His Book of Job bears the Image of these times, and presents us with a resemblance of the past, present, and (much hoped for) future condition of this Nation. As the personal prosperity of Job, so his troubles look like our National troubles; and why may not the parallel be made up, by a likeness in our Restauration? Job was the most flourishing, the greatest man of all the men of the East. We are the greatest, and lately were the most flourishing Nation, of all the Nations of the North. Our Oxen (like his) were strong to labour, our Sheep brought forth Thousands and Ten thousands in our Streets, our Garners were full, affording all manner of Store; our Sons (like his) as plants grown up in their Youth, our Daughters as Corner-stones polished after the similitude of a Palace. There was no breaking-in, nor going-out, no complaining (in reference to outward wants) in our Streets. We washed our steps with Butter, and the Rock poured us out Rivers of Oyl. The Candle of God shined upon our Heads, and the secret of God was upon our Tabernacles: Our Roots were spread out by the Waters, and the dew (of blessings) lay all night upon our Branches. Unto us the Nations gave ear and waited, and kept silence at our Counsel; after our words, they spake not again, and our speech dropped upon them: If we laughed on them, they believed it not: our glory was fresh in us, and the light of our countenance they cast not down: we chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a King in the Army, as one that comforteth the Mourners. Surely, a happy people were we, being in such a case, yea most happy were we, having the Lord (many wayes declaring himself) for our God. And had we (as these mercies did oblige us) fill'd up, or labour'd to fill up th'other part, the better part of Job's character; Had we been a People perfect and upright, fearing God and eschewing evil: We might (according to the promis'd, and often experienc'd tenour of Gods dealing with his people) have continued and encreased in all that happiness unto this day.

But we (herein unlike to Job, and, like a foolish Nation and unwise) have ill-requited the Lord, yea, we have requited the Lord with evil, for, and in the midst of all this Goodness: Our Provocations have been many, and our Backslidings have been multiplied. Our sins have put a Sword into the Hand of God: And God in Justice, hath put a Sword into the Hands of men skilful to destroy. Our young men are slain by the edge of the Sword, and the stink of our Camps comes up into our Nostrils. How many sad Messengers have hastened unto us (as unto Job) with the Reports of Cities Surrendred and Plundred, of Towns Fired and Pillaged, of Villages and Countries laid Waste, and almost Desolate! Now seeing all this is come upon us, is it not time for us (with Job) to rent our Garments (yea our hearts with godly sorrow) and falling upon the ground, worship God, and say, The Lord hath (freely) given, and the Lord hath (justly) taken; Blessed be the Name of the Lord? Our sins have brought these sorrows, let not our sorrows bring in more sin, by causing us to murmur against, or charge God foolishly.

God never sends such Troubles upon a Nation (he doth sometimes upon a Person, and did upon Job) without cause; that is, without respecting sin as a cause. Job might say (in one sence) My Uprightness and my Integrity have procured these things unto me; But we must say, our way and our doings have procured these things unto us: This is our wickedness.

Yet (though all this evil hath been done by us, though all these evils are come upon us, yet) there is hope in our Israel concerning this thing; yea, I believe, there is mercy in and from all these evils, to us and all the Israel of our God. Only what Integrity we have, let us still hold it stedfastly; what evils are (and what evils almost are not?) amongst us, let us reform them speedily: Without this, at least, without hearty desires, and faithful endeavours after this, we may presume, but we cannot believe or hope our Deliverance. I grant, that whensoever God restores us, he must restore us freely; and must both make us good, and do us good, for his own Name sake, in Jesus Christ. For as he hath punished us less then our sins deserve, so whensoever, or in what degree soever he restores us, it will be more then any, or all our Repentings and Reformings can deserve: yet he commands us to Repent and Reform, that we may be restored. God never delivered any people for their Repentance, and rarely any (if any) without Repentance. Yea, I may say it plainly, that he never delivered any (in Mercy) without Repentance; for either he gave them Repentance before they were delivered, or Repentance tance (which is far the greater blessing of the two) with the Deliverance. Better have our Troubles continue, then our Sins continue. To have Peace return, and our Hearts unturn'd, were infinitely worse then War.

And as Repentance is better then Peace, so it will be an Argument, that we shall have Peace: May we not well conclude that God is upon the giving-hand, when he gives a new Heart? And that he hath somewhat else to give, when he hath given a love unto, and a longing after his Truth?

When God feeds us with (and we have a right taste of) this Manna in our Wilderness, we may rest assured that God hath humbled us all this while (and all the while his Wisdom shall see fit to humble us yet, will be) only to prove us, that he may do us good at our latter end, and make this Nation (at least) like Job, in the end which he will make.

Ye have heard of the Patience of Job, and what end the Lord made: Could we but hear of the Repentance of England, all the world (I am perswaded) should hear and wonder at the end, which the Lord would make: Even such an end as he made for Job, if not better; he would give us twice as much in Temporals, double Riches, double Oxen and Sheep, double Bracelets and Ear-rings, double Gold and Silver, double Sons and Daughters: And he would give us (which is not specified in the Inventory of Job's repair) seven-fold more in Spirituals, seven-fold more Knowledge of his Truth, Purity in his Worship, Order in his House; he would make the light of our Moon to be like the light of the Sun, and the light of our Sun to be seven-fold, as the light of seven dayes, in the day wherein he binds up our outward breaches, and heals the stroak of our wound. Thus, we may look to be restored (not only as Job) to more in kind, but to better in kind, I am sure to better in degree: We may look, that, for Brass we shall have Gold, or our Gold more refined; that, for Iron we shall have Silver, or our Silver more purified; that, for Wood we shall have Brass, or our Brass better furbished; that, for Stones we shall have Iron, or our Iron better tempered; We may look, that, our Officers shall be Peace, and our Exactors righteousness, that Violence shall no more be heard in our Land, wasting nor destruction within our borders, but men shall call our Walls Salvation and our Gates Praise.

When these glorious issues of our Troubles shall be, is in his Hand, who held Job's Estate in his Hand, so fast, that Satan could not touch a Sheep or a Shoo-latchet, till himself willed; and who, when his time came, restored Job's Estate double, to a Sheep and a Shoo-latchet, whether Satan and his Sabeans would or no. We have already seen, in Job, an Epitome of our former prosperity and of our present Troubles: the good Lord hasten the latter part of our National likeness unto him, in the doubled (and O that it might be a seven-fold) restauration of our Peace and Truth.

In the mean time these Meditations upon this Scripture, well digested and taken-in, may be (through the blessing of God upon them) a help to our Patience, in bearing those afflictions upon the Land, a help to our Faith in believing, lieving, and to our hope in waiting for the Salvations of the Lord. Whatsoever things were written afore-time, were written for our Learning (but this Book was purposely written) that we through patience and comfort of this Scripture might have hope. Nor do I doubt, but that the Providence of God (without which a Sparrow falls not to the ground*) directed my thoughts to this Book, as (not only* profitable for all times, but) specially seasonable for these times. It is a word in season, and therefore should, as a word upon the Wheels, make a speedy passage into all our Hearts: And how should it not? While we remember that these Wheels are Oyl'd with Blood, even with the Heart-blood of Thousands of our dearest Friends and Brethren.

I find, that this is not the first time, that this Book hath been undertaken by way of Exposition, in such a time as this. Lavater a faithful Minister of the Tygurine Church, opened this Scripture in Preaching, and Printed it in the German Tongue, which was afterwards published in Latine by Hartmanus Sprunglius (as himself expresses in the Title) to support and refresh the afflicted minds of the godly in that last (as he then supposed) and saddest declining Age of the world.

n. 1552 Ferus (a Popish Fryer, but very devout according to the Devotion of that Religion*) Preacher at* Mentz, chose this Scripture in the time of War and publick Calamity (as the Title also of his Book holds forth) to Comfort his Citizens. In his fourth Sermon he makes this observable digression. You know (saith he to his Hearers) that I began to Expound this History of Job, to the end I might Comfort and Exhort you to Patience in these troublesom times. This was and is my Intendment, this moved me to Handle and Explain this Book. But now in my very Entrance upon it, the Storm grows so black, that I see you amazed, dejected, and almost desperate: Some are flying, others are preparing to flye; and in this great Calamity, no man is found to comfort his Brother: But every one increases his Neighbours fear, by his own fearfulness. He prescribes (as far as their Principles will admit) Cordials for the Reviving of their Spirits, and Medicine for the Cure of these Distempers. The whole Book of Job, is a Sacred Shop, stor'd with Plenty and Variety of both: that you may open your Hearts to Receive, and with Wisdom to Apply the Consolations and Instructions here tender'd from this part of it, is (and through the strength of Christ*) shall be, the Desire and Prayer of*

THE INTRODUCTION,

Opening the NATURE, PARTS and SCOPE of the whole BOOK.

IT was the personal wish and resolution of the Apostle Paul, I had rather speak five words with my understanding, then ten thousand words in an unknown tongue. 1 Cor. 14. 19. And surely it is far better to speak or hear five words of Scripture with our understandings, then ten thousand words, yea, then the whole Scriptures, while we understand them not. Now, what an unknown tongue, about which the Apostle disputeth, is in reference unto all, the same is the Scripture unto most, even in their own tongue, that which they understand not. For as an unknown tongue doth always hide the meaning of words from us; so do oft-times the spiritualness and mysteriousness of the matter. While a man speaks in a strange language, we hear a sound, but know not the words; and while a man speaks in our own language, though we know the words, yet we may not understand the meaning; and then he that speaks, is to us in that reference (so the Apostle calls him) a Barbarian. While the Leafs of the Book are opened, and read to such, or by such, the sence is shut up and sealed.

When the Apostle Philip heard the Æthiopian Eunuch read the Prophet Isaiah as he travelled in his Chariot, he said to him, Understandest thou what thou readest? The Eunuch answered, How should I, unless some man would guide me? He understood the Language; but the meaning was under a vail. The very same may we say to many, who read the Scriptures, Understand you what you read? And they may answer as the Eunuch did, How can we, except we have some man to guide us? Yea, and alas, for all the guiding of man, they may answer, how can we, except we have the Spirit of God to guide us? He hath his Pulpit in heaven, who teacheth hearts the heart of Scripture. Acts 8. 30

Paul (we know) was a learned Pharisee, and much vers'd in the Law, and yet he saith of himself before his conversion, That he was without the Law: but when Christ came to him, then the Commandment came to him. I was once without the Law, but when the Commandment came, that is, when Christ came, and his Spirit came in or after my conversion, and expounded the Commandment to my heart, then the Commandment came, &c. to my heart in the power of it, and I understood to purpose what the Law was. So that the teachings of the Spirit, the teachings of God himself, are chiefly to be looked after, and prayed for, that we may know the mind of the Spirit, the Will of God in Scripture. Rom. 7. 9.

But he hath set up this Ordinance, the Ordinance of Interpretation to do it by; both that the Scripture might be translated out of the Original, into the common language of every Nation (which the Apostle calls Interpreting in that place before cited) and also that the original sence of the Scripture might be translated into the mind and understanding of every man; which is the work we aim at, and now have in hand. 1 Cor. 14. 13.

Before I begin that, give me leave to beseech you in the name of Christ, to take care for the carrying on of this work, a degree further: I mean, to translate the sence of Scripture into your lives, and to expound the Word of God by your works; Interpret it by your feet, and teach it by your fingers (as Solomon speaks in another sence) that is, let your workings and your walkings be Scripture explications. It is indeed a very great honour unto this City, that you take care for a Commentary on the Scripture in writing; but if you will be careful and diligent to make a Commentary upon the Scripture by living, or to make your lives the Commentary of Scripture, this will make your City glorious indeed. Prov. 6. 13.

It is the Apostles testimony of his Corinthians, Ye (saith he) are our Epistle, forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the Epistle of Christ, ministred by us, written not with Ink, but with the Spirit of the living God, not in Tables of Stone, but in fleshly Tables of the Heart. Give us, we beseech you, the same occasion of glorying on your behalf, that we may say, You are our Exposition, forasmuch as you are manifestly declared in your practice to be the Exposition of the mind of Christ ministred unto you by us. A walking, a breathing Commentary goeth infinitely beyond the written, or spoken Commentary. And as the Apostle makes his Conclusion (before noted) I had rather speak five words with my understanding, then ten thousand words in an unknown tongue: So I say, I had rather know five words of Scripture by my own practice and experience, then ten thousand words of Scripture, yea, then the whole Scripture, by the bare exposition of another. And therefore let the words of Christ by these verbal Explications, dwell richly in your understandings in all wisdom: And by a practical Application, let it be held forth plentifully in your lives in all holiness. Add Commentary to Commentary, and Exposition to Exposition: Add the Comment of works to this Comment of words; and an Exposition by your lives, to this Exposition by our labours. Surely if you do not, these Exercises will be costly indeed, and will come to a deep account against you before the Lord. If you are lifted up to Heaven by the opening of the Scripture (which is either a carrying you up to Heaven, or a bringing of Heaven down to you) and then walk groveling upon the earth; how sore will the Judgment be! But it is to me an Argument and an Evidence from Heaven, that God hath put it into your hearts to be more glorious in the practice of holiness, because he hath put it into your hearts to desire more the knowledge of holiness. 2 Cor. 3. 2, 3.

To draw in my speech nearer to the business. Having a Book full of very various matter before me, give me leave to premise some things in the general, and something more particularly by way of Preface, concerning the Book, before we come to the handling of the Text.

First, For the general. That which God speaks concerning the whole work of Creation, we may speak concerning the whole Book of Scripture, It is very good. Solomon observes, That wheresoever the wisdom of God speaks, it spake of excellent things. And David, to quicken our endeavours, and excite our diligence to the study of the Word, preferreth it in worth above thousands of Gold and Silver, and in sweetness above the honey and the honey-comb. And when he ceaseth to compare, he beginneth to admire, Wonderful are thy Testimonies. And well may that be called Wonderful, which proceedeth from the God of Wonders. All Scripture is given by divine inspiration, or by inspiration from God; and I need not stay to shew you the excellency of any part, when I have but pointed at such an Original of the whole. Gen. 1. 31. Prov. 8. 6. 2 Tim. 3. 16.

As therefore the whole Scripture (whether we respect the Majesty of the Author, the height and purity of the matter, the depth or perspicuity of the stile, the dignity or variety of occurrences; whether we consider the art of compiling, or the strength of arguing) disdains the very mention of comparison with any other humane Author whatsoever; so are comparisons in it self, as Book with Book, Chapter with Chapter, dangerous. There is not in this great Volume of holy counsel, any one Book or Chapter, Verse or Section, of greater power or authority then other. Moses and Samuel, the writings of Amos the Shepherd, and of Isaiah a Descendant of the blood Royal; the writings of the Prophets and Evangelists, the Epistles of Paul, and this History of Job, must be received (to use the words of the Trent Councel in the fifth Session, but to far better purpose) Pari pietatis affectu, with the same holy reverence and affection. They use it about Traditions, matching Traditions with the Scriptures; but we may fully match all Scripture together, and say, all must be received with the same devotion and affection.

Yet notwithstanding, as the parts of Scripture were penned by divers Secretaries, published in divers places, in divers ages, on divers occasions, for divers ends; so the argument and subject matter, the method and manner of composing, the texture and the stile of writing, are likewise different. Some parts of Scripture were delivered in Prose, others in Verse or Numbers: some parts of the Scripture are Historical, shewing what hath been done; some are Prophetical, shewing what shall be done; others are Dogmatical or Doctrinal, shewing what we must do, what we must believe. Again, some parts of Scripture are clear and easie, some are obscure and very knotty: some parts of Scripture shew what God made us, others, how sin spoiled us: a third, how Christ restored us. Some parts of Scripture shew forth acts of mercy to keep us from sinking; others record acts of judgment to keep us from presuming. And because the way to Heaven is not strewed with Roses, but, like the the Crown of Christ here upon earth, set with thorns; because not smiles and loving imbracements from the world, but wounds, and stroaks, and temptations, do await all those that have received the press-money of the Spirit, and are enrolled for the Christian warfare: because every true Israelite must expect that which Jacob upon his death-bed spake of Joseph, that the Archers will shoot at him, hate him, and grieve him: In a word, because many are the troubles of the righteous; therefore the Scripture doth present us with sundry platforms of the righteous conflicting with many troubles.

Now these considerations that are scattered severally thorough the whole Scripture, seem all concentred, and united together in this Book of Job: which if we consider in the stile and form of writing, is in some part of it Prose, as the two first Chapters and part of the last, and the rest is Verse. If we consider it in the manner of delivery, it is both dark and clear: If we consider the subject matter of it, it is both Historical, Prophetical, and Doctrinal. In it is a mixture of mercy tendred unto, of judgments threatned against, and inflicted upon the wicked: In it is a mixture of the greatest outward blessings, and the greatest outward afflictions upon the godly, concluding in the greatest deliverances of the godly from affliction. In this last the Book is chief; there was never any man under a warmer Sun of outward prosperity then Job was; neither was there ever any man in a hotter fire of outward affliction then Job was, God seeming to give charge concerning this trial of Job, as King Nebuchadnezzer did concerning the three children, to have the furnace heated seven times hotter then ordinary. This is the general concerning the Book.

Now more particularly; I will not detain you in that Proemial disquisition about the Author and Penman of this Book; there is great variety of Judgment about it, some say it was one of the Prophets, but they know not who; some ascribe it to Solomon, some to Elihu, not a few to Job himself; but most give it to Moses. That resolution of Beza in the point shall serve me, and may satisfie you. It is very uncertain who was the Writer of this Book (saith he) and whatsoever can be said concerning it, is grounded but upon very light conjecture. And therefore, where the Scripture is silent, it can be of no great use for us to speak, especially seeing there is so much spoken as will find us work, and be of use for us: neither need we trouble our selves (being assured that the Spirit of God indited the Book) who it was that held the pen. Only take this, that it is conceived to be the first piece of Scripture that was written; take it to be written by Moses, and then it is most probable that he writ it before the deliverance of the people of Israel out of Egypt, while he was in Midian.

Neither will I stay you in the second place about the inquiry into, or rather about the refutation of that fancy; that this whole Book is a Parable rather then a History, like that of Lazarus in the Gospel, not a thing really acted, but only a representation of it. Now this (which was the dream of many of the Jews and Talmudists, and is fastned with no small clamor upon Luther by the Jesuites) may clearly be convinced both by the names of places and persons (which we shall have occasion to open when we come to the Book it self) and also by those allegations of the Prophets and of the Apostles concerning Job; the Prophet Ezekiel quoting him with Noah and Daniel, two men that unquestionably were extant, and acted glorious parts in the world, and therefore Job also. All that I will say in particular, shall be in these three things.

Luk. 15. & 16.

Ezek. 14. 14.

First, to shew you more distinctly the subject of this Book.

Secondly, The parts and division of it.

Thirdly, The use or scope and intendment of it.

First, For the subject of this Book, we may consider it, either as principal, or as collateral.

The main and principal subject of this Book is contained (and I may give it you) in Psal. 34. 1. Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of all.

Psal. 34. 19

Concerning this subject, there are two great Questions handled and disputed fully and clearly in this Book. The first is this, Whether it doth consist with the Justice and goodness of God to afflict a righteous and sincere person, to strip him naked, to take away all his outward comforts. Or, Whether it doth consist with the Justice and goodness of God, that it should go ill with those that are good, and that it should go well with those that are evil. This is one great debate, the main Question thoroughout the Book. And then secondly, here is another great dispute in reference to the former; Namely, whether we may judge of the righteousness, or unrighteousness, of the sincerity or hypocrisie of any person, by the outward dealings and present dispensations of God towards him. That is a second Question here debated.

The friends of Job maintained the first Question Negatively, the latter Affirmatively. They denied that God in Justice could afflict a righteous and a holy man. They affirmed, that any man so afflicted is unrighteous, and may so be judged, because afflicted. And so the whole argument and dispute, which the friends of Job brought, may be reduced to this one Syllogism. He that is afflicted and greatly afflicted, is certainly a great open sinner or a notorious hypocrite: But Job, thou art afflicted, and thou art great afflicted; therefore certainly thou art, if not, a great open sinner, yet a notorious hypocrite.

Job, as constantly and as vehemently maintaineth both those questions in the contrary sence. He acknowledged himself to be a sinner, yet he stiffly denied that he was a hypocrite; he disclaimed his own righteousness in point of Justification, yet he justified himself in point of uprightness. And as for the sinfulness of his nature and of his life, he was willing (except known or wilful, in sincerity) to own both, and charge himself faster then his friends could, appealing to, and triumphing in free grace for full pardon.

This one Syllogism (I say) is the sum of all the dispute, between Job and his three friends; this is (as it were) the hinge upon which the whole matter turned.

But besides these, there are many discourses falling in collaterally, which concur to make up the subject of this book: For, as it is with those that study the Philosophers-stone, the great thing they aim at, is to make Gold, &c. that's the principal, the chief end: yet collaterally they find out many excellent things, many profitable experiments have been made, many rare secrets have been discovered in prosecuting of that great design. So although this be the principal subject of the Book, yet collaterally for the carrying on of these disputes, many other rare and excellent, heavenly, spiritual and useful truths are handled and discovered. As to give you some particular instances.

First, We have the Character of a discreet and faithful Master and Father in a family, and the special duties which concern those relations; the doctrine of the Oeconomicks is often touched in this Book.

Secondly, We have here the Character of a faithful, zealous and just Magistrate in the Common-wealth, how he ought to behave himself, and what his duty is, set down also plainly and clearly by occasion of this dispute.

Thirdly, We have a great discovery made in the secrets of nature. The bowels of nature are as it were ript open, and and the great works of Creation are here displayed. In this you have discourses of the Heavens, of the Earth, of the Sun, Moon, and Stars; of those Meteors, the Hail, the Snow, the Frost, the Ice, the Lightning and the Thunder. In this you have discourses of Jewels, of Minerals, and of Metals; in this, of Beasts, and Birds, and Creeping things. So that by occasion of this dispute, a discourse is carried about all the world, in the whole circuit of natural knowledge or Philosophy.

Fourthly, Here are discourses of Christian Morals, of the duties of equity from man to man: Of the duties of piety which man oweth to God, of the duties of sobriety and temperance towards a mans own self. Yea here we find the great duty of Faith, the matter of believing in the Redeemer of the world, our Lord Jesus Christ.

Lastly, Here are many discoveries made of God, in Himself and his Attributes; in his Power, Wisdom, Justice, Goodness and Faithfulness; yea, whatsoever may be known of God in any of these, is some way or other here discovered. So then, all being summed up together, it may well be said concerning this Book, that it is Βίβλος παντοδαπός, a Book containing all excellencies, of Wisdom and Holiness; and what (as some of the Jews and Rabbins say of it) in other Books, is here a little and there a little, is all plentifully gathered together in this. In a word, it is a Summary, a Compendium of all Knowledge, both Humane and Divine, both concerning our selves, and concerning God. So much of the subject of this Book, both Principal and Collateral.

The second general to be considered is the division of this Book. We may consider it in reference to the division; First, as it a Dialogue (for so some call the whole Book) which is an interchangeable discourse concerning any subject or matter whatsoever. And taking it in that notion, we may divide it by the Collocutors or Speakers, and by the several speeches which they made.

The Collocutors or Speakers in this Book, are Eight.

1. God.
2. Satan.
3. Job.
4. Job's Wife.
5. Eliphaz.
6. Bildad.
7. Zophar.

} Job's three Friends.

8. Elihu, Who cometh in as a Moderator of that dispute.

Their Speeches which they make, are in the whole compass of the Book, thirty two distinctions.

There are two Dialogues between God and Satan. One between Job and his Wife. Three between Job and Eliphaz. Three between Job and Bildad. Two between Job and Zophar. Two between God and Job. And then we have Elihu making four distinct Speeches or Orations which have no Answer. And lastly, two several Speeches or Parables (as they are called) of Job, one in Chap. 27. 1. and the other in Chap. 29. 1. So that, sum up all these together, and you may divide the whole Book into thirty two distinct or several Speeches, either by way of position, or answer, or reply, or determination. God speaks four times, Satan twice, Job's wife once, Job thirteen times, Eliphaz thrice, Bildad thrice, Zophar twice, Elihu four times.

Or if we should consider the Book as a Disputation (which is higher then a Dialogue) so you may distinguish it, by the Opponents, by the Respondents, and by the Moderators.

The Opponents are three. Job's three friends.

Job himself is Respondent. The Moderators are,

First, Elihu, he cometh in first as an Umpire between them.

Secondly, God himself at last, out of the whirle-wind giveth the decisive determinative voice and sentence. He states the question fully for Job, and reproveth Job's friends, as not having disputed and argued aright concerning him.

Yet further, We may divide the Book into five Sections, whereof

The first doth set forth the happiness and fulness of Job's outward estate; and the integrity and perfection of his spiritual estate. And that is contained in the first five verses.

The second presents Job's affliction, Job's fall, the great and sore calamity which in a moment did overtake him, with the occasion of it. And this you have set forth from vers. 5. exclusively to vers. 9. of Chap. 2.

Thirdly, We have the questions, the debates and disputes which did arise upon and about the fall of Job into that sad condition: which are contained from vers. 9. of Chap. 2. to the end of Chap. 31.

Fourthly, We have the moderation or determination of this dispute and of this argument, first by Elihu, and then by God himself, from the beginning of Chap. 32. to vers. 7. of Chap. 42. All which is but as a determination or stating of the Question.

Fifthly and lastly, We have the restitution of Job, his restoring and setting up again, and the repairing of his estate, and making of it double to what formerly it had been. And that is begun and continued from vers. 7. of Chap. 42. to the end of the Book. So here you have a five-fold division of the Book.

Once more, We may divide the Book into three parts. And so it sets forth,

First, Job's happy condition, both in regard of Externals and Internals, in the first five verses.

Secondly, Job's fall, Job's calamity, Job's trouble, from that, to vers. 7. of Chap. 42.

Thirdly, Job's restitution or restoring, from thence to the end.

Take the Book in this division, and it seems to hold forth to us such a representation of Job, as is given us in the three first Chapters of Genesis concerning man. In those three first Chapters, we have man set forth,

First, In the excellency and dignity of his Creation, being Lord and Soveraign of all, adorn'd with that integrity and purity of nature which God had planted in, and stamped upon him at his Creation. And in the beginning of this Book, we have Job like a man in innocency, shining in all his dignity, compass'd about with blessings of all sorts, blessings of the body, blessings of the soul, blessings of this life and of that which is to come.

Secondly, There we find the Devil plotting the ruine of man, and we find his plot taking for a while, and in a great measure prevailing. So here in this Book we have the Devil begging Job's ruine, and having obtained leave, so far as concerned his outward estate and body, quickly puts it in execution.

Thirdly, There we have Adam by Gods free mercy and promise restored to a better estate in Christ through the grace of Redemption, then he had before in himself, by the goodness of Creation. So here we have Job, through the mercy, power, and faithfulness of God, restored to all he had, and more; we see him repaired and set up again after his breaking, not only with a new stock, but a greater: his estate being doubled, and his very losses proving beneficial to him. This may suffice for the division or parts of the Book, which, I conceive, may shed some light into the whole.

Now for the third thing which I proposed, which was the use, or scope, or intendment of this Book. For that is a special thing we are to carry before us in our eye in the reading of Scripture. It is possible for one to understand the subject, and to know the parts, and yet not to be attentive to find out, or distinctly to find out what the mind of God is, or whereat he specially drives and aimeth. Therefore it will be very profitable to us likewise to consider what the tendency and intendment, or (as I may so speak) the Uses of this Book are.

First, It aims at our Instruction, and that in divers things.

First, (Which much concerns every Christian to learn,) it instructeth us how to handle a Cross: How to behave our selves when we are in a conflict, whether outward or inward: What the postures of the Spiritual War are; and with what patience we ought to bear the hand of God, and his dealings with us. This, I say, is set forth by the Scripture in other places to be the main, and one of the principal ends or intendments or Uses of this Book. This the Apostle James speaks of, You have heard of the patience of Job; as if he should say, do you not know why the Book of Job was written? Why God in his providence did bring such a thing to pass concerning Job? It was that all men should take notice of his patience, and might learn the wisdom of suffering, that noble art of enduring. Jam. 5. 11

Job was full of many other excellent graces, and indeed he had all the graces of the Spirit of God in him. But the Patience of Job was the principal grace. As it is with natural men, they have every sin in them; but there are some sins which are the Master sins, or some one sin it may be doth denominate a wicked man; sometimes he is a proud man, sometimes he is covetous, sometimes he is a deceiver, sometimes he is an oppressor, sometimes he is unclean, sometimes he hath a profane spirit, and so the like; like; some one great Master lust doth give the denomination to the man: he hath all other sins in him, and they are all reigning in him; but one as it were reigneth above the rest, and sits uppermost in his heart. So it is with the Saints of God (and here with Job) every Saint and servant of God hath all grace in him, every grace in some degree or other, for all the limbs and lineaments of the new man are formed together in the soul of those that are in Christ. But there is some special grace which doth give (as it were) the denomination to a servant of God. As that which gave the denomination to Abraham, was Faith; and that which gave the denomination to Moses, was Meekness; and so this which giveth the denomination to Job, is Patience; and so the denomination too of this whole History, as if that were the great lesson that were to be taken out, the lesson of suffering and of patience: So that what the Apostle makes to

Rom. 14. be the Use of all Scripture, What soever (saith he) were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. That, I say, which the Apostle there makes to be the end and scope of the whole Scripture, doth seem to be in special the principal and chief end of writing this Book of Job.

Secondly, Another Instruction which we are to take from the whole Book, is this; God would have us learn, that, Afflictions come not by chance, that they are all ordered by providence; in the matter, in the manner, and the measure; both for the kinds and for the degrees, they are all ordered, even the very least, by the wisdom, by the hand and providence of God.

Thirdly, Another thing which we are to learn generally from this Book, is this, The Soveraignty of God; that he hath power over us, over our estates, and over our bodies, and over our families, and over our spirits; that he may use us as he pleaseth, and we must be quiet under his hand; when he cometh and will take all from us, all our comforts, we must give all glory to him. This Book is written for this especially, to teach us the Soveraignty of God, and the submission of the creature.

Fourthly, It teacheth us, That God doth sometimes afflict his children out of prerogative; that though there be no sin in them which he makes the occasion of afflicting them (such was Job's case) yet for exercise of his graces in them, for trial of their graces, or to set them up for patterns to the world, God may and doth afflict them. Though no man be without sin, yet the afflictions of many are not for their sins.

Fifthly, There is this general Instruction which God would have us learn out of this Book, namely, that the best begotten, and the best founded estate in outward things, is uncertain; that there is no trusting to any creature-comforts. God would unbottom us quite from the creature, by holding forth this History of Job unto us.

Sixthly, God would also shew forth this for our learning, viz. The strength, the unmoveableness of faith, how unconquerable it is, what a kind of omnipotency there is in grace. God would have all the world take notice of this in the Book of Job, that a godly person is in vain assaulted by friends or enemies, by Men or Devils, by wants or wounds: Though he be even benighted in his spirit, though God himself take away the light of his countenance from him, yet God would have us learn and know, that over all these a true believer is more then a conqueror. For here is one of the greatest battels fought, that ever was between man and man, between man and Hell, yea between God and man: yet Job went away with the victory; True grace is often assaulted, it never was or ever shall be overthrown.

Seventhly, This also we may learn, That God never leaves or forsakes his totally or finally.

Eighthly, Lastly, The book teacheth this general lesson: That the judgments of God are often times very secret, but they are never unjust. That though the creature be not able to give a reason of them, yet there is infinite reason for them.

These are the general Uses from the general scope and intendment of this Book by way of instruction.

Secondly, This Book serves to convince and reprove that slander of worldly men and of Satan, who say that the people of God serve him for their own ends, that they follow him for loaves, that they attend upon him for an estate, for creature-comforts and concernments. The Lord did on purpose cause these things to be acted, and this History to be penned, for ever to stop the mouth of Satan and all iniquity, and to shew that his people follow him for love, for the excellency they find in him and in his service. Though he strip them naked of all they have, yet they will cleave to him. Here is one Confutation.

Secondly, It is to convince and reprove all those, who judge of the spiritual estate of those that are under the hand of God in sore afflictions by some unbecoming and rash speeches, which may fall from them in the time of those their conflicts, when troubles and sufferings are upon them.

Thirdly, To convince and confute those who judge of mens spiritual estates, by Gods dealing with them in their outward estates.

Fourthly, To convince and confute that cursed opinion, that a man may fall finally and totally away from grace and from the favour of God. God hath shewed by this History, that such an opinion is a lye. If ever any man were in danger of falling quite away from grace received, or might seem to have lost the favour of God, formerly shewed, surely it was Job: and if he were upheld in the grace of holiness, and continued in the grace of Gods love, notwithstanding all that came upon him; certainly God would have all the world know that free grace will uphold his for ever.

Fifthly, To convince all those of pride and extream presumption, who think to find out and to trace the secrets of Gods counsel, the secrets of Gods eternal decrees, the secrets of all his works of providence: Whereas God sheweth them in this Book, that they are not able to find out, or comprehend his ordinary works, those which we call the works of nature, the things of creation, the things that are before them, which they converse with every day, which they see and feel, and have in their ordinary use. They are not able to find out the secrets of the Air, of the Meteors, of the Waters, of the Earth, of Beasts or Birds; every one of these puts the understanding of man to a stand, and pose his reason; they are not able to comprehend the works of Creation, how are they able then to find out the counsels of God in his Decrees and purposes and judgements? And for that end it is that God sets forth here so much of the works of nature, that all men may be stopp'd in that presumptuous way of searching too far into his counsels. Here is another Use or scope of this Book.

Thirdly, There is much for Consolation.

First, That all things do work for the good of those that love God.

Second Consolation is this, That no temptation shall ever take hold of us, but such as God will either make us able to bear, or make a way to escape out of it. We can be in no condition cast so low, but the hand of God can reach us, find us out, send in deliverance, and raise us up again.

Lastly, Here are two general Exhortations.

First, We are exhorted to the Meditation and Admiration of the power and wisdom of God from all the Creatures. This is a duty which this Book leads us unto, for that is the end why so much is spoken concerning the works of Creation, that (as the Apostle saith) The invisible things of him from the Creation of the world, may be clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead. Rom. 1. 20

Secondly, To glorifie God in every condition, to have good thoughts of God, to speak good words for God in every condition. We are drawn to this, by considering how Job (though sometimes in vehemency of spirit he over-shot himself, yet he recovers again, and) breaths sweetly concerning God, shewing that his spirit was full of sweetness towards God, even when God was writing bitter things against him; as when he saith, Though he kill me, yet will I trust in him; then which, what could express a more holy and submissive frame of heart, in reference to the dealings of God with him? Surely he thought God was very good to him, who had that good thought of God, To trust him, even while he slew him.

These things being proposed concerning the Book in general, will help to cast a light thorough the whole at one view. And though at this time I shall not enter upon expounding of the Text it self, yet you have had in some sence, the Exposition of the whole Text. If you carefully lay up these Rules, they will much advantage and advance your profit, when we come to the Explication of any part.

AN

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Observations UPON THE THREE FIRST CHAPTERS Of the Book of JOB.

CHAP. 1. Vers. 1, 2.

There was a man in the Land of Uz, whose Name was JOB, and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil.

And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters.

THis Chapter may be divided into three Parts; whereof the first contains a Description of JOB in his prosperous estate; from the first, to the end of the fifth Verse.

In the second, we have the first part of JOB's Affliction; set down from the sixth verse, to the end of the nineteenth.

In the third, JOB's Carriage and Behaviour in, or his Conquest and Victory over that first Trial, are discovered; this concludes in the three last verses of the Chapter.

The Description of his prosperous Estate is given us in three Points.

First, What he was in person, Verse 1.

Secondly, What in his Possessions: We have an Inventory of his Goods, Verse 2, 3, 4.

Thirdly, What in his Practice of Holiness, Verse 5. Where one Example or Instance is set down for all the rest.

The Book begins with the Description of his Person, in the first Verse; where JOB is described by that which is Accidental, and by that which is Essential:

By Accidentals; so he is described,

1. By the Place where he dwelt; There was a man in the Land of Uz.

2. By his Name; whose Name was JOB.

The Essentials are four qualifications, which were essential to him, not as a Rational man, but as a Holy man; And that man was,

1. Perfect. 2. Upright.
3. One that feared God. 4. Eschewed evil.

As they who write the Acts or Stories of great men, usually give us some Description of their Persons, before they set down their Undertakings or Atchievments (as you see in 1 Sam. 17. 4, 5, 6, 7. how the great Giant Goliah is described) so here, the Holy Ghost, by the Pen-man of this Book, being to record a glorious Combat, a Combat not with Flesh and Blood alone, but with Principalities and Powers, a wrestling with mighty and strong temptations, first gives us (if we may so speak) the Prosopography of this Divine Hero's Soul, the Lineaments and Abilities of his Spirit. This was the height, and this the stature of the Combatant; such were his Limbs, and such his Weapons; there he dwelt, and this was his Name.

There was a man in the Land of Uz, whose name was JOB.

There was] That refers us either to the truth of the Story, or to the time of the Story. Such a man there was, that's certain. Such a man there was, but the time when is uncertain. It refers us to the time only indefinitely: There was such a man, but when, is not exactly and precisely set down. The Scripture (we know) doth often keep an exact account of years (the Scripture is the Guide and Key of all Chronologie) and sometimes it leaves things in general for the time, and only saith thus much, such a thing was, and such a person was; so here. Yet some have undertaken to define (what the Spirit of God hath left at large) the precise time wherein JOB lived *; and tell us in what year of the world these things were done: But I desire not to be so accurate, unless the Rule were so too. Only thus much we we may safely say, that JOB lived between the times of Abraham and Moses; and nearer Moses then Abraham; and for that, I conceive, there is ground sufficient. There are these two special Reasons, why it should be circumscribed within that limit.

1. Because JOB offered Sacrifice at that time in his own Countrey; which, after the giving of the Law, and setting up of a publick worship, was forbidden all, both Jews and Proselytes. They that were acquainted with the wayes of God, knew they must not worship, by Sacrifice, any where but before the Tabernacle, or (after the Temple was built) at the Temple.

2. Because in the whole Book, there is not the least print, or the least mention of any thing, which did concern those great and glorious passages of God's providence towards the people of Israel, either in their going out of Egypt, or in their journey through the Wilderness to Canaan. Now in a Dispute of this nature (such as was between JOB and his Friends) there would have been frequent occasion to have considered and instanced some of those things. There is scarce any Book in Scripture, that bears date after that great and wonderful Dispensation of God, but it makes mention of, or refers to some passages concerning them.

Again, for the time; that which some collect to clear it, is from the Genealogie of JOB: There are three special opinions concerning the Line of his Pedigree.

One, That he descended from Nahor, who was Brother to Abraham, Gen. 22. 21. It was told Abraham, behold Milcah she hath born Children to thy Brother Nahor, Uz his first-born, and Buz his Brother, &c. This Uz who was the first-born of Nahor, Abraham's Brother, is conceived to have given denomination to the Land of Uz, and so from him JOB to be descended.

Another opinion there is (maintained by many) that JOB was of the Line of Esau, and that he was called Jobab by Moses, Gen. 36. 33. And Bela died, and Jobab the Son of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his stead. This Jobab, who was a Descendant, or one of the Dukes of the Line of Esau, they say was JOB. But why the name Jobab should be contracted into JOB, I see little reason offered.

A third Opinion for his Descent is, that he came from the Children of Abraham by his second Wife Keturah, Gen. 25. Where it is said, that Abraham by her had divers sons, and that he gave them Portions, and sent them Eastward into the East-Country; and from Midian (who was the fourth Son of Abraham by that second Marriage) our Genealogies do positively and directly affirm, that JOB was descended.

That may suffice for the time: for bringing of him within a narrower limit, I have no grounds but conjectural.

A man.] He is not called A man (here) barely as the Philosophers Animal rationale, &c. as Man is opposed to a Beast; nor barely is he called a Man to distinguish his Sex, as a Man is opposed to a Woman: but there is somewhat more in the expression; he is called a Man by way of excellency. And for the clearing and opening of that, we may consider that there are three words in Scripture-Original by which man is express'd.

אדם 1. Man is called Adam. That was the proper name of the first man, and it became the common name for all men since. So man was called from the matter of which he was made; Adam from Adamah, because (as the reason is given, Gen. 2. 7.) God made man dust out of the Earth, or, (as we translate) of the dust of the Earth.

אנש 2. Man is called Enosh: So he is called in regard of the infirmities, weaknesses and sorrows which he hath contracted by sin, since the Fall. Sin made the red earth weak and brittle earth indeed, earth moistned with tears, and mixt with troubles.

איש 3. He is called Ish, which the Criticks in that Language, say, comes from, and hath alliance with two words; one signifying Being or Existence, and the other Heat or Fire. So that the excellency of man's being, the heat, courage and spirit that flames in him, is set forth in that word; and that's the word here in the Text, There was a man; it is Ish, an excellent, a worthy man, a man of an excellent spirit, a man of men, a man fitted to honour God, and govern men. And that it is so used in Scripture I will give you an Instance or two, that you may see it is not a bare conjecture.

In the forty ninth Psalm, David, as it were, summons and divides Mankind. In the first verse he summons; Hear this, all ye people, give ear all ye inhabitants of the world. In the second verse he divides; Both low and high, rich and poor together. The word in the Hebrew for high, is Bene-Ish, Sons of Ish; and the word for low, is Bene-Adam, Sons of Adam. If we should translate the Text directly, according to the Letter, the words must run, Sons of men and sons of men; for sons of Adam, and sons of Ish, are both translated sons of men; yet when they are set together in a way of opposition, the one signifieth low, and the other high; and so our Translators render it according to the sence, not Sons of men and Sons of men, but low and high. Junius translates to this sence, though in more words; as well they who are born of mean men, as they who are born of the honourable.

A like Instance we have, Isa. 2. 9. The mean man boweth down, and the great man humbleth himself. The mean man, that is, the Son of Adam; and the great man, that is, the Son of Ish; the great man, in regard of his excellency, is by such a circumlocution described to be more then a man: not only the son of man, but the son of an honourable and great man. So I find the word divers times used, to signifie the excellency and greatness of the person.

Then further, it signifieth, not only a man that is great; but it signifieth a man in authority. There was a man, that is, an excellent man, a man of worth: There was a man, that is, a man in authority. It signifies a Magistrate; and so in divers places of Scripture, Man is put for a Magistrate; especially, when it is expreſt as here, by Ish; Gen. 43. 11. Carry a Present to the man; scil. to the Governour of the Countrey. Jer. 5. 1. Go through Jerusalem, and search, and see if you can find a man. What, were men so scarce in Jerusalem at that time? Was there such a dearth of men, that a man could not be found? Surely no; Jerusalem had throngs of men in every Street. The meaning is then explained in the words following; if there be any that executeth judgment: that is, if there be a Magistrate, a publick man, that's the man I mean.

So in Numb. 27. 16. We find the word to signifie a Magistrate. Let the Lord, the God of the Spirits of all Flesh, set a man over the Congregation. A man, that is, a Magistrate; for there, that's the business; if you read the Text, you will find it, a man in authority, a man fit to rule. And that is it which is meant in Acts 17. 31. concerning Christ, God (saith he) hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the world by that man whom he hath ordained. It noteth Christ the man in power, in authority, because all power in Heaven and in Earth is committed to him. So you know it was usual among the Romans to call their Magistrates by the Names of The men; as the Triumviri, the Septemviri, the Decemviri; to call them sometimes the Three men; sometimes the Seven men, sometimes the Ten men. Those who were the special men in authority, that were men in place and eminency, they carried away the name of men (as it were) from all men, as if they were the only men.

So that we have these two things to take notice of, when it is said here that JOB was a man; you must carry it further then the word is ordinarily taken: He was a great man, he was a man in Authority, a Magistrate. Some carry the Magistracy so high, as to set him on a Throne; affirming that he was a King, a point very much contended for by divers Expositors: but that he was a Magistrate in authority, a Chief in his Countrey, is clear by that which is expres'd of him in Chap. 29. Where he speaks of his deciding mens rights, and executions of Justice.

In the Land of Uz.] I will not trouble you with any Geographical Discourse: In a word, we may consider three things about Uz.

1. Why it was called so.
2. Where it was seated.
3. What manner of People they were that dwelt in Uz.

First, For the Name; let it be taken from Uz, the name of a Man. And there were three called by that Name in Scripture, Gen. 10. 23. Gen. 22. 21. Gen. 36. 28. From either of these JOB's Countrey might derive its Name; but from which of these, would be (I think) a nice debate; yet it is rather ascribed to Uz or Huz, the eldest son of Nahor, Gen. 22. 21.

Secondly, For

Secondly, For the place where it was seated; it is clear that it was upon the Borders of the Sabeans, and of the Caldeans, and of the Arabians, those Eastern People. Some affirm that the Lot of the half Tribe of Manasses on the other side Jordan, which was set forth for them when the People of Israel came into Canaan, was the very place where JOB lived, and that was called Uz. It is clear, that it was near those Parts above-mentioned. First, from Lam. 4. 21. There the Prophet Jeremiah speaking of Uz, saith, Rejoyce and be glad, O Daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the Land of Uz. And Jer. 25. 20. He speaks again of the Land of Uz: All the mingled people, and all the Kings of the Land of Uz, they shall drink of the Cup. He mentions the Cup also in that place, Lam. 4. Rejoyce and be glad, O Daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the Land of Uz; the Cup also shall pass through unto thee. Secondly, Uz bordered upon those Countries; for these People made out their Parties, invaded, slew and took away JOB's Estate, Cattel and Servants; therefore the place, in all probability, lay near these Countries.

For the Condition and Manners of the People; it is generally received, that they were a People prophane in their Lives, and superstitious, at least, in their Worship: Edumeans and Edomites, the Descendants of Esau, bear ill all the Scripture over. Among these JOB lived, among these JOB governed; there he exercised those precious Graces, and practised those excellent Duties both of Holiness toward God, and of Justice toward men. It was in the midst of a sinful and perverse Nation, in the Land of Uz.

Thence observe, First; God hath his Servants in all places, in the worst places.

There was never any Air so bad, but that a Servant of God might breath in it. Here God had a choice piece, even in the Land of Uz, a place of prophaneness; here was Bethel in Bethaven, a House of God in a Land of wickedness. Lot dwelt in Sodom, Joseph in Egypt, David in Mesech and in Kedar, there were Saints in Cæsar's (wicked Nero's) Houshold. Babylon holds many of God's people; yet let them not make such places their refuge, much less their election: but remember the Call, Come out of her my people.

Secondly, We may observe from hence (this being spoken of JOB, to set him forth in the excellency of his spiritual condition, that he lived in the Land of Uz) That

It is a great honour and a high commendation to be good, and do good amongst those that are evil.

You shall be recorded for it. This was one reason why the place is named, that the Honour of JOB might be lifted up; that he was good, not by the example and encouragement, but against the example of others; he was a leading-man himself: though he lived amongst those that were scoffers and wicked, yet JOB was holy. As they say concerning the Affection of Love, it is most unnatural for a man to hate those that love him; it is civil for men to love those that love them; but this is truly Christian, for a man to love those that hate him and do him wrong. So in regard of living and conversing, as of loving and affecting, we may say, it is a most wicked thing to be naught among those that are good; that aggravateth a man's sinfulness, to be unholy while he converseth with those that are holy: It is a good thing to be good with the good, to take example by them; but it is a most excellent thing, a glorious thing to be good among those that are stark naught, to worship God aright among Idolaters, to fear God among those that have no fear of God before their eyes, to be perfect among hypocrites, to be upright among those that are unjust, to eschew evil among those that are altogether wrapt about with evil: this was the honour and commendation of JOB. For a man to be as LOT in Sodom, never touched with Sodom's wickedness, to keep himself pure and sincere, and without rebuke in the midst of a crooked and perverse Generation, to shine as a light in the midst of darkness; this brings honour both to God and man.

Thirdly, From the place where JOB lived, we may observe,

Grace will preserve it self in the midst of the greatest opposition.

It is such a Fire as no water can wholly quench or put out. True Grace will keep it self sound and clean among those who are leprous and unclean; it is such a thing as overcomes and masters all the evil that is about it: God hath put such a mighty power into Grace, that if it once possess the heart in truth, though there be but a little of it, though there be but as much as a grain of Mustard-seed, not all the wickedness in the world, no nor all the Devils in Hell can dispossess it. As all the water in the salt Sea cannot make the Fish salt, but still the Fish retains its freshness; so all the wickedness and filthiness that is in the world, cannot destroy, cannot defile true Grace; that will bear up its head, and hold up it self for ever.

And this man was perfect and upright, one that feared God, and eschewed evil.

Perfect] Not that he had a Legal Perfection; such a perfection as the Papists now contend for, and assert possibly attainable, yea, actually attained by many in this life: For what is man that he should be clean? And JOB himself professeth, Chap. 9. 20. If I say I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse. He acknowledgeth, Chap. 7. 20. I have sinned. The perfection therefore here spoken of, is not an absolute, a legal perfection. תם

For the clearing of the word, we may consider there is a twofold perfection ascribed to the Saints in this life; a perfection of Justification, a perfection of Sanctification.

The first of these, in a strict sence, is a compleat perfection. The Saints are compleat in Christ, they are perfectly justified; there is not any sin left uncovered, nor any guilt left unwashed in the blood of Christ, nor the least spot, but is taken away: His Garment is large enough to cover all our nakedness and deformities. In this respect they may be called perfect, they are perfectly justified: By one Offering Christ hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified, Heb. 10. 14.

Then there is a perfection of holiness or of sanctification; and that is called so, either in regard of the beginnings of, or in regard of desires after, and aims at perfection.

The Saints even in this life have a perfect beginning of Holiness, because they are begun to be sanctified in every part; they are sanctified throughout, in soul, and body, and spirit, as the Apostle distinguisheth, 1 Thes. 5. 23. Though every part be not throughout sanctified, yet they are sanctified in every part throughout; and this is a perfection. When the work of sanctification is begun in all parts, it is a perfect work beginning.

They are likewise perfect in regard of their Desires and intendments. Perfect holiness is the aim of the Saints on earth; it is the reward of the Saints in heaven. The thing which they drive at here, is perfection, therefore they themselves are called perfect. As God accepts of the will for the deed, so he expresseth the deed by the will; he interpreteth him to be a perfect man, who would be perfect; and calls that person perfect, who desires to have all his imperfections cured. That is a second understanding how JOB was perfect.

A third way is this; He was perfect comparatively, comparing him with those who were either openly wicked, or but openly holy; he was a perfect man, he was a man without spot, compared with those, that were either all over spotted with filthiness, or only painted with godliness.

Or thus, We may say the perfection here spoken of, is the perfection of sincerity. JOB was sincere, he was sound at the heart. He did not act a part, or personate Religion, but was a religious person, He was not guilded, but Gold. So the word is interpreted. Some render it, JOB was a simple man, not as simple is put for weak and foolish, but as simple is put for plain-hearted, one that is not (as the Apostle James phraseth it) a double-minded man; JOB was a simple-minded man, or a single-minded man, one that had not a heart and a heart; he was not a compound, speaking one thing, and meaning another; he meant what he spake, and he would speak his mind. It is the same word that is used in Jacob's Character, Gen. 25. 27. Esau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field, and Jacob

Jacob was Ish Tam, a plain man. So that to be a perfect man, is to be a plain man; one whose heart you may know by his Tongue, and read the man's spirit in his actions. Some are such Juglers, that you can see little of their spirits in their lives, you can learn but little of their minds by their words; Jacob was a plain man, and so was JOB; some translate it, a sound man. It is the same Expression that is given of Noah; He was [Tamim] in his generation; or, he was sound, upright-hearted or perfect with God, *Gen.*6.9. And it is that which God speaks to Abraham, Gen. 17. 2. Walk before me, and be thou [Tamim,] be thou perfect, or sound, or upright, or plain in thy walking before me. In Exod. 28. 30. We read of the Urim and Thummim on the Breastplate of the High-Priest. Thummim comes from this Root, and signifies the integrity of heart and life required in the High-Priest, as Urim did the light and clearness of his knowledge.

ישר And upright.] The former word which was translated perfect, in other Texts is rendered upright; but when we have both the Expressions together, as here, we must distinguish the sence: It is not a Tautologie. Then the former being taken for inward soundness, plainness and sincerity; this latter (to be upright) may be taken for outward Justice, righteousness and equity, respecting all his dealings in the world. He was a perfect man, that is, he was plain-hearted, and he was plain-dealing too, which is the meaning of He was upright: So the one refers to the integrity of his spirit, the other to the honesty of his wayes; His heart was plain, and his dealings were square. This he expresseth fully in the 29 and 31 Chapters of this Book; which are, as it were, a Comment upon this word upright. There you may read what is meant by uprightness; his fairness in all parts, both of Commutative and Distributive Justice. In those things that concerned Commutative Justice, when JOB bought or sold, traded or bargained, promised or covenanted, he stood to all uprightly. Take him as he was a Magistrate; when JOB sate in Judgment, or had any Business brought before him, he gave every one his due; he did not spare or smite upon Ends: he did neither at any time justifie the wicked, or condemn the godly; but was upright in Judgment: He was not byas'd by Affection or Interest; he was not carried away by hopes or fears; but kept the path of Justice in all his dispensations toward that people among whom he lived. This is to be an upright man; and so the Prophet tells us, Isa. 26. 7. The way of the just is uprightness; that is, they are upright in their wayes; and more, uprightness in the abstract. We have a like expression, Prov. 29. 27. Those that are upright in the way, are an abomination to the wicked. Uprightness doth refer to the way wherein a man goes in his outward dealings and dispensations towards men. There is a twofold Uprightness of our wayes. 1. Uprightness of words. 2. Of works. So upright walking is expounded and branched forth, Psal. 15. 2, 3. He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his Tongue. This is the second part of JOB's description; He was perfect and upright.

Thirdly, He was One that feared God.

Fearing God.] The Fear of God is taken two wayes. Either for that natural and inward worship of God; and so the fear of God is a holy filial affection, awing the whole man to obey the whole will of God: That is Fear as it is an Affection. Or the Fear of God is put for the external or instituted worship of God. So that a man fearing God, is as much as this; a man worshipping God according to his own will, or according to his mind and direction. Now whenas JOB is said to be a man fearing God, you must take it both these wayes: He had that holy affection of fear with which we must worship God (as we are taught, Heb. 12. 28. Let us have Grace whereby we may serve God with reverence and godly fear. And, serve the Lord with fear, and rejoyce before him with trembling, Ps. 2. Fear is that affection with which we must worship and serve God.) And JOB likewise did perform that worship to God which he required; that is called Fear, and the exercise of it, fearing God: Fearing God, is worshipping God; as you may see clearly by two Texts of Scripture compared together In the Fourth of Matthew, verse 10. Christ saith to the Devil, It is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Compare this with Deut. 6. 13. And there you shall have it thus expresst; Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God: That which in one place is worship, in the other is fear. Again, Mat. 15. 9. In vain (saith Christ) do they worship me, teaching for Doctrine the Commandments of men. Now the Prophet Isaiah (from whence that is taken) Chap. 29. 14. expresseth it thus; Forasmuch as their fear towards me is taught by the precepts of men. They worship me according to the precepts of men, saith Christ. Their Fear is taught by the precepts of men, saith the Prophet: So that Fear and Worship are the same. Fearing God doth include both the Affection of a Worshipper, and the Duty or Act of worshipping.

The fourth part or line of JOB's Character, is, his Eschewing evil.

Evil is here taken for the evil of sin. Before sin came into the world, there was no evil in the world: God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good. But when sin came, which was the first, and is the chiefest evil, it brought in with it all other evils. Sin hath in it the whole nature of evil, and all the degrees of evil; and from it proceed all evil effects: Hence it is eminently called evil. Sickness, and Death, and Hell, are called evil; how much rather that, but for which these evils had never been? how much rather that, with which these compared, may be called good? Further; Evil is put here indefinitely: He was one that eschewed evil; not this or that evil; but evil, that is, all evil; this indefinite is universal. And then further, we are to take evil here, as himself afterward expounds it in his practice, not only for the acts of evil, but all the occasions, the appearances, the provocations and incentives of, or unto evil, or whatsoever might lead him into evil; for thus he instanceth in one particular; I made a Covenant with mine eyes, why then should I think upon a Maid? Chap. 31. 1.

Eschewed.] In this word the prudence of JOB shines as bright as his holiness; who, having received a great stock and treasure of Grace, now watches to preserve it, and opposes whatsoever was destructive to the life or growth of the inner man. That man shews he hath both Money, and his wits about him, who suspects and provides against Thieves.

JOB eschewed evil.] There is much in that expression. It is more to say a man doth eschew evil, then to say a man doth not commit evil. It had been too bare an expression, to say, JOB did not commit evil; but when it is said, JOB eschewed evil, this shews that not only the hand and tongue of JOB did not meddle with evil, but that his heart was turned from evil. For eschewing is a turning aside with reluctancy and abhorrency; so the Hebrew (Sar) imports; JOB did abhor evil, as well as not commit evil. As there is a great deal of difference between these two, the doing of good, and a delight in doing good; between being at peace, and following of peace. A man may do good, and not be a lover of good, a lover of the Commandments of God, a delighter in them; he may be at peace, and not be a lover and follower of peace. So a man may be one that commits not such and such sins; he may do no hurt, and yet in the mean time, he may be one that loves those sins he commits not: Such an one is not presently a man that eschews those sins; for to eschew evil, noteth the activity of the spirit against those evils: That is the spiritualness and strength of holiness: JOB's heart did (as it were) rise against evil. Some expound it by war; as if under this expression, were meant the enmity that JOB did bear against evil; that it was such an eschewing, as when a man hateth his enemy, and makes war against him, and doth by all means oppose him; so there was, as it were, a deadly feud, an irreconcileable enmity between JOB and evil. He was a man that feared God, and eschewed evil. So much for the opening of that first Verse; wherein you have the first part of the Description of JOB's prosperous estate; and that is, what he was in his Person.

That man was perfect and upright.

We will observe hence somewhat in the general first, and then somewhat more particularly.

You see here, when God comes to describe a man, and to set him forth in his Glory and Excellency, where the Spirit of God begins, what is the chief and firſt thing which God takes notice of; it is his Grace. When he would ſet forth what a man JOB was, how bleſſed and how happy; here he ſets his Pen firſt, to deſcribe what his ſpiritual eſtate was. Hence then this in the general:

Spirit

First, Gracious Habits and Spiritual Bleſſings are the choiceſt of all Bleſſings.

If God have given a man Grace, he hath the beſt and the choiceſt of all that which God can give. God hath given us his Son, and God hath given us his Spirit, and God hath given us the Graces of his Spirit; theſe are the fineſt of the Flower, and the Honey out of the Rock of Mercy. Though you ſhould not come to Children, though you ſhould not come to the other part of the Inventory, to Sheep, and Camels, and Oxen, and Aſſes; if you are in the firſt part of the Deſcription, that you have a perfect heart, and upright life, and the fear of God in your inward parts, and a holy turning againſt every evil, your lot is fallen in a fair place, and you have a goodly heritage: they that have this, need not be diſcontented at their own, nor envious at the condition of any other; they have the principal Verb, the one thing neceſſary.

Again, When God deſcribeth a gracious man, you ſee he goes thorough; he ſets him forth in every thing that concerns his ſpiritual eſtate; Perfect and upright, fearing God, and eſchewing evil. From hence, this alſo in the general.

Secondly, Where one Grace is, there is every Grace.

Grace is laid into the Soul in all the parts of it, and there is ſomewhat of every Grace laid into the Soul. We have not one man one Grace, and another man another Grace; but every man hath every Grace that hath any Grace at all. I do not ſay that every man hath every Grace, or that the ſame man hath every Grace in the ſame height and degree: Grace in ſome is more eminent then in others; and the ſame man may have one Grace more eminent then another; he may have one Grace (like Saul among the people) higher by head and ſhoulders then the reſt in his throng of Graces; yet that man hath ſomewhat of every Grace, that hath any Grace; all Grace goes together. Thus in the general.

Particularly; This man was perfect. That is (as we have explained it) he was ſincere and plain-hearted. Obſerve from hence,

First, It is Sincerity that eſpecially commends us unto God.

As JOB's Graces are preferred in his Deſcription, before his Riches, ſo ſincerity is preferred before all his other Graces.

Sincerity is that which makes us ſo acceptable and pleaſing unto God: He was a man that was perfect; you ſee that is put in the firſt place. And indeed, whatſoever a man hath beſides, be a man never ſo juſt in his dealings, could you ſuppoſe a man worſhipping God in all his Ordinances, and avoiding all manner of evil, yet if there be doubling and falſneſs in his ſpirit, all is caſt off, all is rejected of God as abominable. Therefore here the foundation is laid, here is the bottom-Grace, Perfection, Sincerity. Whether it be a diſtinct Grace, or whether it be that which doth accompany every Grace, and gives it life and beauty in the eye of God (for my own part I conceive Sincerity is not properly a diſtinct Grace, but the perfection of every Grace) it is that which doth commend a man unto God. Chriſt tells the Angel of the Church of Sardis, I have not found thy works perfect. Not full; ſaith the Greek Text. There wanted ſomewhat within. Sincerity is the filling up of all our Duties: Without that, they are but empty ſounds, as ſounding braſs, and as a tinkling Cymbal.

He was perfect; that is, he was ſincere. Obſerve then,

Secondly, Sincere and ſound-hearted perſons are in God's eſteem perfect perſons.

It is not all that you can do, or all that you can ſay, or all that you can ſuffer, or all that you can loſe, that can make you perfect in the eſteem of God, without ſincerity; add ſincerity but to the leaſt, and it gives you the denomination of perfect. God accepts the very Goats-hair, the leaſt offering from one that is ſincere; he accounts it a rich Preſent, and calls the Preſenter perfect; but he will not receive the greateſt Riches, whole Droves of Cattel for Offerings, the greateſt and mightieſt Services, from one that is unſound. Truth of Grace is our perfection here; in Heaven we ſhall have Perfection as well as Truth.

Further, In that upon this perfectneſs and plainneſs of heart, there is preſently added uprightneſs: Obſerve from thence,

First, Where the heart is ſincere towards God, the wayes are juſt and honeſt before men.

And Secondly, It is a great honour and an ornament unto our Profeſſion of Godlineſs, to be juſt and upright in our dealings toward men.

This is put as a ſpecial part of JOB's excellency, that he was upright, ſcil. in his dealings. There is much ſcandal caſt upon the Profeſſion of the Name of God, through a defect in this. The world ſaith, theſe men profeſs, they take the Name of God upon them, but they are as unanſwerable to their promiſes, as unjuſt in their tradings, &c. as any other. Then make proof of your perfection in profeſſion, by the uprightneſs of your converſation.

Perfect and upright, one that feared God.

Here we have fearing God added to perfect and upright. Obſerve hence,

First, Moral Integrity and Moral Honeſty, without the Fear of God, can never render us acceptable unto God.

There are ſome that pleaſe themſelves in this, that they are plain-hearted. (It is poſſible for a man in a ſence to be ſo, and yet not to fear God) or they give every man his due, &c. Theſe are good; but in JOB we may learn, on what theſe muſt be founded, whence they come, when we pleaſe God in them; they come from the Fear of God; that muſt be the ſpring of uprightneſs and perfection, elſe they are only Heathen-Virtues, and not Chriſtian-Graces.

God delights in nothing we do, unleſs we do it in his fear. As Joſeph ſaid to his Brethren when they feared ſome hard meaſure from him; I fear God. When this fear of God ties our hands, it ſhews the love of God fills our hearts. Not to wrong man becauſe we fear God, is an argument of more than man. Gen. 42

Fearing God.] Hence obſerve,

Secondly, Holy Fear contains in it every Grace we receive from God, and all the worſhip we tender up to God.

Fear is a comprehenſive word; it is more then a particular Grace. When Abraham had offered up his Son Iſaac, that was a work of mighty Faith, and the Faith of Abraham is wonderfully commended by it; but God ſpeaks thus, Now I know thou feareſt me. Fear containeth Faith, and Fear containeth Love too. Though perfect love caſt out tormenting fear, 1 John 4. 18. yet perfect love calls in obeying fear. Hear the Concluſion of all, ſaith the Preacher, Eccleſ. 12. 13. Fear God, and keep his Commandments; for this is the whole duty of man: or, this is whole man. Fear is all duty, and every Grace.

Fearing God, and eſchewing evil.

Hence this from the Connexion. Thirdly, Holy Fear keeps the Heart and Life clean.

The Fear of the Lord is clean, ſaith David; Pſal. 19. Clean, not only in it ſelf, formally clean; but effectivè: it makes clean, and keeps clean the Heart and Life. Fear is an armed man at the Gate, which examines all, and ſtops every one from entring that is unfit. It ſtands as a watchman on the Tower, and it looks every way, to ſee what's coming to the Soul; if evil come, fear will not admit it. And therefore in Scripture you ſhall have theſe two often put together, fearing God, and eſchewing evil. Nay eſchewing evil is not only put as an effect of the fear of God, but it is put into the very definition it ſelf of the fear of God: The Fear of the Lord is to depart from evil.

He eſchewed evil.

From hence obſerve alſo, First, Godly perſons do not only forbear ſin, but they abhor ſin. They

They have not only their hands bound from it, but they have their hearts set against it. Holy enmity against sin, is the temper of a godly man's heart; he eschews evil.

Secondly, A Godly man's opposition of sin is universal; it is against all sin.

JOB eschewed evil, all evil; there was no picking of this or that particular evil to oppose, but whatsoever came under the name and notion of sin, Job's spirit turned against it. Enmity is against the kind.

Thirdly, Godly persons do not only avoid the acts of evil, but all the occasions of evil.

JOB eschewed evil, whatsoever led him to evil, all the appearance of evil, as the Apostle speaks. We cannot avoid the sin, if we will not avoid the occasion. When Solomon cautions to take heed of the path of the wicked, he useth four expressions, and all to the same purpose; Avoid it, Prov.4.15. saith he, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away; to shew unto us, that if we would keep from the acts of sin, we must keep from the way of sin.

The second thing whereby his prosperous estate is set out unto us, is what his Possessions were. You have a particular Inventory of his Estate in the second and third Verses; and you have the total sum cast up after all the particulars are set down; and it amounts to thus much, that Job was the greatest of all the men in the East. In the Second verse, you have the first part of his Goods set down, his Jewels, his Children.

Verse 2. And there were born unto him seven Sons, and three Daughters.

This Verse contains the first part of Job's outward happiness; the Blessings of Children. Concerning whom, we have three things offered. 1. Their Number; Ten. 2. The distinction of Sexes; Sons and Daughters. 3. Their mutual Love and Concord, v. 4.

There is little in the words that needs explication; therefore where the Scripture is plain and clear, I will not spend time.

There were born unto him.] His Children were not born against him, but born unto him, given as Comforts and Blessings to him.

Seven Sons and three Daughters.] * The number seven, and the number three, are numbers of perfection. Some trouble themselves much about them: But I will not stay upon Numbers.

There were born unto him seven Sons and three Daughters.

Here observe,

First, Children are the Blessings of the Lord.

They are put here as a part of his inheritance. Children Psa.127.3. are an heritage of the Lord, and the fruit of the womb is his reward. They are special Blessings. Children (as it is observed) are a resemblance of our Immortality, because a man revives again, lives anew (as it were) in every Child; he is born again (in a Civil sence) when others are born to him. There are some who account their Children but Bills of Charges; but God puts them upon the account of our Mercies: How holily and piously speaks Jacob concerning his Children? These (saith he) are the Children which Gen. 33.5. God hath graciously given thy servant.

Secondly, Observe this; Children as they are Blessings, and great Blessings; so they are greater Blessings then any outward thing else whatsoever.

When a description is made of Job's Goods, the best is put first. First, his spiritual Blessings are set down, then comes his outward; now Children are put in the very next degree to his Graces. What our Saviour Christ saith of a Mat.16.26. man's Soul, may be said of Children: What (saith he) shall a man give in exchange for his Soul? It is true, that is spoken there of a man's own Soul, that it is more to himself then the world; but it is a truth here too, if one have a Soul given him (and to have a Child, is to have a Soul bestowed on us) for the present, it is more then to have the whole world bestowed on him. A whole world of riches is not so good, not such goods, as one Child; therefore Children are put in the first place, as his choicest and chiefest outward Blessings.

Then from the number of his Children, he had many Children; he had seven Sons and three Daughters.

Observe, Thirdly, To have many Children is a great Blessing, and the more Children the greater the Blessing.

Some think themselves blessed, if they may have one or two Children; one to inherit their Estates, one or two to delight themselves in, to play with, or to bear their name; but if they come to a number, to a great number, then they think themselves exceedingly burdened, then they are troubles. When God casts up the estate of a blessed man in outward things, he saith not only that he hath a Child, that he is not barren; but that he hath many Children, that he hath his Quiver full of such Arrows, as the expression is, *Psal.*127.5. And that is made the blessedness of a man there, Happy is the man (saith he) that hath his Quiver full of them; that hath many arrows, such are children of the youth, V. 4. There are some rich and covetous men, that are in this point beyond others, rich in folly: You shall hear them pride themselves that they have no Children, or but few; this they conceive sets them off in the opinion of the world, for the richer men; whereas one Child is more riches then all the things that are in the world. And we know it is an ordinary thing (though indeed it is a very sinful thing) to say, 'tis true, such an one is a rich man, he hath a fair estate, but he hath a great charge, a great many Children, as if that did take off from his riches, or make him less happy; as if he were the poorer, because he hath a larger share of that ancient first Blessing upon man, Be fruitful, and multiply, and Gen.1.28. replenish the Earth.

Fourthly, Note this, To have many Sons, to have most Sons amongst our Children, is the greater outward Blessing.

JOB is described here in the most exact method of outward Blessings; he had Sons, and his Sons out-number his Daughters; he had seven Sons, and but three Daughters. And the reason why most Sons among Children are the greater Blessing, is clear; because Sons bear up the Name, and are a greater support unto the Family.

Fifthly, To have many Sons and Daughters too, is yet a compleater Blessing.

For by Daughters the Family is encreased, and other Families are joyned, and knit, and united to that Family. And to have Sons and Daughters both, is the perfection of that Natural Blessing; because man was so made at the first; he was made male and female. As it is with the Soul and the Body, though the Soul be more excellent then the Body, yet the Soul alone is not so perfect, as when Soul and Body are together; because though the Body be not so strong in constitution, and noble in condition, as the Soul, yet Body and Soul in Creation were joyned together, therefore their greatest perfection consists in their union. So likewise it is in a Family; though Sons, in nature are more perfect, yet because it was the first institution of a Family, male and female, therefore the fulness and compleatness of the Blessing is in the union of both. JOB had many Sons and Daughters likewise; this made the Blessing more compleat.

And then lastly observe this, Children, many Children in the Family, are in themselves, no impediments, either of Piety toward God, or Justice toward man.

As soon as Job was described in all his Perfections, it is added, he had so many sons and so many daughters; though he had so many children to look to & provide for, yet he omitted neither duty towards God, nor duty towards man. There are many who think it some excuse, if not excuse enough for their neglect, for their slighting holy duties, or slightness in the holy duties of Hearing, Praying, and the like; Oh, they have a great many Children, and they must rise early, and they must work late, they can spare no time, or but little for the publick or private, or secret worship of God; specially for any thing that is extraordinary: so that these Cares steal away, not only those times that might be bestowed in an extraordinary manner upon their Souls, but even the ordinary times are stollen away by them also. Further, Some think themselves by this in part excused for their injustice toward men; they have a great Family, and

* The word Banim, sons, comes from Banah, to build; because sons and daughters build up their Fathers house, and continue the Family; or, because they are (as it were) built and framed out of their parents.

if they deal somewhat hardly, and stick as close as they can in all businesses, they may be born with, for they have a great many Children; and they must look to provide for them, they else were worse then Infidels; and hence they take liberty to do what honest Infidels were ashamed of. Job you see was upright, though he had so many Sons, and so many Daughters to provide for. It is ill with those, whose gain for their Children is loss to their souls; but wo, when any to gain for their Children, lose their souls; doing like those in Nahum 2. 12. The Lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps, and strangled for his Lionesses, and filled his holes with prey, and his Dens with rapine. By the Lion, there, is meant those Oppressors that lived in Nineveh; and by their Whelps, are meant their Children; and by Lionesses, their Wives; they had Wives and Children, and they must have Means and Estates for them. Job, as I may say, had Whelps and a Lioness, Wife and Children, yet he doth not tear for them. Nay, though he had so many to provide for, yet he rather giveth out to others. What hungry belly was not filled with his meat? and what naked back was not cloathed with his wool? He did not say, I have Children to feed and to cloath, and therefore you can have nothing. You see: though he had many Children and a great Charge, yet how compleat he was in his duty to God, and in his duty to man; he failed not either in the duties of worship and holiness, nor in the duties of Justice and Uprightness.

VERS. 3, 4, 5.

His substance also was seven thousand Sheep, and three thousand Camels, and five hundred yoke of Oxen, and five hundred She-Asses, and a very great Houshold; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the East.

And his Sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day, and sent and called for their three Sisters, to eat and to drink with them.

And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt Offerings according to the number of them all, &c.

Psal. 127. 4, 5.

THe Holy Ghost having shewed us the qualities of Job's person, in the first Verse, the Olive-plants round about his Table (being the first outward Blessing) in the second; now proceeds to shew also his outward estate, his stock of Cattel: His Substance was seven thousand sheep, &c.

Concerning the outward Estate of Job, we may note in this third verse,

1. The several kinds of his Stock, Sheep, Camels, Oxen and Asses.

2. The several numbers of each of these kinds; Seven thousand Sheep, three thousand Camels, &c.

It is said, His substance was seven thousand Sheep, &c. We in our Language, call the Estate of a man his Substance; and a rich man we call him a substantial man; though indeed riches are but external and accidental, yet they are called the substance of a man, because they make him subsist and stand by himself, he needs not the prop and help of others.

The word here in the Hebrew which we translate substance, is indifferent to signifie any possession; but especially it signifies possession or substance by Cattel. Therefore in those times wherein the estates of the great men of the earth were most in Cattel, this expression was chiefly used; The Septuagint renders it, And his Cattel were seven thousand sheep, &c. So then his substance, scil. of Cattel, was seven thousand Sheep.

ὑπάρξις αὐτοῦ Septuagint.

Sheep.] Sheep for meat, and Sheep for cloathing; the flesh and the fleece, both are of great use.

And three thousand Camels*.] Camels were used in those Countries for burdens, and for travel, especially in long journeys. Merchants travelled with Camels; as you may read, Gen. 37. 25. Joseph's Brethren beheld a company of Ishmaelites which came from Gilead with their Camels, and these were very strong for travel, being able to abide much hunger and thirst (as the Natural History affirms.) Some affirm they will travel six days together in those hot Countries without drink; and therefore those Eastern parts are stock'd and stored with Camels, beasts so fit for service there.

* The Hebrew word גמל comes from the root Gamal, to render and make recompence; for this creature being used much for burden and travel, doth abundantly recompence his Master for his keeping. From this Hebrew word Gamal, the Greeks derive the name κάμηλος; the Chaldeans Gamla, the Latines camelus, and we in our English Camel.

And five hundred yoke of Oxen.] Oxen for the tillage of the ground. Their Oxen are strong to labour, Psal. 144.

The Asses were for ordinary travel, and for ordinary burdens about the house.

But you may say, We read in the Inventory which here is made of Job's Estate, that he had Sheep and Camels, Oxen and Asses; but where was the Silver and the Gold? where was the goodly Houshold-stuff, the Jewels and the Plate? here is no mention made of these.

I answer, First, That without doubt Job had Silver and Gold, and precious things: It is clear that he had, when he saith (Chap. 31. 24.) If I have made Gold my hope, or have said to the fine Gold, thou art my Confidence; it had not been proper for him to deny that Gold was his hope (in this sence) if he had not had Gold in his possession; or to say, he did not confide in fine Gold, when he had no Gold to confide in: Then he had Gold and Silver. And for Jewels, the holy Story tells us (Chap. 42. 12.) That God gave Job twice as much as he had before. And a part of what was restored to him, was Jewels and Ear-rings; Every man gave him a piece of Money, and every one an Ear-ring of Gold; therefore he had Jewels also in his possession at first, or else they could not be doubled to him in the day of his Deliverance.

We find frequent mention in those ancient times, of the riches of the Patriarchs and others, in Gold and Silver. It is express'd concerning Abraham, Gen. 13. 2. That Abraham was very rich in Cattel, in Silver and in Gold. And Abraham's Servant, Gen. 24. 35. saith of him, The Lord hath blessed my Master greatly, and he hath given him flocks and herds, and silver and gold: And v. 53. The Servant brought forth Jewels of silver and gold, and gave them to Rebekah; he gave also to her Brother and to her Mother precious things. And Gen. 23. 16. We read of Abraham's paying four hundred shekels of silver unto Ephron the Hittite; which was called current money with the Merchants. So that it is plain, in those days Gold and Silver and Jewels were substance.

But here the Estate of Job is reckoned and cast up by Cattel; there is no mention of Gold, and Silver, and Jewels, and precious Stones, and the like. His Substance was seven thousand sheep, &c. Two Reasons may be given for this Accompt.

The first is this, because those ancient times were so much given to, and employed in the feeding of Cattel; therefore they did reckon their Estates by Cattel, as we now do by Money, by Gold, and by Silver, or by yearly Rents and Revenues. If a man had so many Cattel, so many Sheep, so many Oxen, &c. they knew his Estate, what Gold and Silver, or other Riches he might have. When the Sons of Jacob came before Pharaoh, Gen. 46. 32. they are called Shepherds; The men are Shepherds, for their trade hath been to feed Cattel: They are men of Cattel; as if he should say, the special Commodity, the main thing these trade in, is about Cattel, and that gives denomination: They had Gold and Silver, but they are men of Cattel.

And then again, for this reason; Cattel are living Substance; Gold and Silver are dead substance. Cattel, in their own nature, are more excellent then Gold and Silver; because they have Life. Every thing that hath Life, is better in its degree then that which hath no Life. The lowest Creature that hath Life, is better then the best without Life; the lowest of a superiour order, is better then the highest of an inferiour. Now all things without Life, are put into a degree, into a classis or form below and inferiour to those that have Life. It is true, that Money answereth all things: Money is equivalently Sheep, and Oxen, and Asses, and Camels. Money is equivalently Bread, and Meat, and Drink, and Cloathing, and whatsoever you need; it is virtually all that you may and can receive; so that by way of commutation and exchange, Money is all things; but formally, and in it self, so these things are the life, and sustenance, and support of man; therefore these go away with the name and the title of the Estate; the Estate or Substance of Job was in these natural and living

Eccl. 10. 19.

Riches,

Riches, not in artificial or dead Riches. Hence it was that the Ancients gave the name Pecunia to Money; which comes a Pecude, from Cattel (so the Criticks observe) because they stamp'd the form of a Sheep or an Oxe upon Money, noting that Cattel were the riches and the estate of a man properly and chiefly. This may suffice for the reasons why the estate or riches of Job is set forth by Cattel, and not by Gold and Silver, and other-like Possessions.

Further, with this abundance of Cattel that Job had, we must understand (though it is not expresst) that he had Land sutable to such a Stock.

And when these Numbers are set down (because we usually say, he is but poor, that can number his Cattel) we are not to stand strictly upon the precise number of seven thousand, or five hundred, &c. But here are great quantities mentioned; to note, that Job had not only many, very many Cattel, but that he had great numbers of all these.

Then it follows, He had these, and a very great Houshold.

The words in the Original, do signifie Servants, or Tillage and Husbandry. Concerning Isaac, Gen.26.it is said that he had possessions of flocks and of heards, and great store of servants; so some read it; others, that he had great store of husbandry. It comes all to one purpose; for the greatness of the Houshold, or multitude of Servants, were for those uses, to mannage and order those Flocks, that Tillage and Estate that God had blessed him with. He had a very great Houshold, many attendants upon the several services of his Estate.

Lastly, We have the sum and result (as it were) of all his Estate, in the close of the Verse.

So that this man was the greatest of all the men of the East.

He was the greatest divers ways; greatest in riches, greatest in power, greatest in honour, greatest in grace, which is the best greatness of all. He was greatest all these wayes; but that which is here specially meant, is the greatness of his honour and riches: He was the greatest man in outward estate of all the men of the East.

Of all the men of the East.] Heb. Sons of the East. In *Gen.*25.6. Abraham gave gifts to his Sons by the Concubines, and sent them away from his Son Isaac Eastward into the East Countrey. Doubtless the Blessing of God followed these Sons of Abraham his Friend, and they waxed great, but among them all Job was greatest. It had been much to say, he was a great man amongst the men of the East; for the men of the East were very great men, and very rich men. As to say, one is a rich man in the City of London, where there are so many rich men; one that goeth for a rich man there, is a rich man indeed. But here is more in this; he was not only a rich man, or a great man amongst the men of the East; but he was the greatest, he was the richest of them: as to say, that one is the richest in the whole City, cries a man up to the height of riches. This expression then heightens the sence of the Text concerning Job's greatness, he was not only great among the men of the East, but the greatest man of them: as if the Holy Ghost should have said, I will not stay reckoning up Particulars, or tell you this and that Job had; you know the East was a large Countrey, and full of rich men; his estate was the largest, and himself the richest of all the men of the East.

A Question may here be raised, Why the Holy Ghost spends so many words, and is thus accurate in the setting forth of Job's outward estate?

I shall touch three Reasons for it.

1. He is described to be a man of a very great estate, to the end that the greatness of his affliction might appear afterward. The measure of a loss is taken by the greatness of a mans enjoyment. If a man have but little, his affliction cannot be great; but if a man have much, if he have abundance, then the affliction doth abound. After great enjoyments, want is greatest: Emptiness presses those most, who once were full. I went out full (saith Naomi, Ruth 1. 21.) and the Lord hath brought me home empty; therefore call me not Naomi (which is pleasant) but Marah, which is bitter; for the Almighty hath done very bitterly with me.

2. The greatness of his Estate is set forth, that the greatness of his Patience might appear. For a man to be made poorer, that was but poor and mean before, it is no great matter though he bear it; for a man to have but little, that never had much, is no great trial of his patience: but for a man to have nothing at all, that had, as it were, all things, and to be patient under it, this shews the proof of Patience. To a man that is born a Slave or a Captive, Captivity and Bondage is no trouble; it doth never exercise his patience, he is scarce sensible of the evil, because he never knew better: But for a King, that is born free, and hath power over others, for a King that is in the height of freedom and liberty, to become a Slave and a Captive, in such a one patience hath a perfect work, if he bear it. So for Job, a man that once abounded in all manner of good things, to be outed and emptied of all, that tried his patience to the full.

3. It was to give all the world a testimony, that Job was a thorough godly and holy man; that he was a man of extraordinary strength of Grace: Why? Because he held his integrity, and kept up his spirit in the way of Holiness, notwithstanding he was lifted up with abundance of outward Blessings. To be very great, and very good, shews that a man is good indeed: Great and Good, Rich and Holy, are happy conjunctions, and they are rare conjunctions. Usually Riches impoverish the Soul, and the World eats out all care of Heaven; therefore Job was one of a thousand, being at once thus great in Riches, and thus rich in Goodness. He was Rich in Grace, that was so gracious in the midst of so much Riches; the Godliness of Job was enriched by his Riches. It argued that Job's Godliness was very great, and very right, because he continued right in the midst of all his Greatness. How often do Riches cause forgetfulness of God, yea, kicking against God? How often are they made the Bellows of Pride, the Fewel of Uncleanness, the Instruments of Revenge? How often do rich men contemn, despise and oppress their weak and poor Brethren? but to make Riches the fewel of our Graces, and the instruments of Duty both to God and man, to have the house full of Riches, and the heart full of holiness, these united are admirable. Extreams are very dangerous; to be extream poor, or extream rich, is an extream temptation. There the wise man Agur, Prov. 30. v. 8. prayes, Give me neither poverty nor riches. Lord (saith he) I would not be in any of the extreams: It is a sore temptation to be far on either hand; to be far on the hand of riches, or far on the hand of poverty. To be very poor, and very holy, is a rare thing: That man hath great treasures and riches of Grace, who is so. I remember the speech of a poor woman, who having a Child about eight or nine years of age, and being once in such a streight, that hunger began to pinch them both; the Child looking upon the Mother, said, Mother, do you think that God will starve us? No Child, answers the Mother: The Child replied, If he do, yet must we love him and serve him. Such Language from the heart, becomes and argues more then a Child in Grace, a grown Christian. They are filled with Christ, who can starve, and serve him: So likewise are they, who being full-fed, yet serve him; and Temptations are greater upon the full, then upon the empty, upon the rich, then upon the poor: The reason of it is, because as Riches do stir up Lust, so they give fewel, and administer instruments for the obtaining and taking in of that which Lust calls for; this Poverty doth not do.

Deut. 32.

The poor (saith Christ) receive the Gospel; the lame and the blind make most speed, and see their way cleerest into the Kingdom of Heaven; but for rich men (he saith) It is easier for a Camel to go through the eye of a Needle, then for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. We see now the Miracle acted in Job; the Camel is got through the Needle's eye; Job, a rich man, is got through the Needle's eye with three thousand Camels, &c. And the reason was, because all his Camels, Cattel, and Riches, did not take up so much room in his heart, they were not so thick in his spirit, as one single thred. All his outward estate was kept without; not a shred, not a thred got into his spirit. Take this for a third Reason, why the Holy Ghost doth thus exactly set forth the estate of Job; scil. that he might appear to be an exact holy man.

Mat.19.24.

From the whole, take these Observations:

First, We see here Job a holy man, very full of Riches: Thence observe,

That Riches are the good Blessings of God.

God would never have bestowed them upon his Job else. Lest we should think Riches evil, they are given to these who who are good: And left Riches should be thought the chiefest good, they are given to those that are evil. It is a certain Truth, that God never gives any thing in it self evil to those that are good; nor doth he ever give the chiefest good to those that are evil. Therefore it shews, that Riches are good, because the Godly have them; and it shews, that they are not the chiefest good, because the wicked have them. When the Gospel calls us to renounce the world, to cast off the world; it calls us to cast the world out of our affections, not out of our possession. To hold and possess great riches, is not evil; it is evil to set our hearts upon them.

Secondly, Job was described before, a just man, an upright man, that is, a man just in his dealing, a man that gave every one his own; he did not decline, no not a hairs breadth (if possibly he could) from the Line of Justice, Commutative or Distributive; yet this Job is exceeding rich. Hence observe, That Plain and honest dealing is no hinderance to the gaining or preserving of an Estate.

Honest dealing is no stop, no bar to getting. There is a cursed Proverb amongst us, which some use; and it is to be feared, some walk by it; That he which useth plain dealing, shall die a Beggar. You see Job, that was a plain man, a just-dealing man, yet is full of Riches. The nighest and the safest way to riches, is the way of Justice. Wo to those, who by getting riches, get a wound in their own Consciences. What will it advantage any one to gather many goods, when in the mean time, his heart tells him, that all have a bad Master? What will it advantage any to load and fraight his Ship by trading on forbidden Coasts, when by doing this, he splits and makes shipwrack of his Soul? If you would go the ready way to attain the things of this life, walk in the wayes of God. Honesty and Justice, Uprightness and Truth, will lead you to the highest and greatest estate, with Gods Blessing. All other riches are poverty, all other gain is loss; there is a fire in an estate ill gotten, which will at last consume it. A man builds with timber that hath fire in it, that layes the foundation of his estate by sin; he lays up iniquity for his Children. And so doth God, Job 21. 19.

It is commonly said likewise, Dives aut iniquus, aut iniqui hæres; A rich man is either an unjust man, or heir of an unjust man. In Psal. 82. The wicked are put for the rich: How long will you judge unjustly, and accept the person of the wicked? That is, the persons (Divitum aut Potentum) of rich or great men, so it is to be understood; for Judges would never accept the persons of wicked men, if they were poor, if they be in equal ballance with others, in regard of outward things: and then the opposition that is made in the next words, Defend the poor and fatherless, shews that the rich are there meant. These great ones are called wicked, because (saith the glos) they usually get and uphold their greatness by wickedness. Such is the course of the world, and it is the shame of the world, much more of Christians. We see in Job's practice, that riches may be attained and maintained too by righteousness; Job was rich and just.

Thirdly, In that Job, a man fearing God, was thus rich; thus great; see here the truth of the Promises. God will make good his Promise concerning outward things to his people. Godliness hath the promises of this Life, as well as of that which is to come. As it hath promises made to it, so it hath promises performed to it; Job, a man fearing God, a godly man, is very rich. Indeed, not many rich, not many mighty, not many honourable, not many great ones are called: and so not many of those that are called, are mighty, and rich, and great, and noble; yet some such are, that the truth of the promises may appear sometime in the very Letter to the eye of sence, as it alwayes doth to the eye of Faith.

1 Cor. 1. 26

Do not fear that you shall be poor, if you turn godly; for Godliness hath the promises of this life; and there was a rich Job, a rich Abraham, a rich Isaac, a rich David, and many other godly rich. God will perform when it is good for them, the promises of outward good things to his Children outwardly.

Fourthly, Here is another Observation from this place; Job was frequent in holy duties; he was a man fearing God, that is (as we explained in the first verse) he was much verst in the wayes of holy worship; he did not serve God by fits, or at his leisure, but continually; yet he was very rich. Note hence,

Time spent in holy duties is no loss, no hinderance to our ordinary Callings, or to our thriving in them.

Job serves God so frequently, that it is called continually; yet he grows in wealth abundantly. The time that he spent in the service of God did not rob his purse, impoverish his family, or hinder him in his dealings and businesses of the world. Job maintained both his Callings; he maintained his general Calling in the wayes and service of God, and his special or particular Calling in his relations unto men; both went on together, and they were no hindrance one to another, but a furtherance rather. The time we spend in spiritual duties, is time gained for secular. The time we spend in Prayer, &c. whets our tools, and oils our wheels, promotes all we go about, and getteth a blessing upon all.

This meets with another Blasphemy very frequent in the world. If a man professing Godliness, go backward in his Estate, especially a man that is taken notice of for his extraordinary zeal and constancy in holy duties; then the clamour is, O you see what hearing of Sermons hath brought him unto; you see what comes of his praying and fasting; he hath followed these things you see, till he is undone. I say two things unto these men.

First, Many are thought to go backward in their outward estate, because they do so much in spiritual duties, when indeed they are so far from doing too much, that they do too little, and that rather is the reason why they thrive not. The Body may be exercised often, when the Spirit works but seldom, if at all in holy things; and this indeed provokes God many times to blast an outward estate. It is a common fault, that when we see those whom we conceive godly, falling in outward things, we are taken up only in finding out answers how to acquit the Justice of God in his promises. What shall we say to such a promise, Seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you? We trouble our selves often to satisfie the point in reference to the Justice of God, and the truth of his promise: We seldom suspect whether or how they have performed the condition of the Promise. We should rather doubt that they have not evangelically performed the condition, then trouble our selves so much with seeking how to satisfie the Justice of God in answering the Engagement and Promise on his part. For without all question, they that do seek according to the tenour of that Condition, God will administer all things unto them.

Or secondly, We should say thus rather, that they who are so much exercised in wayes of Communion with God, have surely gained a great spiritual estate; and that now God brings them to the proof of it by losses in their temporal estates. These or the like interpretations we ought to make, if we see them going backward in outward things, who have been very forward in spiritual things.

And so much concerning Job's outward estate, in regard of his Riches, both what they were in the kind, and in the number.

In the next place, his outward happiness is described by the unity and concord of his Children.

Verse 4. And his Sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day, and sent and called for their three Sisters to eat and to drink with them.

This Verse sets forth a third part of Job's happiness in respect of his outward estate. He had Children, and many Children in the second Verse: Here in the fourth, we find all these Children, Sons and Daughters agreeing and feasting one with another. We may note from the words four things concerning this feasting.

1. Their Alacrity and Chearfulness, which most do observe out of that expression, they went and feasted; which phrase in the Hebrew, signifies, the doing of a thing with chearfulness and readiness.

2. Their Unanimity: It is not said that some two or three of his Sons feasted, but his Sons indefinitely, all his Sons; and not only his Sons, but his Daughters; the three Sisters were called too. So that they were all of one mind, they all met together in love; though they were ten in number, they were but one in heart, the same in spirit.

3. The Place where they feasted; it was in their houses; they did not go to suspected places, but in their own private houses and families, where it was most convenient, and where they might celebrate those meetings with most security; both for their Bodies, and for their Souls.

4. The frequency of that feasting; it was not only once, but every one his day. They did not meet at every one of their houses upon a special and a set day: Every one his day; some make the sence thus, they feasted in their houses one every day; as if it had been a continual Feast with them; they feasted all the week long, and they would seem to allow it by the moderation used in their feasting; but the words, every one his day, note a course, a certain time wherein they did feast, not a continued feasting. Some conceive it was upon their Birth-days; whether that be so or no, there is nothing appears from the Text; only it is said, They feasted every one his day.

And they sent and called for their three Sisters to eat and to drink with them.

In that we may observe three things.

1. The Humanity of the Brethren; they would not banquet alone and leave out their Sisters; but they sent and called them.

2. The Modesty of the Sisters; that they would not come but upon special invitation; they were not forward of themselves, but they were sent and called for.

3. The end of this Invitation; it was to eat and to drink with them. As under the notions of Bread and Water, or Bread and Wine, all necessaries for food are comprized; so under the actions of eating and drinking, the whole business of feasting is contained, Luke 12. 19. Isa. 22. 15. Eccl. 2. 24.

There is nothing further in the words, that we need stay longer in opening or clearing of them: We shall only give you some few Notes out of them.

His Sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his Day.

This is set forth as the third part of Job's outward happiness. Then note we first, That

The Love and mutual Agreement of Children is one of the greatest Blessings to a Parent.

The Love of Children is the Fathers blessing, and it is a great blessing. How many Fathers have their hearts rent and divided by the rents and divisions that are amongst their Children? It doth blast and wither all the comfort the parent hath, to see that there is no agreement of Love, no correspondency of affection, amongst those that come all from the same Bowels, from the same loins. This is a blessing which was not common in the world, no not in those times. Adam had not this blessing. Adam, when he had only two Sons, they could not agree; but one murdereth the other. Abraham enjoyed not this blessing; when he had but two Sons, one is mocking the other; Ishmael is mocking Isaac. Isaac failed of the blessing; he had but two sons, and one threatned to murder the other: The days of mourning for my Father are at hand, then will I slay my Brother Jacob. This was not Jacob's blessing; he had twelve sons, there was one of them, Joseph, the common Butt of all his Brethrens envie; they did spight him; The Archers did shoot at him, and grieved him sorely, and hated him. They could not all agree, there were divisions among them. It is no ordinary blessing then. You see David, a holy man; yet what divisions were there among his Children? one murdereth another; Absolom caused Amnon to be murdered; Adonijah riseth up against Solomon; he cannot bear it, that his Brother should have the Crown. You see then that it is a blessing, and it is an extraordinary blessing: Therefore take notice of it, you that have an agreeing family, children that live together in love and unity; look upon it as a special blessing from God.

Secondly, We may observe, That

It is a very comely thing for Brethren and Sisters to live rogether in unity.

In Job's children, we have that of Psal. 133. fulfilled; Behold (he calls all to look upon it) how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! Such a sight may draw all eyes after it. Job's Children were many in number, in heart but one, in love the same. And as there is nothing more troublesome, so nothing more uncomely and unnatural, then rents and divisions in a Family.

Numero plurimi erant, consensu autem & concordia quasi unus, unanimitate atq; dilectione quasi idem. Orig.

Thirdly, We may note, That

It is lawful to use feasting.

The Children of Job here went and feasted at their several houses, every one his day. The Christians in the Primitive Churches had their ἀγάπας, Love-feasts. In a Feast there are two things; extraordinary provision, and extraordinary company; both are lawful. God hath given us the Creature, not only for necessity, but for delight; and it is a clear argument that such using of the creatures in feasting, is lawful, because God hath made more creatures serving for the delight of man, then he hath made for the necessity of man. If God had meant that men should do nothing, but serve their own necessity, and maintain their lives, so as they might go on in their places and callings, one half of the creatures might have been spared: But God made nothing in vain: therefore he is willing we should use the creatures for moderate delight. Abraham made a great Feast at the weaning of Isaac; and Isaac makes a Feast for Abimelech and Phicol the chief Captain of his Army, Gen. 26. 30. And the like examples we have in divers other places: And our Saviour Christ himself was at a Feast in Cana of Galilee; where, when wine failed, he supplied it by Miracle, John 2.

Tert. Apol. c. 39.

Deus multo plura condidit, quibus facile carere possemus, quam quibus necessario nobis opus est. Bez. in loc. Gen. 21. 8.

But because Feasting is so often abused, and many turn this liberty into wantonness; being then most wicked, when they should be most thankful; and grieving God most, when he gives them means or occasion of rejoycing. I shall therefore briefly discover the abuses of Feasting: which will also hint rules for the right ordering of it; That we may (as the Apostle speaks) eat and drink, and do all to the Glory of God.

1. Then Feasting is sinful, when any overcharge their Estates, and lavish out what will but serve their necessities, or conveniencies, upon delights and superfluities; to such, Feasting is a sin.

2. When the rich feast the rich, and never think upon the poor, Luke 14. 12, 13. When thou makest a Dinner or a Supper, call not thy friends nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours. Observe here, this is not an absolute denial of calling Brethren, and Kinsfolks, and friends, or rich; for brethren may, yea, ought to be called; but (saith he) when thou makest a Feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind; that is, when thou makest a Feast, be sure to remember these; do not bid thy brethren, or the rich alone, let the poor have a portion with thee, and be refreshed at or from thy Table. When the rich feast one another, and let the poor starve or pine, this is very sinful.

3. When there is a studied curiosity and exactness in feasting. When all things that can be thought on, must be fetch'd in, strange meats and foreign sauces; when there is a lusting after Quails, when men must have meat for their Lusts. Though we may have feasting for our delight, yet we must not have feasting for our lusts: Such make their Belly their god, as the Apostle speaks; when there is so much Art used, as destroys the nature of the Meat, this is a sin and an errour. I remember Bernard speaks of his times, That a man might be at a Fish-feast, and yet should not know whether he had eaten any Fish or no; all things were prepared with so much Art, that the very nature of the Creature was lost. This is a sinful Vanity.

4. When there is Intemperance in feasting (whatsoever the provision be) when there is excess, an overcharging of Nature, which is surfetting and drunkenness. As by the former, man overthrows the nature of meats and drinks, so by this, meat and drink overthrow the nature of man. A man may feast himself into a Beast; and we usually say of such men, They are disguised: For such feasting the Land mourns.

5. When Feastings are frequent. Feasts are not for every day; that was the thing taxed in the Glutton, Luke 16. That he fared deliciously every day.

6. When we spend too much of the day at any time, or too much much time any day in feasting; when we dine till night, and sup all or a great part of the night; this is chambering and wantonness, this is a woful expence and waste of time; and the expence of time is worse by far then the expence of money: you may regain the expence of your money; but you can never call back the expence of your time; you may be at greater charges in your feasting for the waste of time, then for the waste of Estate. All the world cannot give you back again the expence of an hour. Indeed we often hear men complain they have spent too much money in Feasting and Entertainments; but it is very rare, that any complain they have spent too much time; which is, as if a man having received a wound in his Body, should only be troubled for the hole which the Sword made in his Doublet. Prodigality of time is the worst and most dangerous prodigality.

7. Feasting is sinful when unseasonable. I speak in regard of occasions and opportunities: there are special times wherein it is unlawful to feast, though we should spend but very little time in feasting, Isa. 22. 12, 13. In that day did the Lord God of Hosts call to weeping and mourning, and to baldness, and to girding with sackcloth; and behold joy and gladness, slaying oxen and killing sheep, eating flesh, and drinking wine. In the next Verse it is said, It was revealed in mine ears by the Lord of Hosts, surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till you die. To feast in that day was sinful, and a sin that left such a stain as could not be got out; it shall not be purged from you. What time was this wherein their feasting was so sinful? What made this sin so deep-grain'd? You shall find a resolution in the beginning of the Chapter: It was a day of trouble and perplexity, and of treading down by the Lord God of Hosts in the valley of Vision, breaking down the walls, and crying to the mountains. It is a day of trouble and perplexity, and will you now be feasting? (saith God.) Is this a time for you to feast in, when my wrath is breaking forth amongst you? This feasting with men, is a daring of God, a sending (as it were) defiance unto Heaven. And such feasting as this Amos reproves, Chap. 6. 4, 5. They did eat the Lambs out of the flock, and the Calves out of the midst of the stall; they chaunt to the sound of the Viol, and invent to themselves Instruments of Musick, like David; they drink wine in Bowls, and annoint themselves with the chief ointments: but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph.

Then at this time feasting is unseasonable; for Joseph, the People and Churches of God are in affliction: and this is such a day as the Prophet describes, a day of perplexity from the Lord. The Kingdom is full of trouble, and we are full of fears; therefore now Fasting is in season, not Feasting; now humbling is in season, not rejoycing: Or if any feast now, let them feast as if they feasted not, and rejoyce as if they rejoyced not; let them feast, as remembring the affliction and bonds, the hunger and wants of our distressed Brethren. Therefore in those feastings which have a kind of necessity in them, you should labour to have your hearts exceedingly above your feasting, not to lie so low as the Creature; it is ever very sinful to have your hearts drowned in the creature; but now especially, when you hear the voice of the Sword threatning to take the creature from us, and see God clashing them together, as if he meant to stain the beauty, and sowr the pleasures of them all.

Verse 5. And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, &c.

This Verse contains the holy practice of Job. You saw before that he had Grace in his heart; now you may see Grace in his Life. Holy Practice makes Grace visible. There it lay in the habit, here it came forth in the act. Concerning this holy practice of Job, we may note these three things for the division of the Verse.

1. The Actions about which this holy care of Job was exercised: They are two.
   1. He sent and sanctified them. And,
   2. Offered burnt Offerings according to the number of them all.

2. The Ground of this holy practice of his, what moved Job after their feasting, thus to send and sanctifie them. The ground was this; For Job said, it may be that my Sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts.

3. The Constancy of Job in this his holy practice; he did not this by fits, now and then; but thus did Job continually.

And it was so, that when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them.

That is the first thing that we are to explain and open unto you; Job sent and sanctified them. How could Job sanctifie his sons or his daughters? A Parent indeed may provide Riches for his children, but can he provide Grace also? A Parent may put Money in their purses, but can he put holiness in their hearts too, that it is said here, that Job sent and sanctified them? Is not sanctification the proper work of the Spirit of God? Doth not the Holy Ghost alone sanctifie?

For the clearing of this; Whereas it is said that Job sent and sanctified them: First, Some expound the meaning thus; that Job sent up prayers to God to sanctifie them. And indeed Prayer is a sanctifying Ordinance. As Prayer requireth a holy heart, so Prayer will make a holy heart, make the heart that prayes holy; yea, many times get holiness into anothers heart. Secondly, Others say, He sent and sanctified them; that is, he sent them to the place that was appointed for Sacrifice, where he intended to sanctifie them; or where, in the holy duty of calling upon the Name of God, and of offering Sacrifice, they were to be sanctified: He sent and sanctified them; he sent them to the place where the Sacrifice should be offered, that so they might be sanctified. But Thirdly, I rather take it thus; He sent and sanctified them; that is, he sent a Message to them, to command them to prepare and to fit themselves for the holy Duty of offering the burnt offering, or sacrificing. For to sanctifie, in Scripture notes two things.

1. The infusion of a holy habit, the infusion of a new principle into the soul.
2. A preparation of the soul to holy duties.

Now when it is said, that Job sent and sanctified them, it is not meant, as if Job did infuse holy habits into his Children, as if it were in his power to make them gracious; Indeed that is impossible; it is only the work of the Spirit of God; no man can come at the Spirit of another, but the Spirit of God. But this is it, he sent to them to prepare themselves, to advise and warn them to prepare themselves, that they might be ready for that holy duty, for the duty of sacrificing. And this preparation to holy duties, is often called sanctifying; as, Gen. 35. When Jacob was called to Bethel, to offer sacrifice, and to build an Altar, he said to his Houshold, v. 2. Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean (that is, sanctifie you, or be you sanctified) and let us arise and go up to Bethel, and I will make there an Altar unto God, &c. The preparation to the Sacrifice, was a cleansing or a sanctifying of them. So Exod. 19. 20. When the People were to be prepared to receive the Law, the Lord saith unto Moses, Go unto the People, and sanctifie them to day and to morrow; that is, prepare the people, or warn the people, that they prepare themselves for the receiving of the Law. And likewise in 1 Sam. 16. 5. It is said, that Samuel did that which the Lord spake, and came to Bethlehem, and the Elders of the Town trembled at his coming, and said, comest thou peaceably? And he said, Peaceably; I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord; sanctifie your selves, and come with me to the Sacrifice; that is, prepare your selves to come to the Sacrifice. So sanctification is preparation. And, John 11. 55. (to name no more) The Jews Passover was nigh at hand, and many went out of the Countrey up to Hierusalem before the Passover, to purifie themselves, or to sanctifie themselves, that they might be fit and ready for the Sacrifice. So then this sanctifying of them, was a preparing of them for the Sacrifice. There were solemn Rules given afterward, when the form of the Church-Order and Discipline was established by Moses; but even now before that, the Law and Light of Nature taught this, besides the teaching of God, that they must be sanctified, before they came to sacrifice. Job sent and sanctified them, and then they came to that holy Service.

This is the first Act of Job. We may here observe, first, the time when Job sent to sanctifie them; it was when the dayes of their feasting were gone about. Job did not take them off from their feasting, or deny them the liberty of their feasting; but when the dayes of their feasting were gone about, then he sent and sanctified them. The Point we may note from hence, is this,

That, It doth well become godly Parents to give their Children leave to take moderate refreshing and recreation one with another.

Job did not severely and austerely forbid them, and say, What do you feasting and spending your time idly one with another? why do you spend so many days in feasting? He never interrupted them till the dayes of their feasting were gone about: It becometh Parents to loose the reins of Government so far as to give them leave for their refreshing, to let themselves out in honest wayes of recreation by their mutual society. Job did not call them to this holy service from their feasting; but when the dayes of their feasting were gone about.

Secondly, Job sent to sanctifie his Children. Though they were in their own houses, though they were at their own disposing (for it appears they had families and households of their own) though they were men and women grown; yet Job sent to sanctifie them. Observe hence.

That, Parents must not cast off the care of their Children, though they are grown up, though they are men and women.

Some think, that if they look to their Children at School, and breed them up a while, and have given them some instructions in their youth, they need not then trouble themselves any further: whereas the care of Parents ought to live as long as they and their Children live together. Job's care went after his Children to their houses: He sent to them to bid them prepare themselves.

Thirdly, Though these were (as we say) men and women grown, yet as soon as their Father sends the message to them, they all submit and all obey: then observe,

That, Children that are grown up, or have Houses and Families of their own, ought yet to yield all reverence and submission to the lawful commands, counsels and directions of their Parents.

Do not think you have outgrown obedience and honour to Parents, when you are grown in years; still we see these thought themselves under their Fathers command and counsel; there is not one of them replies, what need my Father trouble himself about us? No; but all willingly prepared themselves and came; for he offered burnt Offerings according to the number of them all; therefore certainly they all came.

Fourthly, From the matter of this Act, what it was that Job did; the Text saith, He sent and sanctified them after their feasting: He did not send a Messenger to them, to ask how they were in health, whether they had not surfetted themselves, or had got any distemper; he did not send to know how the accounts went in their Families, whether they had not spent too much; but the matter that he had his eye and his heart upon, was, that they might be sanctified and fitted for holy Duties. From hence observe,

That, A Parents main and special care should be for the Souls of his Children.

The care of many Parents is only to enrich their children, to make them great and honourable, to leave them full Portions and Estates, to provide Matches for them; but for sanctifying their children, there is no thought of that. Nay, many are affraid their Children should be sanctified; some Parents cannot abide their Children, because they suspect them sanctified: Such Parents are the Devil's Children. Job's greatest care was, that his children should be sanctified. And every Parent ought to say of his Natural Children, as the Apostle John doth of his spiritual Children (Eph. 3. 4.) I have no greater joy, then to hear that my Children walk in the Truth.

Fifthly, Job was a holy person, and you see which way his care lies; that his children may be holy: Then take this Note in the general.

He that is a holy person himself, desires to make others holy too.

Holy Job would have all his Children holy. As it is with the wicked, a wicked man would fain have all wicked with him; he would fain scatter his wickedness, and diffuse his poyson unto others: The Drunkard would fain have companions with him in his Drunkenness, &c. And so the man that is truly godly, would make others godly too. As Paul said to King Agrippa, I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether such as I am. Grace is attractive: It desires to draw others into fellowship. A good man would not be happy alone. Act. 26.29.

Sixthly, Sanctification you see here, is ascribed unto Job; he sent and sanctified them; and all that he did, was but to give them counsel and warning to sanctifie themselves; as if he should have said, Go to my Children, and bid them prepare themselves; warn them that they may be ready against the Sacrifice, that they fit themselves for it; yet the Text saith, that Job sanctified them. Then we may observe from this,

That, the good which others do by our advice and counsel, is reckoned as done by our selves.

While we provoke others to goodness, that good which they do, is set upon our account, as if we had done it. As the wickedness, the sin which another commits by the advice and counsel of any man, is set upon the score of that man: If another do ill by thy advice, the ill is reckoned to thee. If one should come and say as Absolom said to his Servants, Mark ye now, when Amnon's heart is merry with wine, and when I say unto you, smite Amnon, then kill him, fear not, have not I commanded you? Not only did the servants kill Amnon, but Absolom killed Amnon, because he commanded them to kill him. You know what is said of David; he did but send a Letter concerning the death of Uriah; and the Charge cometh, Thou hast slain Uriah with the Sword of the Children of Ammon. All the evil others commit by thy counsel, direction, advice, command or consent, is as done by thy self. So (on the other side) all the good others do by our counsel, advice, promotion, admonition, instruction, and the like, that good shall all be reckoned to us. If another be holy by thy advice, it it will be said thou hast made him holy, thou hast sanctified him.

Lastly, Observe, That Holy Duties call for Holy Preparation.

We must not touch holy things with unholy hands, or with unholy hearts: I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine Altar, O Lord, was David's resolution, Psal. 26. 6. therefore Job intending a solemn duty, a Sacrifice, which did contain the sum of all Religion concerning the external worship of God, sends solemnly to his children to prepare themselves: O come not to the Sacrifice except you be sanctified. It is a point so clear, that I shall need but only to name it to you. How and wherein they should sanctifie themselves, and what course they took for the sanctifying and preparing of themselves for that Duty, doth not appear in this place; but afterwards, when God gave them the Law, he prescribed them a rule, what they must do that they might be sanctified: the Jews had special directions for their preparations. Some things were outward, and some inward. I will but touch.

For the outward, they were commanded to wash their cloaths, Exod. 19. that place before quoted; Sanctifie them to day and to morrow, and let them wash their cloaths: Not that God regarded cloaths, but he aimed at somewhat further; if the cloaths must be washed, certainly then the heart must be washed; he pointed at that in the washing of their cloaths, In Leviticus and Numbers, other outward preparations are commanded; as the abstaining from all things that were unclean; they must not touch any thing that was unclean: and then sometimes they were not only to wash their cloaths, but to change their cloaths: you have the expression in that place concerning Jacob; Be clean (saith he) and change your garments: It might be a changing by washing; but I rather conceive, that it was a change by putting on of other cloaths. There was also another ther external requisite to the preparing and sanctifying of themselves; and that was by abstaining for a time from the lawful use of the Marriage-bed: You have the command expresly in that of Exod. 19. 15. Be ready against the third day, come not at your wives; and there are other the like places, 1 Sam. 21. 4. The Priest said, There is no common bread under mine hand, but there is hallowed bread; if the young men have kept themselves at least from women; if they have but the outward preparation; the meaning is, if they had kept themselves from their Wives: David affirms it was so, in the words following. The Apostle giveth the same Rule, in 1 Cor. 7. 5. Speaking of that point; Defraud not one another (saith he) except it be with consent for a time, that you may give your selves to fasting and prayer. So that the Holy Ghost therein intimates such an abstaining as was preparatory to solemn duties, that you may give your selves to fasting and prayer. Extraordinary duties call for extraordinary preparations. These outward preparations were so necessary, that when the people failed in them, Hezekiah prayed for pardon, 2 Chron. 30. 18, 19. The good Lord pardon every one that prepareth his heart to seek God, the Lord God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary. Though their hearts were upright, though they had hearts rightly prepared, yet he prayeth that God would pardon the want of those outward preparations. The principal preparation is of the heart, and the washing of our wayes: therefore we find how the Lord contendeth with them, in Isa. 1. 10, 11, &c. where he speaks of those Oblations, and great Services of the Jews: I hate your solemn feasts, bring no more vain oblations, &c. Why? Your hands (scil. your lives) are full of blood. Wash ye, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil, learn to do well, &c. As if he should say, Why do you come to me in these holy duties, except you prepare and fit your selves accordingly; I cannot abide that unholy persons should come about holy things.

Jer. 7. 8, 9.

Tu Genitor cape sacra manu patriosque penates. Me bello exento digressum & cæde recenti attrectare nefas, donec me flumine vivo abluero. Virg. Æn. —Procul, hinc procul este prophani, conclamat vates totoque absistite luco.

The very Heathen had this Notion, they would not admit any to come to their religious services unless they were prepared. That saying of Æneas in the Poet, to his Father, when he came from the War, is a clear proof; Tu genitor, &c. Father, do you meddle with the Sacrifices; but as for me it is a sinful thing to touch them, —till I have washed my self in the fountain. This was an outward external Rite amongst them for cleansing themselves. The very Heathen saw they must not meddle with their holy things till they were cleansed; therefore they had one cried out to the people when they came to sacrifice; All you that are unclean and prophane, go far away from these Sacrifices. Not only the word of God, but the very light of Nature taught them, not to meddle with holy things till they were sanctified.

Therefore specially look to this, when you have any sacrifice, any duty to perform; be prepared and sanctified within and without, before you come to the duty. It is true, that the duty sanctifies, but it is seldom that the duty sanctifies us, unless we be sanctified for the duty: They get most holiness from the duty, who are most holy when they come to the duty: besides the great danger of coming unprepared. Take heed how you hear; not only hear, but take heed to prepare your selves for hearing: So, look to thy feet (it hath the same sence) when thou comest into the house of God; prepare thy self, be not hasty, lest thine be counted but the Sacrifice of Fools. So much of the first act of Job's holy care; He sent and sanctified them.

Part of VERS. 5. & V. 6.

And rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all. For Job said, It may be that my Sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

Now there was a day when the Sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.

NOw follows the second Act of Job's holy Care; He rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all.

It is ill to perform a holy duty with neglect of preparation; it is as bad to make preparation, and then neglect the duty. We see both joyned in Job; he is careful to prepare, and he is as diligent to perform.

He rose up early.] This notes the extraordinary diligence and zeal of Job toward God in this duty: He was so zealous, that he rises not only in the morning, but early in the morning. In Scripture, to do a thing in the morning, and to do a thing diligently, are the same; Ps. 101. 8. I will early destroy the wicked of the Land; the word is, I will destroy the wicked of the Land in the morning; and the meaning is only this, I will with all diligence and all care root out of the Land all wicked persons. So there is an expression, Prov. 7. 15. which illustrates this; where the wicked woman, the Harlot, tells the young man, that she came forth to meet him, and diligently to seek his face: The Original word there, is, to seek thy face in the morning; and yet we know, that in Verse 9. it was in the twi-light, in the evening that she met him. But the Hebrew phrase is, I came forth in the morning to seek thy face; that is (as it is rendred) I came forth diligently to seek thy face. So this coming forth of Job in the morning, besides the time, that it was at such an hour, the beginning of the day; notes the great diligence and exceeding care of Job about this work.

Yet more exactly, it is not only said, he rose in the morning (for there is a great latitude in the morning, there are divers hours which all are called morning) but it is said, he rose early in the morning, in the very beginning or first of the morning; as it is commanded, Exod. 23. 19. The first of the first-fruits of the Land thou shalt bring into the house of the Lord. God would not only have the first-fruits, but the first of the first-fruits; if there were any ripe sooner then others, God would have them; some fruits that ripened after, were first-fruits; but God would have the very first of them. So here, Job gave God not only the first fruits of the day, but the earliest time, in the morning, which is the first of the first fruits of the day.

Early in the morning.

Thence observe,

First, That it is Gods due and our duty, to dedicate the morning, the first and best of every day unto God.

Psalm. 5. 3. My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, in the morning will I direct my Prayer unto thee, and will look up. We have a saying among us, that the morning is a friend to the Muses; that is, the morning is a good studying time. I am sure it is as true, that the morning is a great friend to the Graces; the morning is the best praying time.

Again, In that Job did rise so early in the morning to offer sacrifice, and did this because he was affraid that his sons had sinned (as we shall see afterward.) Hence observe,

Secondly, That it is not safe for any to let sin lie a moment unrepented of or unpardoned, upon their own Consciences, or the Consciences of others.

If a man's house be on fire, he will not only rise in the morning, or early in the morning, but he will rise at midnight to quench it. Certainly when you have guilt on your souls, you have a fire in your souls, your souls are on a flame; therefore you had need rise, and rise early, and get up as soon in the morning as you can, to get it quenched and put out.

And offered burnt-offerings.] There were divers sorts of Sacrifices among the Jews, when the Law or Rules of sacrificing were established. There were, First, Whole burnt-offerings. Secondly, Trespass-offerings. Thirdly, Sin-offerings. Fourthly, Peace-offerings. That which Job is here said to offer, was a burnt-offering, an Holocost or whole burnt-offering, so called, because it was altogether consumed; there was no part of it reserved for the Priest, or for the people; but all was offered up unto God. Of other Sacrifices, as the Sin-offering, and Trespass-offering, there were parts and portions reserved for the Priest, and part of the Peace-offerings for the People; as you may see by that expression of the Harlot, Prov. 7. 14. I have at my house Shelamim, Peace-offerings; now they did feast upon the Peace-offering, for she invited him to a Feast. But the Burnt-offering was wholly consumed; the word in the Hebrew doth signifie an Ascension, or a thing lifted up. He offered burnt-offerings, word for word out of the Hebrew, it is, He lifted up an elevation, he caused an Ascension to ascend; elevabat elevationem, or ascendere fecit ascensionem; and it was so called, because the Sacrifice which was a whole burnt-offering, was all consumed upon the Altar, and did, as it were, evaporate or ascend up unto God.

Lev. 1, c. 3, &c. עולה ראשה משים

It was called a lifting up, or a thing lifted up, for three Reasons.

1. Because when the Sacrifice was offered, the Smoke of it did ascend; and besides there were sweet Odours put upon the Altar, which did fume up also with the Sacrifice towards Heaven, and so the Sacrifice took its denomination from ascending and going upwards.

2. Because the Priest, when he offered the Sacrifice, did lift it up upon the Altar, and hold it toward Heaven, to God.

3. Because at that time when the Sacrifice was a burning, all the People that were present, did lift up their hands and their eyes, but especially their souls and their spirits, heaven-wards, and powred themselves forth in Prayer unto God. That of David, in *Psal.*141. 2. will give some light to this; Let (saith he) my Prayer be set forth before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as the evening-Sacrifice. David at that time (as Interpreters note upon the Psalm) was barred the enjoyment of the Publick Ordinances; he could not come to sacrificing as formerly he had done: now he seeks unto the Lord that he would accept of the lifting up of his hands and heart, instead of Sacrifice; as if he should say, Lord, I have not a Sacrifice now to offer unto thee, I am hindered from that work, I cannot lift that up; but I will lift up what I have, and what will please thee better then a Bullock that hath horns and hoofs; I will lift up my hand and my heart unto thee, and let these be accepted for Sacrifice and all. Prayer (which is a Sacrifice of the Gospel) it is nothing else but a lifting up of the Soul, an elevation of the spirit unto God: So some of the Ancients call Prayer, an ascending of the Soul unto God; and in allusion unto this, Hezekiah, when he sent to Isaiah the Prophet to pray for him in that time of distress, and day of g.19. trouble, saith, Go and desire the Prophet to lift up his Prayer for the remnant that are left; alluding to the sacrifices which were wont to be lifted up. The like expression of Prayer you have, Psal. 25. 1. Lord (saith David) I lift up my Soul unto thee. Hence Prayers not answered, not accepted, are said to be stopt from ascending, Lam. 3. 44. Thou hast covered thy self with a Cloud, that our Prayer should not pass through. When you meet with such expressions in the Old Testament, concerning Prayer, you must still understand them to be allusions to the Sacrifices, because the Sacrifices were lifted up and did ascend. That for the Act.

For the Person, It is said that Job offered these Sacrifices, Job rose up early and offered, &c. Was not this to usurp upon the Priest's Office? Was it not this for which King
. 26. Uzziah was reprehended, and told by the Priests, It appertaineth not to thee to burn Incense unto the Lord, but to the Priests, the Sons of Aaron? and was he not smitten with Leprosie for doing of it?

I answer in a word, by that rule of the Ancients, Distinguish the times, and Scriptures will agree: It was Job that offered, and Job had right to offer. The time wherein Job offered Sacrifice doth reconcile this; it was before the giving of the Law (as we have shewed in the opening of the former points about the time when Job lived) now in those times the Father, or the Elder of a Family was as a Priest to the whole Family; and he had the power and the right to perform all holy Family-duties; as the duty of Sacrificing, and the like: this you may see carried along in all the times before the Law was given, in the holy Stories of the Patriarchs, they still offered up the Sacrifice.

But it may be here further enquired, If it were before the Law was given, who taught Job to offer Sacrifice? where had he the Rule for it?

I answer; This was not will-worship, though it was not written worship: For howsoever Job did offer Sacrifice before the Law of Sacrificing was written, yet he did not offer a Sacrifice before the Law of Sacrificing was given; for the Law of Sacrificing was given from the beginning, as all the other parts of worship used from the beginning, were. God could never bear it, that men should contrive him a Service; therefore Job did not offer up an offering unto God according to his own will, a thing that he had invented to pacifie and please God with: God had been so far from accepting, that he could not have born such a devised worship. God doth never trust man with the making of holy Institutions. There is nothing doth please him in any act of worship, unless he sees himself obeyed; Obedience is better then Sacrifice; and therefore a Sacrifice which is not out of obedience, cannot be accepted: He that sacrificeth, doth but offer up a Beast; but he that obeyeth, offereth up himself; sacrificeth his own will. It could not be therefore, but that Job had a word, a word as all the world had at that time; a word given by God, and so carried down from one to another by tradition (as it was for more then two thousand years.) All the will that God would reveal, or had revealed to them, was carried from hand to hand, and from heart to heart, from the Fathers to the Children, till at last the Law was written, and the Scripture penned by Moses. So then Job offered Sacrifice according to an Institution; though it was not an Institution written, yet it was an Institution sent forth and given by God himself.

Yet there is a third Query upon it; Suppose that there Psal.51.16. was an Institution of God for sacrificing, why did God call for Sacrifices? What is his meaning? Doth God delight in the blood of Bulls and Goats? Thou delightest not in Sacrifices (saith David) thou desirest not burnt offerings. And what was the Sacrifice unto Job, or unto his Sons? Could the killing of a Beast take away sin? Why then doth Job, when he feareth that his Sons had sinned, go presently and offer Sacrifice?

For Answer: It is true that the Sacrifices in themselves were nothing, either to God or man; they could do no good, they had no power in them, either to pacifie God, or to purge the Souls of men. But look upon the Sacrifice, as it was an Institution, and then God saw his Son Jesus Christ in it, and was well pleased; and likewise man beheld and believed Christ in it, and was purged. When the Sacrifice was offering, man saw Christ suffering; this took away his sin, and pacified his Conscience. A Sacrifice in it self, as it was the killing or burning of a Beast, had no virtue in it, but as it had respect unto Christ; so God saw the death of his Son, and that satisfied him; and man saw the death of his Saviour, and that justified him.

Again, It was not the bare Sacrifice that was effectual, but the Faith of Job, and the faith of his Sons carried up in Prayer; these mingled with the Sacrifice, wrought the cure: Therefore we find in the time of the Sacrifice, still the people were at prayer; they knew the Sacrifice, the Incense, could do nothing, but as joyned with the Faith of the Sacrificer in Prayer. We read, Luke 1. 10. when Zacharias the Priest was offering the Incense within the Temple, the Text saith, that the whole multitude of the people were praying without at the time of Incense. The Incense might burn long enough, and yet the Anger of God burn too; the Incense might burn, and yet the people not be purified, but consumed. But while the Incense was burning, while the Sacrifice was offering, the people were praying and believing. These actings of Faith, and powrings out of Prayer made the Sacrifice, as effectual for man, so acceptable unto God.

Then in that he offered burnt-offerings, which burnt-offerings were made when he feared that his Sons had sinned; these offerings typing out and leading them to Christ and his Death; we may note this,

That, Christ was ever the only remedy and cure of sin.

As soon as ever there was any fear of sin, presently they had recourse to a Sacrifice; and what was that? They went to Christ. Christ hath been the help against sin in all the generations of the world from the first, and will be to the last. If any man sin (saith the Apostle John) we have 1 Joh. 2. 1.
an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins; he is the Propitiatory Sacrifice for our sins. It follows,

According to the number of them all.] That is, he offered for each of his Sons a Sacrifice. There were some Sacrifices, which did serve for the whole Congregation; as we may see in Lev. 4. 13, 14. and in divers other Chapters of that Book. Besides these, there were personal Sacrifices, fices, Lev. 1. Where the Laws about Sacrifices are ſet forth; If any Soul had ſinned, that particular Soul muſt come to the Prieſt, and bring a ſacrifice for his ſin. So here, Job doth not offer only one general family-ſacrifice for them all, but he offereth up a diſtinct particular ſacrifice for every particular Son. This teacheth us,

First, That every one is ſaved and pardoned by the ſpecial and particular actings of his own Faith: Every Soul muſt believe for it ſelf.

Every one muſt have a Sacrifice. We have Congregational prayers, and we have perſonal prayers; now it is not enough for people to pray in publick with the Miniſter, or for the Miniſter (who is the mouth of the Congregation to God) to offer up a prayer for the pardon of the people; but every one muſt apart and by himſelf ſue out his own pardon; which is, as it were, his own ſacrifice, by offering up and tendering of Jeſus Chriſt unto God for the pardon of his ſins.

Then again you may note, in that Job offered a Sacrifice for every one of his ſons,

That, it is not enough for Parents to pray in general for their Children, but they ought to pray particularly for them.

As Parents who have many Children, provide portions according to the number of them all, and proportion out their care perſonally, according to the number of them all; and in the Family they provide meat and cloathing according to the particular number of them all: So likewiſe they ought to be at a proportionable expence in ſpirituals, to lay out and lay up prayers and interceſſions, according to the number of them all; not only to pray in general, that God would bleſs their Children and Family, but even to ſet them one by one before God, and ſo beg and ſue out a bleſſing upon the head of every one of them, as, without all queſtion Job did, when the ſacrifice for every ſon was made; he ſent up a Prayer to God for the pardon and acceptance of every ſon. That for the opening of the ſecond Act in the Text; firſt, He ſent and ſanctified them; and ſecondly, He offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all.

Now follows the Ground or the Reaſon of this Act of Job, both in ſanctifying them, and in offering Sacrifices for them. For Job ſaid, it may be that my ſons have ſinned, and curſed God in their hearts.

Holy Duties muſt be grounded upon reaſon. There muſt be a reaſon why we pray, before we pray; we muſt ſee cauſe for it, and great cauſe too. To pray out of cuſtom and formality, to offer ſacrifice, only becauſe it is a day of Sacrifice, is not praying nor ſacrificing. Job had a ſpecial reaſon; for Job ſaid, it may be my ſons have ſinned.

Let us examine the Reaſon a little; It may be my ſons have ſinned. What is it come to an It may be with Job, that his ſons have ſinned? What ſons had Job? Surely they were more then men, that the Father is but at a Queſtion whether his ſons have ſinned or no. Solomon after an If, concerning ſin, reſolves it into a concluſion, 1 King. 8. 46. If (ſaith he) they ſin againſt thee (here he makes a ſuppoſition; but you ſee he goes not one ſtep from it, before he makes a direct aſſertion) for (ſaith he) there is no man that ſinneth not; and yet Job puts it with an uncorrected If; or, it may be, my ſons have ſinned.

For the opening of this; Without all queſtion Job was fully and throughly ſtudied in that point of the univerſal corruption of man; his Diſputings (as we ſhall ſee afterwards in this Book) ſufficiently evince it. What is man, (ſaith he) that he ſhould be perfect, or he that is born of a woman, that he ſhould be clean? Here, by ſinning then, we are to underſtand ſomething more then ordinary ſinning. To ſin, ſometime is put for common and daily infirmities, ſuch as do inſeparably and inevitably cleave unto us; ſuch as, conſidering the ſtate and condition wherein we are, having corrupt fleſh and blood about us, we cannot be freed from. As a man who in the morning waſheth his hands, and goes abroad about his buſineſs and affairs in the world, though he doth not puddle in the mire, or rake among dunghils, yet when he returns home again to dinner, or at night, if he waſh, he finds that he hath contracted ſome uncleanneſs, and that his hands are foul: we cannot converſe in an unclean and dirty world with our bodies, but ſome uncleanneſs will faſten upon them. So it is with the Soul; the ſouls of the beſt, of the pureſt, of the holieſt, though they do not rake in the dunghil, and wallow in the mire of ſin baſely and filthily, yet they do from day to day, yea from moment to moment, contract ſome filth and uncleanneſs. And in this ſenſe it is that there is no man that liveth and ſinneth not. Every man hath a Fountain of uncleanneſs in him; and there will be ever ſome ſin, ſome filthineſs, bubling and boiling up, if not flowing forth.

Secondly, To ſin, is put for ſome ſpecial act of ſin, that which in Scripture is called a Fall; If any man be overtaken with a fault, you that are ſpiritual, reſtore him. And in this ſenſe the Apoſtle John ſaith (which is a clear anſwer to this doubt, and doth open the term) I write unto you little Children, that you ſin not. He did not write to them an impoſſible thing; he wrote to them about that, which in a Goſpel-ſenſe, they might attain unto. 1 Joh.

There are three degrees of ſinning.

1. There is one kind of ſinning, which is called a daily infirmity; which the Saints of God, the beſt in this life, are not freed from.

2. There is another kind of ſinning, which is to ſin wilfully and with pure delight; and thus, he that is born of God, cannot ſin. 1 Joh.

3. There is another kind of ſinning, which is called falling into ſin, or the falls of the Saints; and ſometimes they have fallen into great and ſcandalous ſins: In this ſenſe it is that the Apoſtle ſaith, Little Children, I write unto you, that you ſin not; that is, though you have daily infirmities, yet take heed of ſcandalous ſinnings. So here in the Text, where it is ſaid, It may be my ſons have ſinned; it is not meant either in the firſt or ſecond ſenſe; it is not meant, as if he thought his Sons were without infirmities, nor is it meant, that he did ſuſpect them of thoſe ſins (which are indeed incompatible with the ſtate of Grace) ſins of perfect wilfulneſs, and of malice, or the like; but it is of thoſe ſins in the middle ſort. It may be my ſons have ſinned; that is, have ſinned ſo, as to provoke God, and ſcandalize men in this their feaſting, in their meeting together. We may note from that,

First, He that liveth without groſs ſins, in a Goſpel-ſence, liveth without ſin.

To be without great and groſs ſin, is our holineſs upon earth; to be without any ſin, is the holineſs of heaven. He that liveth without fault, ſine querela (as it is ſaid of Zachary and Elizabeth, that they lived blameleſly) in Goſpel-account, is ſaid to live without any ſin at all.

Another Point we may collect from this [It may be my ſons have ſinned.]

Certainly then Job's ſons were godly.

If Job be at a queſtion whether they have ſinned, they were godly without queſtion.

When a man lives ſo, that he leaves only a ſuſpition that he hath ſinned, we may be at a concluſion that he is ſanctified. For other perſons can do nothing elſe but ſin, even in holy actions, much more in civil or natural.

Again, [It may be my ſons have ſinned.] It was a ſuſpition in Job concerning his children. Hence obſerve,

It is no breach of Charity to ſuſpect ill of others, while we intend their good.

Indeed upon an It may be, upon a peradventure, to accuſe and charge another, is very uncharitable; but upon a Peradventure, or an It may be, ſuch a one, my Child, or my Friend, or my Brother hath ſinned, to be put to pray for him, this is very charitable. A good heart turns its ſuſpitions of others ſinnings and failings, into prayers and interceſſions, that they may be pardoned; not into accuſations and ſlanders, that they may be defamed. The uſe which Job made here of his ſuſpition of his ſons ſinning, was to turn it into prayer and ſupplication for the pardon of their ſin.

One thing further from this [It may be my ſons have ſinned.] Job knew of no evil that his ſons had committed; he had no report, that we read of, that his ſons had behaved themſelves unſeemly in their Meetings and Feaſtings; he only doubteth, he only is jealous and affraid that they had; yet at this time he prayeth, and sacrificeth, and laboureth a reconcilement for them. Note from hence,

A suspition that we our selves or others have sinned against God, is ground enough for us to seek a reconcilement for our selves or others with God.

If you that are tender Parents, have but a suspition, if there be but an It may be, that your Child hath the Plague, or taken the infection, will it not be ground enough for you to go presently and give your Child a good Medicine? If any of you have but a suspition, that either your selves, or your friends have taken poyson, though you be not certain of it, will it not be ground enough for you to take or give an Antidote presently? Sin is as a Plague, it is as a Poyson; therefore while you have but a suspition, either of your selves or of others, that you have sinned or failed thus or thus; here is ground enough for you to take an Antidote, to take a Preservative, to seek all the means you can to heal your souls, and to make your peace with God.

And if Job prayed thus, when he only suspected his sons had sinned; what shall we say of those Parents, who are little troubled, when they see and know their sons have sinned?

It is safest to repent even of those sins we only fear we have committed; for then we shall be sure to repent of those we have committed. A scrupulous Conscience grieves for what it suspects; a seared Conscience is not grieved for what it is certain either it self or others have done amiss.

Lastly, Where had Job's sons been that he is thus suspitious? Had they been in any suspected place? No, it was only in their own houses. Had they been about any unlawful thing? No, it was only a friendly meeting, feasting of Brothers and Sisters together. Yet Job is affraid lest his sons had sinned. Hence observe,

That, we may quickly offend and break the Law, while we are about things in their own nature lawful, especially in feasting.

It is an easie matter to sin, while the thing you are about is not sinful; nay, while the thing you are about is holy. We may suspect our selves that we have sinned, when we have been praying; much more when we have been feasting. We may suspect our selves that we have sinned, when we have been hearing the Word, speaking the Word; just cause then much more we have to suspect our selves, when we have been trading, buying or selling, and working abroad in the world. Lawful things are oftentimes the occasion of unlawful. All the sins of the world are described thus; they ate, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, &c. There is not one of these an act evil in it self; yet they sinned away their peace, and sinned away their souls, in dealing about these things. Therefore as you must be affraid of all things in their own nature unlawful; so be jealous of your selves in things that are lawful.

Luke 17. 7, 28.

It follows,

And cursed God in their hearts.

Interpreters are much divided about the sense of these words.

First, Some observe that the Hebrew word Barach, doth signifie not only to bless, but to bow the knee: So it is used, 2 Chron. 6. 13. Solomon at the Dedicating of the Temple, had made a Brazen Scaffold, and upon it he stood, and kneeled down upon his knees before all the Congregation. The word there, kneeled down upon his knees, in the Original, is the same here used. But,

וברכו

Then further, the word Elohim, is used in Scripture, not only for the true God, for God himself; but it is applied sometimes to Angels, and sometimes to Idols, to Devil-gods, to false gods, Exod. 18. 11. Now I know that the Lord is greater then all gods; &c. then all the Idols that the Egyptians did trust upon.

לב

They observe further, that the Hebrew word Leb, [in their hearts, Bilebabbam] doth signifie not only the Heart, but the middle or center of a thing: As when it is said in the Scripture, They went down into the midst of the Sea; the word is, They went down into the heart of the Sea; and in the midst of the Earth, it is the heart of the Earth; and so when it is said, that Absolom was hanging in the midst of the Oak, the Original word is, he was left hanging in the heart of the Oak. From all these acceptions of the single terms, the sense is made up thus; It may be my sons have sinned, &c. that is, It may be my sons have sinned, bowing down to the false gods that are in the midst of them. I confess Feasting and False worship, Sensuality and Idolatry go often together, Exod. 32. 6. When the Golden Calf was made, they sate down to eat, &c. And Moses foretels, Deut. 31. 20. When they shall have eaten, and filled themselves, and waxen fat, then will they turn unto other gods. Yet I cannot admit this of Job's Children; surely he who had bestowed so much care in their institution, and had them still under his eye, could not suspect them in degenerating so soon into such palpable Idolatry.

2 Sam. 18. 13.

Secondly, Others take the word [Barach] in the Original, in its proper sense, It may be my sons have sinned, and blessed God; and they expound and open it thus: It may be my sons have sinned, and instead of being humbled and seeking to God for the pardon of their sins, they have rejoyced and blessed God. Just as if a Thief that hath sped well, and hath got a good prey, should thank God that he hath prospered so well in his wickedness: So here (as if Job should say) My sons have done ill in their feastings, and they are so far from being humbled, that they have blessed God in their hearts; they have been lifted up; they have given God thanks for the plenty of Creatures, but have not repented for their abuse of the Creatures. So we may interpret it by that place, Zech. 11. 4. where there is such an expression; the Lord speaking to Christ, saith, Feed the flock of the slaughter; whose possessors slay them, and hold themselves not guilty. (They that should have been the feeders of the flock, instead of feeding of them, have destroyed them; yea, they do this, and hold themselves not guilty) and they that sell them, say, blessed be the Lord, for I am rich. They grew rich by selling souls (as many since have lived by the same Trade, starving the people, to feed themselves) the just character of an idle Idol-shepherd; and then they said, Blessed be God we are grown very rich, and have got much goods, though we have done little good. This is a second interpretation, and a clear one; only methinks it layes too high a stain of wickedness on Job's sons. It is one of the greatest wickednesses for a man to bless himself in his sins; but for a man to bless God in his sins, is far worse.

Thirdly, Others interpret Benedicere by Valedicere, blessing by departing. Thus, It may be my sons have sinned and departed from God in their hearts; and they bring some Texts of Scripture, wherein the word [Barach] signifies to depart, or to take leave, and go away; as, Gen. 47. 10. Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh; he blessed him, and departed. So it is said likewise of Joab, 2 Sam. 14. 22. When he had obtained what he desired, he fell to the ground on his face, and bowed himself, and thanked (or blessed) the King, and went out. Now they would interpret this, blessed God in their hearts, to the same sense; It may be my sons have sinned, and blessed God in their hearts, that is, have departed from God in their hearts. Indeed every sin is a departure from God; as the Apostle speaks; Take heed lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief to depart from the living God. Sin is a turning away from God; yet every sin is not, nay, few sins are a farewel to God. But I shall lay by this interpretation; for the proofs come not home, no, nor near the point. In both those places, blessing is not put barely for departing; and besides, departing in those Texts, is taken in a good sence; Jacob departed from Pharaoh, not in a way of deserting him, but in a way of saluting him; so Joab departed from the King, not that he did revolt from him (as they would have the word to import a kind of revolting and apostatizing from God) but only he did obeisance, and went away about his business; therefore this interpretation cannot stand. Heb. 3. 12.

There is a fourth Exposition much laboured by Zanchius (and would it hold, it were an excellent exposition) according to the Letter of the Text: thus; It may be my Sons have sinned, and not blessed God in their hearts; and so he makes those words to be exegetical, the explication of the former, what the sin of Job's sons was; It may be my sons have sinned, and if you would know what they have sinned in, I fear they have forgot to give God the glory for the Zanchius.

the refreshing they have had by the Creatures, they have not blessed God. This were an excellent and clear sence; but the way he takes to make it out, is very obscure: For he doth it only by this Rule; When (saith he) there is a negative Particle in the former, a negative is likewise to be understood in the following Clause. His Rule he clears by divers Instances. But we find in this place no negative Particle, as Non or Ne, or the like, in the former part of the Verse; and how there should be a negative in the latter, I cannot understand according to his Rule: Ne forte, (It is here said) It may be my sons have sinned (that is a word of doubting, not denial; rather an affirmative, then a negative) and have not blessed; now saith he, though that Particle (not) be not in the Hebrew, yet it must be understood of course, because there is a negative Particle in the former part: How he can make (ne forte) peradventure, a negative particle, I do not well apprehend; yet the sence in it self is very good; It may be my sons have sinned, and not blessed God in their hearts.

Some would read it with an Interrogation (though I question whether the Grammar will allow it) Thus, It may be my sons have sinned; and have they blessed God in their hearts? As if he had said, I fear they have not blessed God, or not blessed him cordially; neglect of, or slightness in such a Duty, calls for sacrifice.

Lastly, That meaning which our Translation leads unto, is most commonly taken by Interpreters both ancient and modern; namely, that here in this Text the word [Barach] is to be expounded by cursing; It may be my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. I shall present you with the grounds of this Interpretation, and how it is made good; and then leave it to the Readers Judgment, whether to chuse this, or those former which have had any countenance shewed them. For in a Scripture which may without impeachment of any Truth, admit divers sences, I would not be so positive in one, as to reject all others.

Now this Translation is maintained by a Figure, either by an Antiphrasis, which is the speaking of a thing sounding one way, when it is meant another way, when there is an opposition between the Letter of the word, and the Meaning of the word. Thus, 1 Kings 21. 13. Naboth is charged for blessing God and the King; sc. cursing. Or, by an Euphemismus; that is, when some filthy or execrable matter is expressed by a word of a fairer signification. So in Scripture, the uncleanness of some things is covered with a word, that so the offensiveness of it may be removed both from the Ear and Phansie: As for example, that Vessel wherein Nature doth unburden it self, it is called A Vessel wherein there is no pleasure; and so the word that the Hebrews use for a Harlot, signifies properly a holy woman; as, Gen. 38. When Judah asked whether they saw the Harlot? the word in the Hebrew (Kedesah) signifies a holy woman, by an Antiphrasis, or by an Euphemismus. Yet some think a Harlot, so called, because (holiness being the dedication of a thing or person) such dedicate and give themselves up to, or are possessed with a spirit of uncleanness. But to the Text; take it by an Euphemismus, or fair speaking: It may be my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts; they even abhorring to use such a word concerning God, express it by blessing; It may be my sons have sinned, and blessed God in their hearts. So the Latines use the word, Sacrum pro execrando, that which is the most execrable thing, they call a sacred thing.

Hos. 8. 8.

Auri sacra fames.

Now taking it thus according to the common stream of Expositors upon the place, it may yet be doubted, how Job could suspect his sons of this, that they should curse God?

I answer to that; Here we are not to take cursing either for that abominable act (at which Heathens blush) the casting of open reproach upon the Name of God; or for a malicious and virulent, though secret blaspheming of God, and sending defiance to Heaven in their hearts. But to curse God in the heart, doth signifie an irreverent, undue, unfit, unholy thought of God, any thought unbecoming the Glory and Majesty of so great a God; which, how quickly the heart may send out at a Feast, who feels not, who finds not? God is said to be cursed, when he hath not that reverence and honour which belongs to him, whose Name is Holy and Reverent. In that sence only we are to understand the word cursing here. And Mr. Broughton gives a Translation which lets in some light to this; It may be my sons have sinned, and little blessed God in their hearts; that is, they have not had such high, such holy thoughts of God as became them; they have little blessed God: careless thoughts of God are little blessing of God, and both amount to a cursing of God.

So that the Sense which results, is this. As if Job should have said, I am well enough satisfied concerning my sons, that they have not broadly blasphemed God, that they have not been such as have torn his Name with Oaths, Cursings and Execrations; yet notwithstanding I know the heart is a deceitful thing, there are many starting-holes in it; it quickly conceives, and closely conceals a sin; and therefore I am very doubtful; though my sons have carried it fairly and well in their actions and words while they feasted, that yet their hearts have been loose, and their affections vain; I am affraid they have cursed, lightly regarded, or little blessed God in their hearts.

Observe First, That we ought to keep our hearts with all manner of keeping in every thing we go about.

If your hearts are disorderly, it is a kind of cursing God. Remember not only to keep your hearts, when you are praying, and when you are hearing, and when you are in holy duties; but remember to keep your hearts when you are feasting and refreshing your selves, when you are in your callings, when you are buying and selling, &c.

Note, Secondly, That Sins of the heart, sinful thoughts are very dangerous sins.

Job could not accuse his sons of loud blasphemies, he only suspected the silent sins of the heart; yet he offereth sacrifice for them.

Again, When Job hath nothing to charge his Sons with, but only sins of the heart, you see it is with an It may be my sons have cursed God in their hearts; he doth not speak directly or positively that they have done so.

Whence note, That no man can positively conclude what is wrought in the heart of another.

The Heart is God's Peculiar; as he only hath the Lock and Key of the Heart, to shut or open it, so he only hath a Window to look into it; we may guess at the heart, we may say, It may be, further we cannot go. The hearts of men often come forth at their mouths, and appear in their actions, and then indeed we may conclude their hearts are naught; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, and the hand worketh, but unless we have that testimony, unless the heart give that witness against it self, we can only suspect it; it may be thus or thus; God alone can tell when we curse him in our hearts; and (if we go on impenitently in them) irreverent thoughts will be interpreted a cursing of God.

Thus did Job continually.

This is the third thing to be opened in this Verse; to wit, the Constancy of Job. We have seen the Acts of his spiritual care, and the ground of it, his fear lest his Sons had sinned. Now we have the constancy of this duty. Thus did Job continually.

כל הימים

Continually.] The Original is, all the dayes thus did Job; Cunctis diebus, all dayes, that is, all the dayes that this occasion did offer it self. When his Sons went to feasting, then ever Job went to praying and to sacrificing. Continually, or all the dayes, doth not import that Job did offer sacrifice every day; this continually is to be understood in the renewed seasons; all the dayes are those dayes wherein occasion was given. We are then said to do a thing continually, when we do it seasonably; so those places of Scripture are to be understood; Pray without ceasing; not that a man should do nothing else but pray, but that he should labour to have his heart in a praying frame alwayes, and should actually pray as often as Duty requires; such an one prayes alwayes. So here; Job's offering sacrifice continually, noteth only the constancy and perseverance of Job in the Duty, that so often as there was an occasion renewed, Job renewed this service and holy care concerning his sons, for reconciling them unto God. Job had many other things to do in the world; he had a calling, yet he offered sacrifice continually.

1 Thes. 5. 17, Eph. 6. 28.

It

It is an excellent point of ſpiritual wiſdom, to drive the two Trades for Heaven and Earth ſo, as that one ſhall not intrench upon another; for a man to pray ſo, as that it may be ſaid he prayes continually; and for a man to follow his Calling ſo, as that it may be ſaid, he follows his Calling continually. In that he offered ſacrifice as oft as his Sons did feaſt, Obſerve this,

That, the heart of man is continually evil.

Do not think that one Sacrifice will ſerve the heart of man; when it hath failed once in a Duty, and thou haſt humbled thy Soul for that, think not thus, now my heart will forbear, when I come to ſuch a duty, or ſuch a buſineſs again, now I have taken order with my heart, I need not fear any more: no, the heart will ſin over the ſame ſin a thouſand times, it will ſin continually. You ſee here Job ſacrificing every time his Sons feaſted, he knew their hearts were apt to conceive thoſe ſins at any time, therefore he ſeeks God for them at all times.

Further obſerve, That, Renewed Sins muſt have renewed Repentance.

Thus did Job continually.] Till you have done ſinning, you muſt never give over repenting. If there be a Leak in the Ship, that lets in water continually, the Pump muſt work continually to carry it out: We are leaking Veſſels all of us, ſin cometh in, ſin is renewed, there muſt be the Pump of Repentance to carry it out again.

Laſtly, We may note this, Job did it continually; Job was not good by fits.

That which a man doth out of Conſcience, he will do with perſeverance.

Nature will have good moods, but Grace is ſteddy. Thus did Job continually; whatſoever his affairs or buſineſſes were, whatſoever was laid by, he would not lay by this duty of ſacrificing.

Let this ſuffice for the Fifth Verſe, containing the care of Job over the ſouls of his Children. And ſo in theſe five Verſes already opened, we have First, ſeen the dignity and ſincerity of Job's Perſon. Secondly, The fulneſs and proſperity of his Condition. Thirdly, The holineſs and piety of his Life. Certainly a man thus raiſed, thus glorious, ſet up thus in Temporals and in Spirituals, thus furniſhed with Subſtantials, and adorned with Circumſtantials, abounding in whatſoever could make a man great and happy, both in the eye of God and man; ſurely ſuch a man as this, a man thus compleat, wanted nothing but ſome want, to try his ſincerity in this fulneſs. And now behold this haſtening upon him: God having thus fitted and qualified him, will now try him, try him like Gold in the Furnace of affliction. You may ſee matter gathering for this, and the fire kindling in the next part of the Chapter.

Verſe 6. Now there was a day when the Sons of God came to preſent themſelves before the Lord, &c.

Take this in the General, from the connection of the two parts.

Uſually where God gives much Grace, he tries Grace much.

To whom God hath given ſtrong ſhoulders, on him, for the moſt part, he layeth heavy burdens. As ſoon as Job is ſpoken of thus prepared, the next thing that follows is an affliction.

Now there was a day, &c.] And ſo we are come to the ſecond main Diviſion of the Chapter; which is, the Affliction of Job; and that is ſet forth from this verſe 6, to the end of verſe 19. And leſt we ſhould conceive it to have come upon him by chance, it is punctually deſcribed four wayes,

1. By the Cauſes of it, verſe 6, 7, &c.
2. By the Inſtruments of it, verſe 15, 16, &c.
3. By the Manner of it, verſe 14, 15, 16, &c.
4. By the Time of it, verſe 13.

First, His Afflictions are ſet forth in their Cauſes; and that is done from the ſixth verſe to the end of the twelfth. And the Cauſes are threefold.

First, The Efficient Cauſes, and they were two.

1. The ſupreme and principal efficient Cauſe, and that was God, ordering and diſpoſing the affliction of Job.
2. The ſubordinate efficient Cauſe, and that was Satan; he was an efficient but under God: Satan found out other Inſtruments and Tools to do it by; but he was an efficient ſubordinate unto God; and the Text diſcovers him three ways.
   1. By his Diligence in tempting, verſe 7.
   2. By his Malice in ſlandering, verſe 9, 10, 11.
   3. By his Cruelty, in ſoliciting the overthrow and affliction of Job, verſe 11.

Secondly, We have the Material Cauſe of Job's Affliction; or, in what manner he was afflicted; and that is laid down, firſt, poſitively, in thoſe words, All that he hath is in thy power; that is, his outward Eſtate; that was the matter wherein he was afflicted. Then it is laid down negatively, in thoſe words, Only upon himſelf put not forth thy hand. God doth ſet him out how far the affliction ſhall go: in the things that he hath, thou ſhalt afflict him; but thou ſhalt not meddle with his Perſon, with his Body, or with his Soul.

Thirdly, The Final Cauſe of Job's Affliction; and that is, the practical and experimental determination, deciſion, or ſtating of a great Queſtion that was between God and Satan concerning Job's ſincerity. God tells Satan that Job was a good and juſt man; Satan he denies it, and ſaith that Job was an hypocrite. Now the determination of this Queſtion was the general Final Cauſe of Job's affliction. When on the one ſide, God affirms it, and on the other ſide, Satan denies; how ſhall it be tried? Who ſhall be the Moderator and Umpire between them; Satan will not believe God, and God had no reaſon to believe Satan: How then ſhould this be made out? It is as if Satan had ſaid, Here is your Yea, and my Nay; this queſtion will never be ended or decided between us, unleſs you will admit ſome courſe to have Job ſoundly afflicted: This will quickly diſcover what metal the man is made of; therefore let him come to the trial, ſaith Satan. Let him, ſaith God, behold all that he hath, is in thy power; do thy worſt to him, only upon his perſon put not forth thy hand. So that, I ſay, the general final cauſe of Job's affliction, is the determination of the Queſtion, and deciſion of the Diſpute between God and Satan, whether Job was a ſincere and holy man, or no.

And all this (to give you the ſum of thoſe ſix verſes a little further) is here ſet forth and deſcribed unto us after the manner of men, by an Anthropopathy, which is, when God expreſſes himſelf in his actions and diſpenſations with and toward the world, as if he were a man. So God here; he preſents himſelf in the buſineſs after the manner of ſome Great King ſitting upon his Throne, having his Servants attending him, and taking an account of them, what they had done, or giving Inſtructions and Commiſſions to them what they ſhall do. This, I ſay, God doth here after the manner of men; for otherwiſe we are not to conceive, that God doth make certain dayes of Seſſion with his Creatures, wherein he doth call the good and bad Angels together about the affairs of the world; we muſt not have ſuch groſs conceits of God; for he needs receive no information from them, neither doth he give them, or Satan, any formal Commiſſion; neither is Satan admitted into the preſence of God, to come ſo near God at any time; neither is God moved at all by the ſlanders of Satan, or by his accuſations, to deliver up his ſervants and children into his hands for a moment. But only the Scripture ſpeaks thus, to teach us how God carries himſelf in the affairs of the world, even as if he ſate upon his Throne, and call'd every Creature before him, and gave each a direction, what and when and where to work, how far, and which way to move in every action.

So that in theſe ſix verſes following, which contain the cauſes of Job's affliction, are (as we may ſo ſpeak) the Scheme or Draught of Providence (that may be the Title of them.) If a man would delineate Providence, he might do it thus; ſuppoſe God upon his Throne, with Angels good and bad, yea, all creatures about him, and he directing, ſending, ordering every one, as a Prince doth his Subjects, or as a Maſter his Servants, do you this, and do you that, &c. So all is ordered according to his Dictate.

Thus

Thus all things in Heaven and Earth are diſpoſed by the unerring wiſdom, and limited by the Almighty power of God.

Such a repreſentation as this we read in 1 Kings 22. 19. Where Micaiah ſaid to Ahab, Hear thou the word of the Lord; I ſaw the Lord ſiting upon his Throne, and all the Hoſt of heaven ſtanding by him. And ſo he goeth on to ſhew how a Spirit came and offered himſelf to be a lying Spirit in the mouth of Ahab's Prophets. This is only a ſhadow of Providence; there was no ſuch thing really acted; God did not convene or call together a Synod of Spirits to adviſe with (de Arduis Regni) about hard, doubtful caſes; nor are wicked Spirits admitted into his preſence; only by this we are inſtructed and aſſured that God doth as exactly order all things in heaven and earth, as if he ſtood queſtioning or interrogating good Angels, Men, and Devils, concerning thoſe matters.

Having thus given ſome light about theſe ſix Verſes in general, I ſhall open the Particulars.

Now there was a day.] The Jewiſh Rabbins trouble themſelves much to find out what day this was: They ſay it was the firſt day of the year. Others, that it was the Sabbath day. But I account it a diſadvantage to a clear Truth, when it is proved by an obſcure Text. The Sabbath hath proof enough before the Law, though this be ſpared. The holy Ghoſt hath told us only that there was a day, or a certain time.

Hic locus refellit Chryſoſt. qui negat Angelos unquam vocari filios Dei. Druſ. Read more of this Point, c. 2. 1, where the whole Verſe is repeated.

When the Sons of God.] In Gen. 6. 2. The poſterity of Seth (who were the Viſible Church at that time) are called the Sons of God. The unanimous conſent of all Expoſitors (I have met with) is, that here the Sons of God are the good Angels; ſo alſo they are called, chap. 38. 7. of this Book. Some, it may be, will object againſt this Expoſition that of the Apoſtle in Heb. 1. 5. To which of the Angels ſaid he at any time, thou art my Son? How then do you interpret here, that the Sons of God are the Angels, whenas the Apoſtle hath expreſt, To which of the Angels, &c.

I anſwer, that the Angels are not the Sons of God, as the Apoſtle there expreſſeth; they are not the Sons of God by eternal Generation; but they are the Sons of God by temporal Creation; for ſo he ſpeaks there; To which of the Angels ſaid he, thou art my ſon, this day have I begotten thee? They are not the begotten ſons of God, but they are the created ſons of God. And the Angels are called the ſons of God in three reſpects.

First, Becauſe of their great and mighty power; therefore Eph. 1. 21. they are called Principalities and Powers; far above principalities and powers, and might and dominions; that is, far above all Angels. They are called the ſons of God, becauſe they are like God in power and dignity.

Then again they are called the ſons of God, becauſe they ſerve God as ſons, chearfully, willingly, readily. They do not obey as ſlaves, as ſervants, as the beſt of ſervants, they obey better then the beſt of ſervants; they obey as Children; they go about their work with filial and ſonlike chearfulneſs and delight.

Thirdly, They are called ſons, becauſe of the great priviledge that God doth vouchſafe them; he doth uſe them as his Children, as his ſons, they are his Courtiers, they are near him, alwayes attending him, and continually ſee his face; they have the priviledge of ſons.

Came to preſent themſelves before the Lord.] Not that the Angels are at any time out of the preſence of God, for Chriſt is expreſs in that, Mat. 18. 10. Their Angels do alwayes behold the face of my Father. But they are then ſaid to come and preſent themſelves before God, when they come upon ſome ſpecial buſineſs, or upon ſome ſpecial occaſion. As it is with us here upon the earth, we are never out of the preſence of God; for Pſal. 139. Whither ſhall I go from thy preſence? Yet when we come to pray, and are in other holy duties, we are ſaid to preſent our ſelves before God, and to draw near unto God, and God is ſaid to draw near unto us at ſuch a time, and yet God is ever with us, and we ever with him. So when it is ſaid here, that the Angels came and preſented themſelves before the Lord, it noteth only this, their readineſs, either to give an account of what they had done, or to receive directions from God what to do. The Angels are moſt willing to go about the ſervice and work of God, and that is all that is here meant by their preſenting themſelves before the Lord, for otherwiſe they are ever in his preſence: as, Luke 1. 19. The Angel anſwered and ſaid, I am Gabriel that ſtand in the preſence of God, and am ſent to ſpeak unto thee. I am Gabriel that ſtand; he ſpeaks in the preſent time, even now while I am ſpeaking unto thee, I ſtand in the preſence of God. The Angel while he goeth into the world, is not abſent from God, he beholdeth the face of God alwayes. The Schoolmen have an odd diſtinction, they ſay, there are aſſiſting Angels, and miniſtring Angels: Thoſe Angels that are aſſiſtants, ſtand alwayes before God, and never are ſent out about the world upon any occaſion; Others are miniſtring Spirits; as, Heb. 1. 14. Are they not miniſtring Spirits ſent forth to miniſter for them who are the heirs of ſalvation? This is School-Doctrine. But there needs no ſuch diſtinction of ſome to be aſſiſting or attending, and ſome to be miniſtring Angels; for whereſoever they are, they are alwayes in the preſence of God; and their preſenting themſelves before God, notes only their preparedneſs to attend the Lords Service in whatſoever he ſhall employ them.

And Satan came alſo among them.] That is, the chief of the evil Angels. The word [Satan] ſignifieth an Adverſary; and ſo it is oftentimes applied to men; as, concerning Solomon, it is ſaid, that while he did walk exactly with God, there was neither Adverſary nor evil occurrant; 1 Kin. 5. 4. the word in the Original is, there was no Satan in his Kingdom. And in 1 Kings 11. 14. it is ſaid, The Lord ſtirred up Satan an Adverſary againſt Solomon. And that accuſation which thoſe wretches in Ezra 4. ſent againſt the building of Jeruſalem, is called Sitna; they ſent Sitna, an accuſation, or an oppoſing Letter. It comes from the ſame Root; any kind of oppoſition is called Sitna, from Satan, who is an Oppoſer. It is ſometimes uſed more generally concerning any oppoſition; as the Angel that came to oppoſe Balaam, Numb. 22. 34. I wiſt not (ſaith Balaam) that there was an Adverſary that ſtood in the way.

But how can it be ſaid that Satan ſhould come among the ſons of God?

I ſaid before, that it was but an alluding ſpeech to the dealings of men in their Seſſions and Aſſemblies, and there is no neceſſity to make every Particular of it hold. We may conceive it thus,

Satan came alſo among them.] It is not ſaid that the ſons of God and Satan came and preſented themſelves before the Lord; Satan did not joyn himſelf in with them, Satan did not offer himſelf for any good ſervice; but thither he came, being ſo ordered by the over-ruling power of God.

But can Satan come into the preſence of God?

No otherwiſe then a blind man can come into the Sun; he comes into the Sun, and the Sun ſhineth upon him, but he ſees not the Sun. Satan comes ſo into the preſence of God, that he is alwayes ſeen of God; he is never ſo in the preſence of God, as to ſee God. It is queſtion'd whether the lapſed Angels ever ſaw God at all while they ſtood; becauſe if they had ſeen God, it is conceived that Viſion would have been their confirmation: But it is moſt certain, that the lapſed Angels, ſince their fall, never ſaw God, nor ever ſhall; though it be ſaid here, Satan came among the ſons of God: you know what the Apoſtle Jude teacheth, That the Devils kept not their place, but are reſerved in Chains of darkneſs againſt the judgment of the great day: We ſhall open that afterward, when we come to ſpeak of his compaſſing the earth, how he doth compaſs the earth, and yet is reſerved in chains of darkneſs. But I ſay, there is his ſeat, there is his place, and all that is ſpoken of him in this, doth not infer any the leaſt glimpſe or fruition of God or communion with the Angels. In regard of his nature, he is ſtill a Spirit; but in regard of his ſin, he is a miſerable Spirit; he hath loſt his excellency, though he hath not his Nature. And being a Spirit, he hath power to paſs and repaſs, to go up and down the world, to aſcend and deſcend at his pleaſure (as good Angels may and can) when God doth permit them.

We ſee here the good Angels are called the Sons of God; in this learn the priviledge of Believers; they partake with the Angels in this Title: The Apoſtle ſaith, Behold what manner of love the Father hath ſhewed, that we ſhould be called the ſons of God. If you would know what manner of love it is, it is as great as the Angels in Heaven have: Chriſt took not upon him the nature of Angels, but hath given us the honour of Angels. Fallen Angels could not ſhare with us in the benefit of redemption, but we ſhare with the Angels that ſtand in the priviledge of Sonſhip. We are the Sons of God as well as they, and in ſomewhat beyond them; they are created Sons, but not (as we) adopted ſons.

Came and preſented themſelves before God.] This ſhould teach us to imitate Angels. This we pray for; That the will of God ſhould be done on Earth, as it is done in Heaven. The Angels alwayes preſent themſelves, they alwayes ſtand before God, ready to do his will; we ſhould be ever in the preſence of God in this ſence, that is, preſenting our ſelves, ſtanding as in the preſence of God, ready to take and receive inſtruction, to do his will, whatever it is. Lord, what wilt thou have me to do, is as it were the voyce of an Angel ſtanding before the Throne of God. It ſhould be the voice of every Soul, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? This is the preſenting of the Soul before God.

Then conſider here, who Satan was; Satan was as good in his Creation, as any of thoſe who are called the Sons of God. They are called the ſons of God; and he is now called nothing but Satan, an Adverſary. His condition was once as good as theirs. Note hence,

There is no created excellency, but if it be left to it ſelf, will quickly undo it ſelf.

These Angels were as good at the firſt as any of thoſe that were here called the ſons of God. They were not confirmed; they ſtood upon their own bottom, they fell, and had no tempter at all; they turned about upon the freedom of their own will, and left their habitation (ſaith the Scripture.) There is no truſting to any eſtate out of Chriſt.

Further, note this, what was the difference between thoſe ſons of God, and this Satan? Only ſin; One was as good as the other in the Creation; nothing elſe made an Angel a Devil, but only ſin.

Sin deſpoiles the Creature of all its comfort and honour at once.

Again, note this, The Angel falling, and becoming ſinful, hath his name preſently changed, he is called Satan, an Adverſary; an Adverſary to God, an Adverſary to man.

He that is wicked himſelf, will quickly be an adverſary, an oppoſer of all goodneſs; no ſooner a Sinner, but a Satan.

Laſtly, note this;

To be an oppoſer of good, is to be conformable to the Devil.

The Devil is the Adverſary, the Satan; and ſo proportionably, as any one is an oppoſer of good, ſo much of Satan, ſo much of the Devil he hath in him: Therefore Chriſt ſaid to a chief Apoſtle, when he did oppoſe him in that greateſt good of all, the working out of our Redemption in dying for us; get thee behind me Satan, Mat. 16. All oppoſition of goodneſs is a ſpice of the Devil. So the Apoſtle Paul, Acts 13. 10. when he ſpeaks to Elymas the Sorcerer, ſaith, O thou Child of the Devil, thou enemy of all goodneſs. To be an enemy of goodneſs, is to be the child of the Devil; it is the very Character of the Devil: He is a Satan in reſpect of all goodneſs and good perſons.

And ſurely (my Brethren) if this be a character of the Devil, and to be conformable unto Satan, how conſpicuous is that conformity in this age? How many thouſands bear this Mark of the Devil, not only in their hands cloſely, but in their foreheads openly? How many viſible walking Satans are there among us, enemies of all goodneſs, oppreſſors of all righteouſneſs, oppoſers of our peace, oppoſers of our liberty, oppoſers of the Goſpel, oppoſers of Chriſt? Theſe are all as ſo many Satans in the world, ſo many enemies. Now is a time that Satans are let looſe in the world; the Devil, now, if ever, works mightily in the hearts and ſpirits, in the hands and tongues of theſe children of Diſobedience. It becometh us then, that as there are many adverſaries and oppoſers of goodneſs, to ſhew our ſelves friends and patrons of goodneſs. Chriſt hath many Challengers, let him find ſome Champions. Now it is time to raiſe your ſpirits, not only to love the Truth, but to maintain the Truth. As it is the height of wickedneſs, not only to do evil, but to oppoſe good; ſo it is the height of holineſs, not only to do good, but to oppoſe evil. This is juſt to be on the contrary point to Satan; he doth wickedneſs, and oppoſeth good; let us do good, and oppoſe all evil: To be a Satan againſt Satan, is the glory of a Chriſtian. Now ſet your ſelves againſt the Satans, be Adverſaries to that Adverſary, and all his adherents, ſo ſhall you approve your ſelves the friends of Chriſt.

VERS. 7, 8.

And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, whence comeſt thou? Then Satan anſwered the Lord, and ſaid, from going to and fro in the earth; and from walking up and down in it.

And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, haſt thou not conſidered my ſervant Job, that there is none like him in the earth? a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and eſchewеth evil?

IN the former Verſe we ſhewed you that great and glorious Seſſion, the Lord with his holy Angels about him, and Satan too coming among them. In the Verſes following, to the end of the twelfth, we have the buſineſs or acts of the Seſſion recorded. God interrogates, Satan anſwers; Satan moves, God grants. This is the ſum of all the buſineſs that paſs'd in this Seſſion. God puts two Interrogatories to Satan, one concerning his Travels, or where he had been? ver. 7. The other, concerning his obſervations, or what he had done? ver. 8.

In ver. 7. we have the firſt Queſtion, the Lord beginneth with Satan; And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, whence comeſt thou?

How the Lord ſpeaks, is a point almoſt unſpeakable. There are many Diſputes about it, I will not ſtay upon them; only to open this, that you may take in all Scripture of the like kind, wherein the Lord is ſaid to ſpeak. We muſt know, that as in Scripture, God is ſaid to have a mouth, and a voice, alluding unto man by that common Figure; ſo likewiſe, when the Lord ſpeaks, we muſt underſtand it by the ſame figure; it is but an alluſion to the manner of men. God is ſaid to ſpeak, as men are ſaid to ſpeak; but God doth not ſpeak as men ſpeak, forming a voice by ſuch Organs or Inſtruments of ſpeech: but when the Lord ſpeaks, it is either by forming and creating a voice in the ayr; ſo God is ſaid to ſpeak ſometimes; as when Chriſt was baptized, there came a voice from heaven, ſaying, This is my beloved Son, &c. So John 12. 28. There came a voice from heaven, ſaying, I have glorified thee; which all the People heard ſounding in the ayr. Secondly, God is ſaid to ſpeak, when he manifeſts and declares himſelf, either to the Spirits of men, or unto Angels, who are Spirits. God doth ſpeak unto the ſpirits of men, ſometimes without any forming of a voice; ſo the phraſe is uſual in the Prophets, The word of the Lord came unto me; which is to be underſtood, that the Lord did ſecretly reveal himſelf to the ſpirits of his Prophets, and not by any external audible voice; it was an inward, not an outward word. So when the Lord ſpeaks unto Spirits or Angels, be they good or evil Angels, you muſt not underſtand it of a voice formed or faſhioned into audible words and ſyllables; but it is a manifeſtation and declaration of Gods will and mind unto the Angels mind, good or bad, as God willeth. For the will of God to declare himſelf unto an Angel, is the ſpeech of God unto an Angel. So much as God intendeth of his mind ſhould be known to the Devil, is a ſpeaking to the Devil. The intention of one Spirit is as plain to another Spirit, as the voice of one man is to another man, there is the very ſame proportion. So here in this place where it is ſaid, The Lord ſaid unto Satan, this was only a manifeſtation of Gods will, as he willed unto Satan; God did manifeſt himſelf thus far to Satan, that it was his pleaſure to know of him whence he came; this will was his ſpeech.

Mat. 3. 17.

To paſs from the manner of ſpeaking, we will look upon the matter ſpoken, And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, whence comeſt thou? That's the firſt Queſtion.

This Queſtion is here put, not for information; as if the Lord did not know whence he came, as men uſually queſtion, that they may be informed. But Queſtions in Scripture (eſpecially when the Lord putteth them) are to be underſtood in ſome of theſe ſences. First,

First, To exact a Confession from the mouth of the party. He said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Not that he needed an information, but that he might receive a confession from the mouth of Satan. So he questioned Adam, Gen. 3. Adam, where art thou? who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the Tree whereof I commanded thee, thou shalt not eat? These Questions were not to inform God, but only that Adam might give a confession out of his own mouth concerning those things. So he questioned Cain, Gen. 4. Where is Abel thy Brother? It was a Question only to draw a confession from Cain of what he had done. There is a like Question of Elisha to his Servant Gehazi, when he had run after Naaman, and had got a reward from him, 2 Kings 5. 25. Elisha saith to him, Whence comest thou? or, Where hast thou been? He asked him this, only to draw a confession from him; for saith he afterward, Went not my Spirit with thee, when the man turned again from his Chariot to meet thee? He knew before where his Servant had been; God had revealed the thing unto him; only he questions him to make him acknowledge it. So here the Lord questions Satan, whence comest thou? that he might have a confession from himself. Though the Lord doth know all the actions, wayes and thoughts of every Creature, yet God at the last will question every man, that he may judge every man upon his own confession.

Secondly, This Question may be understood, as intimating a dislike of the thing or of the business that Satan had been about. Questions are many times put, not out of ignorance or nescience of what hath been done, but out of a dislike or abhorrence of the thing done. When the man or the thing is not approved, then God carrieth himself toward him and his action, as if he knew not what he had been doing, and he must have it out by confession. Thus Hiram, 1 King. 9. 13. puts the Question upon Solomon: What Cities are these which thou hast given me, my Brother? He saw and knew before what Cities they were; but thus he question'd, because they pleased him not, ver. 12. In Hos. 8. 4. God is said not to know that they set up Kings; They have set up Kings, but not by me; they have made Princes, and I knew it not: that is, I did not like them, I took no notice of them by way of approbation. So God questions about things, as if he did not know them, when he doth not like them; and we may conclude that this Question holds out to us Gods dislike of the wayes and works of Satan.

Thirdly, Questions, and this Question may be understood in a way of objurgation or chiding; Satan, whence comest thou? Thou hast been a tempting, thou art come now from murders, and thefts, and adulteries, and blasphemies, from provoking men to all these wickednesses. As that Question, Jonah 4. 4. was a chiding of Jonah; Dost thou well to be angry? So, whence comest thou? As many times when you are angry with your servants, you ask, where have you been? There is a reprehension in the Question: So God full of wrath toward Satan, saith, Whence comest thou? Thou hast been doing all the mischief thou canst abroad in the world I am sure.

Lastly, For the better conceiving of the matter of this Question proposed, whence comest thou? there is more to be understood then is expressed; for God doth not only enquire here concerning the places where he had been, but concerning the business and the work which he had done; all is included in it: Whence comest thou? what hast thou been doing in the world? what hath thy business been abroad? Every man, every Creature, every Angel, good or bad, must give an account of themselves unto God. So much of the Lords Question; now let us examine Satans Answer.

Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

If I am enquired (saith Satan) whence I come; I answer, I come from walking up and down in the earth, from going to and fro in it. Here again it may be doubted, how Satan speaks to the Lord; as before it was about the Lords speaking unto Satan. The speaking of Satan and all Spirits, is according to the manner before explained of Gods speaking. Then Angels speak one to another, or unto God, when they direct or intend such or such things to be known. As a thought, a conception in the mind, is a word in the mind; so the directing or putting forth, or an intending to put forth that word or that thought, is the speaking of the mind, then the mind speaks. As we know in our selves, a man meditates, he conceives such and such things, he forms them all in his spirit under some words into such notions; and he can put forth these by desires, though he doth not speak. And so we are said often in Scripture to speak unto God in our hearts, when the mouth doth not speak at all. As Moses, Exod. 14. 15 is said to cry unto God; that was nothing but the directing, or actual intending of such and such secret desires unto God; that was a crying unto God. So it is said of Hannah (1 Sam. 1. 13.) that she spake to the Lord in her heart. After this manner do Angels and Spirits speak. As we can speak to God in our spirits, by our hearts, when we intend or lift up such and such thoughts unto God; so they speak in the same manner by making known and revealing so much of their minds to God, as they desire he should take notice of: For if a man have such and such thoughts, and only reserve them to himself, he is said to speak to himself, to speak within himself: So Angels, though they have such & such thoughts, they do speak to themselves, and not to God, while they keep those thoughts within themselves; however God knows them all before, yet an Angel is said to speak no more to God, then he doth intentionally and obedientially (as some expres it) make known and declare to God his desire, that God may take notice of it. So here Satan answereth and saith unto God, or he speaks to God these things; that is, he doth actually intend that God should know thus much of him, what he had been about; that he was come now from going to and fro in the earth, from walking up and down in it.

From going to and fro, &c.

It may be doubted, how Satan can be said to go to and fro in the earth, and to walk up and down in it; whereas it is expres in the Epistle of Jude, ver. 6. that the Angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day. Now if Satan, if the Angels that fell, be in chains, and in chains of everlasting darkness, and reserved unto the judgment of the great day, how doth Satan here speak of himself, as being at liberty, going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it?

I answer, That though the Devil goeth up and down, yet he is ever in chains. He is in a double chain, even when he goes and circuits the whole earth abroad, he is in a chain of Justice, and in a chain of Providence. He is in a chain of Justice, that is, under the wrath of God; and he is in a chain of Providence, that is, under the eye of God; he can go no further then God gives him leave, then God lets out and lengthens his chain. So that still he is reserved under chains, even chains of darkness; when he goes abroad, he goes like a Prisoner, with his fetters upon his heels.

But it may be here enquired further, if Satan be thus under the wrath of God, and be a condemned spirit, if he be in such darkness, how can he intend or attempt, plot or execute those designs of temptation for the overthrow of souls, and disturbance of the Churches of God throughout the world? Will not such torment and horrour of darkness, disable and unfit him for such curious methods of doing mischief? can he have his thoughts upon any thing but upon his own woful condition, and miserable estate?

For this likewise (to clear it) we may conceive, that Satan, although he be, at present, under the wrath of God, yet he is not under the fulness of the wrath of God; he is not yet in extremity, he is not yet in that degree of judgment which hereafter he shall receive. Satan is now as full of Discontent as he can be, but he is not so full of Torment as he can be; this we see expresly in Mat. 8. 29. where the Devils say to Christ, Art thou come to torment us before our time? as noting that there will be a time wherein they shall have more torment, their full of torment, such torment, as what they now endure, compared with it, may pass for no torment, if not for pleasure. Then they shall drink the very dregs of the cup of Gods wrath; now they do (as it were) but sip, or taste it. The devils, though they are already cast down from their glorious estate, yet they are not cast into such a woful state as hereafter they shall be; therefore they may walk up and down in the world, and uncessantly set themselves about the destruction of others.

For the words, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. Satan here speaks like a Prince; therefore some conceive, that this is the Prince of devils that is here mentioned in this Text, Beelzebub, the chief of the devils; for here he speaks of himself as some great Prince, that had gone about his Countries to view his Provinces, his Kingdoms, and Cities; I come, saith he, from visiting my several Places and Dominions; I come from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

These expressions are not to be understood properly; for properly Spirits, such as Satan is, cannot be said to go or to walk: A Spirit moveth, that is proper to a Spirit: but properly a Spirit doth not walk or go, that is proper only to bodies: But the word which we translate, from going to and fro, is translated by some, from compassing the earth, or from compassing about in the world, and then it is proper; the Original signifying to compass or circuit about by any kind of motion, as well as by going.

Further, For the understanding of Satans going to and fro in the earth; we must not conceive that this is all that Satan doth, to walk up and down in the world, to go to and fro; he is no idle Peripatetick; but by going to and fro in the earth, is noted,

First, The exact discovery which Satan makes of all things in the earth. For the word [Shut] signifieth to enquire, to search diligently into a thing. It is not a bare going about, but it is a going about as a spie, to search, to enquire, to observe and consider diligently all things as one passeth along. The same word is used (Dan. 12. 4.) for discoursing; we translate it thus, Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be encreased; now, we may wonder how knowledge should be encreased by running to and fro, up and down; they that would encrease knowledge, should rather sit still and consider, and debate things; but the word (so some translate it) signifies to discourse or dispute of things; they shall discourse or go about to enquire into things, and knowledge shall be encreased. Thus Satans going to and fro in the earth, is a discoursing upon every thing, a disputing upon every point and person; he doth, as it were, debate every mans condition as he goeth, and every mans estate, every mans temper, and every mans calling; he considers what is fittest to be done against him, and how he may assault him with greatest advantage. That is the running or going to and fro which is here meant in the Text, it is a going to and fro to encrease his knowledge, and inform himself of all things as he goeth. The same word is used concerning the good Angels, Zech. 1. 10. It is said there, that they were sent to walk to and fro through the earth. It was not a bare passing through the earth, but a curious observing and prying into all things as they went; we translate it a walking to and fro; but it is a walking so as to bring God intelligence; for these were sent out as Christs Intelligencers, to bring him in a report of the state of things abroad: for so there in the Vision it is expresst after the manner of men. Though Christ needs none to inform him about the estate of his Church and People, yet he alludes to the custom of Princes, who maintain Intelligencers in all Courts and Kingdoms, to advise them how the affairs of other Nations are transacted. The very same Original word is used of God himself (Zech. 4. 10.) The eyes of the Lord run to and fro through the whole earth; he is his own Intelligencer, exactly discovering and taking notice of every thing that is done in the world. So then this is the meaning, I have been going to and fro in the earth, saith Satan; that is, I have fully and throughly taken notice of all passages, of all persons in all places, of all conditions and sorts of men; that is the thing I have been doing: Thus Mr. Broughton translates, from searching to and fro in the earth, noting his exactness of enquiry in his travels.

Propriè est attente discurrere, circumspicere, & explorare.

Then Secondly, It noteth the unquietness of Satan. He is an unquiet, a restless Spirit, being cast out of heaven, he can rest no where. A Soul that is once displaced, and out of the favour of God, hath no place to repose in afterward. Now, saith he, all my business is walking to and fro, going up and down: Satan hath no rest. As the Sentence of Cain was, Gen. 4. when God had cast him out of his presence, Thou shalt be a fugitive and a vagabond; thou shalt do nothing but run up and down the world as long as thou livest. Satan is such a fugitive, a vagabond, one that runs up and down in the world; he is an unsetled, an unquiet Spirit. They who are once departed from God, can never find rest in any Creature; but running to and fro is their condition and their curse.

Thirdly, Some understand it thus, that Satan makes (as it were) a recreation of his tempting and drawing men to Hell. Satan cannot possibly in a proper sense, take any comfort, or be refreshed; but as one doth well expres it, he himself being lost, undone and damned, seeks to comfort himself by undoing and damning others. It is a joy to some to have companions in sorrow. All Satans delight (if we may conceive he hath any delight) is in this, in making others as bad and miserable as himself: therefore, it may be, he calls his trade of seduction and destruction, walking up and down in the earth; as men are said to walk up and down for refreshing and recreation; he speaks of it, not as of some toilsome hard journey, but as of walking for delight. But I conceive the former to be more proper. Take two or three Notes from this. Here we may observe,

Ipse perditus perdendis hominibus solatia quærit.

First, That, there is no place in the world that can secure a man from temptation, or be a sanctuary from Satans assaults.

For Satan goeth to and fro through the earth; he is an ubiquitary, he stayes no where, but runs every where. It is the folly of Popish Votaries, that think to shut themselves up in walls from the temptations of Satan: Cloysters are as open to Satan as the open field. Satan walketh to and fro through the earth.

Secondly, We may note here the wonderful diligence of Satan.

Satan is very active to do mischief.

He walketh to and fro; as Peter expresseth it, 2 Pet. 5. 8. He goeth about as a roaring Lion, seeking whom he may devour. There is his diligence, and there is his intent. Satan speaks nothing of his intent here, he conceals that; he speaks only as if he went about like a pilgrim, walking through the earth: his main business, that he went about, to devour souls, is kept in silence; but the Holy Ghost unmasks him, and discovers the design of his walking to and fro; He seeks whom he may devour. If Satan be thus diligent going about to tempt, we ought to be as diligent, standing alwayes upon our watch, to prevent his temptations. Mr. Latimer, in one of his Sermons, where he taxes the Clergy, especially the Bishops of those times, for their idleness, proposeth to them the example of the Prophets and Apostles, and of Christ himself; their diligence in going about to preach, should quicken those Idlers: But (saith he) if you will not follow their example, follow the example of Satan; he goeth about in his Dioceß to and fro continually. Take example from him in doing evil, how to do good: we may take example thus far from Satan, to be as forward to do good, as he is to do hurt; to be as watchful against him, as he is watchful against us. If this be his business to go to and fro through the earth, and his intent be to devour souls, then where-ever we go in the world up and down, we ought to be careful to keep our own souls, and gain the souls of others.

Thirdly, We may observe from it,

That, Satan is confined in his business to the earth.

He can get no farther then the earth, or to the ayerial part: he is called the Prince of the Ayr. Satan being once cast out of Heaven, can never get into Heaven more. There is no tempter in heaven; there is no Serpent shall ever come into the Celestial Paradise; there was one in the earthly Paradise, but there shall never be any in the Celestial. Therefore when we are once beyond the earth, we are beyond the reach of all temptations; we are then at rest from Satans snares and practices, as well as from our own labours.

Let us now consider what the Lord replieth, or his second Question to Satan. Well, thou hast been walking to and fro in the earth, saith God; Hast thou considered my servant Job? Tell me, hast thou taken notice of such an one?

הִשַּׂמְתָּ לִבְּךָ

σοὶ προσέσχες τὴν διάνοιαν σου κατὰ τὸν παῖδά μου Ἰωβ.

Hast thou considered?] The word is, Hast thou put thy heart upon Job? So it is word for word in the Original; hast thou laid Job to thy heart? hast thou seriously, fully, and exactly considered my servant Job? And so it is rendred it out of the Septuagint; Hast thou attended with thy mind upon my servant Job? To put a thing upon the heart, is to have serious and special regard to it; as when the Scripture speaks of not putting a thing upon the heart, it noteth a slighting and neglecting of it. When the wife of Phineas neas was delivered, and they told her that she had brought

1 Sam. 4. 20 forth a son, the Text saith, She answered not, neither did she regard; the Hebrew is, neither did she put her heart upon it: the same word is here in the Text. Thus Abigail speaks
1 Sam. 25. 25. unto David, As for this son of Belial, let not my Lord put his heart upon him, or (as it is translated) let not my Lord regard this man of Belial; take no notice of such an one as he is, he is a fool, name and thing, do not regard him, do not put him upon thy heart. There are divers such expressions, where putting upon the heart is expressed by regarding; and not putting upon the heart, by not regarding. Then here, hast thou put Job upon thy heart? That is, hast thou seriously weighed and considered Job? As if God had said, I am sure in thy travels and wandrings about the world, thou couldst not choose but take notice of Job, he is my jewel, my darling, a special man among all the sons of men: He is is such a spectacle as may justly draw all eyes and hearts after him: when thou walkedst, didst thou not make a stand at Jobs door? I cannot but look upon him my self and consider him, therefore surely thou hast considered him. The eyes of the Psal. 34. 15. Lord are upon the righteous, and his heart is upon them too. A wicked man hath not the eye of God: a godly man hath his heart, and shall have it to all eternity. The sum is,

This Question teacheth us, That amongst all the men that dwelt on the face of the earth, Job was the most considerable.

Hast thou not considered my servant Job?

It is as if one should say to a man come from this City into the Country, were you at Court, or have you seen the King? Because he is the most eminent and considerable person. So God here speaks to Satan upon his account of walking about the earth, hast thou taken notice of Job? A godly man is the most considerable man in the world. But then you must put your heart upon him, not your eye only, for then, as it was said of Christ, (Isa. 53. 3.) you may perhaps see no beauty in him: his inside is the most considerable thing in the world. As a wicked man is the most unconsiderable, not worthy the looking unto, though he be
2 King. 3. 14 never so great: as Elisha said to the King of Israel, Surely as the Lord of hostes liveth, before whom I stand, were it not that I regard the presence of Jehosaphat the King of Judah, I would not look toward thee nor see thee; thou art not a man saith he, that deserveth so much as to be looked upon: A
Psal. 15. 4. godly man is therefore described to be one, in whose eyes a vile person, a wicked man, is despised.

But secondly, in reference to Satan. Some read these words not by way of Question, but by way of Affirmation, thus; Thou hast considered my servant Job. Thou hast been abroad in the world, surely then thou hast taken notice of my servant Job, thou hast considered him; that is, of all men in the world, thou hast set thy self about Job to tempt him and to try him: when thou camest to Jobs house, there thou madest an assault, there thou tryedst the uttermost of thy strength to overcome him; thou considerest him, what to do against him, how to overthrow him: and tell me, hast thou not found him a tuff piece? Didst thou ever meet with such an one in the world before? To consider a thing, is to try all wayes how to gain it, or how to compass
1 Sam. 9. 20 such a thing: as Samuel said to Saul, when he was seeking his fathers Asses, As for thine Asses that were lost, set not thy mind on them; that is, do not trouble thy self, do not beat thy brains to consider which way to go to find them, or where it is most probable to get them. So here, thou hast set thy mind or considered my servant Job, that is, thou hast beat thy brains, and set all thy wits on work, what course to take with greatest advantage to destroy my servant Job.

Take the words in that sense, and they yield us this Instruction.

That Satans main temptations, his strongest batteries are planted against the most eminent godly persons.

When Satan sees a man that is eminent in grace, against him he makes his hottest and subtilest assaults: he sets his heart upon such a man, yea and vexeth his heart too about him. Satan is most busie at holy duties (one said he saw in a vision ten Devils at a Sermon, and but one at the Market) and about holy persons. As for others, he doth not trouble himself about them, for they (as the Apostle
2 Tim. 2. 26 shews) are led captive by the Devil at his will; if he do but whistle (as it were) they easily follow him, and come after him presently, so that he needs not set his heart or vex himself about them. But when he cometh to a Job, he sets all his wits and all his strength a work, bends all his thoughts to consider what course to take to assault such a strong hold of grace. If he can get such a man down, then there is triumph indeed, he sings victoria; then (if we may so speak) there is joy in Hell. As there is joy indeed in Heaven at the conversion of a sinner; so there is a kind of joy in Hell, when one sins that is converted. If any thing can make the Devils merry, it is this, to give a godly man the foyl; though they see he is past their reach to destroy him, yet if they can but blemish or disgrace him, if they can but trouble and disquiet him; this is their delight. Hence it is that General Satan with his legions of darkness, those infernal spirits, encamp about such persons with deadly hatred. As when an Army meets with a strong Castle, or City, they sit down, and there consider what course to take for the besiedging and gaining of it.

Hast thou considered [my Servant Job.] The title which God gives Job is very observable, My servant Job. A Servant (you know) is one, that is not at his own dispose, but at the call and beck of another; so the Centurion describes a servant; For (saith he) I am a man under authority, and I have servants, and I say to this man go, and he goeth, and to another come, and he cometh. Servants are at the word of another, they are not (sui juris) in their own power; therefore Aristotle calleth Servants, living tools, or living instruments, breathing instruments, because they are at the will of another, to be used and imployed at the discretion of their Master. Here God calleth Job his servant: And he calleth him so, First, by way of distinction or difference; my servant, that is, mine, not his own. Many are their own servants, they serve themselves, as the Apostle saith, They serve not the Lord Jesus, but their own bellies; they serve their own lusts, divers lusts and pleasures; Job is not such an one, he is my servant. ζῶντα ὄργανα. Rom. 16.

Many are Satans servants; as if God should have said to Satan here; Satan thou hast gone about the world, and thou hast found a great family of thine own, thou hast found many servants in all places, but hast thou considered my servant? There is one, I am sure, that oweth thee no service, and by his good will, will do thee none; hast thou not found my servant?

Some are the servants of men; but Job is my servant; not a servant of men, to subject himself to their lusts, either for hope or fear: He is not (as the Apostle speaks) the servant of men (in that sense) to please men, with sinning against and provoking God.

Secondly, My servant, by way of special right and property; So Job and all godly persons are called Gods servants. First, By the right of election they are Gods chosen servants, as Paul is called a chosen vessel, that is, a chosen servant, to carry the name of God. Secondly, They are Gods servants by the right of purchase; my servant whom I have bought and purchased: so in the 1 Cor. 6. You are bought with a price, be not the servants of men; that is, you are bought with a price to be my servants, therefore be not the servants of men in opposition to me, or to my disservice in any thing. So Job was Gods servant by way of purchase; God buyeth every one of his servants with the blood of his Son.

Thirdly, My servant, by way of Covenant. Job was Gods Covenant servant, God and he had (as it were) sealed Indentures. Job entred into Covenant with God, that he would perform the duty of a servant; and God entred into Covenant with him, that he should enjoy the priviledge of a servant. Now that which is Gods by right of Covenant, is his by special right.

Then again, We may further understand this, and all such like expressions: When God saith, my servant, he doth as it were glory in his servant. God speaks of him, as of his treasure, my servant; as a man doth of that which he glorieth in. As the Saints glory in God, when they use this expression, my God, and my Lord, my Master, and my Christ, this is a kind of glorying and triumphing in God. So this expression carryeth such a sense in it, Hast thou not considered my servant Job; there is one that I have honour by, one that I rejoyce and glory in, one that I can speak of with much more then content, even with triumph, my servant Job: There's a man.

It is a mans honour to be Gods servant, and God thinks himself honoured by the service of man.

It was once a curse, and it is a great curse still to be the
Gen. 9. servant of servants, as it is said of Cham; but it is an honour, the greatest honour of the creature to be a servant to God. He that is a servant of Christ, is not onely free, but noble. And Christ reckoneth that he hath not onely work done him, but honour done him by his willing people, and therefore he glories in any such, my servant.

My servant Job.] There is somewhat also to be considered in that. When God speaks of his people by name, it noteth two things in Scripture.

First, A special care that God hath over them.

Secondly, A special love that God hath to them, John 10. 3. He calleth his own Sheep by name; this noteth a special care Christ hath of his Sheep, and a special love that he beareth to them. So Isa. 49. 1. The Lord hath called me from the womb, from the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name; it noteth the special care, and the special love that God had of, and bare to Christ. See it eminently in that place, Exod. 33. 12. where Moses speaks thus unto God, Yet thou hast said, I know thee by name; now what it is to know by name, is by way of Exposition added in the end of the verse, And thou hast also found grace in my sight. So that to be known by name, is in a special manner to find grace in the sight of God: When it is said here, My servant Job, it shews that God did take an extraordinary care of, and did in an extraordinary manner love Job above all that were upon the Earth.

There is a great deal of difference between these two expressions; to know the name of a man, and to know a man by name. It is a truth, that God knoweth all your names, and the names of all the men in the world, but he doth not know all by name. Therefore the Scripture assures us, that God hath the names of none written, but the names of his own, as Moses saith in the former Chapter, If thou wilt not forgive the sin of this people, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy Book which thou hast written. Thou knowest me by name, my name is written in thy Book: So Luke 10. Christ bad his Disciples that they should not rejoyce so much that they had the spirits subject unto them; but in this they should rejoyce, that their names were written in Heaven. Note from hence,

That God doth take care of his elect children and servants in a special manner above all other men in the world.

The names of Princes, or Emperors, or Potentates, if they belong not to God, are not vouchsafed a place in his Book, but the names of the meanest of his Saints, are recorded for ever, and shall be had in everlasting remembrance.

Hast thou not considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the Earth, &c.

We read before at the end of the 3. verse, that Job in reference to his riches was the greatest of all the men of the East: Now he goeth beyond that, in reference to his holiness, he is the greatest upon the Earth, there is none like him in the Earth.

This we may understand, first, as a cause or reason why Job fell under the special consideration or observation of Satan, Hast thou not considered my servant Job, because (so some render that particle) or in as much, or for that, there is not the like to him in the Earth. As if God should say, there is reason why he must needs be taken into thy consideration; because there is not such another man as he in the Earth. You know that a man is quickly taken notice of, when there are none like unto him, in the Place or Company where he is. If a man walk in the Streets, or come into a House, who is of an extraordinary tallness; some will ask the question, did you not observe such a man, for there was never a man in the Company, never a man in the Street so tall as he? So one that is extraordinary in Beauty, or extraordinary in rich Apparrel, every one hath an Eye upon such. The reason why many are observed, is, because they are not like to others, they are beyond others in quality or in habit. So here, Hast thou not considered my servant Job, that there is none like unto him in the Earth, thou must needs take notice of him.

Or again, It may be understood thus; as the matter which Satan should consider and observe in Job. Hast thou considered my servant Job, &c. in this thing, that there is not a man upon the Earth like to him? Hast thou not taken notice of this in him? Thou who hast looked over all men, and hast (as it were) sifted all mens manners, hast thou not observed thus much, that there is not such a man upon the Earth as Job? Hath not that fallen under thy observation?

So now in the words [There is none like him] there is 10 a secret advancing of the praise of Job. For there is nothing that can be spoken more to the praise of man then this, to say that there is none like him. Though you say no more, you have said all. As the Scripture (we know) sets forth the wonderful praises of God, Exod. 15. 11. Who is like unto thee O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee? Which is resolved into the negative, there is none amongst the gods like unto thee, there is none like unto thee. This is the high praise of God, Mic. 7. 18. Who is a God like unto thee that pardoneth iniquity? It is the highest commenda-
20 tion of God to say, there is none like him, to set him above all creatures. In like manner here in the Text, when it is affirmed, that there was none like Job; this setteth him up in all praises and excellencies to the highest: though particulars be concealed, yet whatsoever may make for the honour of a man is included in this, that there is none like him.

Est quasi quædam Apostopesis maximarum laudum.

But how should we understand this of Job, that there was none like to him upon the Earth?

We must understand it, not only in reference to wicked men, that there was no meer natural man, no wicked man
30 like unto him: as if God had said to Satan, there is none in the Earth which is thy inheritance, no earthly man like my servant Job; look over all thy servants, thou hast not such an one in the Earth. That's too low. We will take it therefore in reference to all the Saints that were then upon the Earth, there was not such a godly man upon the Earth, none like unto him; and then we must expound likeness by a distinction. There is a double likeness; there is a likeness of Quality; and there is a likeness of Equality. When it is said here, that in the Earth there was none like
40 to Job, you must not understand it of a likeness of quality, as if there were no man that had such qualities as Job had: for all the Saints that are in the Earth, have the same kind of qualities, they are all alike in the main and in the general; namely, in the conformity of their nature to the will of God, which is holiness, that is the general quality; and thus all the Saints upon the Earth are alike; there is not any man can have any other likeness upon him then this; it is impossible. I say in this regard, the meanest and lowest Saint upon the Earth, is like to the highest and greatest Saint upon
50 Earth: yea not only so, but the meanest Saint upon Earth, is like to Jesus Christ in Heaven, in regard of quality; he hath the same quality, the same nature, he is made partaker of the divine nature: And the Apostle Paul exhorts the Philippians, Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ. The meanest Saint hath the same mind and the same quality, in reference to his new nature, that is in God himself or in Christ, he is like to God, God begetteth all his own children in his own likeness. But in regard of the likeness of equality; thus Job was such a man as there was none like him in the Earth; no
60 man like him in the degrees of those qualities, they were not equal to him in this or that or the other grace. Job was a man above them all. As we know it is with wicked and natural men, all wicked men upon the Earth are alike one to another as can be; As face answereth to face in water, so doth the heart of man to man; the heart of one natural man to the other: but yet there are some wicked men so wicked, that there is none like them in the Earth. We have the very same words applied to Ahab in wickedness; 1 King. 21. 25. But there was none like to Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord. None like 70 unto him, I say not (as in the former) that there were no wicked men that had the same sinful qualities, for all have the same sinful qualities; but there was none like him in equality of wickedness, Ahab was a None-such, he was a Giant in wickedness, none were grown to such a stature of wickedness as Ahab. In the same manner we must understand this concerning Job, none did reach to him in the equality of his graces, in the stature of the inward man; Job had out-grown all the world in grace at that time.

2 Pet. 1. 4.
Phil. 2. 5.
Prov. 27. 19

80 Yet a little further, for the understanding of this: We find find sometimes when the Scripture saith of a man, that there is none like to him, the speech is to be restrained to some one particular. And it may be a Question, whether we are to understand this of Job's preheminence in the general, or in regard of some one particular grace? We read of Solomon that there was none like him, Neh. 13.26. Among many Nations was there no King like him who was beloved of his God. There was no King like to Solomon, but he restrained it to this, who was beloved of his God, none to whom God did so much communicate himself as to Solomon, none like to Solomon in wisdom and knowledge, in those revelations and intimate communions that God had with him, he was, as it were, Gods darling, as his other name Jedediah importeth. Then it is said of Hezekiah (see another instance) 2 *King.*18.5. That he trusted in the Lord God of Israel, so that after him was none like him among all the Kings of Judah. Now this we must understand of some one particular especially, that is, of his trusting in the Lord; in regard of his trusting so firmly in God, he went beyond all the Kings that came after him, there was none did so perfectly trust in God: for it is said, he brake in pieces the brasen Serpent that Moses had made, and stamped it to pouder, trusting in the Lord. Though some of his Counsellors might tell him, If you do those things you may bring a world of trouble upon your self and the Kingdom; if you change these ancient customs you will make your people mutiny: this Serpent was of God, it was made in the wilderness, &c. Yet saith he, I see it is abused to Idolatry, I care not for all that you say, I will trust in the Lord however it go. Here was an high, an unparaled act of confidence. Yet afterward it was said concerning Josiah, 2 King. 23.25. That like unto him was there no King before him, that turned to the Lord with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might. Here it is said after Hezekiah, that Josiah was such a King as there was none before him; and it was said of Hezekiah that was before him, that he was such a one, that after him there should be none like him. How shall we reconcile these two? Only by applying those expressions to such and such particulars: Hezekiah was such a man, as there was no King after him for trusting in God; and Josiah was such a man, as there was no King before him, for desire, care, and zeal in reforming the Church of God: Josiah's reformation was the most perfect reformation that was made by all the Kings of Judah; and so in that particular, in regard of his great zeal for God, there was no King before him, like him. How shall we understand this then concerning Job?

2 King. 18. 4.

I answer in two Conclusions. First, When it is said, there was none like to Job, we are to understand it in reference to that generation. Doubtless God had as great ones in grace as Job, both before and afterward; Noah and Abraham before him, were eminent ones; and afterward, Moses, and Joshua, and David, and Samuel. But take Job in the time and the age wherein he lived, so there was none like unto him in equality, we may understand it so; For Job is conceived to be in the darker times, between Abraham and Moses, about the time that the people of Israel were in captivity in Egypt; so that in reference to that time Job lived in, he was the only man, the chief man, the greatest for grace in that age: As it is said of Noah, he was a just man, and perfect in his generations; he was the justest man of all that age, the most righteous of all that generation: so was Job in his.

Secondly, We may understand it, not only concerning some particular grace wherein he was most eminent: although it be a truth, that he had one grace, for which he was cryed up in Scripture more then for others, to wit, Patience; Have you not heard of the patience of Job? But we may take it for the whole latitude of Job's holiness and graces, and there was not at that time such a man upon the earth as Job: And so God himself seemeth to expound it, he doth not confine this to some one point, but saith, Hast thou not considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and upright man, one that feareth God and eschewth evil? God addeth this by way of exposition, what he meaneth by a man to whom there was none like, who had no match upon the Earth. In those words the whole sum of godliness is compriſed; whatsoever goes, or may be conceived to go, toward the making up of a godly man, falls under one of those four members: And God saith there is none like him, take him in any, or in all these.

I shall only give you two or three brief Observations from hence. There is none like unto him in the Earth. Learn,

First, That God hath servants of all statures and degrees.

All his servants come not to the like pitch, to the like height, here is one that is beyond them all, My servant Job, not a man like him upon the Earth.

Secondly, note this, We ought not to set up our rest in low degrees of grace; or content our selves to be like others in grace.

We should labour (if it be possible) to go beyond all others in grace. It did not satisfie Job that he had gotten to such a degree, to such a frame and temper of heart, to such a course of holiness, as his neighbours or brethren that were good, had attained unto, but he laboured to go beyond them all; Not such a man upon the Earth as Job. It is an holy ambition to labour to exceed all others in grace and goodness. We have a great many in the world that desire to be so rich, as none should be like them; to be so gay in their apparel, as none should be like them; so beautiful, as none should be like them: but where are they that desire and endeavour to have such a portion or stock of grace, that none should be like them; to be above others in holiness, as Job was? True grace never rests in any degrees or measures of grace, but labours to increase: he that hath any grace would have more: do not think it enough when you are like others; you ought to labour to be beyond others.

Then see the Character that God giveth of Job, A perfect and upright man, one that feareth God and eschewth evil.

These have been already opened in the first verse, and these are but a report of the History before going, therefore I shall not need to stay upon this place; only take these two Observations from it.

First, God hath a perfect Character of every soul.

He knoweth fully and clearly what the tempers of your hearts and spirits are: just as the history and relation of Job was, such is Gods testimony of him to a tittle.

Secondly, God will give to every man a testimony according to his utmost worth.

God will not conceal any of your graces, or obscure your goodness, he will make it known to the world to the full, what you are. When God cometh to give testimony, he giveth it so, as his Saints can never loose by it. Oftentimes man gives a testimony short of his Brothers goodness and draweth a curtain before another mans worth; but God will draw the curtain quite back, and unveil every soul to the whole world. You shall see and hear a testimony from God before men and Angels concerning your selves to the uttermost, what you are in all godly and gracious perfections.

Job was an excellent man, a man commended indeed, who was commended of God: as the Apostle concludes it, Not he that commendeth himself is approved, but he whom God commendeth. It is good for us to have our Letters Testimonial from God, to have our Letters Commendatory from Heaven. It is not what a man saith in his own heart, what he flattereth himself: It is not what your Neighbours or others flatter you, and say of you, but what God saith of you, what testimony he giveth of you. He is not approved that commendeth himself, or that other men commend only, but he whom the Lord commendeth. And if God speak well of us, no matter though all the world be silent, or slander.

VERS. 9, 10, 11.

Then Satan answered the Lord and said, doth Job fear God for naught?
Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the Land.
But put forth thy hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.

IN the former verse Job receiveth testimony from God himself; in this, though Satan cannot deny it, yet he calumniates, and mis-interprets what he cannot contradict.

Satan grants indeed that Job fears God, but the latter words embaſe the former, and faſten inſincerity upon all his ſervices. Doth Job fear God for nought? Fear is worth nothing unleſs in this ſenſe it be for nought. I have already ſhewed you what it is to fear God, I ſhall now clear the other term, and ſhew how much evil Satan charges Job with, when he queſtions, Doth Job fear God for nought?

Satan accuſeth with a queſtion, doth Job fear God for nought? The queſtion may be reſolved into this Accuſation: Job doth not fear God for nought. The word which we tranſlate for nought, hath a threefold ſenſe from the Hebrew.

חנם First, Some render it in vain. Doth Job fear God (frustra) in vain. We are then ſaid to do a thing in vain, when we cannot attain the end which we propoſe in doing of it. The Egyptians help in vain, that is, they cannot procure that ſalvation and deliverance which was deſired or intended: and ſo the ſenſe here may be, doth Job fear God in vain? No, he doth not, he hath his end, he looked for riches, that he intended in taking up the ſervice of God, and that he hath attained.

Secondly, It is interpreted by, without cauſe, Doth Job fear God without cauſe? ſo the word is tranſlated. Pſal. 35.7. where David complaining of his enemies, ſaith, Without cauſe have they hid for me their net in a pit, which without cauſe they have digged for my ſoul. As if he ſhould ſay, I never gave them any cauſe why they ſhould lay ſnares for me I never wronged or hurt any of them. According to this ſenſe, when Satan ſaith, Doth Job fear God for nought? namely, without cauſe, it is as if he had ſaid, The Lord hath given Job reaſon enough, he hath given him cauſe enough to do what he doth; Job ſeeth reaſon in his Flocks and in his Heards in his many Children, and in his great Houſhold, in his Subſtance, and in his Honour, he ſeeth reaſon in all theſe, why he ſhould fear God, and be a very obedient ſervant, having ſo bountiful a Maſter. Doth Job fear God without cauſe?

Or Thirdly, The word is tranſlated by Gratis (as we expreſs it) To do a thing gratis, that is to do a thing without any reward, without any price, or without pay. I ſhall inſtance Scriptures wherein the word is rendred in that ſenſe, Gen. 29.15. Laban ſaith to Jacob, when he was come to him to ſerve him, Thou art my kinſman, ſhouldſt thou therefore ſerve me for nought? that is, ſhouldſt thou ſerve me gratis, or without wages, as he explains his meaning in the next words, Tell me what ſhall thy wages be? So that to do a thing for nought, is to do a thing without wages, without price. And ſo there is the ſame interpretation of the word, Exod. 21.11. where Moſes ſpeaking of the Maid that was taken into the family and was not married, ſaith, If he do not theſe three unto her, then ſhe ſhall go out free without money, ſhe ſhall pay nothing, ſhe ſhall go out gratis, or for nought. So here we may take in this ſenſe to fill up the form: doth Job ſerve God gratis? doth he ſerve God without price, or without pay? Surely no, thou haſt given him ſufficient hire, wages ſufficient for all his ſervice; Job doth not ſerve thee gratis, out of good-will and affection to thee, but he ſerveth thee for hire, becauſe thou payeſt him ſo plentifully.

So the general ſenſe of the words, Doth Job fear God for nought? is as if Satan had beſpoken the Lord in ſuch words as theſe: Lord thou doſt enquire of me whether I had conſidered thy ſervant Job? I confeſs I have, and I muſt needs acknowledge that he is a man very diligent and zealous in thy worſhip and ſervice; neither do I wonder that he is ſo, ſeeing thou haſt out-bid all his labours and endeavours by heaps of benefits. There is no queſtion but thou mayeſt have ſervants enough upon ſuch terms, at ſuch rates as theſe: no marvail if Job be willing to do whatſoever thou commandeſt, whenas thou beſtoweſt upon Job whatſoever he deſireth. Thou ſeemeſt, as it were, to neglect all other men, and only to intend the ſafety and proſperity of thy darling Job. Is it any great matter, that he who hath received a flock of ſeven thouſand Sheep from thee, ſhould offer a few, ſeven, or ten, to thee in ſacrifice? Is it any great matter that he ſhould give ſome of his fleeces to cloath the poor, who hath received from thee ſo many thouſands to cloath and enrich himſelf? Is it a ſtrange thing that he ſhould feed a few, that hath five hundred yoak of Oxen? Is not Job well hired to work for thee? doth he fear God for nought, who hath received all theſe?

Yet a little more diſtinctly for the opening of this expreſſion, I ſhall give you Satans ſenſe in three notable falſities or lyes, which he twiſts up together in this one ſpeech, Doth Job fear God for nought?

First, That riches will make any man ſerve God, that it is no great matter to be holy when we have abundance; a man that proſpers in the world cannot chuſe but be good. This Satan implyes in theſe words, and this is an extream lye; for as there is no affliction, ſo there is no outward bleſſing can change the heart or bring it about unto God, They did not ſerve the Lord in the abundance of all things, Deut. 28.47. Abundance doth not draw the heart unto God: Yet Satan would infer that it doth. This might well be retorted upon Satan himſelf: Satan why didſt not thou ſerve God then? thou didſt once receive more outward bleſſings from God then ever Job did, the bleſſedneſs of an Angel; yet that glorious Angelical eſtate wherein thou waſt created, could not keep thee in the compaſs of obedience, thou didſt rebel in the abundance of all bleſſings, and didſt leave thy habitation; Satan thou ſhouldeſt not have ſerved God for nought. Why then didſt not thou ſerve him? thine own Apoſtacy refutes thy error in making ſo little of Job's obedience, becauſe he had received ſo much.

Secondly, There is this in it; Doth Job fear God for nought? Satan intimates, that God could have no ſervants for love, none unleſs he did pay them extreamly; That, God is ſuch a Maſter, and his work ſuch as none would meddle with, unleſs allured by benefits. As if Satan ſhould ſay, you have indeed one eminent ſervant, but you ſhould not have had him unleſs you had been at double coſt with him. Here is another lye Satan windeth up cloſely in this ſpeech; For the truth is, Gods ſervants follow him for himſelf: the very excellencies of God, and ſweetneſs of his wayes, are the argument and the wages by which his people are chiefly moved and hired to his ſervice. God indeed makes many promiſes to thoſe that ſerve him, but he never makes any bargains with them: His obey him freely. Satan makes bargains to hire men to his ſervice, as he did with Chriſt, Mat. 4.9. All theſe things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worſhip me. God makes many large and gracious promiſes, but he never makes any ſuch bargain and agreement with men for their obedience.

Then there is a third ſenſe full of falſhood, which Satan caſteth upon Job, Doth Job fear God for nought? that is, Job hath a byas in all that he doth, he is carried by the gain of godlineſs, not by any delight in godlineſs, thus to ſerve God. Job is mercenary, he ſerveth God for hire; Job hath not any deſire to pleaſe God, but to benefit himſelf; Job doth not ſeek the glory of God, but he ſeeks his own advantage. This is the ſenſe which the words have in reference to the perſon of Job; that as once Satan accus'd God unto man, ſo, now he accuſeth this man unto God. He accus'd God unto man, Gen. 3. when God had forbidden him to eat of the Tree of knowledge of good and evil, and told him that in the day he did eat thereof he ſhould ſurely die; You ſhall not ſurely die, ſaith Satan, for God knoweth, that in the day you eat thereof, then your eyes ſhall be opened, and ye ſhall be as Gods, knowing good and evil. As if he ſhould ſay, God hath not forbidden this tree, becauſe it will do you any hurt, but becauſe he would be God alone, he would have all the knowledge to himſelf, he hath an ill intent: he knows, that if you eat of it, you will be like him, as gods knowing good and evil. So here he accuſeth man to God, Job ſerveth you indeed, and offereth you ſacrifice, and obeyeth you, but it is that he may get by you, that he may receive more and more from you, he likes the pay, the reward, not the work; he cares not for God, but for the good that cometh from him. This is the accuſation which here the ſlanderer caſteth upon all the holy ſervices and duties of Job.

Thus in brief you ſee the ſenſe, I ſhall give you ſome obſervations from it.

First, It is an argument of a moſt malignant ſpirit, when a mans actions are fair, then to accuſe his intentions.

The Devil hath nothing to ſay againſt the actions of Job, but goes down into his heart and accuſeth his intentions. Malice miſ-interprets the faireſt actions, but love puts the faireſt interpretation it can upon foul actions. Malice will ſay when a man doth well, it is true he doth it, but it is for vain glory, it is to be ſeen of men, it is for his own ends, it is for gain: But when a man doth ill, love will say, this he hath done through ignorance, or inadvertency, or violent temptations, love covers a multitude of sins as fairly as possibly it may with wisdom and with justice. How fair a cover did Christ himself put upon the foulest act that ever was in the world, upon his own crucifying, Luk.23.24. Father forgive them, they know not what they do; they do it indeed, but they do it ignorantly. So Peter afterward, I wot (saith he) that through ignorance you did it, as did also your Rulers. Love excuseth what is ill done in another, and malice accuseth what others do well. Let such men learn from hence, that in so doing they are the mouth and tongue of Satan.

Secondly, Observe, That it is an argument of a base and an unworthy spirit to serve God for ends.

Had this been true of Job in Satans sense, it had indeed spoiled and blemished all that he had done. Those that come unto God upon such terms, they are not holy, but crafty; they make a trade with God, they do not serve God; it is not Obedientia, but Mercatura, as one expresseth it, it is merchandizing with God, not obeying him. There is reward enough in God himself, there is reward enough in the very duties themselves; work and wages go together. Therefore for any to be carried out to the service of God upon outward things, argues a base and an earthy spirit. As sin is punishment enough unto it self; though there were no other punishment, though there were no hell to come after, yet to do evil is or will be hell enough unto it self: So to do good is reward enough unto it self. A Heathen Poet observed it as a brand of infamy upon the age wherein he lived, that most did repent that they had done good, or were good gratis, or for nought, that the price of all good actions fell in their esteem, unless they could raise themselves. If a Heathen condemn'd this, how damnable is it among Christians?

Nec facile invenies multis in millibus unum virtutem pretium qui putet esse sui.---Et gratis pœnitet esse probum. Ovid de Pont.

But here a Question will arise, and I shall a little debate it, because it doth further clear the main point, May we not have respect to our own good, or unto the benefit we shall receive from God? Is it unlawful to have an eye to our own advantage, while we do our duty? Must we serve God for nought in that strict sense, or else will God account nothing of all our services?

I shall clear that in five brief Conclusions, and these will (I suppose) fully state the sense of this Text and of this speech.

The first is this, There is no man doth, or possibly can, serve God for nought: God hath by benefits already bestowed, and by benefits promised, out-vyed and out-bid all the endeavours and services of the creature. If a man had a thousand pair of hands, a thousand tongues, and a thousand heads, and should set them all on work for God, he were never able to answer the ingagements and obligations which God hath already put upon him. Therefore this is a truth, that no man can in a strict sense serve God for nought. God is not beholden to any creature for any work or service that is done unto him.

Again secondly, this is further to be considered. The more outward blessings any one doth receive, the more he ought to serve God, and the more service God looks for at his hands. That is another Conclusion. Therefore we find still, that when God hath bestowed many outward blessings upon any, either Persons or Nations, he chargeth an acknowledgment upon them, Hos. 2. 8. She did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oyl, and multiplied her silver and gold, which she bestowed upon Baal; therefore I will come and recover it, saith God. You having received this, you ought to have served me with it. You see how God upbraideth David, 2 Sam. 12. 7, 8. I annointed thee King of Israel, and I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul, and I gave thee thy Masters house, and thy Masters wives into thy bosom; and if this had been too little, I would moreover have given thee such and such things. How is it then that thou hast despised the Commandment of the Lord, to do evil in his sight? As if he should say, the more I bestowed upon thee, the more obligations thou shouldst feel thy self under to obey me faithfully.

In the third place, it is lawful to have some respect to benefits both received and promised by way of Motive and incouragement to stir us up and quicken us, either in doing or in suffering for God. Moses, Heb. 11. 26. had respect to the recompence of reward; therefore it is not unlawful. And Christ himself, Heb. 12. 2. Looking at the joy that was set before him. These are examples beyond all exceptions, that respect may be had to benefits and blessings received or expected.

Fourthly, Then reference unto benefit is sinful, when we make it either the sole and only cause, or the supream and chief cause of our obedience. This makes any thing we do smell so of our selves that God abides it not: when we respect our selves, either alone or above God, God hath no respect at all to us. As Christ taxes those, Joh. 6. You did not seek me, but the loaves. To have respect to the loaves more then to Christ, or as much as to Christ, is to have no respect at all to Christ.

Thus when the Sichemites, Gen. 34. 23. admitted of Circumcision, and so gave up themselves as a Covenant-people to God, here was all the argument they proposed to themselves, Shall not their cattel, and their substance, and every beast of theirs be ours? what beasts were these Sichemites, what shadows of Religion, who would take upon them this badge of Religion for the gain of beasts and worldly substance? Such pure respects to our selves, defile all our services, and render our persons odious unto God.

Therefore in all our duties and holy services, we must set the glory of God in the Throne, that must be above; and then we may set our desires of Heaven and glory on the right hand, we may set the fear of hell and the avoiding of misery on the left hand, we may set our desires of enjoying outward comforts here in the world at the foot-stool. Thus we must marshal and rank respects to God and our selves. And thus we may look upon outward things, as motives and incouragements; we must not make them ends and causes; we may make them as occasions, but not as grounds of our obedience.

Lastly, We may look upon them as fruits and consequents of holiness, yea as incouragements unto holiness, but not as causes of our holiness; or we may eye these as media, through which to see the bounty and goodness of God, not as objecta on which to fix and terminate our desires. So much for the clearing of the first part of Satans answer, Doth Job serve God for nought? Wherein you see he casts dirt upon Job's sincerest duties, and how we may carry our respects in the service of God to outward blessings, whether received or promised. It followeth,

Verse 10. Hast thou not made an hedge about him and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land.

Here Satan more fully expounds himself, and what he meaneth by Job's not serving God for nought. You shall see it is not for nought. He casts up the particulars of Gods benefits conferred on Job, and they amount to a great sum. 1. He hath an hedge about him, that is somewhat. 2. He hath blessed him, that's more. 3. He doth increase and multiply, there's the highest degree of outward happiness. Here are three degrees of Gods dealing with Job. These Satan reckons up in this verse, that he may make Job's goodness of no account, and leave his person in no degree of acceptance with God.

Here is first Protection in the hedge, Hast thou not made an hedge about him?

Secondly, Here is a Benediction upon that which was protected. It was not a bare keeping of that from spoiling, but it was a blessing of it.

Thirdly, Here is also an increase or multiplication; he was not only blessed to keep himself and all he had in the state and plight wherein he stood, but there was a daily increase and an augmentation. Thou protectest him, thou blessest him, and thou dost increase all that he hath, he is increased in the Land. That is the sum and sense of the words. I shall now open them a little more distinctly.

First, He speaks here of his protection; Hast thou not made an hedge about him? Some render it, Hast thou not made a wall about him? Or, Hast thou not made a trench about him? It is an elegant Metaphor frequent in Scripture, shewing that as when a Field is well hedg'd, or a Town well wall'd and entrench'd, then it is safe. So when God is said to make an hedge or a wall about a man, or about a nation, the safety of that man or nation is assured by it, Isa. 5. 2. We have this word used, where God speaks of his vine-vineyard, He planted a vineyard in a very fruitful hill, and he fenced it, or he made a wall or an hedge about it. So verſ. 5. when God is angry with his vineyard and will deſtroy it, it is thus expreſt, I will (ſaith he) take away the hedge thereof, that is, I will take away my protection from it. In the ſame ſenſe, Zac. 2. 5. I will be (ſaith God) a wall of fire round about; that is, I will be a defence unto it. So when it is ſaid here, that God had made an hedge about Job, it notes Divine Protection, he was under the wing and ſafegard of the Almighty.

Deus ipſe arx eſt quæ virum innoxium ambit.

This hedge of protection is twofold. It is ſaid God made this hedge, Haſt thou not made an hedge about him? First, There is an hedge which is made immediately by the hand of God: Sometimes God makes the hedge immediately, yea ſometimes God expreſſeth himſelf to be the hedge or wall, as Zac. 2. 5. So Pſal. 18. (all thoſe are words of protection) verſ. 2. Thou art my rock and my fortreſs, my deliverer, my ſtrength, my buckler, the horn of my ſalvation, and my high Tower, &c. There God was the hedge, here God makes the hedge: God hath not put out this hedge to others to make, but he makes it himſelf; Satan obſerves as much: Haſt not thou made an hedge about him?

Pondus habet immenſum pronomen illud Tu, cujus ſenſus mirus ac arcanus eſt, Deum ipſum eſſe ſepem, &c. non hanc curam ſolis demandaſti angelis.

Secondly, Sometime the hedge of protection is made by the hands of others. God ſends out his Angels to guard his people, Pſal. 34. 7. The Angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him. Encamping and hedging are to the ſame purpoſe: Gods hedge is as ſtrong for ſafety as any wall, as any trench. Sometime God doth make one man to be an hedge or a defence to another. The ſervants of Nabal ſaid of David, 1 Sam. 25. 16. That he had been a wall unto them both by night and day; that is, he had been a protection and a guard to them, he had defended them all the while his Army was quartered in thoſe parts. God makes a good man to be as a wall to a wicked man. How much more will he make men and Angels to be walls and hedges for the ſecurity of his own people?

The Text further goes on and ſhews the compaſs of this hedge, what ground it takes in, how far it reacheth: and here we ſhall find that it was a very large hedg of a great extent. We know there are ſome Cities that have not only a ſingle wall, but a double wall, yea ſome ſtrong Cities and places have a treble wall about them: So we find a threefold hedg made about Job, and they are all expreſt here in this Text.

Here was an hedg, firſt, about his Perſon, that was the inmoſt hedg, or the inmoſt wall, in theſe words, Haſt thou not made an hedg about him? That is, an hedg about the very perſon of Job, an hedg about his body, leſt any ſickneſs, diſeaſes or dangers ſhould invade it; and an hedg about his ſoul, leſt ſnares and temptations ſhould take hold of, or prevail againſt that; thou haſt made an hedg about him, ſo that I cannot come at the perſon of Job to hurt him.

Again, Beſides this inmoſt wall, and the neereſt about his perſon, there is a ſecond wall or hedg, and that is expreſt to be about his family. Haſt thou not made an hedg about him, and about his houſe? By houſe, we are not to underſtand the material houſe of ſtone or timber, the edifice in which Job dwelt, but by the houſe we are to underſtand the houſhold, Job and his family, as oftentimes in Scripture, the houſe is put for the family. This day (ſaith Chriſt to Zacheus) is ſalvation come to thy houſe; and it is ſaid of the Jaylor, that he believed and all his houſe, that is, all his houſehold. So here, thou haſt made an hedg about him, and about his houſe, that is, about his family, about his children eſpecially: hence the Hebrew word for a child, for a ſon, doth ſignifie an houſe, becauſe children build up the houſe or keep up the name of their fathers. So that the houſe hedg'd about, is the children, the family and the followers and ſervants of Job; as if Satan ſhould ſay, thou haſt made an hedg not only about his perſon, but about all that belong unto him, about his children and ſervants, I may not meddle with them neither. There is the ſecond hedg.

Jobus nihil tam v'le & exile habet, quod non cuſtodiendum in tuam ſuſceperis tutelam. Lavat. in loc.

Laſtly, There is an hedg or wall, Haſt thou not made an hedg about him, and about his houſe, and about all that he hath? That is about his goods, about his cattel, and about his lands: ſo far as ever any thing of Jobs doth extend, ſo far the hedge goeth; if Job have but the leaſt thing abroad, God doth make an hedge about it, he hath not the meaneſt thing belonging unto him but is under guard and protection. That is the meaning of it.

There is yet another thing to be obſerved in the words to make it more full. Haſt thou not made an hedge about him, and about his houſe, and about all that he hath on every ſide? It is not only ſaid, thou haſt made an hedge about him, but thou haſt made an hedge about him on every ſide, which is a pleonaſm or redundancy of ſpeech. It was a ſign of Gods care of Job, when he made an hedge about him; but to ſay he made an hedge about him on every ſide, here is expreſt an extraordinary care, that God had not left the leaſt gap for Satan, or for any annoyance, to come in unto Job. There is not the leaſt breach, the leaſt hole, thou haſt hedged him round about on every ſide; whereby the wonderful ſafety of Job, his family and eſtate, is ſet out under the protection of God. That for the opening of thoſe words.

Illud quod per circuitum vallatur, ex nulla parte poteſt pati injultum.

Per circuitum circumcirca.

Firſt, We may obſerve from the manner of this ſpeech, Haſt thou not made an hedge about him? Satan ſpeaks very angerly. Queſtions as they ever expreſs quickneſs of ſpirit, ſo they, many times, expreſs much paſſion and trouble of ſpirit. Here Satan in queſtioning, ſpeaks as if he were vext, Haſt thou not made an hedge about him? Hence note,

> That the protection which God gives to his people and ſervants, is the vexation of Satan and of all his Inſtruments.

It troubleth them extreamly that God doth ſo regard and hedge up his people, that they cannot come at them. No man can endure to ſee that defended, which he wiſheth were deſtroyed.

Then again, if we conſider the matter of Satans ſpeech, it is a truth, and a moſt comfortable truth, a truth full of conſolation to the people of God, Haſt thou not made an hedge about him, and about his houſe, and about all that he hath on every ſide? We may note hence,

> That Satan, the father of lyes, ſometimes ſpeaks truth for his own advantage.

For, as it is ſaid concerning Judas about his care for the poor, when he would have had the oyntment ſold and given to the poor, This he ſaid (ſaith the Text) not that he cared for the poor, but becauſe he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein. So we may ſay here, Satan ſets forth the care of God over his people in moſt exact terms; And why doth he do this? Not that he cares to ſpeak well of God, or to advance God in the eyes of his people, by telling his people and ſervants how watchful he is over them: but he doth this only for his own advantage, that hereby he may leſſen the ſervice, and blemiſh the obedience of Job, becauſe he received ſo much care and love from God. As it is many times with ungodly men, they will do good, not that they care to do good, but only for ſome by-end: So Satan will ſometime ſpeak that which is true, not that he regards the truth, or that he would ſpeak a word of truth (for he hath nothing but lyes in his heart; there is a lye in his heart when there is truth in his mouth.) He never ſpeaks truth, but to deceive and do hurt by it.

Thirdly, we may obſerve this, which lieth plain in the words,

> That the people and ſervants of God dwell in the midſt of enemies, in the midſt of dangers.

Why elſe need there be an hedge, a wall about them? What need there be a guard about them, unleſs there were dangers about them? There are none in the world ſo envyed and ſpighted, ſo aimed at and perſecuted as the people and ſervants of God; you may ſee it by the wall that is made about them; God will not beſtow coſt and care in preſerving and guarding where there is no danger of invading. If you ſhould come to a City and ſee it mightily fortified, and ſee men make wall after wall about it, and bulwark after bulwark, you will preſently conjecture, that City ſtands in great danger, and is in the midſt of enemies: So when we read that God was fain to make wall after wall, to make hedge after hedge about the perſon, the family, the eſtate of Job, it ſheweth that the devil had an ill eye upon Job and upon all that was Jobs; Satan and his inſtruments, had it not been for this hedge, would quickly have fallen upon him. No godly man ſhould live a quiet moment, did not the Lord ſtretch forth his hand to ſave and protect him.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, That God himself doth undertake the guarding and protecting of his people.

Thou hast made an hedg about him, and about all that he hath.

God himself either doth it immediately, or he doth put those to do it to whom he giveth his power, strength and wisdom. There is no meer creature could be strength and security enough for us against our great malicious and mighty enemies, therefore God himself either is or makes the hedge. There is no strength in man but Satan can overmatch it; Satan can over-power all the strength, and out-wit all the wisdom that is in the creature. Flesh and blood are no match for a spirit. And we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against Principalities and Powers and spiritual wickedness in high places, Ephes. 6. 12. But if God makes an hedge about us, it is not in the power of all the enemies in the world, whether men or devils, to make a gap in it; they are sure that are under the protection of God. They that dwell in the secret place of the most high, they shall abide (safe) under the shadow of the Almighty, Psa. 91. 1.

Fifthly, You see here how far the hedge goeth, an hedge not only about his person and household, but about all that he hath. Take the meanest thing that Job hath, God protects it and hedgeth it about. Then we may note this, That God hath an especial care, and doth exceedingly prize even the meanest thing that belongs to one of his servants. God would not bestow an hedge about it, if he did not prize it: A man will not hedge or wall that about, which he doth not value. Psal. 116. God highly values the meanest thing that belongs to one of his servants. The Psalmist saith, Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints. But not only is the blood, the life of the Saints, precious in the sight of God, but every member, every hair of their head is precious: God numbers these. Not only are their children precious, but every thing that's called theirs, their servants, their household, their cattel, their Oxen, their Asses, whatsoever they have, is all precious in the sight of God.

Lastly, Observe, That Satan hath a deadly spight, not only against the persons of the godly, but against every thing that belongs unto a godly man.

Satan would not only hurt and annoy them in their persons, but in every thing that's theirs. If God (if we may so speak with reverence) should leave but a dog that belongs unto one of his servants unguarded, Satan would do it a mischief; Satan would be doing at the least thing, rather then not do mischief. If he cannot destroy our souls he would be at the very hair of our heads; therefore Christ to comfort the Disciples in the Mat. 10. 30. time of trouble, assures them, that the very hairs of their heads were numbred: As if he should say, God will have an account of every hair, the enemies cannot pull off a hair, but God will call them to a reckoning for it.

And it notes too that the enemies will take hold of any thing that belongs to the people of God; if they cannot get all, they will get a hair if they can, why else is it expresst that the very hairs of their heads are numbred? Those words at once intimate, Gods care of all, and Satans malice against all.

It followeth, Hast thou not made an hedge about him, &c.

Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the Land.

Thou hast blessed.] The root Barac, which from the word here used, doth signifie to bow the knee as well as to bless, because men used to bow the knee in blessing God or man. Blessings are carryed three wayes.

First, From man to man; one man blesseth another. There were Prophetical or extraordinary blessings, as Isaac blessed Jacob, and Jacob blessed his sons upon his deathbed; and there is a popular or ordinary blessing, to wish well to another is to bless another, every time we pray for our friends, we bless our friends. So man from man.

Secondly, Man blesseth God; and then man blesseth God when he praiseth God, when he takes notice of and returns thanks for the blessings received from God. Bless the Lord O my soul, &c. (Psal. 103. 2.) and forget not all, (that is,) forget not any of his benefits. Thankfully to remember benefits, is to bless the Lord. The Cup in the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, is called the Cup of blessing, 1 Cor. 10. 16. because therein we commemorate the death of Christ, and render thanks to the Name of the Lord, for the unspeakable benefits conveighed to us by his blood.

Thirdly, as here in the Text, God blesseth man. Now God blesseth man, when he causeth that to prosper which man undertakes. Mans blessing unto man, it is only a wish, an optative blessing: but Gods blessing unto man is an operative blessing, as Aquinas expresseth it, Dei benedicere est benefacere, when God wisheth us good he doth us good.

So then the sense is, Thou hast blessed, that is, thou hast caused him to prosper and thrive in what he undertakes, as we shall see in the object of the blessing, Thou hast blessed the work of his hands.

The work of his hands.] We are not to understand it strictly for manual or hand labours, as if Job were a man imployed in ordinary manual services, in the labour of his hands; but according to an ordinary use of speech among the Hebrews, and likewise amongst other Nations, by the work of the hands, is understood any kind of labour, any kind of business whatsoever. As it is said of Christ, Isaiah 53. 10. that the pleasure of the Lord did prosper in his hands. Now the work that Christ had to do was not a handy work; yet it did prosper in his hands, that is, he managing and going about it, it did prosper and took success; it was effectual for the redemption and salvation of his people; This was prospering of the work in his hands. In this sense the work of the head may be called the work of the hands; the the work of the tongue, the work of the hands; any work, any business that a man doth, may be called the work of his hands. So then, Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, that is, thou hast blessed every thing that Job goeth about, as a Magistrate, as a Minister, or as a Master of a Family, in any of, in all his relations, thou hast caused his endeavours to prosper. In the 28. of Deuteronomy, an universal blessing is thus promised, vers. 6. Blessed thou shalt be when thou comest in, and blessed shalt thou be when thou goest out: between those two are contained all the labours and undertakings of that people: by their going forth is meant the beginning of their labours, and by their coming in is meant the end and conclusion of their labours; so that beginning and ending, when they set their hands to a business, and when they took their hands from a business, they should be blessed, that is, they should have a thorough blessing upon all their labours. So here, Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, that is, every thing he putteth his hands unto.

And his substance is increased in the Land.] That is the third thing which Satan doth observe here concerning Job, that he was not only blessed in the estate wherein he was, but God did mightily increase and multiply his estate. He is increased in the Land. The word we translate increased, signifieth not an ordinary increase, but such an increase as breaks the bounds; it signifieth so to increase in such an abundance, as that the former place where those things were, cannot contain nor hold them, but they must seek some new place, more room for them: such a kind of increase is here meant. So the word is used, Exod. 1. 12. concerning the people of Israel when they were in Egypt, when they were afflicted, the Text saith, The more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew; the same word is there used, to shew the wonderful increase of the people of Israel when they were in their affliction: It was such as did break the bounds. As it is with a river, the more it is stopped, the more it swelleth and breaks all the banks and bays, whatsoever is set to hinder the course of it: So much is meant in that place of Moses, when the people of Israel were stopped and hindered from their increase, they like a river did swell over all, they did increase so as they did break all the bounds. Thus of Job, his substance is increased, it is as if we should say in our Language, he had so much that there was no end of, no room for his substance: as the rich fool said, Luk. 12. when his estate was increased, what shall I do, my barns are not big enough? I must pull them down and build larger, that they may hold my estate. So Jobs estate was so increased, that the compass he had for that present could not contain it, he must make new folds for his Sheep, they increased so; and he must make greater barns for his Corn, his fields brought forth such plentiful crops; he must make larger stalls for his Oxen, he must build bigger houses for his family; he is increased, he is broken forth in the Land, Gen. 38. 29. When Tamar brought forth twins, the Text saith, that one put out his hand, and as he drew it back, his brother came out, and therefore they called his name Pharez (the same Original word that is here used) because of the breach that he made. So this signifieth the breaking forth of the estate of Job in the Land, he increased wonderfully and exceedingly. Thus Satan, by the most emphatical words, still heightens the dealings of God with Job, that he may the more debase the services of Job towards God.

Hebraica vox Paraz significat non solum crescere, sed præ copia & abundantia disrumpi, Merc. Ruperunt horrea meses. Virg.

Thou hast blessed (saith he) the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the Land. We may observe here,

First, That, All success in business is from the blessing of the Lord.

Satan speaks very good Divinity here; Thou hast blessed: It is from the Lord. It is said of Joseph, Gen. 39. 23. That, whatsoever he did, the Lord made it to prosper. We may do much, we may set our hands to do many things, but we cannot prosper any thing. Working is our part, but prospering is the Lords part. As it was with the Disciples, they could fish all night; but till Christ came, they could not catch; when Christ came, the blessing came; and when the blessing came, there was not only fishing, but catching; and there was catching in abundance. So it is in all the works of mens Callings; men may be labouring, and sweating, and toyling, but there is no prospering, no succeeding, till God come with a blessing. Thou hast blessed the work of his hands. Some take all to themselves, and thank their own labours, their own wisdom, policy and parts: Others ascribe all to their good Fortune, &c. We see Satan himself here preacheth a truth, that will confute them; he is more orthodox then these practical Atheists: Satan acknowledgeth, Thou hast blessed.

Then again, we may observe, Thou hast blessed the work of his hands.

Every one ought to be a man of employment.

Every one ought to have some business to turn his hand unto. In the former part of this Chapter, we read of Job's piety and holiness, and of his zeal in the worship of God: Here now we see Job's care and diligence in his place and calling wherein God had set him, which is called the work of his hands. Every one must have two callings, and the one helpeth forward the other; Job feared God, and Job went on in the business which God set him. Job is said to serve God continually, and yet Job did work continually. These two continuals may well stand together; for both the continuals are taken for their seasons; continually, that is, seasonably, according to the several opportunities God called him to, and put into his hands. This rebukes those who have no labour, who can shew no work of their hands. It was said to Adam, and in him to mankind, not only as a curse, but as a command, In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat thy bread, till thou return to earth; this is laid upon all, In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat thy bread: Not that every man is bound to labour in such an employment as causeth the face to sweat; but thereby is meant serious labour and employment in some honest calling: so here, the work of the hands, is taken, not strictly, but for any employment wherein Job was serviceable to God and his Countrey.

Gen. 3. 19.

Put these two together; Thou hast blessed, and, thou hast blessed the work of his hands; and we may observe from both,

That the Lord delighteth to bless those who are industrious.

It is seldom that there is an industrious hand, but there is a blessing of God upon it: Hence, as we find in one place, The diligent hand maketh rich; so in another, The blessing of God maketh rich. The blessing of God maketh rich, and the diligent hand maketh rich; neither of them alone, but both conjoyned; the blessing of God upon a diligent hand makes rich: a diligent hand cannot make rich, without God; and God doth not usually make rich without a diligent hand: Therefore it is said here, that God blessed the work of Job's hands. Up, and be doing, and the Lord shall be with you. God will not be with us unless we be doing. God doth not love to bless those that are idle; if we be doing, God will be blessing; his being with us, is put for his assisting and prospering of us: So it is indeed in all things. God doth not work, that we should sit still; nor bless, to the intent that we should do nothing; as it is in Judges 6. They proclaimed the Sword of the Lord, and of Gideon; those two must go together. Would you be blessed with protection? you must labour to protect your selves. Do not think that the Lord will protect you with your hands in your pockets, and your Swords rusting in your sheaths: while you labour in these times of danger, to defend your selves, you may expect defence from the Lord: How unbecoming is it for you now to stand still, and say, Lord help us. We must indeed stand still (as Moses counselled the people, Exod. 14. 13.) in regard of fear and diffidence, but beware of standing still in regard of care and diligence, as ever you hope to see the salvation of the Lord. The Sword of the Lord and of Gideon must be cried up at once; those two must go together.

Prov. 10. 4. Prov. 10. 22.

There is a fourth point that we must observe also from the connection of the two sentences in the Text. Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is encreased in the Land.

The Blessing of God where it falleth, is effectual.

If God doth but bless, we shall encrease, there is no question of it; if God doth but bless, we shall encrease mightily. Thou hast blessed him, and he is encreased: It is the word that followed the first blessing after the Creation, Gen. 1. 28. God blessed them, and said unto them, be fruitful and multiply. Blessing and multiplying go together: The blessing of God is a powerful blessing; it is mighty in operation, and carrieth all before it. You know what a strong opinion Balak had concerning the blessing of Balaam, Num. 22. 6. I wot (saith he) that he whom thou blessest, is blessed, and he whom thou curses, is cursed; a strong conceit, and but a conceit. As there are many at this day, as strongly conceited of the blessing of that Balaam of the seven hills, that blessing, but cursed Prophet: If they can but get a blessing from the Pope, they think all is safe; if they can but get a blessed Sword (such some have obtained) to do a cursed act, to cut the throat of Gods people, or of their Prince, it must needs be effectual. You know there was a blessed Standard or Banner given to them that came against us in Eighty eight: and when that Standard was lifted up, that Banner displayed, with the Popes special blessing, they accounted, nay called themselves Invincible: Such was their invincible ignorance, till they were taught better with Briars and Thorns, or rather with storms and winds fighting against them. And though they have been often cozened, yet still they retain such an esteem of the Popes blessing, that they travel and throng for it, as for their lives, more then for all manner of riches. I may say to them, as once that great Cardinal did on the same occasion; Seeing this people will be deceived, let them be deceived. But I desire to raise your esteem of Gods blessing; for it is a certain truth, that whom God blesseth, they are blessed: Gods blessings are fixed and effectual blessings; if he bless, we shall be blessed indeed: His blessings are irreversible blessings, as Balaam was forced to confess; Behold, he hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it. If once God hath blessed, it is not in Satan, nor in all his lying Prophets, nor in all the power of the Creature to alter it, no nor to retard or hinder it for a moment.

Judg. 8. 16.

If God now give us the mercy of Protection, if he make the hedge about us, and bless us in these times, we shall be continued and established in the Land; yea, we shall be increased in the Land, we shall break forth abundantly, to the amazement of all hearers and beholders. Though Rome curse, though Hell plot, yet if God bless, we are safe.

This is the thing therefore that we should labour for, to be under the influence of the blessing of God. If we have but that, we have all; let means be what they will, great or little, or none at all, if God bless, he can make any thing serve the turn; any thing with a blessing, will do it; any thing with a blessing, will make us encrease; yea, make us a strong, a mighty, an invincible people; so that Satan, and his instruments, for very envie, shall be forced to acknowledge that there is a hedge about us, which they cannot break through, that there is a wall about us, which they can neither scale, nor batter with all their Engines and Artillery.

In these two Verses, we have the Answer which Satan makes to the Lords Queſtion; Haſt thou conſidered my ſervant Job; You ſee the ſlander that is in it, and how he doth advance the bleſſings of God upon Job, that he may debaſe the ſervices of Job toward God. Now leſt God ſhould take him off preſently with a denial, and tell him that all this is falſe; that Job is no ſuch man as he repreſents him to be, that he hath moſt preſumptuouſly intruded into Gods peculiar, namely, the ſecrets of the heart (for Satan had nothing to accuſe him of, that was in ſight, only he gueſſeth at his heart) leſt God, I ſay, ſhould preſently come and check him thus, for his boldneſs and impudence, both in contradicting his teſtimony, and in charging Job with inſincerity: Satan makes a motion in the next Verſe; Put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curſe thee to thy face: as if Satan ſhould have ſaid, Lord, if you be not ſatisfied that thus it is with your ſervant Job, if you will not take my word that he is an hypocrite, and that he doth ſerve you only for ends; do but ſtretch forth your hand, &c. do but take away that which you have given him, and you ſhall ſee preſently he will take away that which he hath given you; if you will withdraw his riches, he will quickly withdraw his ſervice.

VERS. 11, 12.

But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curſe thee to thy face.
And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, behold all that he hath is in thy power, only upon himſelf put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the preſence of the Lord.

THis eleventh Verſe contains Satans motion, which he ſubjoynes to his Anſwer, ver. 10. But put forth thine hand now. By his Anſwer before, he had wounded all the holy ſervices of Job, and now he ſeeks to wound his eſtate and poſſeſſions. His Anſwer was full of malice, and his motion is as full of cruelty. Whom before he had falſly accuſed, he (in theſe words) deſireth may be cauſleſly afflicted. Put forth thine hand now: As if he ſhould have ſaid, There is great queſtion concerning Job's integrity, this one Experiment will quickly decide and determine it; Touch all that he hath, &c. This motion is grounded (as was before noted) upon a feared denial of his Anſwer in the former words: For there Satan had argued after this manner; That is an unſound and hypocritical profeſſion, which is grounded only upon outward benefits; but all the profeſſion of Job is grounded only upon outward benefits: therefore it is unſound. Doth Job ſerve God for nought? This is the ſtrength of Satans Argument. Now he perceiving the weakneſs, or rather indeed the falſeneſs, the extream Lie that was in the Minor, in the Aſſumption (namely, that the profeſſion and holineſs of Job was grounded only upon outward things) he (I ſay) perceiving that) ſeeks to confirm what he had affirm'd by his motion. If you doubt (ſaith he) whether it be ſo or no with Job, let that come to the trial; touch all that he hath, and he will curſe thee to thy face. The ſtrength of the reaſon that lies in the motion, may be thus conceived: That profeſſion is grounded upon outward things, which a man layes down, when outward things are removed and taken away; but if thoſe outward things be removed and taken away from Job, he will quickly lay down his profeſſion; yea, he will take up Blaſphemy, he will curſe thee to thy face: therefore the profeſſion of Job is grounded upon outward things. This now is the Logick or the reaſon, upon which Satan bottoms and infers this motion, that ſo he may bring Job upon a further trial.

שלח Put forth thine hand now.] The Hebrew is, ſend forth thy hand. To put forth the hand, ſignifies, ſometimes to help, and ſometimes to hurt. So in Pſal. 144. 7. Send forth thine hand, and deliver me. There is a ſending forth the hand in a way of mercy. And ſo, Acts 4. 30. There Peter prayeth that Chriſt would ſtretch forth his hand to heal. So that ſtretching forth, or ſending forth, or putting forth the hand (for the words are all uſed in common to the ſame ſence) ſignifie to do a thing for our good and preſervation: But uſually this putting forth, or ſtretching forth of the hand, notes ſome affliction, ſome puniſhment. A man that ſtandeth with his hand ſtretched out, is in a poſture to ſtrike. And ſo God himſelf is often deſcribed, by having his hand ſtretched forth, when he is about to puniſh; as, in the Propheſie of Iſaiah divers times, Chap. 5. 25. Therefore is the anger of the Lord kindled againſt his people, and he hath ſtretched forth his hand againſt them, and hath ſmitten them: And Chap. 9. three times; ver. 12. For all this, his anger is not turned away; but his hand is ſtretched out ſtill: and ſo at verſ. 17. and verſ. 21. His anger is not turned away, but his hand is ſtretched out ſtill; that is, the Lord is ſtill ſmiting and afflicting them. In Eſther 6. 2. Two men were found in the Chronicle, who ſought to lay (or put forth) their hands on King Ahaſuerus, ſcil. they would have ſlain him. Then the meaning of Satan here is, ſtretch forth thine hand, let him feel the weight of thine hand in ſmitings and ſore afflictions. Ezek. 6. 4.

Thy hand.] The hand of God in Scripture ſignifies, First, The purpoſe of God; as that, Acts 4. 28. They have done whatſoever thy hand and thy counſel determined before to be done; that is, whatſoever according to thy purpoſe, thou didſt determine. Secondly, The hand of God ſignifies the Spirit of God, in the mighty actings and workings of it; ſo a Spirit of Propheſie is called the hand of God, Ezek. 1. 3. The hand of the Lord was there upon me: And, Ezek. 37. 1. The hand of the Lord was upon me; that is, the Spirit of the Lord, a mighty power of Propheſie was upon me. So likewiſe a Spirit of ſtrength that is upon a man, is called the hand of God, 1 Kings 18. ult. The hand of the Lord was upon Elijah, and he girt up his loins, and ran before Ahab. Here the hand of the Lord is put for the power of the Lord; Put forth thy hand, that is, put forth thy power: and ſo the hand of the Lord is uſed often, Iſa. 59. 1. The hand of the Lord is not ſhortned; that is, the power of the Lord is not abated. The Lord hath a long hand, and his hand is alwayes of the ſame length. So, ſtretch forth thy hand now, that is, do thou put forth thy mighty power.

This hand of the Lords power (to clear that a little further) is taken three wayes in Scripture.

First, For his protecting power. There is a protecting hand; as, John 10. 28. No man is able to pluck them out of my Fathers hand; ſaith Chriſt. God hath his ſheep in his hand, and he will protect and ſafeguard them ſo, that none ſhall be able to pluck them away. This hand God put forth before for Job.

Again, It is put for his correcting power; as, Pſal. 32. 4. His hand was heavy upon me; that is, the afflicting hand of God was heavy upon me. Let us fall into the hand of God: (David choſe that, 2 Sam. 24. 14.) that is, into the afflicting hand of God, rather then into the hands of men.

Thirdly, It is put for a revenging hand, for a wrathful hand, by which he doth deſtroy and break in pieces thoſe who are his enemies, Heb. 10. 31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. David deſireth to fall into the hands of God, ſcil. into his correcting hand, becauſe he knew there was mercy; but it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of God, when he cometh in wrath to take vengeance on thoſe who contemptuouſly deſpiſe his mercy, as is there expreſſed.

Now here, when Satan ſaith, Put forth thy hand, that is, thine hand of power; Satan intendeth not, that God ſhould put forth the hand of his power, to protect, nor barely to correct: He deſireth more then barely a correcting or chaſtiſing hand upon Job; he would have his revenging hand, his breaking, his deſtroying hand, as we ſhall ſee afterward.

Further, Thy hand; that is, Gods own hand: as if he did deſire that God himſelf would take Job into his own hand to chaſten and puniſh him.

The hand of God, his correcting or chaſtiſing hand, ſometimes is an immediate, and ſometimes a mediate hand. Sometimes it is immediate, when God by himſelf doth chaſten, or puniſh, or afflict, when no ſecond cauſe doth appear or intervene. So it may ſeem Satan here means, when he ſaith, put forth thine hand, that is, do it thine own ſelf, let no other have the handling of Job, but thy ſelf. God doth ſend ſuch immediate afflictions; a man is afflicted in his body, in his eſtate, and many other wayes, and he cannot find any thing in the Creature, whence it ſhould come; it is an immediate ſtroke of God, he cannot ſee how or which way, or at what door this evil came in upon him; therefore it is called a creating of evil, Iſa. 45. 7. I make peace, and create evil. Now creation is out of nothing; there is nothing thing out of which it is wrought. So many times God bringeth evil upon a people or person, when there is no appearance of second causes, no matter out of which it is made, but it comes as a creature, formed by the only hand of God. Sometimes likewise it is called Gods hand, when it is the hand of a creature, it is Gods hand in a creatures hand; Gods hand when it is the hand of wicked men, Gods hand when it is Satans hand. So that place is translated, Psal.17.14. Deliver my soul from the wicked which is thy Sword (you see a wicked man is Gods Sword) and from men which are thy hand. So that thy hand may be understood of an instrument; Satan himself is Gods hand to punish in that sence, as wicked men here are said to be Gods hand; from the men that are thy hand. Though there be other readings of that place, some read it, Deliver me from men by thy hand; and others, Deliver me from men of thy hand: but our translation may very well carry the sence of the Original in it, from men which are thy hand, as Nebuchadnezzar that wicked King is called Gods servant, Jer. 43.10. I will send and take Nebuchadnezzar my servant; God speaks of him as his servant, or as his hand in the thing. So then, Put forth thy hand, it may be understood (I say) either immediately, do it by thy self, or do it by Instruments, strike him thy self, or give me Commission, or give others Commission to strike.

נא Particula objecrantis. There is one thing further in this expression, Put forth thine hand now. Now. Some read it, Put forth thine hand a little; and some read it, I pray thee put fort thy hand, The Original word is translated to all these sences; we translate it, referring to the present importunity and instancy of Satan, Put forth thine hand now, let not this business sleep, let it not be deferred a minute, a moment, let commission go out speedily to afflict Job.

And touch all that he hath.

To Touch] Notes sometime a heavy and a sore affliction, and sometime a light and a small affliction. In the Scripture we find it both wayes used. Sometime (I say) to Touch, doth signifie, the greatest and the sorest affliction or punishment that can be; and so Job doth express all the afflictions that fell upon him at the last only by touching, Job 19.21. Have pitty upon me, have pitty upon me, O ye my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me. Whereas Job at that time lay under the sorest and heaviest affliction that could be, all his estate was gone, and his body was full of diseases, and his soul was full of horrour, and all this he doth express by this, The hand of the Lord hath Touched me. So Psalm 73.14. To be Touched signifies the greatest affliction, All the day long (saith David) have I been plagued. That which we translate plagued, is the same Original word which we translate Touch, in the Text; All the day long have I been Touched, that is, I have been Touched with the sorest plagues, heavy afflictions have been laid continually upon me. So that to Touch signifies sometimes the greatest, or the sorest strokes of trouble.

Sometimes again, we shall find it signifies only a light affliction, as Gen. 26. in two places of that Chapter, at the 11. vers. Abimelech charged all his people, saying, he that toucheth this man or his wife, shall surely be put to death, that is, he that doth them the least hurt or wrong. So at verse 19. in that agreement between Abimelech and Isaac, they conclude thus, That thou wilt do us no hurt, as we have not touched thee, and as we have done unto thee nothing but good. So that to touch, notes the least ill or hurt that can be, we have not touched thee, that is, we have done nothing to thee but good: Any thing on this side doing of good to them, had been touching of them. We find the like expression in Psal. 105.15. where the Psalmist speaks of Gods extraordinary care of his people. He suffered no man to do them wrong, he rebuked Kings for their sakes, saying, touch not mine anointed, and do my Prophets no harm. Touch not mine annointed people, that is the meaning of that place. Though in many other places we know Princes are called the annointed of God: yet here it is meant of the people of God in general, they are Gods annoynted (as the context clearly carries it) for they have all received Unction from God, an Unction of Grace, an Unction of the Spirit, and an Unction of Priviledge. Touch not mine annointed, that is, do them not the least hurt. And the sence that these words may bear, Put forth thy hand now and touch all that he hath, might be carried, as if Satan here intended only a touch in the latter sence; Give him but the least stroak, lay but the lightest affliction upon him, do but touch him; you are so confident of your servant Job, that he is such a man, do but give him the least touch, and you shall see how he will discover himself. So some expound it.

He doth not say, wound him, smite him, break him to pieces, but touch him only. Neither saith he, touch him, but his: And if thou give him but a touch with the top of thy little finger, thou shalt presently find the rottenness of his heart. In that sence the word imports, an extenuation of Jobs sincerity, or heightning of Jobs hypocrisie: as if he had been so rotten in his profession, that the least touch would overthrow him, and make him discover himself to be stark nought. Like the Apples growing about Sodom, which have fair out-sides, but if you touch them, they moulder away into dust and ashes.

Si vel extremo digitulo levissime tangas bona sua, ejus fictum animum & simulatam probitatem manifeste comperies.

Though the words have this sence in them, and Satan carries it cunningly, expressing himself in such ambiguous terms, yet certainly Satan had a further intendment, whatsoever his language may bear: he had an intention that Job should be touched in the former sence, namely that he should have a touch to the quick, as we say, that he should have the sorest and deepest wound that his estate was capable of: he would have him whipt, not with cords, but with Scorpions; he would have the little finger of God heavier upon him, then his loyns upon others.

Destroy him, undo him by your touching. He speaks by the figure μειωσις, which is when we go less in our expressions then in our intentions, when our words are lower then our spirits: and that is proper for Satan, who is the great deceiver, the great jugler in word and deed; to desire that Job should only be touched, when he meant he should be utterly undone and ruined. Touch all that he hath, that is, all his Estate, all his Possessions, his Children, his Family, his Cattel, whatsoever belongeth unto Job, let all feel an undoing stroak from thy hand.

Before I come to that which he undertakes upon the affliction, I shall observe two or three things from the words, thus far opened,

Put forth Now thine hand.] We may note from that,

The extream importunity of Satan to do mischief.

He would not give God a minutes, not a moments respite to consider this thing, but do it now presently, let him presently be afflicted; he makes haste to destroy, he makes haste to shed blood; their feet are swift to shed blood, as the Psalmist speaks. So Satan, his feet are swift to shed blood; when Satan would have God to afflict us, do it presently, saith he; when Satan, would have us sin against God, do it presently, saith he; now sin, now provoke God, do not stay till the next day: but when we are called to give up our selves to God, then to morrow will serve the turn, and next year will serve to repent, yea when you are old 'tis time enough to repent; when he tempteth to do any mischief, any sin, then now, now sin; but 'tis time enough to do good hereafter, to morrow will serve for that.

Put forth now thine hand, and touch all that he hath.

It is a truth which Satan here speaks concerning the hand of God; That if God do but touch the highest and greatest estate in the world, it will fall to pieces quickly. There is a truth in it, take it in the easiest sence that can be, if God do but lightly touch the estate of a man, it will soon fall in pieces. God is not put to any stress to afflict and punish, as *Psal.*81.14. I should soon have subdued their enemies, and have turned my hand against their adversaries: God expresseth the utter over-throw of the enemies of his people, but by the turning of a hand: if God do but turn his hand, they are all gone presently, soon subdued; if he do but touch the might, the pomp, the greatness, the riches and the power of all those in the world that are opposers of his Church, presently they fall to the ground: A touch from the hand of God will end our Wars. If he touch the Mountains they smoak (as it is in the Psalm) and consume to ashes: they that are the mighty and great ones of the the World, the Mountains, by one touch of his hand fall as it were to nothing. So if God do but touch our estates, they moulder away, no creature can uphold them.

Then

Then again observe here, the cunning imposture of Satan that puts such sore, such heavy afflictions into such light and easie expressions; he cloatheth his malice, his utmost malice here in very fair words, do but touch him, saith this enemy; but you see what Satans touches are, touch all that he hath. Why Satan, would nothing have made a tryal, but only a touching of all? For Job to have lost somewhat had been a tryal, a touch: for Job to have lost half his flocks of Sheep, or his Oxen, had been a tryal, and no very light one neither; for Job to have lost a son, to have found one of his children suddenly struck dead, had been an affliction, and a heavy one too; such a touch as that might well have touched the fathers heart: Would it not serve Satan that a son should dye, or that some of his Cattel should be destroyed, but he must have all touched, all that he hath? The malice of Satan is unsatiable, there is nothing will serve him, unless he may devour all.

This touch of Satan, which he desireth might be laid upon Job, is like the touch that many have given to those, who have come into their hands amongst us; they would but touch them, but they would touch them in all; when they put forth their hands (as they pretended) in the wayes of Justice, in their Courts, they would touch men in all, touch them in their liberties by imprisonment, and touch them in their estates by extream vast fines, and touch them in their names by disgrace, touch them in their bodies by whipping and cutting, and touch them in their relations, by keeping all friends from sight of them: No moderation, no bounds, but touch them in all that they had. And (O exactness of Justice) when God came to touch that power, he gave them a touch, just after the rate and proportion of their own touches; for when those Courts and persons came to have their power and actions scanned, it was not moderating, or regulating, or restraining, or abating, or limiting their power, that satisfied, they must quite down, and be taken away. God gave them a touch, just as they touched others before: So that a man may say certainly, there is a God that judgeth the Earth. These are the touches of Satan, and the touches of mercilesse men are as like his as themselves are, they think there is nothing done unless men be undone: they never give over touching till they come to ruining.

Touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.

Some render it thus, Touch all that he hath, if he curse thee not to thy face: So it is word for word out of the Original, nisi, unless, or Si non, Touch all that he hath, and see if he do not curse thee to thy face. We give the sence of it in a direct affirmation, Touch all that he hath, and he will, &c. Others put the force of an imprecation to it, Touch all that he hath, and see if he do not curse thee to thy face; that is, as if he had said, let me never be believed, and never be trusted. Indeed Satan is so far disgraced and damned already, that he hath nothing to loose, he cannot damn himself further, he cannot wish any thing to himself worse then he already is; but yet here is a kind of execration or imprecation upon himself in it; Do this, and if he do not curse thee to thy face, let me never be accounted of, or (as many use to say) let me never be trusted; or as some wretched hellish ones, Let me be damned, if such or such a thing be not. There is such an emphasis in that manner of speaking used in the Text. But we translate it by a direct affirmation, and that is a good sence too, Touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face, that's certain, so saith Satan, he will do it, it is as sure as done already.

Curse thee.] It is the same word which is used before, ver. 5. It may be my children have cursed God. The word signifies properly to bless. It was shewed that probably in that place, it might be translated Curse; but in this Text there is a necessity of translating it so, seeing a clear sence cannot be made out, taking the word properly. In cursing another these three things concur. First, An ill opinion or conceit of that person. Secondly, Hatred or malice against him. Thirdly, A desire that some evil may befall him. This Satan means when he undertakes that Job being afflicted will Curse God. So then, to Curse God is to blaspheme God in our thoughts and words, to think or speak unworthily of God, and the wayes of God; see, if he Curse thee not to thy face, that is, see if his heart be not imbittered against thee, see if his tongue be not sharpned to wound thy honour, to reproach thy goodness, to accuse thy providence: As it is said of those, Isa. 8. 21. They shall be hungry and hard bestead; And what then? They shall fret themselves, and Curse their King, and their God, and look upward; that is, they shall speak basely of their King and of their God, in whom they have trusted, and whom they have followed; he speaks of those wretches that did seek to false gods, or worship the true God fallly, they shall Curse their King and their God. It is the very same, that here Satan promiseth himself and undertakes with God that Job will do; Do but make him hungry (saith he) and hard bestead, and he will fret himself, and Curse thee.

It was very ordinary among the Heathen to do so: when their gods did not please them, then they would Curse their gods. The Poets bring them in often raging against their gods; as he speaks of the mother that found her son dead; she calls the gods and the Stars cruel, she flies in the face of Heaven presently, who would serve such gods as these are, that thus slay my son, &c. Satan interprets Job to be a man of the same temper.

Cum complexa sui corpus miserabile nati: Atque deos, atque astra vocat crudelia mater. Virg. Eclog. 5. Quem non incusavit amens hominumque deumque: Id. lib. 2. Æneid.

Aquinas takes the word properly, Touch all that he hath, and he will bless thee to thy face: And endeavours to make out the sence thus, Touch all that he hath, and thou shalt see he hath blessed thee to thy face; he reads it in the Preter-perfect tense; that is, if thou afflict him, thou shalt find that all his former Religion was nothing but meer outside formality, that he served thee only from the teeth outward, served thee to thy face; he blessed thee, pray'd unto thee, and honoured thee only to thy face. He had no regard to thy worship in his heart; he did not worship thee, ex animo, because he loved thee, or delighted in thee, but gave thee an outward complemental blessing, because thou didst bless him outwardly. As the Apostle directs servants, Eph. 6. 6. Not with eye service, as men pleasers. Satan makes Job an eye-servant to God, or as if, like those of whom Christ complaineth, Matth. 15. in the words of the Prophet, He had drawn nigh to God with his lips, while his heart was far from him. The heart of Job hath been far enough from thee, he only blessed thee with his lips, and to thy face. Indeed this interpretation hath a fair face, but touch it by a serious examination, and it will be found without a heart. The construction of Grammar is quite against it, and for us to change the Text, and make it to speak in the Preter-perfect tense, of a thing past, whereas the words are in the Future tense, of an act to be done for the time to come, is too much boldness with Scripture. Therefore though that opinion hath a plausible sence in it, yet I shall lay it by, and take the ordinary translation, that he indeed intended this, that Job would break forth into blasphemous revilings of God, if God did but try him with an affliction.

And when he saith that Job would do it to his face, the meaning of it is, that he would do it openly: he will Curse thee openly, he will Curse thee boldly, he will not go behind the door to tell tales of thee, but he will speak of it before all the world, that thou art a cruel God, an unjust God, and a hard master, he will tell such tales of thee, even to thy very face. We have a like speech, Gal. 2. 11. When Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, (saith Paul) that is, openly; I did not go behind his back to tell Peter his own, but I told him it to his face, plainly, openly before them all, (as it is explained, vers. 14.) I said to Peter before them all, that were then present. Jerome (because he would not have Peter receive such an open reproof, judging it would be a disparagement to Peter, to be rebuked by Paul) gives a quite contrary sence of those words of Paul; I withstood him to his face, that is, saith he, I did speak somewhat roughly to him before them, but there was no such thing in my heart, I did it but to his face, very slightly, lest I should offend the Jews, whose Apostle Peter was; and I did it to his face, a little, that I might satisfie the Gentiles who were scandalized by Peters walking: otherwise in my heart I had no quarrel with Peter: he and I agreed well enough. As if Paul had made but a shadow fight (ad faciendum populum) to delude the people. But we must not be thus wise: I withstood him to his face, is not opposed to withstanding him cordially, but to a withstanding of him secretly, or behind his back. So here he will Curse thee to thy face; that is, he will Curse thee (as the Greek Scholiast hath it) openly, and impudently; himself indeed was afraid least his sons had cursed God in their hearts, but for all this his niceneſs, and ſeeming fear of his childrens ſinning in ſecret, he will Curſe thee with impudence, he will not only Curſe thee in his heart, but the Curſe will break out at his lips: Out of the abundance of his heart, his mouth will ſpeak blaſphemy againſt God. He will Curſe thee to thy face.

We may give ſome exemplifications, what it is to curſe God, to blaſpheme God thus to his face. You may read what it is, Mal. 3. 14. Your words have been ſtout againſt me, ſaith the Lord, you have ſpoken to my very face: why, what had they ſpoken to the Lord? What have we ſpoken, ſay they, ſo much againſt thee? Ye have ſaid, It is vain to ſerve God, and what profit is it that we have kept his Ordinance, and that we have walked mournfully before the Lord of Hoſts? &c. This is to curſe God to his face: when the wayes of God are blaſphemed, and the worſhip of God reported as unprofitable, when men ſay it is in vain to ſerve God, when they caſt aſperſions and bring up an evil name upon an holy duty, this is to blaſpheme God. They did only ſpeak againſt the ſervice of God, and they thought they had not blaſphemed God in it, Wherein have we ſpoken againſt thee? Yes, ſaith God, you have ſpoken againſt me, in that you have ſpoken againſt and diſcredited my wayes. So, if Job had ſaid the wayes of God are unprofitable, and I ſee now it is in vain to ſerve God and to fear him, this had been blaſphemy and curſing of God to his face. David was near upon the very brink of this blaſphemy, Pſal. 73. 13. when he ſaid, I have cleanſed my heart in vain, and waſhed my hands in innocency, becauſe (ſaith he) I am plagued every morning; the judgments and afflictions that were upon him, began to make him break out thus. But he preſently befools himſelf for ſuch ſpeeches, and by that repairs God in his honour.

Secondly, To quarrel and be angry with the Providence of God, as if he were not wiſe, or juſt, or good in his diſpenſations either to particular perſons, or to the Church, this I ſay likewiſe is a curſing, a reproaching of God.

Thirdly, To curſe the ſervants and people of God, is to curſe God; If he that touches them touches God, then he that curſeth them curſeth God too. And God is curſed in any of theſe ſences two wayes, firſt, by detracting from himſelf, his worſhip, his works, or his ſervants, the good they have; or by faſtning on them, and aſperſing them with the evil which they have not.

He will curſe thee to thy face.

Obſerve two or three points from this,

First, Satan can only gueſs at the hearts of men.

He would undertake and enter warranty with God that Job would blaſpheme, if God did but touch him, but he was deceived: Satan did but conjecture at moſt, and ſpeak at a venture; If he did not lye knowingly, I am ſure he did but gueſs ignorantly. Satan knows not what is in the heart, that's God's peculiar, that's God's Cabinet. God knew there lay ſincerity in the heart of Job all the while, although Satan would ſtand to it, that nothing was there but hypocriſie.

Secondly, We may note, ſeeing Satan, accuſing him of hypocriſie, would have him afflicted,

That, Affliction is the tryal and touchſtone of ſincerity.

When God doth afflict you, then he doth bring you to the touchſtone to ſee whether you are good mettal or no, he doth bring you then to the furnace, to try whether you be droſs or gold, or what you are. Affliction is the great diſcoverer, That unmasks us. Satan was not out in the thing, he hit upon the righteſt way that could be; if any thing would diſcover Job, affliction would. Indeed ſome are diſcovered by proſperity and outward abundance. The warm Sun makes ſome caſt off that cloak, which the wind and the cold cauſed them to wrap cloſer about them. Some, when they have gotten enough from God, care not for God; and when the fiſh is caught, they lay by the net: for they do but go a fiſhing with Holineſs, and the profeſſion of Religion, and when they have their ends, there's an end of their profeſſion. Affliction and the croſs try others: Some will hold on with God as long as the Sun ſhineth, as long as it is fair weather; but if the ſtorm ariſe, if troubles come, whether perſonal or publick, then they pull in their heads, then they deny and forſake God, then they draw back from, and betray his truth; what they, ſuch and ſuch men; No, not they. Trouble makes the great tryal; bring Profeſſors to the fire, and then they ſhew their metal. This courſe Satan took with Job. He knew Job had been abundantly tryed by fulneſs and abundance, and theſe did not draw his heart from God, he muſt therefore now try another way. It is an excellent paſſage in the Church-hiſtory, concerning Conſtantius the father of Conſtantine, that to the end he might try the hearts of his Courtiers, he proclaimed, that all they who would not forſake the worſhip of the true God, ſhould be baniſhed the Court, and ſhould have heavy penalties and fines laid upon them: preſently upon this (ſaith the ſtory) all that were baſe, and came to ſerve him only for ends, went away, forſook the true God, and worſhipped Idols. By this means he found out who were the true ſervants of God, and whom he meant to make his own; ſuch as he found faithful to God, he thought would prove faithful to him. What this exploratory decree of Conſtantius effected in his Court, the ſame did that which the Apoſtate Julian ſet forth in good earneſt againſt the Chriſtians. He no ſooner cauſed it to be proclaimed, that whoſoever would not renounce the Faith, ſhould be diſcarded his ſervice, and forfeit both life and eſtate to his high diſpleaſure; But preſently upon the publication of that decree, they who were indeed Chriſtians, and they who had only the title of Chriſtians, preſented themſelves, as it were, on a common ſtage to the view of all men. Such as theſe are Willows, not Oaks. And as it was with Naomi and her two daughters in law, Orphah and Ruth: All the while that ſhe was Naomi, beautiful, and had enough, they both ſtay with her: but when once Naomi became Marah, bitter, and empty, then Orphah took her leave of her, but Ruth abides with her. Here was the tryal whether Orphah or Ruth had the ſincerer affection to Naomi; Ruth loved her mothers perſon, Orphah her eſtate and outward preferments. While Religion and Proſperity go together, it is hard to ſay which a man follows; but when once they are forced to a ſeparation, where the heart was, will ſoon be manifeſt. The upright in heart are like Ruth, whatſoever becometh of the Goſpel, they will be ſharers with it in the ſame condition; be it affliction, or be it proſperity; be it comfort, or be it ſorrow; be it fair weather, or be it foul; be it light, or be it darkneſs, they will take their lot with it. This is a clear truth, that, whatſoever was the cauſe of our doing a thing, that being removed we ceaſe to do it; if outward comfort and accommodations in the world, be the cauſe why we follow Chriſt in the profeſſion of his Goſpel, then as ſoon as ever they fail, our profeſſion will fail too. When zeal is kindled only with the beams of wordly hopes, when worldly hopes fail, our zeal is extinct, and our indeavour is cut off with our expectation.

Αὐτίκα ὡς ἐν χειμῶνι. εἰσὶ γὰρ ὄντες Χριστιανοὶ καὶ νομιζόμενοι φανεροὶ πᾶσιν ἐγίνοντο. Socrat. lib. 3. cap. 13.

We are next to conſider the Lords grant of Satans motion.

And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, behold all that he hath is in thy power, only upon himſelf put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the preſence of the Lord.

We have in this verſe. First, Gods Commiſſion, or his permiſſion unto Satan, behold all that he hath is in thy hand. And ſecondly, His limitation of the Commiſſion, Only upon himſelf put not forth thine hand. Thirdly, Satans ſpeedy execution of his Commiſſion, So Satan went forth from the preſence of the Lord.

The Lord ſaid unto Satan, all that he hath is in thy hand,] thy power, ſo we tranſlate it: the word in the Original is, all is in thy hand. Satan moved that God would put forth his hand againſt Job; and God puts Job into Satans hand. Leſt Satan ſhould cavil that God had toucht him but lightly, he puts him into Satans power, and lets him do it himſelf, who would do it throughly. The hand (as we before noted) is put for power; and when any thing is put into the hand, it is put into the power or diſpoſition of another, Exod. 4. 21. Thou ſhalt do all the wonders before Pharaoh which I have put into thy hand. And John 3. 35. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand. This phraſe of giving or putting into the hand, is taken either for good or for evil. Sometime the putting of a thing into ones hand, is only for the managing and diſpoſing of it for good. As Gen. 39. 7, 8. Joſeph ſaid that his maſter had committed all that he had into his hand, that is, to take care of it, and to order it for his masters benefit, profit, and honour: But often, to put or to give into the hand, is for evil, to do what you will with persons or things, to punish or to afflict them, Judg. 6. 1. God delivered the Israelites into the hand of Midian, that is, he left them to the power of the Midianites, to tyrannize over and vex them: And vers. 7. God delivered Midian into the hand of Israel, that is, he gave Israel power over them to destroy or afflict them. So here, he gave all into the hand of Satan, that is, he gave Satan leave to dispose of Job's estate as he pleased. As if God had said to Satan; Thou hast leave to do what thou wilt with Job's outward estate, spoil it, plunder it, destroy it, consume it, fire it; thou hast free leave, All that he hath is in thy hand.

Dan. 1. 2.

We shall note a point or two from that. You see, as soon as ever Satan had made his motion, God presently answereth, All that he hath is in thy hand.

It is not always an argument of Gods good-will and love, to have our motions granted.

Multi irato Deo exaudiuntur, multis propitius Deus non tribuit quod volunt, ut quod utile est tribuat, August.

Many are heard and answered out of anger, not out of love. The children of Israel required meat for their lusts, and God gave it them, he did not withhold from them their desire, they were not shortned of their lusts, they had it presently: many times his own servants call and call again, move and move again, and obtain no grant: For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, saith Paul, yet Paul could not have what he sought. Satan did but move once, and presently all that Job had was in his hand.

2 Cor. 12. 8.

But further, that which is chiefly here to be observed is,

That until God gives commission, Satan hath no power over the estates or persons of Gods people, or over any thing that belongs unto them.

Neither our persons nor our estates are subject to the will either of men or Devils. Christ must say, All that he hath is in thy hand, before Satan can touch a shoe-latchet: As Christ said, Joh. 19. 11. unto Pilate, when he spake so stoutly, Knowest thou not that I have power to crucifie thee, and power to release thee? He thought that he had all power in his hand: but Christ tells him, Thou couldst have no power at all against me, unless it were given thee from above. If the Devils could not go into the swine, much less can they meddle with a man, made after Gods Image, till God gives them leave. Every soul that hath an interest in Christ may suck comfort and consolation in the saddest, in the sorrowfullest day, from the breast of this truth. If Satan and wicked men cannot move till Christ saith, go; nor wound, till Christ saith, strike; nor spoil, nor kill, till Christ saith, their estates, their lives are in your power: surely Christ will not speak a word to their hurt, whom he loves, nor will he ever suffer his enemies to do a real dammage to his friends. Besides it may fill the soul with unspeakable joy, to remember, that while a man is suffering, the will of Christ is a doing.

Thirdly, Satan doth very wickedly (according to his nature,) in moving, that Job may be afflicted. He moveth in malice and in spight: God knew what his heart and intent was, and yet grants it. We may note from hence,

That which Satan and evil men desire sinfully, the Lord grants holily.

Unus idemque spiritus & Domini appellatur & malus: Domini per licentiam potestatis justæ! malus per desiderium voluntatis injustæ, Greg.

The will of God, and the will of Satan, joyned both in the same thing; yet they were as different as light and darkness, their ends were as different as their natures. Though it were the same thing they both willed, yet there was an infinite distance between them in willing it. The will of Satan was sinful, but the power given Satan was just: Why? Because his will was from himself, but his power was from the will of God. Satan had no power to do mischief but what God gave him; but his will to do mischief was from himself. Therefore we find that the same spirit is said to be an evil spirit, and to be a spirit from the Lord, and yet the Lord doth not partake at all in the evil of the spirit, as 1 Sam. 16. 14. The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him. An evil spirit from the Lord; how was it an evil spirit, if it were from the Lord? can the Lord send forth an evil from himself who is only good? In that he was evil, that was from his own will; but that he had power to trouble Saul, that was from the Lord: So here, Satans will and intent were most wicked, these were from himself; his power to afflict Job was from God, and that was good. Satan willeth Job should be afflicted for his destruction; God willeth it only for his tryal and probation. Satan desireth it, that God may be blasphemed; but God willeth it, that himself might be glorified. Satan willeth it, that so others in his example might be scandalized and disheartned from entring into the service of God, seeing how ill he sped; but God willeth it, that others might be strengthened and incouraged to enter into his service, beholding a man under such heavy pressures, and yet not speaking ill of God or of his wayes. Satan willeth it, hoping thereby Job would discover his hypocrisie; but God willeth it, knowing that he would therein discover his integrity. So then, though the same thing was willed, yet there was a vast disproportion in their ends and intentions; and though the power by which Satan did afflict Job was from God, yet the evil intent with which he afflicted him was from himself. Thus we see how God without any stain or touch of evil grants this, which Satan did most wickedly desire. It followeth, Satanæ voluntas semper iniqua est, sed nunquam potestas injusta, Greg. Deus adeo bonus est ut nullo modo mala permitterit nisi inde majora bona elicitaturus esset.

Only upon himself thou shalt not put forth thy hand.

God gives a Commission, but it is with a limitation, there is a restriction in it; Only upon himself, &c. that is, not upon his person, not his body, thou shalt not afflict that with diseases; not his soul, thou shalt not afflict that with temptations. Hence note,

That God himself sets bounds to the afflictions of his people.

He limits out how far every affliction shall go, and how far every instrument shall prevail: as he doth with the Sea, Hitherto (saith he) thou shalt come, and no further, here thou shalt stop thy proud waves; so he saith to all the afflictions of single persons, or whole Nations, hither you shall come, and no further. Only upon himself thou shalt not put forth thine hand. This limitation respects; First, The degree or measure, thus far you shall afflict, that is, in such a degree, to such a height, and no higher. Secondly, It respects the time, thus far, that is, thus long, so many years, or so many dayes you shall have power, and no longer. God leaves not either the measure, or the time, the degree or the continuance of any affliction in the hand of Satan or his adherents: We read (Rev. 6. 10.) That the souls under the Altar cry, How long Lord? how long? They cry to God how long? they knew that he only had the time in his hand, he only could tell how long, and it should be as long as he pleased, How long Lord? They cryed not to cruel tyrants, how long will ye persecute? but Lord, how long will it be before thou come to revenge? And so David, Psal. 31. 15. My time it is in thy hand, speaking of his afflictions. There is no affliction but it is in the hand of God, for the continuance of it, as well as for the manner of it; and as no enemy, man or devil, can make thy cross greater, or longer, or heavier, so no friend, man or Angel, can make thy cross lighter, or lesser, or shorter then God himself hath appointed; Only upon himself shalt thou not put forth thine hand, thou shalt not move an inch further, not a hairs breadth further. As our afflictions for the matter of them are by the will of God, (as the Apostle speaks, 1 Pet. 4. 19. While you suffer (saith he) according to the will of God: those words, according to the will of God, note not only the righteousness of suffering, that it must be in a good cause, but also the spring from whence those sufferings come, they are Ex voluntate Dei, so Mr. Beza translates it, they are out of the will of God. Now, I say, as they are out of the will of God, or from the will of God, springing from his will, and flowing from his dispensation of things in the matter of them) so also in every circumstance; God himself gives thy cross length, and breadth, and thickness; he fills thy cup of sorrow, he directeth how many drops to a drop, shall be put into it thou shalt not have a drop more then God prescribes, and (which is more comfortable) knows will be for thy good.

Secondly, Observe, That Satan is boundless in his malice toward the people of God.

If God did not set him bounds, he would set himself no bounds, therefore saith God unto him, Only upon himself, &c. He had a mind to have gone further, he would have been upon Job himself, as well as upon his estate, if God had not stop'd and curb'd him. Therefore the Apostle gives that aſſurance for the comfort of the people of God, 1 Cor. 10. 13. God (ſaith he) is faithful, who will not ſuffer you to be tempted above that you are able: As if he ſhould ſay, Satan would with all his heart lay more upon you, then you are able to bear; Satan would break your backs if he were let alone, but God will not ſuffer it. Satan hath a boundleſs malice againſt the people of God. Some obſerve this from his name Leviathan, Iſa. 27. 1. In that day the Lord with his great and ſtrong Sword ſhall puniſh Leviathan the piercing Serpent. Leviathan is put there for Satan, and for all the inſtruments of Satan. Now Leviathan ſignifieth in the Hebrew an augmentation, an addition, or an increaſe: And Satan is ſo called, becauſe (ſay they) he ever deſires to lay more burdens upon, to increaſe the afflictions, troubles and temptations of Gods people, he never thinks he hath done enough againſt them. His thirſt to work miſchief is never quenched, but ſtill he deſires to do more, he would fain have his Commiſſion inlarged to do more miſchief in the world. Therefore God is ſaid not to ſtrike after their ſtroak, in the ſeventh verſe of that 27. of Iſa. Hath he ſmitten him as he ſmit thoſe that ſmote him? In the Hebrew it is, He hath not ſmitten him according to the ſtroak of thoſe that ſmote him: according to their ſtroak, noting that the ſtroak of Leviathan, and the ſtroak of his inſtruments, is an unmeaſurable ſtroak, a boundleſs ſtroak, they would never give over ſtriking: They think the wound is never deep enough, nor blood ſhed enough; but ſaith the Prophet, verſ. 8. God doth it in meaſure, ſo that he oppoſeth their ſtriking to Gods afflicting by the meaſure of it. God keepeth his afflictions in ſuch a bound and compaſs, he afflicts in meaſure; but Satans ſtroak, and the ſtroaks of wicked men, are without all meaſure, that is, without all moderation: unleſs God ſtop them, they would never make an end.

Dicitur Leviathan, i.e. Additamentum ſive augmentum, nam nullo noſtro malo contentus eſt, nullam poteſtatem ſibi ſatis eſſe putat, plus ſibi poteſtatis addi nobis malorum plus inferri ſemper poſtulat. Pineda.

Laſtly, Obſerve how Satan is by this proved a deceiver, he intended more then he ſpake; you may ſee it plainly in this, becauſe God put a reſtraint upon him. Touch all that he hath, ſaith Satan; that referred to his poſſeſſions and outward eſtate, as if that had been the mind of Satan in the motion, do but afflict him in his outward eſtate, I deſire no more to make this trial: now when the Lord ſaith, All that he hath is in thy hand, there he grants him the motion in the letter of it: but the Lord God ſaw that Satan had a further reach, when he ſaid, Touch all that he hath, which words ſeem to extend no further then his eſtate; but had not God limited and reſtrained him, he by an indefinite grant to his motion, had likewiſe fallen upon his perſon, that was the great morſel he gaped after all this while, he would have been doing with Job himſelf, elſe there was no need of this limitation, Only upon himſelf put not forth thy hand; Satans fingers itcht to be medling with Job, though his words called for what he had, not for himſelf.

And Satan went forth from the preſence of the Lord.

As ſoon as he hath leave, and his Commiſſion, he is gone preſently, He went out from the preſence of the Lord. The word is, he went out from the face of the Lord: Now the face of the Lord in Scripture it is taken ſometimes for the eſſential glory of God, that inacceſſible Majeſty of God, Exod. 33. ult. Thou canſt not behold my face. Sometimes the face of God is put for the favour and love of God, Cauſe thy face to ſhine upon thy Sanctuary which is deſolate, Dan. 9. 17. and cauſe thy face to ſhine upon thy ſervant: So in many other places the face of God is put for the favour of God, becauſe as the favour and love of a man is ſeen and diſcovered in his face, ſo there is ſomewhat in thoſe dealings of God which diſcover God; he is ſaid to make his face to ſhine upon his people, when he doth diſcover by any act of his, that he loves and favours them; that is the ſhining of his face upon them. The face interprets the heart, and ſhews the meaning of the ſpirit: ſo in thoſe things which interpret ſomewhat of the love of God to us, God is ſaid to make his face ſhine upon us. On the other ſide, the face of God is put ſometimes for the anger and wrath of God, becauſe anger is ſeen in the face too; ſo in thoſe things by which God diſcovereth his anger, he is ſaid to ſet his face againſt men: there is an expreſs place for it in this ſenſe, Lam. 4. 16. The anger of the Lord (the Hebrew is, the face of the Lord) hath divided them; that is, the Lord hath done ſuch things as have the character of anger upon them, that do repreſent and hold forth nothing but the anger of the Lord unto a people, and that anger of the Lord is called the face of the Lord unto a people. Thirdly, by the face of the Lord in Scripture, we may underſtand the ordinances and the worſhip of God, becauſe in them and by them, God is revealed, manifeſted and known to his people, as a man is known by his face: So in the Old Teſtament, coming to God in thoſe inſtitutions, was called appearing before God, becauſe in them God had promiſed to manifeſt himſelf unto his people. Laſtly, the face of God is put for the common and general preſence of God in the world, by which he filleth heaven and earth, Pſal. 139. 7. Whither ſhall I go from thy preſence?

Index animi vultus.

Now when it is ſaid that Satan went forth from the face of God, or from the preſence of God, it cannot be underſtood in the firſt or in the ſecond ſenſe, for he cannot ſo come into the preſence of God, or before the face of God: before his face of glory, or before his face of favour, Satan never came, nor ever ſhall. And as the preſence of God is taken for his worſhip; ſo Satan cares not to come into his preſence. Laſtly, as the face of God ſignifies his common and general preſence in the world, ſo Satan cannot poſſibly go out from his face, Whither ſhall I go from thy preſence? Pſal. 139. nor men, nor devils are able to go out of the preſence of the Lord, in that ſenſe, for he filleth heaven and earth.

Then theſe words, He went out from the preſence of the Lord, are ſpoken after the manner of men. When a ſervant cometh to his Maſter to receive Commiſſion to do ſome buſineſs, and hath his errand given him, then he goeth out from the preſence of his Maſter about his buſineſs. So Satan comes here upon a buſineſs unto God, he makes a motion, and deſireth to have ſuch power put into his hand, to do ſuch and ſuch things: the Lord grants it, and ſo ſoon as ever he had his diſpatch, he goeth out of the preſence of the Lord. So that the meaning is only this, that Satan left off ſpeaking with God, left off moving God any further at that time, and went out to execute that which he got commiſſion to do, as ſervants go out from the preſence of their Maſters, when they have received warrant or direction what to do. While a ſervant is in expectation of his meſſage or errand, ſo long his eyes are upon his Maſter, Our eyes wait upon thee, O God, as the eyes of ſervants look unto the hands of their Maſters, Pſal. 123. 3. The eyes of ſervants wait upon the face of their Maſter till they have received their meſſage, and then they go out from their preſence.

Hominum more loquitur, à quibus ſervi exeunt, ut mandata exequantur quæ ab illis acceperunt.

It notes the ſpeed that Satan makes when he receives power from God to afflict, or to chaſten and try any of his children, he makes no ſtay, preſently he goeth out from the preſence of the Lord. Satan is ſpeedy and active in executing any power that is committed unto him againſt the people of God, againſt any particular member, or againſt the Church in general: As ſoon as ever he hath but his Commiſſion to afflict, he is gone about it inſtantly: As the good Angels in Heaven are deſcribed to have wings, becauſe as ſoon as ever they have received a command from God, they are upon the wing, they fly, as it were, to fulfil the will of God; and in that ſenſe go out of his preſence: So Satan and the wicked Angels are upon the wing too in that ſenſe, as ſoon as ever they have received power, they preſently put it in execution.

And we may in this make Satan himſelf our pattern. As we pray that the will of God may be done on earth as it is in heaven, in heaven by the good Angels: So in this ſenſe (I ſay) we may deſire that we may do the will of God with as much ſpeed as the evil Angels. It is not unwarrantable to learn from Satan ſpeedily to be doing about the will of God.

VERS. 13, 14, 15.

And there was a day when his ſons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldeſt brothers houſe.
And there came a meſſenger unto Job, and ſaid, The Oxen were plowing, and the aſſes feeding beſides them.
And the Sabeans fell upon them, &c.

IN the former context we ſhewed you the affliction of Job, moved by Satan, and permitted by God, Touch all that that he hath, is Satans motion: All that he hath is in thine hand is Gods permission. From this 13. verse to the end of the 19. the afflictions of Job are particularly described; and we may observe six particulars in the Context concerning his afflictions.

First, The time or season of his afflictions, And there was a day when his sons and daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brothers house, verse. 13.

Secondly, The instruments or the means of his afflictions. Satan who undertook the afflicting of Job, stands as it were behind the door, he doth not appear in it, but sets on others. His instruments were first cruel and bloody minded men, the Sabeans, verse. 15. The Chaldeans, verse. 17. Secondly, those active creatures, devouring fire and stormy winds; the fire, verse. 16. the wind, verse. 19.

Thirdly, The matter of his affliction, or in what he was afflicted, it was in his outward estate.

Fourthly, The variety of his afflictions: he was not smitten in some one thing, in some one part of his outward estate, but he was afflicted in all; his Oxen, his Asses, and his Camels were violently taken away, his sheep burnt up by the fire, his sons and his daughters over-whelmed and crushed by the fall of an house, all his servants attending upon these, slain, consumed, destroyed, excepting only one from every stroke, to be the sad relator or messenger of these calamities.

Fifthly, The suddenness of his afflictions, they came all upon him in one day.

Sixthly, The unceassantness of the report of these afflictions, the sound of them all was in his ears at once: as they were all brought upon him in one day, so they are all told him in one hour, yea by the story it doth appear, there were but very few moments between the first and the last. For the Text saith, that no sooner had one messenger ended his doleful news, but another begins, nay, they did not stay so long as to let one another make an end; but the Text saith, While the former was yet speaking, there came another and said; and so while the next was yet speaking, there came another and said; and while he was yet speaking, another, &c. So that Satan did not give Job so much as the least minute of intermission to breath a while, or recollect himself. His troubles both in the acting and in the reporting, were close linked together, like a chain, one with another, and he within them all fast bound, and yet free.

These are observable, thorough the whole Context concerning this great affliction of Job. Now we will consider the afflictions themselves, their several parts, and open the words in which they are presented to us.

Vers. 13. And there was a day when his sons and daughters were eating, and drinking wine in their eldest brothers house.

Eccles. 3.1. And there was a day.] To every thing there is a season (saith Solomon) and a time for every purpose under the Sun. God hath a time for his purposes, God hath his day: Man hath a time for his purposes; and so hath Satan: any day will not serve his turn, he picks and chooseth. יום There was a day, it intimates a day extraordinary, and there is an expres addition in the Original which puts an emphasis upon it, and makes it more then a day, there was that day, or that special day: So it is used 2 Kin. 4.8. And it fell on a day that Elisha passed to Shunem, or upon that day, a notable day wherein so many great things were done.

But what day was this? It is explained in the words, in the latter part of the verse. It was a notable day, for it was a day, or that day, When his sons and his daughters were eating, and drinking wine in their eldest brothers house.

There are three things in those words, which prove that this was an extraordinary day.

First, It was a feasting day, and feasting dayes are extraordinary dayes.

Secondly, It was an extraordinary, not an ordinary feasting day; For it is said, they were eating, and drinking wine. In the beginning of the Chapter (where the feasts of of Jobs children are described) it is said only, That his sons went every one their day, to eat, and to drink: But here it is said, that they did eat, and drink wine; which notes an extraordinary feast. For still in Scripture, when we Esther 5.6. read of a banquet of wine, or a feast of wine, an extraordinary feast is meant. Queen Esther invited the King and Haman to a banquet of wine; not that there was nothing but wine at the banquet, but that addition doth imply, that it was a plentiful banquet, a solemn banquet. It is John 2.4. more to make a banquet of wine, then to make a banquet, though scarce any banquet is made without wine. So when there wanted wine, the solemnity and glory of the feast was thought to be blemished, They have no wine, saith the mother of Christ unto him at the marriage feast in Cana. And when the Spouse would set forth the wonderfulness of spiritual delights, which she had from Christ, she expres- Cant. 2.4. seth it thus, He brought me into the banqueting house, the Hebrew word is, he brought me into the house of wine; the house of wine notes extraordinary spiritual refreshing. What a banquet had the Spouse for her soul there? Christ called her to eat and drink abundantly, to be filled with his love. See the like Isa. 25. 6. So Jobs children were eating, and drinking wine, &c. they were at a plentiful and and solemn feast that day.

Thirdly, It was a day of feasting in their eldest brothers house, that is another thing which proves it was an extraordinary feast day. It was a feast, and a feast of wine, and a feast of wine in their eldest brothers house, who had a larger estate, a fuller portion, and to answer the dignity of his primogeniture, ought to make a more solemn feast then the rest did: This was the day that Satan picks out and chooses to bring all these sad afflictions upon Job, an ordinary day would not serve his turn; without doubt this was not the immediate day or time, after which he got that Commission from God, All that he hath is in thine hand; Satan went away, he would have been at it as soon as he could, but yet he waiteth for a special time wherein he might do it with greatest advantage: and that is the point I shall observe from this.

That Satan observeth and watcheth his time to fasten his temptations most strongly upon the soul.

He watcheth a day, there was a day, and there was not a day in the whole year, upon which he could have done it with greater advantage then upon that day. As the mercies of God are exceedingly endeared to us by the season in which they come to us: When they come to us in our special need, how sweet is a mercy then! And as our obedience is exceedingly commended to the acceptation of God, when it is upon a fit day, when it is on the day, wherein he calls for and expects it: And as our sins are exceedingly aggravated, by the season and time wherein they are committed: What, sin upon this day? A day of trouble, 2 Kin. 5.26. a day of humiliation? As Elisha rebuked Gehazi, Is this a time to receive money, and to receive garments? &c. Is this a time for thy heart to run out sinfully after the world? So likewise the temptations of Satan and the afflictions which he brings upon the servants of God, are exceedingly imbittered by the season; and he knows well enough, what seasons will make them most bitter. And what can more imbitter a cup of sorrow, then to have it brought us upon a day of rejoycing. Solomon tells us, that as he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings a song to an heavy heart. If joy be troublesome in our sorrows, how troublesome is sorrow in the midst of our joyes, Prov. 25. 20. Then, Satan could never have found out such a time as this: Must he needs be afflicting the Father, when the children were a feasting? Could he find out no other time but this? Must his tears be mingled with their wine? Must the childrens rejoycing day be the Fathers mourning day? Must Satan needs shew his malice against the Father, when the children were shewing their love one to another? It was a love-feast. Thus he did with Christ; it is observed that when Christ had fasted forty dayes and forty nights, and afterwards was an hungry, then the Tempter came, he layes hold of this advantage, he would not come till he was hungry, to perswade him to turn stones into bread. What a strength had this temptation from the season? Who would not make bread for himself if he can, when he is hungry? Had Christ been full, there had not been such an edge upon, such a weight in the temptation. How many doth Satan provoke to turn stones into bread, when he comes to them in their hunger? Thou art in a strait, like to starve and perish, turn stones into bread, that is, procure thy self meat and provision by unlawful and sinful wayes; This is indeed to turn stones into bread.

So here at this time when Job was rejoycing (as doubtless he did) to see the love and unity of his children; now at this time Satan attempts to turn their bread into a stone, to bruise and break the heart of their tender Father. Afflictions press most when they are least expected.

Let us observe then this mixture of malice and cunning in Satan, in choosing his time. To carry a man from one extremity to another, puts him upon the greatest extremity: To make the day of a mans greatest rejoycing to be the day of his deepest sorrows, this is cutting, if not killing sorrow. To be brought from extream sorrow to extream joy suddenly, doth rather amaze then comfort the spirit of a man: It is said that when the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, the people were like them that dream; the change was so great, so sudden, that they were rather astonished and amazed then comforted with it, for a while. So, much more to be hurried from extream joy to extream sorrow, from the borders of comfort to the brink of death on a sudden, is not so much to afflict a man, as to confound and distract him. This course Satan takes with Job.

It were well if we could be wise in this respect to imitate Satan, to choose out our day to do good when there is greatest probability of success, as he chose out his day to do mischief: It is the Apostles rule, as you have opportunity, do good; if we could be wise to lay hold upon opportunities, it would be a wonderful advantage to us. As a word fitly spoken is a word upon the wheel; so a work fitly done, is a work upon the wheel, it goeth on, takes upon the heart both of God and man. Let us consider whether now we have not a season, whether this be not a day that holds forth to us a glorious opportunity. Surely we may present this day unto you, as a day to be doing in. Let us therefore be as quick in this our day to do good, as Satan was in that day to do hurt. This is a day wherein great things are a doing, and grievous things are a suffering by many of our brethren, therefore you should be working this day, make a day on't. This is a day in which sons of Belial, men that will not bear Christs yoke, are combining to break it, and to cast his cords from them. Then joyn this day, to help Christ; else, as Mordecai said to Esther, If thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time (this was a day for Esther to work in) then shall their enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place, but thou and thy fathers house shall be destroyed: So I may say to you in reference to the present opportunity, if you altogether hold your peace, hold your purses, and hold your hands at this time, at such a day as this, enlargement will come to the Church some other way; but you may be destroyed, who think to hold & keep your peace either by saying or doing nothing: If ever you will appear, this is a day to appear in to do good. Let us be wise to manage and improve our day; that it may never be said of us, as our Lord Christ did of Jerusalem: If ye had known, even ye, in this your day, the things which belong unto your peace, Luke 19. 42. It is a sadder thing to have had a season and not to know it, (sc. not to use it,) then not to have had it. Solomon tells us, Eccles. 8. 6. That, Because to every purpose there is a time and judgment, therefore the misery of man is great upon him. Misery cannot be great to a man, because there is a time for every purpose; but because men are either so blind that they cannot see, or so sluggish that they will not make use of the proper time for every purpose. Thus the Preacher himself expounds it, Chap. 9. 12. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds are taken in a snare, so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them. Consider what Solomons experience taught him: Let not your inadvertencie of these times, make you a new experiment of that ancient truth, and leave men that should be wise, especially that pretend to wisdom, to be numbred among, and compared with a silly bird, a silent fish.

Gal. 6. 10.

Esth. 4. 14.

Then again, Forasmuch as it was the day of their great feast, of their feast with wine, upon which this great affliction assaulted Job; Observe,

That, The fairest and clearest day of our outward comfort may be clouded and overcast before the evening.

It was a fair day as ever began in Job's family, a feast, and a feast with wine, and that, in the eldest Brothers house, and yet all was darkness before night.

This is true in reference to ungodly men, great and terrible judgments fall suddenly upon them; their light is turned into darkness in a moment, as Christ compares it to the dayes of Noah, and the dayes of Lot: As it was (saith he) in the dayes of Noah, they did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entred into the Ark, and the Flood came and destroyed them all. And as it was in the dayes of Lot, &c. Both which, are in two words set out by the Apostle: When they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh. Thus it is with ungodly men, their Sun often sets at noon; when they say, yea, when they conclude all's well, then judgment mixt with wrath, is at the door. This is a truth also in reference unto godly men, and the Churches of God, all their outward comforts may be clouded in a day, while they are eating and drinking, not sinfully, but in a holy manner; suppose, as the Apostle adviseth, to the glory of God: yet even at that time, all may presently be taken away. And therefore, as the Apostle adviseth, Rejoyce as if you rejoyced not in the Creature, and eat as if you did not eat, and buy as if you possessed not; Why? For the fashion of this world, and the Scheme of this world passeth away; you see it did with Job: in what a goodly fashion was his worldly estate in the morning? how was it drest and adorned in perfect beauty, in all its excellencies (as we heard it before described) yet, before night all the fashion of it past away, and the beauty of it was quite blasted: therefore, you that have great Estates, and good Estates, Estates well gotten, and well governed, be not high-minded, trust not in uncertain riches; if riches encrease, and if they increase in a right way, yet set not your hearts upon them; for the fashion of worldly things quickly passeth away. Riches make themselves wings to flie away, when thou art making doors and locks, bolts and bars, to keep them in. That for the Time, in Verse 13.

Psal. 62. 10.

But what did Satan upon this day? That is set down in ver. 14, and so on.

And there came a Messenger unto Job, and said, the Oxen were plowing, and the Asses feeding beside them.

There came a messenger.] The Jewish Rabbins, and some of the Fathers tell us, that these Messengers were Devils, evil Spirits, in the likeness of men: But surely the Opinion hath little likeness with truth; therefore with Beza, I lay it by, and reject it amongst the Tales of the Rabbins: These Messengers were really the escaped servants of Job, as we shall see afterward.

Now the Messenger bespeaks Job thus, The Oxen were plowing, they were hard at their work; and the Asses were feeding besides them: The word in the Hebrew is this, the Asses were feeding at their hand, or at hand. To be at hand, doth note nearness: In our Language we say, such a thing is at hand, or such a man is at hand, the day of our fear is at hand, when we mean, they are near: The Lord is at hand, Phil. 4. 5. sc. nigh unto us for our help. So, 2 Thes. 2. 2. It is applied also to nearness of place, as well as of time, Neh. 3. 2. where the building of the wall of Jerusalem is described, it is said, Next unto him built the men of Jericho, the Hebrew is, at the hand of him built the men of Jericho; that is, next to him in place.

Now the Messenger describeth all in such a posture, The Oxen were plowing, and the Asses feeding; by this to assure Job of the care and diligence of his servants about his business, for the securing of his Cattel, and improving of his ground. As if he should have said, This sad affliction which is come upon thee, did not come through our negligence or improvidence, we were about our business, according to our several places; the Oxen were plowing, and the Asses were feeding by them; they were not carelesly left to danger, but our eye was upon them; yet notwithstanding they were all surprized and taken away.

From this relation of the posture of Job's Servants and Cattel at the time when this affliction fell upon them, we may observe thus much,

That, All our care and diligence cannot secure outward things unto us.

Afflictions may take us in the midst of our best and most honest endeavours. A man may be looking to, and ordering his estate, and yet at the very time, while his eye is upon it, it, he may see it take its flight like an Eagle towards heaven; while he is ordering of it, he may see disorder and confusion coming upon it; while he is setling of it by honest care, he may quickly see it unsetled, removed, and all broken in pieces, as it was here with Job; he was in a very good way, his servants were honestly employed, but suddenly all is gone: the Oxen were taken away, and the Asses that fed by them. But who made this attempt? The Messenger informs that in the next words:

And the Sabeans fell upon them.

ויפל From נפל

The Sabeans. The Hebrew is, Saba fell upon them; the countrey put for the people, Saba for the Sabeans: As we use to say, Spain made war, and France made war; that is, the Spaniards made war, or the French made war; so it is such an expression, Saba fell upon them, that is, the people inhabiting Saba.

Fell upon them. The word noteth a mighty violence; they came upon them as from above, they come powring down upon them like a storm. There is such a phrase in war, when they go violently upon a place, they are said to storm the place, to storm the gates of a Castle, or of a City; so here, they fell upon them, that is, they came violently upon them like a storm. In Prov. 1. 27. Destruction is described to come upon wicked men like a whirlwind.

Sabæos autem Arabas intelligit, qui latrociniis dediti erant; unde posterior ætas eos Saracenos appellavit, non a Sara, ut quidam somniant; sed a Saras, verbo Arabico, quod furari & latrocinari significat. Unde Saric, Fur, Latro. Drus. in loc.

The Sabeans were a people (as is concluded by most Interpreters) inhabiting Arabia Fœlix, near the Countrey where Job dwelt: And for the manners of this people, it is observed by Historians, that they were a people famous only for robberies, a people that lived by pillage and plundering of their neighbours; such a people they were: These Sabeans fell upon them, they took away thy Cattel, and have slain thy servants with the edge of the Sword.

Here it may be questioned, how or why these Sabeans at such a time should fall upon the estate of Job? What hurt had Job done them? Job lived in a fair way with all his neighbours, and kept good quarter and correspondence with them, he was not a man of war or contention; how cometh it to pass that these fell upon Job's estate, and took it away, and upon that day too, in this nick of time?

2 Sam. 14. 19. As when the Widow of Tekoah had told a fair tale to David, about the bringing back of Absolom, the King asked her, Is not the hand of Joab with thee in all this? So when you see such men, Sabeans and Caldeans falling upon the estate of Job, you may demand, Is not the hand of Satan in all this? Yes no doubt. These Sabeans fall upon Job's estate, but Satan first fell upon the Sabeans, and by strong temptations provoked them to do this service.

But how could he prevail upon the Sabeans, that they should come and do his business now at this time?

2 Tim. 2. 26. The Apostle telleth us, that wicked men are led captive by Satan at his will. Satan doth lead men captive at his will, while they are, as they conceive, conquerors, riding in triumph, doing their own will. These Sabeans came to execute their own designs, but Satan had a design upon them, he brought them thus to spoil the estate of Job.

But what could Satan do? How could Satan prevail with these? Can he force men to be his Instruments, to execute his designs upon the people of God? Or hath he Sabeans and Caldeans, Nations and People at his beck, or under his command?

No, Satan cannot force or compel them against their wills; but as that Scripture saith, he leads them captive at his will; and as another Scripture, he is a Prince of the power of the ayr, and he works in the children of disobedience; yea, he works like a Prince, mightily and powerfully in the children of disobedience. Though he cannot constrain them, yet he can work mightily in them to effect what he hath to do. Eph. 2.

But how doth he bring them about thus readily and suddenly to act what he projects?

Thus; First, He finds out the temper and disposition of the persons: That Satan can do; he is a great Naturalist, and hath a great deal of help to his skill, long experience; by both, he can go very far in discovering the dispositions of men, which way their spirits tend; and he found out, that these Sabeans were a people given to robbery and spoil, and so fit ministers for him to work by in his design of spoiling the estate of Job. Secondly, When he hath found out the natural temper or state of a mans heart, he can lay a bait of temptation suitable to that inclination and desire: finding out a people given to spoil, he presently sets before them rich spoils; these are a taking object: See, yonder is a brave prize for you, yonder is a rich man, his estate will be good plunder, yonder are Oxen and Asses store, there's good booty to be had. Thus finding out their disposition, he presents or holds up an object to them, which hits it fully. Thirdly, Satan deals with man to draw him to his purpose a degree further, sc. by injecting and casting into the mind the motion to do this: He not only presents such and such a thing, such and such an opportunity, but he casts in and injects the motion. As it is said of Judas, that the Devil put it into his heart to betray Christ. The Devil, being a Spirit, hath access to our spirits, and can convey himself into them, and instill his suggestions. As the Lord Christ did breath upon his Disciples, and so they received the holy Ghost, and were filled with the Spirit; so Satan breaths filthy suggestions into the spirits of men, and fills them with all manner of wickedness, malice, unrighteousness; he fills them with the spirit of Hell: Why hath Satan filled thy heart? saith Peter to Ananias. Satan had filled his heart to lie to the Holy Ghost. Thus he instilled these thoughts of gain by robbery and murder, into the Sabeans and Caldeans, and filled their hearts brim full: Then they resolve to act it with the hand, and so they become his instruments. Joh. 13. 2. Acts 5. 3.

Lastly, Satan can do somewhat more then inject and suggest such thoughts, he can mightily irritate and provoke, and stir up the heart to be willing to give entertainment to such a motion. He not only barely presents his temptation, but vehemently backs it, and will give no rest to a man, till he yields it: As it is said of his tempting David, that Satan stood up and provoked David to number the people; he did not only inject such a thought into David, but he provoked him; he never let him alone, but followed him, solicited him to it. This Satan can do; and yet he cannot press men to take up Arms for his designs; all those that fight under Satans Colours, are Voluntiers; he never constrains any, neither can he; the will is never forced by him, neither can it be. Satan uses no compulsion beyond a moral perswasion well set on; he can but vex us (as the Midianites did Israel) with his wiles; He is an Achitophel, not an Alexander; a Machiavil, not a Cæsar. 2 Chr. 21. 1.

This is the manner of Satans working in the children of disobedience. All these things he can do; yet I believe he is not alwayes put to do all these upon every one over whom he prevailes; some come to this work on easier terms then others: He needs not provoke and solicit them, a suggestion wins them, the very sight of an object overcomes them: yea, some stand ready offering their service unto Satan, and selling themselves to work any wickedness he will employ them in. I have shewed you the most that Satan can do; I conceive he had not much to do with these Sabeans, to invite them to this war: That which is in motion, is easily moved: And as we say, He must needs run whom the Devil drives; so the Devil needs not drive them, who are running of themselves.

It being opened, what these Sabeans were, and how they came into the service of Satan, what made them take up Arms, as it were, in his cause; we may observe from hence,

> First, That wicked and ungodly men, while they satisfie their own lusts, are but doing the work of Satan, and executing his designs.

These Sabeans, though they did not think it, yet they came upon Satans errand: So God, when he doth justly use wicked men to punish or correct his people, they do their own will, and they have their own way; but God hath his way too, he over-rules them to effect his business at that time: As it is said of the King of Assyria, O Assyrian, the rod of mine Anger, I will send him against an hypocritical Nation, and against the people of my wrath will I give him charge; howbeit, he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so, Isa. 10. He hath purposes of his own. So they that are agitated by Satan, and provoked by him, they think not so; they think not they are doing the will and work, the dirty drudgery of Satan; but the truth is, they do nothing else all the while. You are of your Father the Devil, and his luſts will you do; ſaith Chriſt to the Jews: while they do their own, they fulfil the luſts and deſigns of Satan. As it is ſaid in the Revelation, The Devil Rev. 2. 10. ſhall caſt ſome of you into priſon; it was not the Devil in perſon, it was the Devil in his ſeconds or ſervants; and theſe men little thought that they did the Devils ſervice at that time: If one ſhould have come and told them, you are now doing the Devils work, and undertaking a piece of ſervice for him, you are ſo many inſtruments and agents for Hell; they would not have believed it: but the truth is, it was the Devils work, and they did it ſo deviliſhly, that, from both, it is ſaid the Devil did it; he caſt ſome of them into priſon. It is a fearful thing to perſecute or oppreſs the people of God; ſuch, in ſerving their own luſts, are indeed the right hand of Satan, the Devils hirelings.

Secondly, Foraſmuch as Satan will have Sabeans and Caldeans to afflict Job's eſtate (he could have deſtroyed all himſelf if he pleaſed. Good Angels have mighty power, and ſo have wicked Angels too, if God will let them alone to put out their power; therefore they are called Principa- Eph. 6. lities and Powers. Satan had leave, he might have taken what courſe he would with the eſtate of Job; he doth not call in the Sabeans and the Caldeans to this work, becauſe he could not do it himſelf; no, it is becauſe he would work by others, he would have inſtruments.) Note hence,

That, Satan loveth to draw others to be partakers with him in his deſigns.

Though he can do his work alone, yet he will have man joyn with him in it, if he can: And in this he imitates God himſelf, who hath an almighty power, is able to do all things alone, if he pleaſe; yet uſually he calleth in inſtruments. He is able to convert alone by the motion of his Spirit; but he will have Preachers to convert by the Miniſtry of the Word. He is able to protect his people from their enemies, by his own ſtrength; yet he will have Armies muſtered, to do it by. And why doth God chooſe to work thus? There is a double good in it. He doth it, that he may do good two wayes at once. Firſt, His creature is ſaved and relieved; that is one good. Secondly, Men who are employed as inſtruments, are honoured and reſpected; they having given help to God in ſuch a cauſe, (ſo he interprets it, a coming forth to help the Lord againſt the mighty) God gives them honour in the eyes of all his ſervants; there is another good. So Satan, while he ſetteth men awork, Sabeans, Caldeans, and others, to do miſchief, he doth a double miſchief at once; he doth miſchief to Job, or others whom he afflicts; and he doth miſchief to his inſtruments; he makes theſe ſin, he makes others ſuffer: If he carry on the work alone, they ſuffer, but others do not partake in the guilt of the ſin; but now when he uſeth inſtruments to effect his wicked deſigns, he makes one miſerable, and the other wicked. This is one of Satans methods, he will work by means, and do his buſineſs by the hands of men, that he may at once do a double miſchief.

Thirdly, In that theſe Sabeans and Caldeans, are obſerved in Hiſtories to be a people given much to robberies and ſpoil, and theſe are the men whom Satan picks out for this buſineſs; Obſerve,

That, Satan ſuiteth his temptations to mans natural temper and inclination.

Whenſoever he tempteth, he takes this advantage, if he can diſcover or obtain it. He is wiſer then to ſet ſail againſt wind and tide, to row againſt the ſtream; therefore he labours all he can, to find which way the ſtream of every mans affections runs; and to what ſins his Relations, his Calling, or his Opportunities lay him moſt open and obnoxious; accordingly he layes his Snares, and ſpreads his Net. When he meets with a proud man, him he tempteth with high thoughts: When he meeteth with a covetous man, him he tempteth to the love of the world; he layes a golden bait of profit before his eyes: The adulterous, he leads to the Harlots houſe. For howſoever it be true, that every man hath in him a principle ſuting to every ſin, yet it is a truth too, that every man is not equally active for, or diſpoſed unto every ſin; and every man hath not every particular ſin predominant in him: now Satan, when he ſeeth what is predominant in any man, then he faſhioneth and frameth a temptation ſutable: He perceived theſe Sabeans were given to rob and ſpoil, and he ſheweth them a deſirable booty.

And have ſlain thy ſervants with the edge of the ſword.

This a further aggravation of the affliction; they did not only fall upon Job's Cattel, and took them away; but they ſlew his Servants. A mans ſervants are nearer to him then his Cattel, then his Oxen and his Aſſes; ſervants are next unto our Children. So that this was a heightning of Job's ſorrow, not only are your Cattel gone, but your Servants are ſlain; and they are ſlain (ſaith he) with the edge of the ſword: the word in the Hebrew is, they are ſlain with the mouth of the ſword.

We read in Scripture ſometimes of the face of the ſword, and ſometimes of the mouth of the ſword; as, Iſa. 31.8. where we tranſlate, they ſhall flee from the ſword, the Hebrew is, they ſhall flee from the face of the ſword. The like Text you have, Jer. 25.27. Now when the Scripture ſpeaks of the face of the ſword, it is meant of war coming, or war preparing and approaching. But the mouth of the ſword is war inflicted, war acted. This phraſe, the mouth of the ſword, is uſed to ſhew, that the ſword is a great devourer, Deut. 32.42. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my ſword ſhall devour fleſh. War hath a terrible face, it hath a wide mouth, and ſharp teeth; They have ſlain thy ſervants with the edge of the ſword; the mouth of the ſword hath devoured them.

At this day we have great cauſe to have our hearts deeply affected with this thing. There hath been (as it were) the face of the ſword a great while looking towards us, but now there is the very mouth of the ſword gaping at us; yea, tearing, gnawing, and devouring the fleſh and bones of thouſands amongſt us. Where the ſword comes, it will devour: war is a great judgment, one of Gods ſore judgments, the ſoreſt of all Gods outward judgments. David chooſeth the Peſtilence rather then the ſword; the Peſtilence is a devourer, but the ſword is a greater devourer. And though the Prophet Jeremiah, in his Lamentations, makes Famine a ſorer judgment then the Sword (Chap. 4.9.) They that be ſlain with the ſword are better then they that be ſlain with hunger. Yet the ſword is in this worſe then famine, becauſe uſually it is the cauſe of famine. The ſword cuts off food, the ſupport of mans life, as well as the life of man. While the ſword is making it ſelf fat, it hath famine in the belly of it.

We need not go to Jeremiah or Joſephus for the proof of this in Jeruſalems Babylonian or Roman deſolations; ſad Germany, bleeding Ireland, are near woful witneſſes and ſpectacles of it at this day. The Sword hath opened a way for Famine to enter both; and which of the two hath eaten moſt fleſh, is hard to determine. Let us cry earneſtly to God, that the mouth of the Sword may be ſtopped, or continued open, only to devour thoſe, who would devour the man who is more righteous then they: Let us pray that blood may be ſpared, or none but corrupt blood ſpilt. Spare thy people, O Lord: It is (I confeſs) one of the ſaddeſt prognoſticks, in my obſervation, againſt this Nation, that God hitherto hath made little difference. Our Sword hath not yet been taught from Heaven to diſtinguiſh of men. Precious blood hath been drawn, and men, whoſe very hairs were all numbred (that is, highly prized) by God, have been numbred among the ſlain. It muſt ſatisfie us, that the will of God is ſo. The anſwer which David gave Joab's Meſſenger, is good ſetling counſel now (2 Sam. 11.25.) Let not this thing diſpleaſe thee; (He ſpeaks this after the fall of noble Uriah) for the ſword (not by accident, but decree; not caſually, but providentially) devoureth ſo and ſuch (as the Hebrew elegance hath it) one as well as another; ſo we tranſlate. It is mercy, we are not all conſumed by this eater; as in the Text ye may read all the ſervants of Job were, excepting one, only one got out of the mouth of the ſword; it eat up all ſaving one, and he was ſaved, that by the report of the deſtructive ſword, he might deſtroy Job himſelf.

And I only am eſcaped to tell thee.

The word in the Original, is double; tantum ego, ſolus ego, only I; I alone am eſcaped: as if the man ſhould have ſaid, between horror and amazement, much ado I had to get away without loſing ſomewhat of my ſelf; I only ſin- רק אני לבדי gle,

gle, ſingle I got away and eſcaped. The ſword was very hungry, when but one man of all Job's ſervants eſcaped the teeth of it.

But how cometh it to paſs that this one man eſcaped?

Certainly, as I ſaid before, the hand of Satan was in this alſo: For howſoever the Lord ordered and diſpoſed all theſe things, yet he let Satan work in his circle, in his compaſs, to contrive things as he pleaſed himſelf, the moſt aptly he could imagine, to afflict and trouble Job; therefore there is ſomewhat in it, no good-will (I believe) to Job, that this one man had the favour of quarter or mercy of an eſcape.

It was not out of any compaſſionate reſpect to Job, that one of his ſervants comes home alive. It was rather to increaſe the affliction of Job, and for the perfecting of his ſorrows; this man was not ſlain, that Job may be more deeply wounded. There are two Reaſons, which may be aſſigned, why one man eſcaped out of every one of theſe calamities.

Firſt, That the report of this affliction might come ſuddenly to him. A man that eſcapes out of ſuch a danger, needs no driving; his fear will add wings to his feet, he will run home amain.

Secondly, For the certainty of it. Reports fly abroad, they may be falſe; Fama mendax, Fame is a liar. Job might have had ſuch reports from his neighbours in the Countrey, all your Cattel are ſeized upon, and all your ſervants are ſlain; and Job might ſlight it, and ſay, This might be but a rumour, I give no credit to it; therefore Satan lets one of his own ſervants come frighted home with the news, one that was there, one that was an eye-witneſs, one that Job knew, one that had no reaſon, much leſs the boldneſs to bring falſe tales to him; that ſo the report coming ſpeedily and certainly, his heart might be ſmitten preſently. It is ſome abatement of an evil, to have but a colour to doubt of it. If we can but lay hold of any circumſtance which renders an evil report improbable, and may for a while ſtrengthen our unbelief of it, we may in that interim get more ſtrength of Faith to bear it, when we ſee it is certain and unqueſtionable. There was no mercy in ſuch a ſparing.

And we may obſerve out of it, that which Solomon ſpeaks of the mercies of the wicked is moſt true of Satans, The very tender mercies of Satan are cruel, the beſt of his mercies, his ſparings are woundings; he never ſpareth but with an intent to do further hurt. Jobs afflictions had not gone ſo deep, if this man had not been left to bring the meſſage.

It followeth,

Verſ. 16. While he was yet ſpeaking there came alſo another and ſaid, the fire of God is fallen from Heaven, and hath burnt up the ſheep, and the ſervants, and conſumed them, and I only am eſcaped alone to tell thee.

In this verſe we have the ſecond charge which this great enemy gives Job, While he was yet ſpeaking there came alſo another. Afflictions ſeldom go alone; And therefore when one affliction is ended, look another ſhould begin, and labour to prepare for it. Job having received this meſſage of the loſs of his cattel and death of his ſervants, while the meſſenger was yet ſpeaking, a ſecond comes with a ſadder ſtory then that. Satan would not give him the leaſt breathing or intermiſſion; while he was yet ſpeaking; one evil treads upon the heel of another; as wave overtakes wave in the ſea; ſo it was here, here was wave after wave, to over-whelm his ſpirit. And as it is ſaid in the Revelation, concerning him that ſate on the white-horſe, that he rid out conquering and to conquer, there was no intermiſſion of his victories; ſo Satan goeth forth afflicting and to afflict, vexing and to vex, tempting and to tempt, he will never give over. While he was yet ſpeaking, there came alſo another, and ſaid, the fire of God is fallen upon thy ſheep.

The fire of God.

Why is it here called the fire of God? Some conceive it is called the fire of God, becauſe ſent from God: that is aſcribed to God, which comes from God, as that Gen. 19. 24. where it is ſaid, that the Lord did rain fire and brimſtone upon Sodom out of Heaven from the Lord: or Jehovah did rain from Jehovah fire upon Sodom to conſume it: And Levit. 10. 2. it is ſaid, That a fire went out from the Lord and conſumed Nadab and Abihu. Elijah procures fire from Heaven to conſume the Captains that came from the King to take him, 2 King. 1. 10, 12. The Pſalmiſt ſpeaking of the plagues of Egypt (Pſal. 105. 32.) ſaith that the Lord ſent flames of fire in the land; So ſome expound that place, Pſal. 104. 3. He maketh his Angels ſpirits, and his Miniſters a flame of fire, that is, he uſeth flames of fire for his Miniſters, for his meſſengers. God ſometime ſends a fire on his errands, though we know that place is applyed to the Angels by the Apoſtle, Heb. 1. 7.

But here rather it is called the fire of God in another regard; for howſoever this fire was ſent of God, as all afflictions are; yet becauſe the immediate kindler of it was Satan, he had the power put into his hand; therefore this was not a fire (in that ſenſe as thoſe other fires are ſaid to be) ſent from God: But it may be called (as uſually in Scripture) the fire of God, becauſe of the ſtrangeneſs of the fire, it was a wonderful, an extraordinary fire; and ſo it is very ordinary in the Hebrew to uſe the name of God, El, Elohim or Jehovah, as an Epithite, as an additional word to heighten the excellence or rareneſs of things. We find that phraſe often, A man of God. The Hebrews ſay, to call one a man of God, is as much as to ſay, he is an extraordinary man, a man of an excellent ſpirit, a Prophet, a holy man: In that Pſalm where the Church is ſhadowed under the ſimilitude of a Vine, it is ſaid, She did ſend forth her branches like the goodly Cedars: So we tranſlate it; the Original word is, She ſent forth her branches as the Cedars of God, that is, excellent Cedars, tall and extraordinary Cedars. In Pſal. 36. 6. comparing the love of God to great Mountains, Thy loving kindneſs is as the great mountains, the word is, like the mountains of God. Pſal. 65. 9. Thou refreſheſt it with the river of God, that is, with an excellent River. Cant. 8. 6. ſpeaking of love and jealouſie, Love is ſtrong as death; jealouſie is cruel as the grave, the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a moſt vehement flame; the word in the Original is a flame of God, the coals thereof are coals of fire, the flame of God, that is, as we tranſlate it, a vehement flame. So here the fire of God, that is, a ſtrange fire, an unheard of, an unuſual fire, a vehement fire, ſuch a fire as had not been ſeen nor obſerved before. Therefore the Hebrews call extraordinary things the things of God; becauſe indeed all the wonders and excellencies, all the glory and goodneſs that is in creatures, is but a footſtep, a print or drop of that excellency and glory and power that is in God; therefore every thing that is moſt excellent, is aſcribed unto God. It is moſt equal that his name ſhould be ſtampt upon all excellent things in the creature, who is the cauſe of all creature-excellence. This fire being a ſtrange and extraordinary fire, is ſaid to be the fire of God.

Pſ. 180. 10.

This fire of God is conceived to have been ſome terrible flaſh of Lightning, which in a moment deſtroyed and conſumed the ſheep and ſhepherds. And this is more probable, becauſe it is ſaid to fall down from Heaven, that is, out of the Air; for ſo often in Scripture, Heaven is put for the Air, the middle region of the Air, where Satan hath great power; therefore he is called the Prince of the Air; and he can do mighty things, command much in the Magazine of Heaven, where that dreadful Artillery, which makes men tremble, thoſe fiery Meteors, Thunder and Lightning, are lodged and ſtored up. Satan let looſe by God, can do wonders in the Air: He can raiſe ſtorms, he can diſcharge the great Ordnance of Heaven, Thunder and Lightning, and by his Art, he can make them more terrible and dreadful then they are in nature. If the skill and art of man can heighten natural things, then much more the skill of Satan. I doubt not, but many fearful impreſſions are made in the Air by Devils, carrying Nature (by Gods permiſſion) far above its own courſe; and theſe are properly Marvels or Wonders (ſuch as the Magicians wrought in Egypt, by the help of Satan) for Miracles are quite out of the Devils Sphear: But he can do wonders; and ſuch was this fire falling from Heaven, &c. A Marvel, a Wonder, is Nature mightily improved: a Miracle is Nature totally croſſed, if not contradicted. Obſerve this for the nature of that fire; the effect of it follows in the next words.

Fulguri maximum. Jun.

It hath burnt up the ſheep and the ſervants, and conſumed them.

The word in the Original is, It did burn them and eat them them up. Fire is a devouring Element. Devouring Fire, as before a devouring Sword, theſe were devouring judgements upon Job. Yet it doth not neceſſarily inter that the ſheep were all burnt to aſhes; but that the ſheep were all killed by that flame of lightening that came from Heaven; for it is ſaid of Nadab and Abihu (of which we ſpake before) that a fire went out from God, and did conſume them; it is the ſame Original word that is here in the Text, A fire went out from God, and did eat them up, yet we know their bodies were not conſumed, for they were carried out to their burial, and their garments were upon them. So that this conſuming doth not note the burning of things to aſhes, but a ſtriking of them to death; it is a devouring fire, becauſe it is a deſtroying fire, it takes away life: and thus lightenings kill rather by peircing and penetrating, then by conſuming and devouring.

But now here it will be queſtioned for the further opening of this, why Satan chooſes thus to conſume the Sheep with fire? why doth he not rather uſe ſpoylers to take them away? He could doubtleſs have got the Sabeans to have fetched away the flocks of Sheep, as well as the droves of greater Cattle; he could have procured them eaſily; why then doth he cauſe fire from Heaven to come down, the fire of God to conſume them?

I anſwer, his reaſon for this was to put the greater ſting into the affliction. He would not have the Sheep taken away after the ſame manner that the Oxen and Camels were, that he might aggravate Jobs trouble, and provoke him if he could to be paſſionate againſt God, yea and (for that was his great deſign) to blaſpheme God; therefore he procures fire from Heaven to fall upon the Sheep, thereby to beget an opinion in Job that God was now become his enemy as well as man. When we ſuffer from man, then the afflicted ſoul flies to God, makes his complaint and moan to him, as doubtleſs Job did when he heard of thoſe cruel Sabeans, and what they had done; but leſt Job ſhould reſort in his thoughts to Heaven, and comfort himſelf in God again, the next meſſenger telleth him that God is his enemy too, that the fire of God is fallen upon the Sheep; an extraordinary fire; as if he ſhould ſay, God fighteth againſt thee as well as the Sabeans; Alas now to whom ſhould Job make his moan! That ſpeech of Eli, concerning ſin may well be applied to ſuffering, If one man ſin againſt another, the Judge ſhall judge him: but if a man ſin againſt the Lord, who ſhall intreat for him? So if a man ſuffer from men, he may go unto God; But if God himſelf do appear to be an enemy and to fight againſt us, to whom ſhall we go? Indeed Job knew how to go to God, though he did appear as an enemy; but that is the greateſt ſtraight, and to do thus notes the greateſt ſpiritual both skill and ſtrength. Hence obſerve,

That Satans great deſign againſt the people of God or any ſervant of God, is to provoke them to ill thoughts of God;

To perſwade them that God is their enemy, to bring the love and good will of God into ſuſpition. Therefore he cauſeth this great fire, and (it is like) formed the ſervants language in that cutting phraſe, The fire of God is fallen upon the Sheep. Thou canſt not put this off, as thou mighteſt do the other, and ſay, this is but the malice or the covetouſneſs of the Sabeans, that rob'd me of my goods, and ſlew my ſervants; No, thou ſhalt ſee now that God himſelf is angry, Heaven frowns upon thee, the fire of God from Heaven conſumes thee. Turn over the Records of all antiquity, and ſee whether God ever dealt thus with any, but thoſe curſed Sodomites upon whom God rained fire from Heaven: Thou who comeſt ſo near them in the puniſhment, haſt reaſon to judge thy ſelf not far behind them in ſin.

Secondly obſerve, Thoſe afflictions are moſt grievous wherein God appears to be againſt us.

The malice of Devils and the rage of men may be endured; but who can ſtand before God, when he is angry? If God doth but withdraw his comforts, the ſoul ſinkes under ſmalleſt tryals; how then can it ſtand if God ſhould reveal his wrath againſt us, when we are in great trials?

It may here be queſtioned, why the Sheep were conſumed with fire, rather then any other of his Cattel, rather then any other of his ſubſtance.

There are two things in that. Firſt, The Sheep were uſed in Sacrifice. When the dayes of their feaſting were ended, Job offered Sacrifice, and the Sheep chiefly were offered in Sacrifice. Now Satan by conſuming the Sheep hoped to faſten this upon Job, if poſſibly he could, that God was angry with his very Sacrifices, God was angry with his ſervices. As if he ſhould ſay, Doeſt thou think that the offering up of thy Sheep in Sacrifice hath been pleaſing to God? Certainly if the fire of thoſe Sacrifices had delighted God, if he had ſmelt a ſavour of reſt in them (as he is ſaid to have done, when Noah offered Sacrifice after the Flood, Gen. 8. 21.) he would never have ſent a fire from Heaven to conſume them. That is conceived by Expoſitors to be an eſpecial reaſon why the Sheep were conſumed, namely to caſt Job upon this apprehenſion, that his very Sacrifices were rejected of God; that he might conclude of himſelf (as Solomon ſaith of the wicked) that his Sacrifices were an abomination unto the Lord; and to ſhew that God would now have no more of his Sacrifices, God himſelf made one Sacrifice of them all. But Origen brings in Job excellently retorting this ſuggeſtion upon Satan: I ſacrificed now one, and then another of my Sheep to God; but now bleſſed be God, who hath accepted all my flock as one burnt-offering.

Prov. 15.8.

Againe, the Sheep were conſumed by fire, as to make Job conceive that his former ſervices were rejected, ſo to take him off and diſcourage him from offering any more ſuch ſervices; to make him deſpair of ever thriving in the way of thoſe duties: and conclude ſurely God is ſo angry now, that all my ſervices, all my ſacrifices will never appeaſe him, nor profit me: therefore I were as good lay by theſe duties as perform them, when I get no good. This is a dangerous temptation; if Satan by ſuch prejudices againſt holy duties, can cauſe us to lay them by, the day is won: for then the ſoul is left naked and unarm'd. We have not then ſo much as a bulruſh in our hands to ſmite him, or a paper breſt-plate to ſecure our ſelves. If we give over praying and ſeeking, we have no ground to expect Chriſt either aſſiſting or protecting us. That for the ſecond affliction.

Verſ. 17. While he was yet ſpeaking, there came alſo another, and ſaid, the Caldeans made out three Bands, and fell upon the Camels, and have carried them away, yea, and ſlain the ſervants with the edge of the Sword, and I only am eſcaped alone, to tell thee.

This is the third affliction, the taking away of the Camels, the deſtroying of the ſervants that waited upon them. There is not much to ſtay upon in this, having before opened moſt of the paſſages of it in the 15. verſe.

While he was yet ſpeaking, there came alſo another, and ſaid, the Caldeans made out three Bands.] Caldeans ſometime note a condition or a rank of men, ſuch as were Diviners, Southſayers and Aſtrologers, theſe are in Scripture called Caldeans. As the Indians called ſuch skilful perſons Gymnoſophiſts, and the Perſians called them their Magi, and the Romans called them Augures, ſo the Aſſyrians called them Caldeans. When Nebuchadnezzar dreamed a dream, it is ſaid, that he ſent for the Diviners and the Aſtrologers, and the Caldeans; and afterward the Caldeans take up all, he ſaid to the Caldeans, and the Caldeans ſaid to the King: the Caldeans, were put for all thoſe that undertook the Art of divining and interpreting dreames. But here by the Caldeans, are to be underſtood, not a condition of men, but a Nation of men, or the people inhabiting Chaldea: frequently ſpoken of by the Prophets, and deſcribed to the life by the Prophet Habakkuk, Chap. 1. where the Lord threatned to ſend the Caldeans againſt his people, and then deſcribes them, That haſty and bitter Nation, their Horſes are ſwifter then the Leopard, and more ravening then the evening Wolves: Such a kind of people they were who were ſtirred up by Satan to take away the Camels of Job.

Dan. 2. 3.

Hab. 1. 6, 7.

Theſe are ſaid to make out three Bands to ſpoyl. They were a people like the Sabeans, delighting in war and robbery; ſo much the Etymologie of their Name Chaſdim (which is the word in the Original) implieth, being derived from Sadad, which ſignifieth to rob and ſpoyle. Theſe were a wicked generation, yet theſe prevail over the eſtate of Job. Victory doth not always attend a juſt cauſe. The way of the wicked often proſpers, and the way of theſe wicked Caldeans proſpered ſo often, that the Prophet Habakkuk complains to God as one ſcandaliz'd at it: Thou art of purer eyes then to behold evil, and canſt not look on

on iniquity; wherefore lookeſt thou upon them that deal treacherouſly, and holdeſt thy tongue, when the wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous then he? If ever we ſhould be brought upon a like caſe, to argue it thus with God, or (as Jeremy did, chap. 12. 1.) to plead with God about his judgments, let us remember to eſtabliſh our hearts (before we open our mouthes) with the Prophet Jeremies concluſion in that place, Righteous art thou O Lord, though the wicked devour the man that is more righteous then he. It is very rare that God makes one good man his rod to ſcourge another; he uſually makes the worſt of men his rod, his ſtaffe, his ſword, to inflict either trials or judgments upon his people. The durty Scullion ſcowres the Silver veſſel, and makes it both clean and bright for his maſters uſe.

VERS. 18, 19.

While he was yet ſpeaking, there came alſo another and ſaid, thy Sons and thy Daughters were eating and drinking Wine in their eldeſt Brothers houſe.

And behold there came a great wind from the Wilderneſs, and ſmote the four corners of the houſe, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am eſcaped alone to tell thee.

THis was, as the fourth and laſt, ſo the greateſt of all Satans aſſaults, the moſt fierce and terrible charge that Job had all the day, and Satan reſerves this untill the evening, till Job was ſpent and ſpiritleſs, as he hoped. I ſhall note this in general from it.

That Satan uſually keeps his greateſt ſtrength and moſt violent temptations unto the laſt.

When he thinks we are at the weakeſt, then he cometh with the ſtrongeſt aſſaults. If Satan had ſent Job word of the death of his Children firſt, all the reſt would have been as nothing to him: he would not have regarded the loſs of his Cattel, when he heard that all his Children were cruſhed to death by the fall of the Houſe. As ſome one great evil falling upon us, takes the heart off from having any ſenſe or joy in a leſſer good; ſo one great evil ſwallows up the ſenſe and feeling of a leſſer evil: that great evil which fell upon the Wife of Phineas, when ſhe heard that the Ark of God was taken, afflicted her ſo extreamly, that ſhe could not at all rejoyce in the birth of her ſon, ſhe had no ſenſe of that. Here was therefore the cunning of Satan, leſt Job ſhould have loſt the ſmart of the leſſer afflictions, leaſt they ſnould have been all ſwallowed up in the greater, he brings them out in order, the leaſt firſt, the greateſt is reſerved for the laſt. We obſerve in War, that when once the great Ordnance are diſcharged, the Souldiers are not afraid of the Musket: ſo when a great battery is made by ſome thundring terrible judgment upon the Soul, or upon the Body, or Eſtate of any man; the noyſe and fears of leſſer evils are drown'd and abated. Therefore Satan keeps his greateſt ſhot to the laſt, that the ſmall might be heard and felt, and that the laſt coming in greater ſtrength might find the leaſt ſtrength to reſiſt it.

And that this was a greater affliction then any of, or then all the former, is ſo clear that I ſhall not need to ſtay long in the confirming of it; only to quicken the point a little, take notice of the greatneſs of it in five reſpects.

First, It appeareth without controverſie to be the greateſt of all, becauſe it was upon his Children: a mans Children are more then all that he hath in the world: a mans Children are himſelf, every child is the Father multiplied; a Son is the Fathers bowels: and therefore when Paul wrote to Philemon concerning Oneſimus, whom (ſaith he) I have begotten in my bonds; (ſc. to the faith of Chriſt) Receive him who is mine own bowels: A ſpiritual Son is the very bowels of a Miniſter; he doth but allude to a natural Son, a Son is the very bowels of the Father. This affliction reached unto the very bowels of Job himſelf; Satan had no leave to afflict the body of Job, and yet you ſee he afflicts him in his very bowels.

Phil. v. 12.

Secondly, The greatneſs of it is ſeen in this, his Children were all taken away. To looſe all our children, is as grievous as to looſe an only Child: Now that is made a cauſe of the higheſt ſorrows, Zach. 12. 10. They ſhall mourn for him, as one that mourneth for an only Son: that is, they ſhall mourn moſt bitterly. Now as the meaſure of mercies may be taken by the comforts which they produce; ſo we may take the meaſure of an affliction by the ſorrow which it produceth, and that is the greateſt affliction which cauſeth the greateſt ſorrow.

Thirdly, It was a further greatning of the affliction, that they were all taken away ſuddenly. Had death ſent them a ſummons, by its uſual meſſenger ſickneſs, but a day before to prepare themſelves, it had much ſweetned the bitterneſs of this cup; but to hear they were dead before he knew they were ſick, yea when he thought they were merry and rejoycing, how ſad was this?

Fourthly, That they died a violent death, by a mighty wind caſting the houſe down upon them. Had they died in their beds (though ſuddenly) it had been ſome eaſe to the Fathers heart: violent death had an impreſſion of wrath upon it. And men can hardly judge well of thoſe, who fall by ſuch judgments. Suſpition will ariſe, if cenſure paſs not, from better men then Barbarians, if they ſee a Viper on the hand of a Paul, Act. 28. It is more then probable from our Saviours queſtion, that thoſe eighteen upon whom the Tower of Shiloe fell, and ſlew them, were commonly ſuppoſed greater ſinners, or ſinners, above all men that dwelt in Hieruſalem, Luk. 13. 4.

Fifthly, They were all taken away when they were feaſting; and this did exceedingly aggravate the affliction upon Job, that his Children were all deſtroyed feaſting; for you know what the thoughts of Job were concerning his Children at their feaſting; after they had done, he offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all, for he ſaid, It may be my Sons have ſinned and curſed God in their hearts. Now at this time, when Satan knew that Job was moſt ſolicitous leſt his Children ſhould ſin, at that time doth he deſtroy them; that ſo their Father might be afflicted with the thought, that his Children died unreconciled to God, that they died with ſin upon them unrepented of: That they died a double death, death at once ſeizing upon both ſoul and body. This then was a further degree of Satans malice, to wound, vex and grieve the ſpirit of Job unto the utmoſt. How ſadly and paſſionately did David lament Abſaloms death? Some conceive that this was the head of the Arrow that pierced him, becauſe he feared his Son died in a ſinful condition, he was ſuddenly taken away in his rebellion, unreconciled either to God or man. Such a thought might fall upon Job's heart; my Children are ſuddenly dead, and dead feaſting, it may be they forgot God, it is poſſible they ſinned in feaſting, and curſed God in their hearts: Alas my Children died before they could ſo much as think of death: I fear they are gone rejoycing to Hell, where they ſhall weep for evermore. Doubtleſs Satan did or might faſten ſuch a temptation upon his heart who was ſo tender of his Childrens ſouls, and ſo fearful of their ſinning in feaſting. So then it is clear from all theſe particular conſiderations, that this was the greateſt affliction.

Be prepared then, not only to receive another affliction, but to receive a greater affliction, and have thoughts of receiving the greateſt affliction at the laſt. Satan will come with his ſtrongeſt aſſaults when thou art weakeſt. At the time of death when he ſeeth he can do no more, but that he muſt then do it, or never do it, then thou ſhalt be ſure to have the ſtrongeſt temptations.

It ſhould therefore ſtir up the people of God, ſtill to look for more and more ſtrength to bear afflictions and tentations, and to beg from Chriſt the greateſt ſtrength at laſt, becauſe they may juſtly fear the greateſt temptations at laſt. If as Satan doth greaten his temptations, Chriſt doth greaten his aſſiſtance, we ſhall be able to bear them, and be more then conquerers over them.

So much of this fourth charge in the general; I ſhall now open the words more particularly (for thoſe in the 18. verſe I ſhall not need to ſay any thing of them, they have been handled before at the 13. verſe, which runs thus; And there was a day when his Sons and his Daughters were eating and drinking wine in their Eldeſt Brothers houſe:) The 19. verſe deſcribes the manner of this trial; And behold there came a great wind from the Wilderneſs, &c.

Ecce adverbium demonſtrandi uſurpatur in rebus notabilibus.

And behold.] Ecce, or behold, in Scripture notes more then ordinary matter following. Firſt, Great things call for attention. Secondly, That which is ſudden and unexpected, calls us to behold it. Thirdly, Rare things, things ſeldom seldom seen, invite all to see and wonder at them. Here is matter of admiration: what God threatens in the Law, he seems to fulfil upon Job, I will make their Plagues wonderful. Deut.28.59 There is no Ecce prefixed to any of the former three afflictions; but this as being the most strange and terrible, comes in with Ecce, And behold ——

There came a great Wind.] It was a Wind, and a great Wind that came. The Wind is elegantly said to come (as the Sun) out of his chamber, and rejoycing as a strong man to run a race, Psal. 19. 5. Hence the word which the Latines use for the Wind, is derived from a word that signifies to come; because the Wind comes with force and violence. The Wind (in the nature of it) is an exhalation arising from the Earth, drawn upwards by the power of the Sun and other Heavenly bodies: but meeting and conflicting a while with the cold of the middle region of the Air, is beaten back again; and being so light that naturally it cannot descend, and so resisted that it cannot peaceably ascend, it takes a course between both, slanting with mighty violence through the Air. Thus Philosophers teach. This Wind is said to have been a great Wind: great in quantity, much Wind, a large Wind; great also in quality, a vehement, boistrous, angry Wind.

Ventus à violentia & vehementia nomen habet, quod veniat ebundè, & magna vi irruat in unum aliquem locum. Magir. Phys.

Further, this Wind is described by the Coast or Quarter from which it breathed.

From the Wilderness.] Or as the Hebrew is, from beyond the Wilderness, from the other side of the Wilderness this Wind came.

מעבר המדבר A regione deserti, vel à trans desertum.

Winds are differenced by the quarters or points of the Heavens out of which they blow. This Wind is described by the place from whence it came, from the Coast out of which it was raised, it was from beyond the Wilderness.

There were many Wildernesses. Here Wilderness is set down indefinitely. There was the Wilderness of Maon, and the Wilderness of Ziph, and many other Wildernesses spoken of in Scripture. What Wilderness was this?

It is conceived, that this was either the Wilderness of Idumea, or Edom, spoken of 2 Kings 3. 8. or else it was Arabia the Desart, which is by way of eminency called The Wilderness. It came from the Wilderness, that is, it came over that part which is called Arabia deserta, or Arabia the wild.

When it is said, this Wind came from the Wilderness, the Coast is cleared, but the cause and stirrer up of this Wind is concealed. A Wind came from the Wilderness; but how this Wind was raised, and this storm was blown up, there is no mention. We must charge it on him who was the contriver and directer of all this mischief; Satan, Prince of the Air, raised up this mighty Wind.

Winds are said sometimes to come from God; As Exod. 10. 13. The Lord brought an East-wind upon the Land of Egypt that it was covered with Locusts, (one of the Plagues of Egypt.) And verse 19. The Lord turned a mighty VVest-wind which took away the Locusts. And Numb. 11. 31. There went forth a VVind from the Lord, and brought Quales from the Sea. Jonah 1.4. The Lord sent out a great VVind into the Sea. The Heathens (who divided the World among sundry Gods) gave the Winds to Æolus, whom they supposed to have them all shut up and lockt close in his lodge, till he gave them command to fly abroad. It is an argument of a divine power to rule the Winds. Who is this, say those Sea-men, Matth. 8. 27. that even the Winds and the Sea obey him! As God only causeth the Sun to shine, and the Rain to fall, so the Winds to blow. The Wind is Originally in the hand of God, He gathers the Wind in his fists (saith Agar of God,) and sendeth it which way he pleaseth. Prov. 30.4. But the Winds were put for that present into the hand of Satan, and he had leave to raise a storm for this special purpose. So then, there came a great Wind from beyond the Wilderness, that is, Satan stirred up a mighty Wind in those parts and quarters, which came ——

And smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead.] Here we see what was the work of this Wind. As it is described by the Region from whence the Wind came, so by the effects which it wrought being come; It smote the four corners of the house: The Hebrew word is the same used verse 11. Touch all that he hath. According to Satans sence, this Wind touched the four corners of the house. The corners of the house are the strength of the house, and the four corners are all the strength. Christ is called the corner stone, because he is the strength and binding of the Church, he holds all together. This wind smote the four corners at once. It may seem very strange, that one Wind, a Wind described to come out of one quarter, a Southern wind, as this is conceived to have been, coming from the Wilderness, that this one Wind should strike all the four parts of the house together: must it not be a Wind from the four quarters of Heaven which strikes the four corners of a house? I answer, this was an extraordinay Wind, there was a wonder carried on the wings of this Wind; therefore you have an Ecce of admiration, Behold set in the beginning of this relation; This Wind did not work according to the ordinary rate of Winds. Or we may say, It was a Whirle-wind, that tempestuous Whirle-wind, which Philosophers call Typhon; such a Wind as whirles about in a circle, and so it might fetch in or assault all the parts and corners of the house with one blast. Further, We must take notice, that Satan was in this Wind: He acted and wrought mightily with it for the sure and suddain effecting of this dreadful overthrow, the Devil spirited this Wind. The Wind (though, for the quickness and power of it, called a spirit) is a dull and weak thing compared to a spirit.

There came a great wind from the Wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead.

But what became of his three Daughters? did they escape? They are not named, but they also were involved. It is usual in Scripture, under one Sex, the superiour Sex, to comprise both. All Job's Children perished under the ruines of that falling house. Hence Observe,

First, That Satan being left at his own disposse, can raise and enrage stormes and tempests.

It is said, Psal. 148. 8. That stormy winds and tempests fulfil the will of God. The winds go often on Gods errand; but as often as the Lord gives leave, these stormy winds and tempests fulfil Satans will; not his alone, much less against the will of God. Satan cannot raise so much wind by his own power as will wave a feather; but when God saith go, do such and such things, then the winds likewise fulfil his will: And then he can raise wind enough to move Mountains, and raze the foundations of the proudest and strongest buildings. It is reported that some wicked wretches trade with Witches for winds, they buy winds of the Devil: A most abominable merchandize; and the Lord doth answer them justly, to let them have what they pay for, winds of the Devil; as he speaks in the Prophet, I also will chuse their delusions. Isa. 66. 4. When men will be deluded, and go down to Hell for help, God will chuse their delusions, saying in his wrath, you that think the Devil can give you a wind, the Devil shall give you a wind; a wind by which you shall sayl at once to the port of your hope, and to the pit of desperation; a wind which (unless you repent) will carry you into that lake wherein there is no water, a lake burning for ever, And the breath of the Lord like a stream of brimstone kindling it.

Secondly, Observe here, from the effect of this wind;

That a violent and sudden death, it is no argument of Gods anger or disfavour.

Here all Job's Children were destroyed suddenly and violently, yet it was not in wrath towards the Children, but for a trial unto the Father. When they told Christ of some whose blood Pilate had mingled with their Sacrifices; Think not (saith he) that either these or those upon whom the Tower of Shiloe fell and slew them, were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem; I tell you, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Luk. 13. 1. As there is no judging of the sins of men, by such kind of exigents and events, so neither of the wrath of God; yet how many by such appearances judge unrighteous judgment, being as barbarous as those Barbarians of Malta, who seeing a Viper coming out of the heat, and fastening on Paul's hand, they (concluding he must die presently) censured him to be a murtherer, whom though he had escaped the Sea, yet vengeance followed on shore, and would not suffer to live. Acts 28. 3. We must not ground our judgments upon the works of God, but upon his Word. In externals there is the same event to all, Eccles. 9. Men cannot be distinguish'd for eternity by what they suffer, but by what they do; not by the manner of their death, but by the tenor of their lives. This is a certain truth, That man can never die an evil death, who hath led a good life. There is nothing makes death evil, but the evil which followeth death, or the evil that goes before death.

not

Thirdly, Here was death, a strange and sudden death surpriz'd the Children of Job, and this when they were feasting, when they were eating and drinking wine in their eldest Brothers house. We may observe from that also by way of admonition, Christians had need to take heed, and be holy in feasting.

While we are eating and drinking, we may be dying: therefore eating and drinking, we had need be holy. Take heed to your selves (saith Christ) lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness; take heed lest at any time, because at any time the day may come upon you unawares. That day, whether it be a day of general calamity, or personal, may come upon you unawares. It becomes us to be holy in all manner of conversation, though we had an Assurance of our lives: But seeing in what manner of conversing so ever we be, death may surprise us, and we have no assurance of our lives in our greatest joyes, how holy should-we be? Whether you eat or drink (saith the Apostle) or whatsoever you do, do all to the glory of God. Have God in your eye, let him be your aim. It is propheſied concerning the latter times, That every pot in Jerusalem and Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord. The very pots in Jerusalem shall be holy, that is, men at their pots shall be holy, to note that they should be holy in their eatings, in their drinkings: not holy only when they were praying, and holy when they were hearing, but holy in those ordinary natural actions of eating and drinking, holy at their Tables, and at all their refreshings with the Creature. Then indeed there is holiness in the heart, when there is holiness in the pot; and 'tis but need, there should be holiness in the pot, when there may be death in the pot.

Zach. 14.21

We may observe somewhat more generally from all these four sore afflictions considered together. As first, We see how quickly the beauty of all worldly blessings may be blasted. Job in the morning had an estate, as great and as good as his heart could desire in worldly things; there was lustre and strength in and upon all he had, but before night he had nothing but sorrow to sup upon; he had no retinue of servants left, but four, reserved only to report his losses. In one day all's gone. It is added as an aggravation of Babylons down-fall, that her judgments shall come upon her in one day, Revel. 18.8. Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine, and she shall be utterly burnt with fire, for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her. In one day all the beauty of Babylon shall be blasted. We need not now trouble our selves to think Babylon is in a great deal of strength, and beauty, and glory; surely there must be a long time spent in contriving and acting the destruction of Babylon; no, the Lord can blast her beauty and destroy her power in a day; and the Text saith, he will do so, In one day all her plagues shall come upon her. That which Babylon hath been gathering many years, shall be scattered in a moment. She thinks that by her wisdom and policy she hath laid such a foundation of her own greatness as shall never be shaken; And therefore concludes, I sit a Queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Yet all her strength shall not hold out one day, when God in his displeasure shall lay siege against her walls. So when ye look upon other great and mighty, prosperous and flourishing enemies, such as flourish like green bay trees, remember the Lord in one day can wither their branches and kill their roots, yea root them up. Certainly the strength of the Lord is as mighty for the destroying of his enemies, as it is for the afflicting of his own people: if he sometimes gives Commission to take away all their comforts in a day, when their estates are highest and strongest built; Surely he will at last give Commissions for as speedy a dispatch against the estates of his greatest enemies.

And this may be unto us all, matter of Admonition, to prepare for changes, to esteem creatures as they are, perishing substance. Who ever had an estate better gotten, better bottom'd, or better managed then Job? yet all was overthrown and swept away in a moment. We can never expect too much from God, nor too little from the creature.

Lastly, We may learn from the fore-going story of these afflictions, considering that Satan was the contriver and engineer, who set all a work,

That Satan is mighty both in power and policy for the effecting of his designs, if God give him liberty and leave.

You see he doth not fail nor miss in the least, he brings every affliction upon Job in the perfection of it: and he doth not bungle at it, or do his work by halves, but he is quick and speedy, both in laying the plot and executing it. There is nothing in this inferiour world able to stand before him, no creature, no man, if God let him alone. The good Angels can match, yea and master devils, there is no doubt of that: but if God stop his Angels, and withdraw his hand, the Devil would quickly over-run all the world. We wrestle not with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers. Eph. 6. Evil spirits are called powers in the abstract, they have not only a power, they are not only powerful, (hence called principalities, such as have great authority and soveraignty (as it were) over others) but they are called Powers. It is not an empty title or a naked name that is given them, but they are filled and cloathed with strength proportionable. Satan is a mighty Prince commanding in the spirits of wicked men (there's his throne) he can kindle their lusts and inflame their spirits, set them on fire from Hell, and then cause them to go on with a rage (in doing mischief) as high as heaven. He can lead men captive at his will, though not against their own will. Yet to shew the efficacy of his actings, he is said to lead them captive at his will, to do his will and execute his devilships designs. It is admirable what Satan can do upon wicked men, who are his willing vassals and bond-slaves; if he speak the word, they go; if he suggest, they submit; if he move, they obey. And likewise we see what a mighty Prince he is in the air, all the Elements and the Meteors stoop to his direction. He cannot only command men who have reason, but he can command the fire, the water, the winds, the thunders, therefore he is called the Prince of the powers of the air; those powers that are in the air he can command. For though it be true that Satan of himself cannot make one sparkle of fire, or so much as one breath of wind, yet if he be let loose and unchain'd, he can go to Gods storehouse of wind and fire, he can go to Gods Magazin of thunder, storms and tempests, he can fetch out such store of all these, and so enrage them, that no man is able to withstand their violence.

1 Tim. 2. 26.

Eph. 2. 2.

The Apostle taxes all natural men, that they live without God in the world, that is, they live without a sensible apprehension of the Majesty, of the Power, and Holiness of God, they are not affected with God in the world. I may say in a sence unto many godly men (and it may be a reproof unto them) that they live without the devil in the world, that is, they have not such apprehensions of the power, and policy, and sleights of Satan, as they ought to have. We do not know, or apprehend as we ought, and as we might, who the Devil is, or what his power is. I do not speak this, as if I would have any meditate and pore upon the power of Satan, so as to be afraid of him, that's no part of my intent: but it is for this end, that our hearts might be raised up to bless God, who doth bind up such an enemy, and bound such a power, who if he were let alone, would do us mischief an hundred times in a day: Nay he would unquiet and unsettle the whole world. This is the reason why we should consider the power and policy of Satan, to bless God, who stops the mouth of this Lyon, so that he cannot stir to do that mischief, unto the which his nature doth at once incline and inable him.

Eph. 2. 2.

Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped,
And said, Naked came I out of my Mothers womb; and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the Name of the Lord.
In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

THese three verses contain the third Division of the Chapter, as we shewed in the Analysis of it. We have seen in the first, the character of Job in his prosperous eſtate, and the deſcription of his proſperity. We have ſeen his afflictions in the cauſes, in the time, in the inſtruments, in the matter, and in the manner of inflicting them. In this third part we have the carriage of Job, how Job took it, how he behaved himſelf in this ſad condition. And likewiſe how God took it that Job did ſo behave himſelf. So then,

We may note two things in the general out of theſe three verſes.

1. We have the carriage of Job, his behaviour.
2. We have the teſtimony of God concerning his carriage and behaviour.

The carriage and behaviour of Job is laid down, verſe 20, 21. And concerning his carriage, the Text gives us to conſider,

1. What Job did.
2. What Job ſaid.

Firſt, What he did, and that is in the 20. verſe, and there we find mentioned five diſtinct actions of Job upon the receiving of the relation of his affliction.

1. He aroſe.
2. He rent his mantle.
3. He ſhaved his head.
4. He fell down upon the ground.
5. He worſhipped.

Secondly, What he ſaid, and that is in the 21. verſe, And he ſaid, Naked came I out of my mothers womb, and naked, &c.

His ſayings contain two ſtrong and undeniable argumental Propoſitions, and one clear Concluſion, flowing naturally from them both, or from either of them; by which he doth acquit the Lord in his afflicting of him, and alſo ſupport and ſtrengthen his own ſoul under thoſe afflictions.

The teſtimony of God concerning Job's carriage is in the 22. verſ. The Lord comes in, as it were, like an Umpire to determine who got the day, which is reſolved when he ſaith, In all this Job ſinned not, nor charged God fooliſhly. Theſe words expreſly ſet the Laurel of Victory upon the head of Job. Satan undertook that Job (if touched) would curſe God; now ſaith God, look upon him touch'd, ſee what he hath done, examine all his actions that are paſt, obſerve what he hath ſpoken, weigh every word that hath come out of his mouth in the ballance of truth and reaſon, and when thou haſt done both, tell me whether he hath yet curſed me. I pronounce, that in all he hath done, in all he hath ſaid, Job hath not charged God fooliſhly. That in the general for the ſum of the Context, and for the parts of it.

To begin firſt with what Job did, his actions.

Then Job aroſe and rent his mantle, &c.

Then] Job ſtood out the three former aſſaults unmoveably, but when he had received the fourth, then his bowels were moved, And then, &c.

Job aroſe.] This was his firſt action. To ariſe is properly an act of one that ſitteth; he is ſaid to ariſe, that before did ſit or lie. But yet in Scripture to ariſe, is not alwayes taken ſo ſtrictly, neither is it in this place. To ariſe, in the Scripture language notes two things. Firſt, the ſpeedineſs of doing a thing: when a man doth a thing inſtantly or preſently, he is ſaid to ariſe to do it, to ariſe and do it, though he were ſtanding or walking before. This is an Hebraiſm, He aroſe and rent his mantle, that is, He preſently rent his mantle upon the hearing of theſe meſſages, eſpecially the laſt. And ſo you have the word in divers places, as Judg. 20. 18. The Children of Iſrael aroſe, and went to the Houſe of the Lord; that is, they went preſently up to the Houſe of the Lord, 2 Sam. 14. 31. Then Joab aroſe and went to Abſolom; the meaning is only this, that upon the receiving of that Meſſage, he went with ſpeed, he made no delayes: And Nehem. 2. 18. when Nehemiah exhorted them to the great work of building the Houſe of the Lord, the people ſhewing their willingneſs and readineſs, expreſt it thus, Let us riſe up and build, that is, let us build (as we ſay) out of hand, ſpeedily.

Secondly, To ariſe, implies the courage, conſtancy and ſtrength of thoſe who undertake or go about a buſineſs, they ariſe and do it, that is, they do it with ſpirit: So here it may import as much concerning Job in his ſufferings, He aroſe and rent his mantle, that is, though he heard all theſe ſad relations, yet his ſpirit was not overwhelmed, he was not drowned in thoſe ſorrows, he did not ſink down under them, but he aroſe and rent his mantle, &c. as if he had raiſed himſelf up to wreſtle with the temptation and the tempter, to wreſtle with Satan himſelf. In this ſenſe the Lord is ſaid to riſe, Iſa. 33. 8, 9. where there is that ſad deſcription of the Land, The Earth mourneth and languiſheth, Lebanon is aſhamed, &c. now will I riſe, ſaith the Lord, now will I be exalted; that is, now will I come and ſhew my ſelf with a mighty power for the deliverance of my people. I will be exalted, and they ſhall rejoyce. That Prayer of the old Church, Ariſe, O Lord, and let thine enemies be ſcattered, hath the ſame intendment, deſiring the Lord to go forth armed with ſtrength for the help of his people and the ſubduing their enemies. Thus Job aroſe, bound with a fourfold cord of affliction: he raiſed himſelf up like Sampſon, though in humility, yet with ſtrength and courage. And ſo it is oppoſed to the ſinking of the ſpirit under troubles, as you know the ſpirit of Eli did, 1 Sam. 4. 18. There was ſad tidings brought to Eli concerning the death of his Sons, and the taking of the Ark; the Text ſaith, As ſoon as he heard theſe things, he fell down backward, he had no ſpirit, no ſtrength left in him, he did not ariſe and rend his garment, but he ſunk down and brake his neck. When Nabal heard of the danger that his churliſh and inhoſpitable anſwer had almoſt drawn upon him, 1 Sam. 25. 37. His heart died within him, and he became as a ſtone. When all that Job had, was dead and gone, his heart lived, yea he was (erecto animo) of a raiſed ſpirit, not only when he aroſe, but when he fell upon the ground: for then he worſhipped, and worſhip is the lifting up of the ſoul to God: In the worſhip of God while the body is upon the knee, the mind is or ought to be upon the wing.

And rent his mantle.] That is the ſecond act. Renting of garments is very often ſpoken of in Scripture, and we find it eſpecially in theſe two caſes. In caſe of extream ſorrow, and in caſe of extream indignation.

In caſe of extream ſorrow, and that of two kinds; either in the ſorrows of afflictions, or in the ſorrows of repentance; in both theſe we find renting of the garments.

For the ſorrows of outward affliction; ſo we read frequently of renting garments: When Jacob heard of the death of Joſeph, when his Sons brought him home the bloody Coat, ſaying (but falſely) that ſurely their brother was torn with wild beaſts; he preſently rent his garment. And when the relation of the death of Saul was brought to David's ear, to expreſs his ſorrow, He took hold on his clothes and rent them, and likewiſe all the men that were with him: And ſo again afterward at the funeral of Abner, David rent his clothes, and gave order to all the people that were with him to do the like. In great funerals or fatal mournings, it was uſual among the Hebrews to rent their garments. This alſo was a frequent cuſtom among the Heathen, as the Poet deſcribes a Mourner in his mixt lamentations for private and publick loſſes; he went with his garments torn, being aſtoniſhed at the death of his Wife and the ruine of the City. Many ſuch Inſtances there are amongſt their ancient Hiſtorians.

Herodotus l. 1. records the like geſtures among the Lacedemonians. And Livy among the Sabines. l. 1. 2 Chron. 34. 20.

Secondly, It was uſed in token of Repentance, when ſorrows for ſin brake forth and multiplied, Joſh. 7. 6. When Joſhua humbled himſelf upon the defeat, flight and ſlaughter of the Iſraelites before Ai, it is ſaid, He rent his clothes, and fell to the earth: This renting of their garments was in reſpect of the outward affliction, but withall in token of repentance; for Joſhua and the people humbled themſelves with faſting. So when the Book of the Law was read to Joſiah, and he ſaw how far they had departed from the rule and word of God, it is ſaid, He rent his clothes, and he was afraid, he humbled himſelf, and his heart was tender before God.

But it may be objected, that in Joel 2. v. 13. when we are exhorted to rent the heart, we are ſtopp'd from renting the garment, Rent your hearts, and not your garments, in the caſe of Repentance.

For anſwer to that I ſay, the Not there is not an abſolute prohibition of renting the garment, it is not ſo much a negation, as a direction, Rent your hearts, and not your garments, that is, Rent your hearts rather then your garments, or, Rent your hearts more then your garments, or, be ſure that you rent your hearts whatſoever you do with your garments. Negations do not alwayes quite deny a thing; In the 2 Cor. 3. 6. take an Inſtance for it, where the Apoſtle treating treating of the preheminence of the Gospel in the new dispensation, saith, Who hath made us able Ministers, not of the letter, but of the Spirit. Not, there doth not deny, as if the Ministers of Christ did not speak and publish the letter of the word: for the letter of the word is the vessel wherein the Spirit is contained, and unless we speak the letter to the ear, the Spirit cannot in an ordinary way come into the heart; therefore understand the Apostles meaning thus, He hath made us able Ministers, not of the letter, but of the Spirit; that is, he hath made us Ministers rather of the Spirit then of the letter, or more of the Spirit then of the letter, because of the promise of the plentiful effusion of the Spirit, after the ascension of Christ.

A further Instance we have in that speech of God, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice; that is, rather mercy then sacrifice. Sacrifice is not rejected, but mercy is preferr'd. So Rent your hearts, and not your garments, that is, rather rent your hearts then your garments: For otherwise you find that not only it was lawful (as in the former places) in times of repentance and sorrow to rend the garments, but they are taxed because they did not repent and rend their garments. The not renting the garment is charged as a
Jer. 36. 24. conviction of an unrent heart. When the roll of curses that Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah was read before Jehojakim and his Courtiers, the King cut the roll with a pen-knife and cast it into the fire, their impenitence is thus described, Yet they were not afraid, nor rent their garments, neither the King, nor any of his servants, that heard all those words. As if it had been said, this was a time that called them aloud to rend their garments, to humble themselves and repent before the Lord, when they heard such words as these (cloathed with their own sin and Gods wrath) read unto them; but they did it not; Yet they were not afraid, neither did they rend their garments. So then, renting of the garment was used as a ceremony of repentance, as a shadow of godly sorrow; It had nothing in it self to move God, only it testified the greatness of their grief, that their hearts did rend as their garments were rent.

Further, Renting of the garment was used in case of extream indignation. Indignation is anger and sorrow boyl'd up to the height; it is as it were the extract and spirit of them both: And it is stirr'd especially when the ear of a man is filled with a voyce of blasphemy, or his eye with a spectacle of bold transcendent wickedness against the Lord. Word being brought to Hezekiah of the blasphemy that Rabshakeh had belched out against God, when he heard how 1 King. 19. 1. Isa. 37. 1. he had reproached the living God, in saying, who is the God of Jerusalem that he should deliver it out of my hand? the Text saith, that Hezekiah rent his clothes with indignation; that report fill'd him with a mixture of grief and anger; he was grieved that the holy Name of God was blasphemed, he was angry with the blasphemer: these caused holy indignation, and this the renting of his garments.
Acts 14. 13. Thus also when Paul and Barnabas had restored the Criple at Lystra, the superstitious Lystrians would have done sacrifice to them as Gods; which when the Apostles Paul and Barnabas heard of, and saw the preparations (Oxen and Garlands brought to the Gates) for that abominable Idolatry, They rent their clothes, and run in among the people, saying, Sirs, why do you these things? we also are men of like passions with you. They rent their clothes with indignation, being grieved and vext to see men so besotted, and God so dishonoured.

This act of Job in the Text, renting his garments, may refer to either of these, it may refer to all these. If it be demanded why did Job rend his garments? I answer, first, He rent his garments for the greatness of that sorrow that was upon him in regard of his outward affliction. Secondly, He rent his garments, to testifie his deep humiliation under the hand of God, with repentance for all his sins. Thirdly, He rent his garments, being filled with indignation at those blasphemies which Satan suggested to him: This latter I clear thus; you know it was the main design, the very plot of Satan to provoke Job to blaspheme God, do this saith he, Touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face. He did promise this to himself, and did undertake with God to bring Job to that height of impatience. If so, then there is no question, but as these messengers of sorrow came to him, so Satan came with them, and pointed every message with this or the like poysonous suggestions. Now see what a Master you serve, now blaspheme God; why shouldest thou make scruple of thinking, or of speaking evil of him, who hath poured out all these evils upon thee? Never stand so much upon his honour, who stands so little upon thy comfort. It is no question but Satan provok'd Job in some such manner. He was not wise to promote his own ends, unless he did ply him with temptations to blasphemy. Now Job being most sensible of these temptations, it being to him (as afterwards to holy David, Psal. 42. 10.) as a Sword in his bowels, while the Enemy said unto him, Where is now thy God, he arises with indignation and soul-abhorrence of these injections, rending his garments, &c. That for the second act. The third follows.

And shaved his head.] Shaving of the head was used sometimes to express sorrow, sometimes to express bondage, and I find it used in Scripture in opposition to both these, sc. in times of joy and liberty.

First, Shaving of the head was used as a note of sorrow, Isa. 15. 2. The Lord speaking by his Prophet of the great affliction that should come upon the Jews, saith, On all their heads shall be baldness, and every beard cut off; that is, they shall mourn, that's the meaning of it. And Isa. 22. 12. In that day did the Lord God of Hosts call to weeping, and to mourning, and to baldness; that is, to shaving of themselves or cutting off their hair; the meaning of it in joyning baldness and mourning was only this, to shew that there should be extream sorrow and mourning in the Land; The Lord called to mourning and baldness, that is, to an exceeding great mourning, such as those mournings used to be when they shaved their heads. And the Prophet puts in this as an aggravation of their sin, that when the Lord called for such a mourning as was joyned with baldness and shaving the head; that then there should be joy and gladness, slaying Oxen, and killing Sheep, eating flesh, and drinking wine. See this more clear, Jer. 7. 29. when the Prophet fore-shews the great affliction of Jerusalem, he thus bespeaks them, Cut off thine hair, O Jerusalem, and cast it away, and take up a lamentation. To add one instance more, Mic. 1. 16. In case of their sore affliction, the Prophet saith, Make thee bald and pole thee for thy delicate Children, enlarge thy baldness as the Eagle: The meaning of all is, mourn bitterly, or mourn greatly for thy delicate Children; thy delicate and sweet Children they are destroyed, mourn greatly for them, enlarge thy baldness as the Eagle; As the Eagle, because the Eagle (as Naturalists observe) casteth her feathers, and her head is many times quite bald, therefore it is said here, enlarge thy baldness as the Eagle, that is, be exceeding bald, cut off all thy hair in that great mourning. We may illustrate this by a contrary rule given by this Prophet Jeremy, and likewise by Ezekiel, when mourning was forbidden, Jer. 16. 6. where he speaks of some that should die and have none to mourn for them, he saith, They shall not lament for them, nor make themselves bald for them, Ezek. 24. 17. Make no mourning for the dead; what followeth? Bind the tire of thine head upon thee; when they should keep on their hair, their tire, that was an argument that there was no mourning.

Further we find, that the cutting off the hair, the shaving of the head, was a sign of bondage and reproach. When
2 Sam. 10. 4. David sent Messengers to Hanun, Samuel records, that Hanun took the Messengers and shaved off the one half of their beards, and cut off their garments in the middle, and the men were exceedingly ashamed; now the shame was not only because their beards were half cut off; for if that had been all, they might quickly have cut off the other half, and have delivered themselves from the shame; for they were at liberty: but it is therefore said that the men were greatly ashamed, because amongst them it was a mark of shame and slavery to be shaven. Hereupon David giveth order that they should tarry at Jericho, till their beards were grown; it was a dishonour to be shaved: And it is noted in Plutarch concerning Demosthenes, that when he had a mind to sit close at his study, and would not go abroad, or be interrupted by visits of friends at home, that he would shave himself, that so he might be ashamed to go forth or see any body, but be constrained to keep to his Book for two or three months together, till his hair were grown again: The bondage and reproach that Nebuchadnezzar brought upon Tyrus is thus described, Every head was made bald. And Aristotle observes, that the hair was a token of liberty. Thus the ſhaving of the head in Job might be a ſign both of his ſorrow and great reproach that was come upon him, being one now that was ready to be mocked and made the ſcorn and by-word of the world, as we ſee afterward he was, during this affliction.
Ezek. 29. 18. Crinis est libertatis argumentum. Arist. 1. Rhetor.

Yet it is conſiderable from Scripture example, that the cutting off the hair, and ſhaving of the head, had not alwayes either of theſe ſignifications hitherto diſcuſs'd, but did vary according to the diverſity of places and of times. In the Book of Geneſis, we read that cutting and ſhaving of the hair, was a token of joy and liberty both together. When Joſeph was delivered out of priſon, it is ſaid, That he ſhaved himſelf, and came to Pharaoh. And it is noted concerning Mephiboſheth, as a matter of his ſorrow for David's abſence, that he let his hair grow. He trimmed not his beard, being much troubled at the Kings abſence. I confeſs neither of theſe Inſtances come home enough to the point: both of theſe neglecting the care and culture of their bodies in their troubles, now being delivered, prepare themſelves by ſhaving and trimming the hair for the preſence of thoſe Kings. But in ſome Nations, ſhaving hath been a mark of Honour; All the Roman Emperors were ſhaved, till Nero. And it was an ancient Proverb, Thou art a ſlave, for thou wearest locks or long hair.

2 Sam. 19. 24.

Aul. Gel. l. 3 c. 4. Servus es & comam habes.

There is an Objection that may be made concerning this act of Job, (becauſe afterward it is ſaid, That in all this Job ſinned not) whether or not Job might ſhave his head without ſin? for you have an expreſs rule to the contrary, Lev. 19. 27. chap. 21. 5. You ſhall not round the corners of your heads, neither ſhalt thou mar the corners of thy beard. And ſo you have it again in Deut. 14. 1. that they ſhould not cut their hair, or make any baldneſs upon their heads for the dead, namely, by ſhaving or cutting off the hair. How is it therefore here that Job ſhaved himſelf for the death of his children, and in regard of thoſe great troubles that were upon him?

I anſwer briefly for that, firſt, Job lived (as we have cleared when we ſpake of the book in general) before that Law was given, which did prohibit the cutting of the hair in that manner.

Secondly, It appears in thoſe places, where thoſe Laws are ſet down, that the Lord did forbid only conformity to the Heathen; they muſt not ſhave or cut themſelves, as the Heathen did, who cut their heads round like a globe (as it is obſerved concerning them) and were wont to dedicate their locks to their Idol-gods. That vain faſhion and groſs ſuperſtition were the things forbidden in that Law of Moſes.

Vovebant cincinnos in honorem deorum. Heſych.

Thirdly, Though the Jews were forbidden to ſhave their heads, as mourning for the death of their friends; yet (in the judgment of learned Junius) the ſhaving of their heads was not only permitted, but commanded in caſe of mourning for ſin, or in times of ſolemn repentance and humiliation. He inſtanceth in two places before mentioned. Firſt, The Prophet Iſaiah reproving the unſeaſonable mirth and deſperate ſecurity of the Jews in a time of publick trouble and treading down, tells them, In that day did the Lord God of Hoſts call to weeping, and to mourning, and to baldneſs, and to girding with ſackcloath, Iſa. 22. 12. Secondly, There is counſel given anſwerable to that reproof by the Prophet Micah, chap. 1. 16. Make thee bald, and pole thee for thy delicate children, enlarge thy baldneſs as the Eagle, for they are gone into captivity from thee.

Etſi calvitium induci pro mortuo interdictum eſt in lege, tamen certum eſt in ſanctæ reſipiſcentiæ calvitium probari atque imperari. Jun. in Iſa. 22. 12.

We will obſerve ſomething from theſe two actions, the renting of his garments, and the ſhaving of his head. Theſe refer to the expreſſion of his ſorrow for thoſe loſſes in eſtate and the death of his Children: As the other two actions, his falling upon the ground and worſhipping refer to the expreſſion of that homage and honour that he tendred up to God in the midſt of theſe ſorrows. From thoſe two acts of ſorrow learn we,

First, That when the hand of God is upon us, it becometh us to be ſenſible of it, and to be humbled under it.

Job hearing theſe ſad relations, doth not ſtand out ſtoutly, as if nothing had touch'd him: but to ſhew that ſorrow did even rend his heart, he rent his garments; to ſhew that his affliction touch'd his ſpirit, he ſhav'd his head. There are two extreams that we are carefully to avoid in times of affliction; and the Apoſtle doth caution all the Sons of God againſt them both in one verſe, Heb. 12. 5. My ſon, deſpiſe not thou the chaſtening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him. Thoſe are the two extreams, deſpiſing and fainting when God doth correct. He would not have us deſpiſe his chaſtening, to ſay, I do not regard this, let God take all if he will: If my eſtate muſt go, let it go; if my children die, let them die; this is a deſpiſing of the chaſtening of the Lord, and God cannot bear it, that we ſhould bear it thus lightly. There is another extream, that is, fainting: If when goods are taken away, the heart be taken away; and when children die, then the ſpirit of the Parent dies too; this is fainting. Take heed of theſe two extreams. Job walks in the middle, in the golden mean between them both. He doth not careleſly deſpiſe, neither doth he unbelievingly faint: he riſeth up, and he rents his garments. He would have it known that he fainted not under the ſtroke, and he would have it known that he felt the ſtroke; he was not like a ſtock or a ſtone, he would not carry it with a Stoical apathy, but with Chriſtian fortitude and magnanimity. Senſleſs ones are taxed, Jer. 5. 3. Thou haſt ſtricken them, and they have not grieved. Such are compared by Solomon to him that lies down in the midſt of the Sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a maſt; ſecure and careleſs in the greateſt dangers. They have ſtricken me, ſhalt thou ſay, and I was not ſick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not, Prov. 23. 34, 35. The Prophet Hoſea reproves the like; Strangers (ſaith he) have devoured his ſtrength, and he knoweth it not; yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him, and he knoweth it not, ch. 7. 9. That is, he is in an afflicted, in a declining condition, and yet he layeth it not to heart. A man may out of the greatneſs of his ſpirit (but not out of the careleſneſs of his ſpirit) ſay as Luther once did, when things went very ill, If the World will go thus, let it go thus. Otherwiſe it is a moſt unbecoming temper to be ſtricken of God, and not to tremble, at leaſt to take it to heart. When God afflicteth us, then we ſhould afflict our ſelves, and be humbled: when Gods hand is upon us, our hands (in this ſence) ſhould be upon our ſelves: We muſt bear our croſs upon our backs, we muſt not make a fire of it to warm our hands. Indeed the Apoſtle exhorts to rejoyce in tribulation, and it is an excellent thing to rejoyce in tribulation; but we muſt not ſlight, much leſs make a ſport of tribulation. Rejoycing ariſeth from a holy ſatisfaction that the ſoul hath in the dealings of God with us: But ſleighting ariſeth from an unholy contempt, or at the beſt from a ſtupid inſenſibleneſs of Gods dealings with us. The former hath in it the height of wickedneſs, and the latter hath not the leaſt degree of goodneſs. It is no vertue to bear what we do not feel.

Secondly, Obſerve, That in times of affliction we may expreſs our ſorrows by outward geſtures, by ſorrowful geſtures.

Job was not only ſorrowful, but he acts ſorrow, he puts himſelf into mourning poſtures, he rents his garments, he ſhaves his head, down he falleth upon the ground. It is no hypocriſie to appear what we are: it is hypocriſie to appear what we are not. We uſe to ſay, he mourneth truly that mourneth without a garment; but if a man mourn in truth, a mourning garment is comely. To mourn in our clothes, and laugh in our ſleeves, is both ſinful and baſe. Now Job mourned indeed; the ſhaving his head, and renting his garment, was but to keep an outward correſpondence with what he was within. Therefore take heed of cenſuring thoſe, who in great ſorrows uſe ſorrowful geſtures, ſtriking upon their breaſts, tearing their hair, or the like. Only let all take heed of exceſſive and immoderate mourning; mourn not like Rachel, who would receive no comfort; mourn not like the Heathen, who had no hope. To be above paſſions will be our happineſs in Heaven, to rectifie paſſions is much of our happineſs on earth: To be without natural affections, is to fall below a man; to ſteer and mannage them, is one of the heights of a Chriſtian.

Thirdly, We ſhewed, that this renting of his garments might have reference to his repentance: whence note,

That when God afflicteth us with ſufferings, we ought to afflict our ſelves, to humble our ſouls for ſin.

Smarting times are good repenting times, and worldly ſorrow ſhould get the company of godly ſorrow. It is not safe to be alone with worldly sorrow, that works death; but if we mingle a few tears for sin, and our unkindness to Christ with those tears, then they will refresh us. We get by losses in our outward estate, when they lead us to look to the losses, and repair the breaches of our spiritual estate. No question but Job at this time fell a searching of his heart, and a trying of his wayes, renewing his repentance, and assuring of his peace with God. When afflictions cause us to return thus into our own breasts, they have then a sweet influence, a blessed operation upon us.

Lastly, Observe, That thoughts of blasphemy against God should be cast off, and rejected with the highest indignation.

Job rent his garments, when Satan sollicits Job to rent the name of God with reproach and cursings. Thoughts dishonouring God must needs be vexing to every good heart. Nothing touches a godly man, like that which touches God. When the glory of God is engaged and concern'd, he cannot contain. So much for those two acts, He rent his garments, and he shaved his head.

The two other acts are,

1. He falleth upon the ground. 2. He worshippeth.] The Original words do both signifie a bowing to the ground; He fell upon the ground, and bowed; so some translate it; you shall see the reason by and by: He fell upon the ground and worshipped, that is, He fell upon the ground to worship. To fall upon the ground is a gesture of worship; and not only is it a posture of worship, when the worshipper mourns; but it is likewise a posture of worship, when the worshipper rejoyceth. Great joy as well as great sorrow transports a man in his next actions. It is said, Matth. 2. 10, 11. that the wise men, when they found Christ, rejoyced with exceeding great joy, and presently, they fell down, and worshipped him. Neither is this posture peculiar to worship in times or upon occasions of extraordinary joy and sorrow, (unless in the degree of it) for the ordinary invitation was, O come let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord our Maker, Psal. 95. 6. I said, in the degree, for to fall down is more then to bow down. Falling down in worship proceeds not only from sorrow, but from joy; when the heart is filled with joy, then we fall down and worship. And it is probably * observed, that the ancient Prophets and holy men, the Servants of God, were called Nephalim (from Nephal, which is the Original word of the Text) Cadentes or Prostrantes, that is, prostrates or fallers, because in their worship they usually fell upon the Earth to humble themselves before God. And because adoration was so commonly made by falling to the ground, by bowing the head, by bowing the knee, by bowing the whole body, therefore the same Original word which the Hebrews use for worshipping, doth properly signifie to bow down the body. And that phrase to bow the body, as it is often joyned with worshipping; so sometime to bow the body, put alone, doth signifie to worship, 2 Kings 5. 18. When I bow my self in the house of Rimmon, scil. when I worship, &c. So likewise the Greek word to worship hath the same sence in it, for that word signifies (as a learned Writer observes upon it) to bow after the manner of dogs, that crouch at the feet of their Masters for favour, or for fear. So in worship, the people of God crouch down and abase themselves at Gods feet, as not worthy in themselves to eat the crumbs under his Table.

Yet we are not to look upon this, as if it were the only true and acceptable worship-gesture; for we shall find in Scripture, that there were worship-gestures with which God was well pleased. Some have worshipped God standing, some sitting, some walking; all these are worship-postures. For standing, we find it, 1 King. 8. 22. at the Dedication of the Temple; Solomon stood before the Altar of the Lord, and made that Prayer. For sitting, we have, 2 Sam. 2. 18. When Nathan brought that Message unto David, concerning the building of the House of God, that it should be deferred till his Sons time, the Text saith, That David went in, and sate before the Lord, and said, Who am I, O Lord? And in the end, he saith, Therefore have I found in my heart to pray this prayer unto thee. We also find walking in Prayer, Gen. 24. 63. Isaac went into the field to pray. He walked and prayed; we translate it, to meditate; but in the margin of your books, you find it, to pray, as being nearer the Hebrew. So that walking, and sitting, and standing, are likewise praying-gestures, or postures of holy worship: But chiefly that posture of bowing down the body, or bending the knee, is the worship-posture; so it follows in the Text.

He fell upon the ground, and worshipped.

And worshipped.] To worship, is to give to any one the honour due unto him: So the rendring unto God that Love, that Fear, that Service, that Honour which is due unto him, is the worshipping of God; that is the Scripture-definition, Psal. 29. 2. Give unto the Lord the honour due unto his Name: Then follows, by way of exposition, Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness; that is, in his holy Temple, in his beautiful Sanctuary, or, in the comely honour of his Sanctuary. So that worship is the tendring of honour to the Lord, in a way honourable to him; namely, according to his own will and laws of worship: which is intimated by coming to worship him in his beautiful Sanctuary, where all things about the Service of God were exactly prescribed by God. And then there was beauty or comely honour in the Sanctuary, when all things were ordered there by the rule of his prescription; varying and departing from which, would have filled that holy place with darkness and deformity, notwithstanding all the outward lustre and beauty had been preserved.

The worship of God is twofold; there is internal worship, and there is external worship. Internal worship, is to love God, to fear God, and to trust upon him; these are acts of inward worship, these are the sum of our duty, and Gods honour, contained in the first Commandment: And so you may understand worship in the Text: Job fell down and worshipped; that is, presently upon those reports, he put forth an act of love and holy fear, acts of dependance and holy trust upon God, in his Spirit, saying to this effect within himself, Lord, though all this be come upon me, yet I will not depart from thee, or deal falsly in thy Covenant. I know thou art still the same Jehovah, true, holy, gracious, faithful, all-sufficient; and therefore behold me prostrate before thee, and resolving still to love thee, still to fear thee, still to trust thee; thou art my God still, and my portion for ever. Though I had nothing left in the world, that I could call mine, yet thou, Lord, alone art enough, yet thou alone art all. Such doubtless was the language of Job's heart, and these were mighty actings of inward worship.

Then likewise there is external worship, which is the sum of the second Commandment, and it is nothing else but the serving of the Lord according to his own Ordinances and institution, in those several wayes wherein God will be honoured and served; this is outward worship; and as we apply our selves unto them, so we are reckon'd to worship God. Job worshipped God outwardly by falling to the ground, by pouring out supplications, and by speaking good words of God (as we read afterward) words tending to his own abasement, and the honour of God, clearly and fully acquitting and justifying the Lord in all those workes of his Providence and dispensations towards him.

This is worship both internal and external. Internal worship is the chief; but God requireth both: and there is a necessity of joyning both together, that God may have honour in the world. Internal worship is compleat in it self, and pleasing unto God without the external: The external may be compleat in it self, but is never pleasing to God, without the internal. Internal worship pleases God most, but external honours God most; for by this God is known, and his Glory held forth in the world. External worship is Gods Name. Hence the Temple was called the place where God put his Name, sc. his worship; by which God is known, as a man, by his name: They that worship God, must worship him in spirit and in truth: In spirit; that is, with inward love and fear, reverence and sincerity. In truth; that is, according to the true rule prescribed in his word. Spirit respects the inward power, Truth the outward form. The former strikes at hypocrisie, the latter strikes at Idolatry: The one opposes the inventions of our heads, the other, the looseness of our hearts in worship.

Observe further, that it is only said, Job fell down and worshipped; nothing is said of the Object to whom he did direct his worship, or whom he did worship. The Object is not exprest, but understood, or presupposed, ſuppoſed: And indeed worſhip is a thing ſo proper and peculiar to God, that when we name worſhip, we muſt needs underſtand God; for nothing but God, or that which we make a god, is, or can be worſhipped. Either he is God whom we worſhip, or (as much as in us lies) we make him one. What Creature ſoever ſhares in this honour, this honour (ipſo facto) ſets it up above, and makes it more then a Creature.

The very Heathens thought every thing below a God, below worſhip: therefore there needed not an expreſſion of the Object. When the Text ſaith, Job worſhipped, that implies his worſhip was directed unto God; yet there is a kind of worſhip which is due to Creatures.

There is a Civil worſhip mentioned in Scripture, as well as Divine worſhip. Civil worſhip may be given to men. And there is a twofold Civil worſhip (ſpoken of in Scripture.) There is a Civil worſhip of duty, and there is a Civil worſhip of courteſie: That of duty, is from Inferiors to their Superiors, from Children to their Parents, from Servants to their Maſters, from Subjects to Kings and Magiſtrates. Theſe gods muſt have Civil worſhip; as, Gen. 48. 11. When Joſeph came into the preſence of Jacob his Father, he bowed down to the ground; this was a Civil worſhip, and a worſhip of duty, from an Inferiour to a Superiour. And it is ſaid of the Brethren of Judah, Gen. 49. 8. When Jacob on his Death-bed bleſſed the twelve Tribes, Thy Brethren ſhall worſhip thee, or, bow down to thee. It is the ſame word uſed here in this Text. Judah's honour was to wield the Scepter; the government was laid upon his ſhoulders: now he being the chief Magiſtrate, all the reſt of the Tribes, all his Brethren muſt worſhip him, or give Civil honour unto him.

Secondly, There is likewiſe a worſhip of Courteſie; which is from Equals: when one Equal will bow to another, or when a Superiour (as ſometimes in courteſie he will) bows down or worſhips his Inferiour: As it is noted concerning Abraham, that when he came before the men of the Countrey of Heth, he bowed himſelf; now Abraham was the Superiour, he was a Prince and a Great man; yet coming before the men of the Countrey, he bowed himſelf: and it is the ſame word. Gen. 23. 12.

So then this Civil worſhip may lawfully be given unto men: But as for Divine worſhip, that is proper and peculiar unto God; that Glory he will not give to graven Images, Man or Angel, and therefore we muſt not. Hence we find, that when Cornelius and John did act their Civil worſhip a little too far, they were preſently taken off, for fear they ſhould intrench upon the Divine worſhip. Civil worſhip, when it is exceſſive, and goeth too far, is ſinful; as in Acts 10. 25. Luke relates, that as ſoon as Peter came in, Cornelius met him, and fell at his feet, and worſhipped him: the worſhip was to Peter; for we are not to think that Cornelius was ſo groſly ignorant, as to take Peter for a god, and to give him Divine worſhip; but the meaning of it is, that he fell down at his feet, and gave him an honour and reſpect beyond what he ought to have done, he was exceſſive in it; therefore Peter takes him off: Stand up (ſaith he) I my ſelf alſo am a man; I am a man as thou art, though an Apoſtle, give me ſuch reſpect as becometh a Miniſter of Chriſt; take heed that you give me no more then belongeth to a man. So the Angel, Rev. 22. 8. When John falleth down at his feet and worſhippeth, he takes him up; See thou do it not, ſaith he, for I am thy fellow-ſervant: This is too much for man, worſhip God, as it is in the end of the Verſe; ſuch worſhip belongeth properly and peculiarly unto God.

So much for the opening of theſe two latter actions of Job in reference unto God. We ſhall now give you ſome Obſervations. He fell down upon the ground, and worſhipped. You ſee how Job divides himſelf and his Affections in this time of his affliction; part he beſtowed upon his Children and Servants, and Loſſes, they ſhall have his ſorrow and tears; He rent his mantle, and ſhaved his head; but they ſhall not have all: God ſhall have the better part, his love, his fear, his truth, his body to bow to him, and his ſoul to worſhip him. Learn from hence, Impendit liberis & ſervis luctum, Deo proſtrationem & adorationem Pined. in loc.

That, A godly man will not let Nature work alone, he mixes or tempers acts of Grace with acts of Nature.

We muſt not ſorrow as thoſe that are without hope (ſaith the Apoſtle) qualifie ſorrow with hope; theſe mixt, do well. A man muſt not ſorrow for outward things, as though we had nothing elſe to do, but to ſorrow; he muſt remember he hath a God to worſhip and honour. Job beſtows ſomewhat upon his Children, but more upon his God; while his body fell to the Earth, his heart was raiſed up to Heaven: He fell down and worſhipped.

Secondly, Obſerve, That, Afflictions ſend the people of God home unto God; Afflictions draw a godly man nearer unto God: Then Job fell down and worſhipped.

Afflictions are a great advantage to the ſervants of God; for when the world frowns moſt, then they beg moſt for the ſmiles of God; when the world is ſtrange to them, and will not look on them, then they get more familiarity, and cloſer communion with God, they ſeek his face. Wicked men in their afflictions, in their ſorrows, are either quite drowned in, and overwhelmed with them, ſo that there is nothing but ſorrow, as we ſay, a la mort; or elſe they go out to help themſelves with worldly refreſhments; trouble drives them to ſin, it may be as low as Hell, to ſeek relief. The more poor they are, the more wicked they are; ſuch are not poor as Job, though they are as poor as Job. Job's poverty ſent him to God, rich in mercy. He fell down and worſhipped.

Thirdly, Learn, That, That the people of God turn all their afflictions into Prayers, or into Praiſes.

When God is ſtriking, then Job is praying; when God is afflicting, then Job falls to worſhipping. Grace makes every condition work Glory to God, as God makes every condition work good to them who have Grace.

Job falleth down and worſhippeth: Whence obſerve,

Fourthly, That, It becometh us to worſhip God in an humble manner.

Though God (as we ſhewed before) may be worſhipped in another poſture, yet we ſhould rather chooſe that poſture which is moſt humble, and may lay our bodies as low as our ſouls, if it may be. There were ſome lately amongſt us, who cried aloud, as great Patrons for humble poſtures in worſhip; and all were cenſured for a ſtiffe neck and an Elephants knee, who refuſed to bow with them, or to bow their way. I may well add, their way; for Gods way of bowing, was neither queſtioned, nor refuſed; all their humility in bowing, went but one way; they muſt bow towards the Eaſt, and towards the Altar at leaſt, if not to it. Some of their ſtomacks, I believe, would have digeſted that before this time, eſpecially, being a little helped with a diſtinction.

Laſtly, We may here obſerve, That, Divine worſhip it is Gods peculiar.

Papiſts have worſhip for Creatures, and they have a diſtinction for it, but no Scripture for it. They tell us of Latria, which is, they ſay, worſhip proper only to God; and their Dulia, which is for Saints; and then their Huperdulia, which is for the Virgin Mary, and for the Sign of the Croſs. Thus they make vain diſtinctions, which God and the Scripture make not. Vain Diſtinctions are good enough to maintain vain Superſtitions. They that invent a worſhip, muſt invent a Doctrine to maintain it by. Some perhaps may ſtumble at that Text, Rev. 3. 9. where this promiſe is made to the Church of Philadelphia, Behold, I will make them of the Synagogue of Satan, which ſay they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worſhip before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee.

Obj. May not worſhip then be given to a Creature?

Anſw. This worſhip may be taken for Civil worſhip; namely, for that ſubmiſſion which the Enemies of the Church ſhall be forced by the power of Chriſt to make unto her; as was promiſed by the Prophet, Iſa. 60. 14. The ſons alſo of them that afflicted thee, ſhall come bending unto thee; and all they that deſpiſed thee, ſhall bow themſelves down at the ſoles of thy feet.

Anſw. 2. If this be Divine worſhip, then worſhipping at the feet of the Church, notes worſhipping in the Church, not worſhipping of the Church. The worſhip is not terminated in the Church, but in Chriſt; who dwells and rules in the Church, who is both Head and Husband of the Church.

Church. These enemies being convinced of the presence of Christ in his Church, shall worship him. This David propheſies of Christ, speaking in his own person, *Ps.*18.43, 44. Thou hast made me the head of the Heathen, a people whom I have not known shall serve me; as soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me; the strangers shall submit themselves unto me. That of the Apostle, will more illustrate this sence; who, speaking of the great benefit of propheсying in a known tongue, concludes his Discourse thus; If all propheſie, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all. And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face, he will WORSHIP God, and report that God is in you of a truth. The worship then is not given to the Church, but to God, who in such Ordinances, or other acts of his power and goodness, is evidently revealed, as present in the Church.

So much for the actions or gestures of Job, what he did: He rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped.

Now we come to his words, to that which Job spake, in the two last Verses.

Verse 21. Naked came I out of my Mothers womb, and naked shall I return thither.
Verse 22. The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh, blessed be the name of the Lord.

Words are, or ought to be the Interpreters of the heart, and the comment of our actions. This speech of Job, doth indeed interpret his heart, and expound the meaning of his former actions. This speech (I say) of Job is the true comment of his own actions; for some seeing Job renting his garments, and shaving his head, and casting himself down upon the ground, they might not know the meaning of all this; they could not read his heart in these strange behaviours; they might not understand what his intentions were; probably they might judge that he was enraged and mad, that he was distracted or drunk with sorrow; that he was either desperate or impatient at the report of those losses. Therefore now to confute all such surmizes, he speaks forth the words of truth and soberneſs. And by that which he saith, sets so fair and true a gloss upon his actions, as might then render them, not only rational and ingenuous, but holy and gracious in the eyes of all men, as they were before in the eyes of God, who knew his heart. Satan was now like the servants of Benhadad before Ahab, watching for words; he had done his business, and now he was trying how it would work, what the event and issue would be; he hearkned when some irreverent speech should come from the mouth of Job; he looked presently that he should blaspheme God: he could not but smile surely, when he saw him renting his garments, and shaving his head, and falling down on the ground: O now it works! I shall hear him blaspheme and curse God presently. He that is thus distempered in the carriage of the other members of his body, will not surely be able long to rule (that unruly piece) his tongue. One undutiful or dishonourable word cast upon God, would have been musick to Satans ear, and joy to his heart; he would have catched it up as nimbly, as the men before spoken of, did Brother Benhadad, from the mouth of Ahab. But how blank look'd Satan? how was he cloathed with shame, at the fall of those words from Job? Naked came I out of my mothers womb, &c.

What David spake concerning the words of his Enemies, (Psal. 55.25. Their words were smoother then butter, but war was in their heart; they were sweeter then honey, and softer then oyl, yet were they drawn swords) we may speak of these words of Job, considered in reference unto Satan, and in reference unto God. These words of Job in reference unto God were as sweet as honey, as smooth as butter. For this breath had nothing in it, but meekness and patience, humility and holiness, in all which God delights: but in reference to Satan they were as drawn Swords, as poyson'd Arrows; Satan was hardly ever so smitten before, as he was by these words of Job. There is no word in this sentence, but gave Satan the lye, and refuted all his slander. And in the close Job gives him the deepest stab of all, it was a Dagger at the very heart of the Devil, when he heard him say, Blessed be the name of the Lord. No words could be utter'd upon the longest study, more eros's to Satans expectation, or more answerable to the former testimony of God; and therefore the Lord Crowns all, both his actions and his speeches with a new testimony; In all this Job sinned not nor charged God foolishly.

So much of Job's words in general, I shall now examine them distinctly in the parts.

Some conceive that Job at that time spake out his mind more largely; but that the Holy Ghost, in the penning of this story, did gather and sum up the strength of all his speech into these two conclusions. Beza in l

Naked came I out of my Mothers womb; and naked shall I return thither.
The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord.

We will consider the words a little, first, in the Grammatical sence of them, and then we will consider the reason of them: For here they are used Logically, as a strong and mighty argument, both for the supporting of his own spirit under those afflictions, and for the justifying and acquitting God in so afflicting him.

Naked came I out of my Mothers womb, &c.

Naked.] There is a twofold Nakedness, there is an internal Nakedness, and there is an external Nakedness; there is a Nakedness of the Soul as well as of the body. The Nakedness of the Soul is, when it is devested of all it's gracious ornaments and endowments. When Job saith, Naked came I out of my Mothers womb, and naked shall I return thither; it referreth especially to the nakedness of the Body: for though it be a truth that Job came naked into the world in regard of his Soul, yet he knew he should not go naked out of the world in regard of his Soul. Seeing then he referreth nakedness to his going out of the world as well as to his coming in; therefore it cannot be here meant of an inward nakedness: his Soul came naked in, but he knew his Soul should go out cloathed. Neither can it be meant of a then present spiritual nakedness; for Job was never so richly and gorgeously attired in his Soul, never appeared in such glorious ornaments of grace, as when he was stript of all worldly comforts. Therefore the nakedness here is bodily nakedness, that which Moses speaks of Gen. 2. 25. describing our first Parents, They were both naked, saith he, the man and his Wife, and they were not ashamed. Yet that nakedness and this which Job speaks of (though they were both bodily and external) were very different and unlike: for that nakedness of Creation needed no covering, nakedness was then an ornament. Man was richly attired when he had no garments. The nakedness of Creation was the absence of cloathing, or a not using of cloathes, it was not the want of cloathing. But the nakedness Job speaks of, is the nakedness after the Fall properly; where nakedness importeth not only a not having of cloaths, but want of cloathing; and so nakedness is a part of that curse and punishment which followed sin. Naked came I out of my Mothers womb, that is, I came into the world in a sad and miserable condition, weak and poor: And so nakedness is put not strictly as opposed only to cloathing, but we may take it more largely for the want of all outward comforts whatsoever, I came a poor destitute creature into the world, I had not only no cloathing upon my back, but I had no comfort for my body; I brought neither Sheep nor Oxen, nor Children nor Servants into the world with me, I had none of these things, nothing to help me of my own, when I first set footing into the world.

Some Naturalists considering this kind of nakedness, have fallen out into great complaints against Nature, or indeed rather against the God of Nature; as Pliny in the Preface to his seventh Book of his natural History, doth as it were chide with Nature for turning man into the world in such a helpless forlorn condition; as if man were dealt with more hardly then any other creature, then any beasts of the Field or fowls of the Air. Other creatures, saith he, come into the world with Hair, or Fleeces, or Bristles, or Scales, or Feathers, or Wings, or Shels, &c. to defend and cover them; but nature casts man naked upon the naked ground. This he spake, not considering that nakedness was once no trouble, but rather an honour and an ornament; and this he ſpake, not knowing whence or how that kind of troubleſom nakedneſs came into the world: And this he ſpake, not obſerving as he might, how many wayes God had provided for the help and ſupply of that nakedneſs; giving man underſtanding and reaſon, inſtead of weapons and cloathes, which alſo are a means for the procuring of all things neceſſary for the ſupporting of that naked and weak periſhing condition.

Naked ſhall I return thither.] The difficulty that is in this lyeth only in that word Thither; the doubt is, what place he means, or whither? What into my Mothers womb? There is no ſuch return, as Nichodemus ſaid, Shall a man that is old go into his Mothers womb, and be born again? Some anſwer it thus, The Adverbe [thither] doth not neceſſarily refer to the literal antecedent: but in Scripture ſometimes Relatives refer to ſomewhat in the mind or in the thought of the ſpeaker, and not to that which was before ſpoken by him; as that of Mary ſheweth, Joh. 20. 15. when ſhe cometh into the Garden, and finds that Chriſt was riſen; ſhe meeteth Chriſt, and ſuppoſing him to be the Gardiner, ſaith unto him, Sir, if you have born him hence; Him, what him? There was no antecedent mentioned to which Him ſhould relate, only Maries mind was ſo full of Chriſt, that ſhe thought every one would underſtand, what him, or whom ſhe ſpake of: as if none could ſpeak of or think any thing but of Chriſt only. Therefore ſhe made the relation to that which was in her own ſpirit, and not to what was formerly expreſt. So ſome Interpreters make the [thither] to be God or the grave, I ſhall return unto God, or I ſhall return to the grave, to the houſe of the grave, as the Chaldee paraphraſe hath it. For they ſuppoſe Job had his mind full of thoſe thoughts, therefore he may make a relation to that.

Another conſideration for the clearing of it is this, that ſuch Adverbs of place as this is, do not only ſignifie place, but a ſtate or a condition, wherein any one is, or to which any thing or perſon is brought; as it is ordinary in our ſpeech to ſay, hither have I brought the matter, that is, to this ſtate or to this condition: So when Job ſaith, Naked ſhall I return thither, that is, I ſhall return to ſuch a condition or to ſuch an eſtate, as I was naked before, ſo I ſhall return to ſuch a ſtate of nakedneſs again.

But thirdly, that which may more clearly carry it, the thither which Job here ſpeaks of may be underſtood of the earth or the grave; Naked came I out of my Mothers womb, and naked ſhall I return thither; to the womb of the earth, which is the grave: and ſo there may be in the latter a reference unto the former, taking the one properly, and the other improperly; taking the earth for his Mothers womb, in an improper ſence, ſc. the earth which is the common Parent from whence we all came, and to which we all return; the earth ſhall receive and take in all mankind again; when man dyes, the earth opens her bowels and receiveth him in; and which makes her once more a Mother, the earth at laſt being, as it were, with Child, or rather big with Children, ſhall travel in pain, and groaning to be delivered, ſhall by the mighty power of God, bring forth mankind again. There ſhall be a mighty birth from the womb of the earth at the laſt day. In Scripture the reſurrection is called a birth, in the day of the reſurrection mankind is anew begotten by God and mankind is anew, born: that clears it, Pſal. 2. 7. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee; which words are applied by Paul, Act. 13. 12. to the reſurrection of Chriſt. God hath fulfilled the promiſe made unto the Fathers, unto us their Children, in that he hath raiſed up Jeſus again; as it is alſo written in Pſalm 2. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. And as Chriſt, ſo all men, but eſpecially all Chriſtians ſhall be again begotten by the power of God, and born from the womb of the earth in the day of their reſurrection.

So much for the underſtanding of thoſe words, Naked came I out of my Mothers womb, and naked ſhall I return thither.

I ſhall collect ſome Obſervations from them two wayes. Firſt, As they contain a general truth. Secondly, As they are an argument or a reaſon for the ſupport of a man in ſuch a ſad condition as Job was then reduced unto. In the former way obſerve, Firſt, That every man is born a poor, helpleſs, naked creature.

The ſoul is naked of all that is good, there is not a rag of grace upon it, when we come into the world. Our bodies are naked too, ſo that we are born with nothing upon us, but only an ugly dreſs of ſin, ſuch as may juſtly make God loath us, and us a terror to our ſelves. Naked came I into the world: this one thought well taken in and fully digeſted, will lay pride in the duſt; this thought that we were born thus naked, will ſtrip us of all high and proud thoughts of our ſelves.

Secondly, Naked ſhall I return. Note,

When death cometh, it ſhakes us out of all our worldly comforts and poſſeſſions.

Death is called an uncloathing, 2 Cor. 5. 4. We that are in this Tabernacle do groan, being burdened, not for that we would be uncloathed, that is, not that we would dye. Death is called an uncloathing, becauſe it pulleth all outward things off from a man; it pulleth off all his rayment, his riches, his lands, his honours; yea death uncloathes the very bones, our fleſh wears off quickly in the grave. We have a uſual phraſe among us, and it is a very proper one: when a rich man dies (we ſay) he left a great eſtate, he leaves it indeed, for he cannot carry it with him, he muſt go out naked, how well cloathed ſo ever he was while he was here. The Apoſtle doth more then intimate, that ſome rich men do ſcarce believe this for ſound doctrine; he ſpeaks as if he would beat them off from ſome thought of carrying the world with them out of the world; while they live they are buried in their riches, and when they die they hope their riches will be buried with them, yea and riſe with them again. Such a conceit (I ſay) the Apoſtle ſeems to meet with, for in 1 Tim. 6. 7. having ſaid, We brought nothing with us into this world, he addeth in the next words, and it is certain we can carry nothing out; he doth not ſay, we brought nothing into the world, and we can carry nothing out, as Job here ſpeaks; but as if Jobs aſſertion had come into queſtion in Pauls time, he ſaith, we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain, never doubt of the truth of it, we can carry nothing out; we ſhall go out as we came in. Many, as the Prophet Habakkuk ſpeaks, Chap. 2. 6. lade themſelves with thick clay: But, as the queſtion there follows, how long? This lading muſt be laid down again. If riches end not before thee as thine, they muſt end with thee. Yet if any would carry riches and cloathing out of the world, it will be their wiſdom to labour for ſpiritual riches, for ſpiritual cloathing; when ſuch die, as they ſhall not be found naked, ſo they ſhall not go out naked: All your other cloathing and riches muſt be left on this ſide the grave, but get ſpiritual cloathing and riches, and you ſhall go out of the world adorn'd and enrich'd for ever; the cloathing of grace, the robe of righteouſneſs, a veſture of ſpiritual ornaments will endure to all eternity.

Thirdly, Note here further, how the Holy Ghoſt deſcribes the life of man, Naked came I into the world, and naked ſhall I return.

The life of man is nothing elſe but a coming and a returning.

Here is nothing ſaid of ſtaying or abiding; We have here no continuing City; while we are here, we can hardly be ſaid to continue here, and after a few dayes we ſhall not be here at all. It is but a coming and a going, it is but a flood and an ebb, and then we are carried into the Ocean of eternity.

We may yet conſider the words as they are an argument (and ſo I ſhall note two things from them). So Job uſes them as an argument both to ſupport himſelf, and to acquit God. Then Obſerve, Firſt, That a godly man in his ſtraits ſtudieth arguments to acquit and juſtifie God in all his dealings with him.

Job could not have found out upon longeſt ſtudy a better argument for the acquitting of God then this is: I have as much as I brought, then what wrong is done me in all this? As wicked men when they fall into ſtraits or troubles, eſpecially when they fall into ſin, ſtudy arguments how to ſhift themſelves out, and lay all the blame upon God; as Adam and and Eve, our first Parents in Paradise, (there it began) when they had sinned and were naked, they began to devise shifts how to put it from themselves, and to fasten the fault upon God. David on the other side labours to clear God, if ever he should be stript naked, Psal. 51.4. I will confess my sin, that thou mayst be justified when thou speakest, and clear when thou judgest. Weigh the reason why David confesseth his sin in that Psalm, I do it, saith he, that I may by this means acquit God, whatsoever God shall do with me hereafter, whatsoever affliction God shall bring upon me; men it may be will begin to judge God for it, and to say that he hath dealt hardly with me, notice having been taken, what an eminent servant of God I have been. Behold, saith he, I confess my sin before thee, that thou maist be clear when thou judgest; or as the Apostle Paul quotes the place, according to the Septuagint, Rom. 3.4. That thou mightest overcome when thou art judged. David knew men would be apt to judge God, if they saw him afflicted; and therefore to stop their mouths, or to give God the day against them, he confesses his sin; thereby shewing cause why God might chastise him, either for correction of sin past, or prevention of sin to come.

Secondly, As the argument referreth unto Job himself, we may Observe this,

> That the consideration of what we once were, and of what at last we must be, may relieve our spirits in the greatest outward afflictions of this life.

Art thou for the present in a naked condition? Consider thou wast naked once, and ere long shalt be naked again: Consider the two extreams, the beginning and the ending, and that will bear thee up in the middle condition. There is many a man that complains, and saith, I have nothing but the cloaths upon my back left me, and they are but rags, but mean ones neither: Why! With nothing but the cloaths upon thy back? Know O man thou wast born with nothing but thy skin upon thy back. Consider this, and leave complaining; this was one thought which helped Job to bear this burden, the want of all. And the Apostle Paul useth this argument to the very same purpose, 1 Tim. 6.6. having said, That godliness with contentment is great gain; he subjoyns presently this argument of Job, for saith he, we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain that we shall carry nothing out. To consider what (not long ago) we were, and what very shortly we must be, will mightily work the soul to contentation in what estate soever we are. It follows,

The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away.

This is the second argument which Job useth to both the former purposes; and it is a more spiritual and sublime argument then the former. A man who hath nothing in him but nature, may say as much as Job did before, though he could never say it with Job's spirit; for though godly persons use natural arguments and common reasons, yet being concocted in their spirits, they become heavenly and spiritual. Natural men (I say) or Heathens have taken up such an argument as that; as when word was brought to a Heathen Philosopher, that his Son was dead, I know (saith he) that I begot a Son mortal, and subject to death; he did but look back to the common condition of man, and supported himself. But now I say this second argument is higher, it is not an argument bottomed upon the frailty of nature, but upon the sovereignty of God: this argument is grounded upon the equity of divine providence and dispensations. The Lord (saith he) hath given, and the Lord hath taken away.

Scio me mortalem genuisse.

The Lord hath given.] Every good and every perfect gift is from above, James 1.17. What gifts doth Job here mean? He means good and perfect gifts in their kind; but not the best and most perfect kind of gifts. The Lord once gave me those Oxen, those Sheep, all these outward things that now I am stripped of, The Lord hath given. A gift is any good freely bestowed; when we receive a thing which another was not ingaged to bestow, that is a gift. Now God doth not only give us those transcendents, grace and glory, faith in Christ here, and the fruition of Christ hereafter: not only are these gifts, I say, sent in from God, and undeserved by us; but outward things, riches and honour, children and servants, houses and lands, these are the gifts of God likewise; we have not the least creature comfort of our own, we have nothing of our own but sin. What hast thou, that thou hast not received? is a truth concerning every thing we have, even to a hoof or a shoe-latchet. We are indebted unto God for our spirituals, for our temporals, for all. We must say of all, little or much, great or small, The Lord hath given.

How did the Lord give Job all his riches and estate?

The Lord doth give either immediately or mediately. When Job saith, The Lord hath given, we are not to understand it, as if the Lord had brought such a present to him, and said, here take this estate, take these cattle, these servants; but God gave them mediately by blessing the labours of Job. So when the Lord prospereth us in our honest endeavours, and labours, and callings, then the Lord giveth us outward things.

The Lord hath given. Job doth not say, by my strength and diligence, my policy and prudence, I have got this estate; as the Assyrian said, Isa. 10.13. By the strength of my hand have I done this, and by my wisdom, for I am prudent. Job takes no notice of himself; he was not idle, yet he speaks as if he had done nothing, The Lord hath given.

This should teach us in the first place to acknowledge the Lord as the fountain and donor of all our outward comforts. When you get wealth, do not say, this I have gotten (such language is barbarous in divinity) but say, this, The Lord hath given. We find an expres caution to this purpose given by Moses from God, not only against the former language of the tongue, but of the heart; when the Jews should come to Canaan, and should grow rich and great there. When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the Lord. Beware thou forget not the Lord thy God, for the good land which he hath given thee, and say in thy heart, my power, and the might of my hand, hath gotten me this wealth; but thou shalt remember the Lord thy God, for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth: It is he that giveth thee power. Many who are perswaded that God gives them grace, that God gives Heaven and Salvation; are hardly perswaded, or at least do not so well consider it, that God gives riches, &c. their hearts are yet ready to say, that they have gotten this wealth, they have gotten this honour. It is a sweet thing when a man looks upward for these lower things, and can say on good grounds, that his earth hath dropt down to him from Heaven, The Lord hath given.

Deut. 8.10, 11,17,18.

Further, when Job saith, The Lord hath given, it is an argument of his own justice and equity in getting: Job did not enrich himself by wrong, by grinding the face of the poor. If he had done so, he could not have said, The Lord hath given. So much as we get honestly, we may look upon as a fruit of Gods bounty. Look into your estates, and whatsoever you have got by wrong dealing, take heed of saying, this is of Gods giving, for so you make God himself a partner in your sins. God sometime gives when we use no means, but he never gives when we use unlawful means. What God said concerning the setting up of those Kings, Hos. 8.4. They have set up Kings, but not by me; he saith of all, who enrich themselves by wrong, they have gotten riches, but not by me. When men leave the rule of justice, God leaves them: And though unlawful acts are under the eye of Gods providence, yet they are not under the influence of his blessing. Wicked men thrive often, but they are never blessed; their prosperity is their curse.

Thirdly, It is observable, that when Job would support himself in the loss of his estate, he calls to mind how he came by his estate; and finding it all given in by the blessing of God upon his honest labours and endeavours, he is satisfied. Note,

> That, what we get honestly, that we can part with contentedly.

He that hath got his estate by injustice, can never leave it with patience. Honesty in getting causeth quietness of spirit in loosing outward things. Keep a good conscience in getting the world, and you shall have peace when you cannot keep the world. Whereas a wrong-doer and a wrong-dealer, is in such a day under a double affliction; he is afflicted with his present loss, and he ought to be afflicted for his former gain.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, These words, the Lord hath given, being rightly handled, will be as a sword to cut off four monsters or monstrous lusts, which annoy all the world; or as a medicine to cure four diseases about worldly things. Two of these lusts are strongest in the rich; and the other pair assault the poor. The poor pine either with discontent, because they have so little; or with envy, because others have so much. The rich swell with pride, because they have abundance, or they are fill'd with contempt of those that are in want. Let the rich seriously weigh this speech, it will cure them of pride, Charge them that are rich (saith the Apostle, 1 Tim. 6. 17.) that they be not high-minded. You see how subject rich men are to this inflammation of pride. But with what doth he prick this Bladder? It is with this thought, that God gives all riches; Let them trust in the living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy. That argument of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 4. 7. If thou hast received it, why dost thou boast? is as strong and as true in regard of temporals, as of spirituals. Consider seriously that your estates are the gift of God, and down falls pride. If you come honestly by them, they are the gift of God; if you come dishonestly by them, they are the gifts of Satan; and you ought to be ashamed of them, and restore them, not to boast, or be proud of them.

Then secondly, It will cure the rich of all contempt of others. What the Apostle James observed and censured in the rich of those times, is found by too much experience among the rich at this day; Ye have despised the poor, chap. 2. 6. Consider it is the Lord who gave, and he gave as a Lord, freely; he might have given thine estate to that poor man, and have left thee in that condition thou so much despisest in thy brother: God gave him as much as his wisdom thought fit; and it seems he hath given thee more then thou art fit for: In despising him, thou dost asperse the dispensation of God, and whilst thou woundest him in his poverty, thou woundest God in his providence. Consider it is the Lord that gives, and then be unconvinced, if you can, that while you contemn man in his wants, you question God in his wisdom; busie thy self hereafter in praising him who gives All, and leave despising him who hath received less.

Then likewise let the poor look upon this Text, and it will cure them of two diseases, into which they often fall, and by which they are much endangered, even in the vitals of Grace; Discontent, and Envy. It is the Lord that giveth, that shapes and cuts out your condition, why then should you not be contented with his allowance, and be thankful in your lot? If your estates be proportioned from above, you ought to be content with your portion. Ignorance or Inadvertency from whom we receive, causeth murmuring at what we have. Do not think thou hast less love from God, because thou hast less allowance from God. The power of God is as much acted in making a Fly, as in making an Elephant; and his love may be as much, and is often more acted in giving a penny, then in giving a talent. Know this, thou who art a child of God, if thy portion be but a penny, it hath upon it the Image and Superscription, a Fathers love, which is better then life.

This also will cure the poor of envy: many times the poor have an evil eye of envy at the rich; they cannot bear it, that others have so much, and they so little: Consider, it is the Lord that giveth. This argument Christ useth, Mat. 15. 20. to him that was angry that they who came at the latter end of the day, had as much as he; May not I do with mine own what I will? Is thine eye evil, because mine is good? The envious eye is an evil eye; envy is the disease of the eyes. This Text is one of the best Medicines that ever was prescribed. Wilt thou be sick, because another is in health; and make thy Brothers happiness the ground of thy misery? Do not think that all is lost, which is not cast into thy lap; or that thy estate is less or worse, because thou seest one having a greater, or a better. Must God ask thee leave, or ask thy counsel, how, and in what measure to distribute his favours? Were all but well Catechized in this one Principle, that God gives all, it would soon dispel this malignant vapour, and all would rest satisfied, not because they or others have received thus or thus, but because God hath thus disposed to all.

Observe one thing more;

If the Lord give us all, then we should be willing to give back somewhat unto the Lord again.

And this consideration that God gives us, will make us willing to give unto God. What is the reason that many are so unwilling to give somewhat unto God? It is because they will not understand that they are beholding to God for all. If they were perswaded of their receipts from him, a little Oratory might perswade a gift from them, in the cause of God; especially when God intreats them, who may of right command them; when he is content to take it as a courtesie, who may send for it by authority, and expect it as a duty. God himself, who fills and enjoyes all things, hath sometimes (in a sense) need of your estates. Christ, who is Lord of Heaven and Earth, is sometimes in want of a penny. Christ tells you of his wants and poverty, Mat. 25. and shews how and when he is relieved. And as Christ wants in a Member, some particular Believer; so he often wants in his whole Body; which is the Church, or whole company of Believers. If you have any spiritual wisdom, to discern times and seasons, you may know, that now Christ wants money (as I have explained) now God (in his cause) hath need. He goes about (in those who solicit his cause) and asks a relief at every one of your doors. Now then do but consider, when any thing is asked for the Lords sake, that the Lord gave all; this will be a key to unlock your chests; this will at once untie your hearts and your purses. Will you let Christ want, shall the cause of God want, while you have it, whereas what you have, God gave? It is expres concerning Nabal, that this was the reason why he would not part with a loaf of bread to relieve David and his Army, 1 Sam. 25. 11. Shall I take my bread and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and send them to a fellow, I know not who? You see the man was all in his possessives, my bread, and my water, and my flesh; he never thought that God had any share or interest in his estate, that God gave it; therefore he would not give to a servant of God. You shall see on the other hand, how David's munificence, and that of the Nobles with him, 2 Chron. 29. sprung from this root, the acknowledgment that nothing was their own, it came in all from God; when they had offered so willingly and bountifully towards the building of the Temple, David shews the Mine which yielded so much treasure; even this we have digged in all this while: All things come of thee, and of thine own we have given thee, vers. 15. They confessed that all came of God, they were but Stewards, he was the Owner; and his own they could not with-hold from him. God giveth us the use of the creature, but he keepeth the right to them in his own hand; when we have the possession of them, he hath the property. Wherefore let the consideration, that God giveth all, make us ready and open-handed to give unto God, when he calleth and requireth it at our hands.

And the Lord hath taken away. When God gives, it is an act of bounty; and when he takes, it is an act of justice; for he is Lord, sovereign Lord in both. But why doth Job here charge this upon God? The Lord hath taken. Was it not told him by the messengers, that the Caldeans and Sabeans came and took away his cattel, plundered and pillaged his estate? They told him, that the fire consumed his Sheep, and the wind blew down the house upon his Children: Why doth Job say, The Lord hath taken? What! will Job charge all those robberies upon God himself? Doth not this look like the blasphemy that the Devil hoped would have come out of Job's mouth?

I answer, when Job saith, The Lord hath taken, it doth but set forth the supream power and sovereignty of God, in ordering all things; and (as we opened before) that God gave the commission to Satan, or leave to spoil him, or else Satan could not have touched one of the dogs of his Flock. Job knew that God had all men and Devils, fire and wind, all creatures in his hand. He saith, the Lord hath taken; because none could take, but by the will of God; and he was satisfied, that God willed that in righteousness and in judgment, which they acted with so much cruelty and injustice. Is there any evil in the City, and the Lord hath not done it? Amos 3. 6. Every evil of affliction or of trouble, is said to be the Lords doing, because it cannot be done without the Lord. Wicked men, in all their plots, and in all their successes, are either the rod of God, to chasten his people for their sins; or else they are as Gods furnace, to try his peoples Graces, and purge them from their sins. Thus the hand of the Lord is in all our sorrows. The Lord, saith Job, hath taken away.

We

We should from hence learn, In all our afflictions to look beyond the Creature.

In all the evils we either feel or fear, let our hearts be carried up unto God. As then we rightly enjoy outward blessings, when those blessings carry us up unto God, when, upon creatures, our hearts are raised up to heaven: So then we make a right use of afflictions, of crosses and troubles, when we are led by crosses (in our meditations) unto God. Job doth not say, The Lord hath given, and the Caldeans have taken away; the Lord hath enriched me, and Satan hath robbed me; but, as if he had never made any mention of Satan or Caldeans, of fire or wind, he saith, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. He doth not fall out with man, or complain of the Devil, he is not angry with chance or fortune, with stars or constellations; many, in the troublesom evils which they suffer, are apt to flie out upon all creatures, and upon all causes, rather then to cast an eye upon God; whereas indeed, we should not take either good or evil out of the hand of any creature. There were some of old, Marcion, and his followers, who could not relish this Doctrine, nor endure that we should carry our evils, and lay them before Gods door, and say, The Lord hath done this: therefore they found out two beginnings; that is, two Gods, rather then they would make the same God the author of such extreams (as they thought) of good and evil: They said, there was one God that was a good God, and another an evil God; the one, a giving God, the other, a taking God; the one a loving God, a merciful God; the other, an angry God, a severe God. Many of the Heathen taught better Divinity then those Hereticks: for they feigned, that their Jupiter had two great vessels placed at the entrance of his Palace, whereof the one was filled with Good, and the other with Evil: These he dispensed according to the dictate of his own will, among the sons of men. And they painted Fortune in two forms, with two faces of contrary colours, the foremost white, the hindermost black; to signifie, that good and evil, which they shadowed under white and black, come both from Goddess Fortune: which comes near that language in the Prophet, Isa. 45.7. I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil. And we are taught to look upon the same God, as the spring and fountain of all good, and of all this sort of evil. Though it be a truth (as the Apostle speaks) that the same fountain cannot send forth bitter water and sweet, take it in a natural or moral sence; yet the same fountain may send forth bitter and sweet, take it in a civil sence; that is, the same may be the author of outward corrections, and outward favours. God is not the fountain of good and evil in a moral sence, so nothing but good floweth from him; but take it in a civil sence, and so both good and evil, bitter and sweet come from the same fountain.

Consider the words, as they are an argument, and then see their strength to the purposes, for which Job doth especially here apply them: 1. The acquitting or justifying of God. 2. The supporting and comforting of himself: and so we may note from them,

First, That, The absolute soveraignty of the Lord over us, is enough to acquit him from doing us any wrong, whatsoever he doth with us.

Job saith only this, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken: he is the sovereign Lord, therefore I have no reason to complain; he doth it, upon whom I have laid no engagement, upon whom I have no tie at all, to do this or that for me; he doth it who may resolve the reason of all his actions into his own will; he is the Lord. God cannot injure his creature; therefore the Apostle hath recourse to that only, in Rom. 9. for the answer of all cavils and objections against Gods dealing with man; Hath not the Potter power over the Clay? The soveraignty and supremacy of the Lord is enough to bear him out whatsoever he doth, with or to his creatures. O man, who art thou that repliest against God?

Then again, it is as strong for the second end; for the support of the soul in bearing evil: consider that it is the Lord that giveth, and the Lord that takes. The thought of Gods soveraignty over us, and over ours, may quiet our spirits in all that he doth unto us or ours. As it doth justifie God, so it doth quiet us: Hear David, Psal. 39. 9. I was dumb, saith he, and opened not my mouth, because thou didst it: He doth not say, I was contented because thou dealtest thus and thus with me; but, I was dumb, and opened not my mouth, because thou didst it; that it was the act of God, the sovereign Lord, satisfied him; he had not a word to say, because God did it. So Job here, The Lord hath taken away, is, as if he had said, I could not have born this at the hands of any creature, but at the hands of my soveraign Lord, that may dispose of me and mine, and do what he pleaseth; at his hands I not only bear it, but take it well.

Joseph had not a word of discontent to vent against his Brethren, being thus resolved; It was not you that sent me hither, but God, Gen. 45. And David layes aside all revenge against railing Shimei, on this ground, So let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, curse David, 2 Sam. 16. 10. A godly man cannot be angry at the doing or speaking of that which pleaseth God, that it should be done or spoken. And it takes away all complaining, That the Lord hath taken away.

Blessed be the Name of the Lord.

The Septuagint, and so the Vulgar, from them, insert here another Sentence between these two; The Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord: reading it thus, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away *: as it pleaseth the Lord, so cometh things to pass, blessed be the name of the Lord; but we have no more in the Hebrew, then our own Translation gives us.

* ὡς τῷ κυρίῳ ἐδόξασεν οὕτως ἐγένετο Sept.

Blessed be the Name of the Lord.] This is the triumphant conclusion which floweth from the former Propositions; this is the issue and result of them both: a conclusion as opposite to Satans design, (as the two Poles of the heavens are one against the other. Satan waited to hear Job conclude with blaspheming the name of the Lord; and now he heareth Job conclude with blessing the name of the Lord. How did this vex and sting Satan? This one word of Job did wound Satan more then all the afflictions which Satan procured, wounded Job. Though I return naked, though all be taken from me, yet blessed be the name of the Lord.

Blessed be the Name of the Lord.] The Name of God in Scripture, is taken, First, For God himself. The name of a thing, it is put for the thing named, Psal. 44. 5. Through thee we will push down our enemies, through thy name we will tread them down that rise up against us. Through thy name, that is, through thee: Through thee and through thy name, are the same. So, Psal. 48. 10. According to thy name, so is thy praise, that is, thou art praised like thy self; as thou art in thy self, so thou art or oughtest to be praised by thy people; the name is put for the person. You have it clearly, Acts 1. 15. The number of names together, were about an hundred and twenty; that is, the number of persons, so many persons, because numbred by their names.

Secondly, The Name of God is often in Scripture put for the Attributes of God.

Thirdly, The Name of God is put for his Ordinances or worship: Go ye now to my place which was in Shiloh, where I set my Name at the first, Jer. 7. 12. that is, where I first set up my publick worship; because as a man is known by his proper name, so is God by his proper worship. And therefore false worship is the setting up of a strange god. When we mistake the name, we mistake the person.

Fourthly, The Name of God is that reverence, esteem and honour, which Angels and men give unto God. As we know amongst us, the report and reputation that a man hath among men, is a mans name; what men speak of him, that is his name: such an one hath a good name, we say; such an one hath an ill name; that is, men speak or think well or ill of such persons. So, Gen. 6. 4. When Moses describes the Giants, he saith, they were men of renown; the Hebrew is, they were men of name, because the name of a man is the opinion he hath amongst men; as a man is esteemed, so his name is carried, and himself is accepted in the world. So the name of God is that high esteem, those honourable apprehensions, which Angels and Men have of God; such as the thoughts and speeches of men are for the celebration of Gods glory and praise, such is his name in the world. Blessed be the name of the Lord.

By blessing God, we are to understand, either, first, what we express in word concerning God. God is blessed by his creatures, when his goodness, and greatness, and mercy, and bounty, and faithfulness, and justice, are published with thanksgiving thanksgiving and praise. Or God is blessed likewise, when we have high, and great, and glorious thoughts of God; when we inwardly fear, and reverence, and love, and honour God, then we bless God. The one is to bless with the tongue, the other to bless with the heart. The tongue blessing without the heart, is but a tinckling Cymbal: the heart blessing without the tongue, makes sweet, but still musick; both in consort, make that harmony which fills and delights Heaven and Earth. When Job saith here, blessed be the name of the Lord, we are to understand it both wayes; that Job speaks out the blessing of God with his mouth, and likewise he had high and reverent thoughts of God. His heart and tongue met at this work and word. Blessed be the Name of the Lord.

We may note from hence, That, God is worthy of all praise and honour, not only when he doth enrich and strengthen us, when he fills and protects us; but also when he doth impoverish and weaken us, when he empties and smites us, when he gives us up to the will of our enemies, to the will of Devils and wicked men, even then God is to be blessed.

It is a good thing, and it is our duty to bless God, when we are rich, and when we are full; as, Deut. 8. 10. When thou hast eaten, and art full, then thou shalt bless the Lord: But it is a far better thing (yet but our duty) to bless the Lord when we are poor and weak, when we are empty, and have nothing to eat; then to bless the Lord, is the breathing of an excellent spirit indeed, 1 Thes. 5. 18. In every thing give thanks: Let God do what he will with his children, they have cause to thank him, as he is God in himself, blessed for evermore. When God thunders in judgments so loud, that he breaketh the Cedars, and shakes the Wilderness, then to give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name, and in his Temple to speak of his glory, argues a spirit highly ennobled, and glorious in Grace, Psal. 29. Therefore his children should not rest in this, that they bear afflictions, but they should labour to bring their hearts to bless and glorifie God in, and for the afflictions that they bear. And a soul that thus honoureth God, shall assuredly receive honour from God. That which the Apostle speaks of the Saints suffering persecution, is true of them in any kind of holy suffering, the spirit of Glory and of God doth rest upon them, 1 Pet. 4. 14. The Spirit of God is spoken of, as if it were unsetled or unquiet, and knew not where to fix it self, till it had found such a soul; like Noah's Dove, that went hovering about, and knew not where to rest the sole of her foot, till it came to the Ark; so the Spirit of God is expresst, as hovering about from person to person, from place to place, as if it could not rest any where, till he found a soul triumphing and blessing God in affliction; at least lying quietly under affliction, till God takes it off, and there the Spirit rests and settles it self.

Observe further, that Job here blesseth God in his afflictions, and that makes the difference; his afflictions now are good unto him.

If we bless God in our afflictions, then our afflictions are blessings unto us.

We have so much blessing in our affliction, as we can bless God for our affliction. There is a mighty power in this speech, I bless God; it changeth evil into good: here is an heavenly Alchimy (as we may speak) whatsoever affliction you touch with blessing God, you turn that affliction to a blessing; if you have an Iron yoke of affliction upon you, do but touch it with blessing God, it turneth it into Gold. When you have a heavy cross upon you, ready to weigh you down, do but touch the cross with this word from the heart, and it makes it as a Crown of Glory upon your heads. Thus, (I say) you may turn every evil into good, every affliction into a comfort and a blessing, if you can but touch it with blessing the Name of God.

We will come to the Conclusion.

In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

This testimony the Lord giveth concerning Job, both in reference to what he did, and what he spake. In all this, in renting his mantle, in shaving his head, in falling to the ground, in worshipping, in saying, Naked came I out of my mothers womb, and naked shall I return thither; The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the Name of the Lord. In all this Job sinned not, neither charged God foolishly. God himself puts all the actions, and all the speeches of Job into the ballance, and finds not any lightness in them; he bringeth all that he hath done, and all that he hath said, to the touchstone, and finds them pure metal. The holy Ghost, the great and infallible moderator of this cause and question between Job and Satan, determines, That in all this Job sinned not, neither did he charge God foolishly.

But it will be objected, Is there any man that sinneth not? or, is there any man that sinneth not in every thing? How then are we to understand what the holy Ghost pronounceth, In all this Job sinned not? Is any man so holy, or can his heart be kept in so holy a frame, as to do and speak so much, without any touch of sin, without any spot of defilement? Job's question, chap. 9. affirms, that no man can do any one act purely pure; Who can bring a clean thing out of that which is unclean? Now Job himself in his nature, was unclean, he had uncleanness in him; how then was a clean thing brought out of Job? Whence had he such a priviledge above his brethren, as not to sin in doing and suffering so many things?

There are some Popish Commentators, who would build the Tower of perfection upon this and other the like Scriptures; scil. That a man may in this life be freed from all sin. For the refuting this fence, and clearing of the Text, I will give you the resolution in a distinction or two.

First, If we consider sinful actions, they are of two sorts. There are actions sinful in the matter, when the very thing done is a sin; as, to steal, to lie, to be drunk, to commit adultery, and the like; the very thing done is a sin materially. There are other actions that are sinful in the formality or manner of doing; so a good work in the matter, may be sinful in the manner of doing. We do not assert that all the works of regenerate persons are sins, as if they were sinful actions, or that all that they do is sinful in the matter; for that were a reproach to the Spirit of Christ, that were a reproach to the Grace of Christ, by which they being regenerated, act and do these things. But we positively affirm, that to the works of regenerate persons, to their best works some defilement cleaves; so that though the action be not sinful, yet there is some sin in the action. There is a great deal of difference between a sinful action, and sin in an action: We have that difference expresly, Exod. 28. 38. Where the High Priest is said to bear the iniquity of the holy things: holy things, yet iniquity in them; holy things in the matter of them, yet iniquity in the manner of performing them.

Now when it is said here, In all this Job sinned not, we are to understand it first thus; Here were no sinful acts in the matter of them, such as Satan did promise to himself, and did undertake with God, that Job would speak and break out into: Satan was confident that Job would blaspheme and curse God to his face; this was an act of an high nature, sinful in the very matter of it, an act abominable. In all this Job sinned not such a sin; he was not transported by passion or impatiency to reproach and curse the living God.

Secondly, In Scripture-language we are said not to sin, when we do not commit such & such sins; as is clear in that instance about David, of whom this transcendent testimony is given, 1 Kings 15. 5. That he turned not aside from any thing the Lord commanded him all the dayes of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite: a high expression of his holiness. What then? shall we think that David never sinned at all, but in that matter? No, the meaning of it is, that David never fell grosly or foully, but that time; in comparison of that act, all the rest of the life of David went for so holy, as if he had lived without any sin at all. In this sense the Apostle John giveth the command not to sin, 1 John 2. 1. I write unto you little Children, that you sin not (it is a possible precept in an evangelical sence) that is, that you sin not as wicked men do, who can do nothing else but sin. In this sence, Job sinned not; he carried himself like an holy person, like an obedient child of God, like one born of God (as the Apostle speaks) whose Character and priviledge it is, that he cannot sin. Such have the blessing of impotency in the unregenerate part, so that they cannot sin strongly; though as yet they have not that ability, in their regenerate part, not to sin at all. 1 Joh. 3. 9.

The

The Septuagint adds to this clause, He sinned not before the Lord, or against the Lord. The Vulgar adds those words, with his lips. Neither of them mend the sence of the Hebrew Text; and the latter makes it worse. For it is a higher and clearer testimony to say, In all this Job sinned not, then to say, In all this Job sinned not with his lips; for he might sin in thought, &c. though it be most true which the Apostle James speaks, chap. 3. 7. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man.

Or charged God foolishly.] The Translations are somewhat different; the Septuagint thus, He did not cast any folly upon God; others, He did not offer any thing unsavoury of God; another, He did not accuse or complain of God: The word in the Original is, He did not give; we translate, He did not charge.

οὐκ ἔδωκεν ἀφροσύνην τῷ Θεῷ. Sept. Non dedit insulsum Deo. Ar. Mont. οὐκ ἐμέμψατο τῷ Θεῷ. Olym. תפלה Proprie insulsitas.

The word which we translate adverbially [foolishly] is a Noun in the Original; yet it is fully enough to the sence, He charged not God foolishly, or, he charged not God with folly, so it is rather in the Original. That word which is here translated folly, signifieth in the general, any thing that is indebite dispositum, any thing that is unduly disposed, any thing in disorder: And we find it in Scripture referred divers wayes.

First, It is put for unsavoury meat, without salt or sauce; as, Job 6. 6. Can that which is unsavoury, be eaten without salt? The word [unsavoury] there, is the same with this, here rendred folly or foolishly.

Secondly, It is used for mortar that hath not a due temper or mixture in it; as, Ezek. 13. 14. I will break down the wall that ye have dawbed with untempered mortar; mortar that is not well tempered, is unfit for use, Thirdly, It is put for any rude, undigested or indiscreet speech; as, Lam. 2. 14. Thy Prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee; they have seen foolish and unsavoury things for thee. Hence the word is used to express madness; because madness is the height of folly, being without any seasoning, without any temper, a thing that hath no taste of wisdom or goodness in it, Jer. 23. 13. I have seen folly in the Prophets of Samaria; that is, they are unsavoury, their speeches are untempered mortar, they are foolish and vain. So then, he did not charge God with folly, or charge God foolishly, hath this sense, Job did not speak any thing rashly, or unbecoming the Majesty of God, or charge him in the least, to have dealt unwisely or unjustly with him. As if the Lord had said, Satan, thou didst expect that Job should now at this time have charged me home, and have laid load upon me with complainings, for dealing thus with him; thou expectedst that he should have broken out into the dialect of hell it self; such words as these, Why, what have I done against God, that he should deal thus with me? Is this the wages that I shall receive for the work and service I have done him? Will he discourage and dishearten others from coming on to his service, by my sad example? Is it justice in God, that I, who have lived so innocently, should be thus extreamly afflicted? Could the Lord find out no swearers, no drunkards, no adulterers in the world, to let Satan loose upon, but he must needs turn him loose upon me? Had he no other Butt in the world to shoot the arrows of his indignation at, but at an innocent breast? Is this a just God, who uses his servants thus? Or, if he be omniscient and omnipotent, why then did he not protect me from Satans rage? Why did he not defend me from the violence of those evil men? Such kind of speeches, or to this effect, Satan expected Job would have uttered rashly against the Lord: but he is deceived; Job hath no such thought, much less did he speak such words, either against the justice, or wisdom, or power of God; he charges no folly upon God, the only wise God, but gives him glory; saying, Blessed be his Name, whatsoever he doth with me or mine.

Learn from hence, first, what blasphemy is, or what it is to curse God:

> To curse God, is to charge God with folly, or with doing things foolishly and rashly.

For these expressions expound one another. Satan said Job would curse God; the holy Ghost saith, Job hath not charged God foolishly; therefore that is a definition of Gods own making, plainly declaring what it is to curse God: Yet every speech or act unbecoming the Majesty, Wisdom and Power of God, doth not presently denominate a man a blasphemer: There may be blasphemy in what is spoken, and yet the person speaking, not a blasphemer. Job himself spake many things afterward unadvisedly in the heat of dispute; but he blasphemed not. Blasphemy or cursing of God, properly taken, is ever joyned with an intent to cast reproach upon God. As every one is not a liar, that telleth what is not true; but he that telleth an untruth, knowing it to be an untruth, with an intent to deceive and wrong others. So he that thinks or speaks a thing unbecoming God, with an intent to reproach or slander God, and his wayes, this is blaspheming indeed.

Secondly, Observe, Impatience under, and murmuring at the cross which God layes upon us, is a charging of God with folly.

Murmuring against God, questions the wisdom of God. Complaints have a charge in them. We tax what is done, while we submit not to what is done. When we lie under Gods hand quietly and silently, then we speak the praise of God, then our carriage ascribes all wisdom, honour and glory unto him.

Thirdly, In that it is said by way of excellency concerning Job, that in all this Job sinned not, referring it to his behaviour under these afflictions; as if the holy Ghost had said, it is matter of admiration that in this, in all this Job should not sin. Note from hence,

> That, It is an high act, one of the highest acts of Grace, to be composed in thought and word under great afflictions.

In all this Job sinned not; as if he had said, it had not been much for Job, not to sin in other things; but in this affliction, in this distress, being so put to it, being thus tried, in all this not to sin, is Grace, almost to a miracle.

> Lastly, Note this, What is well done by us, shall be sure to receive a fair testimony from God.

When Job had carried himself discreetly, and spoken discreetly, the Lord hides not this in darkness, he shuts it not up in silence; but proclaims the innocency and uprightness of his carriage in this present passage of his life, as he had done before, concerning the whole course of his life and conversation, that he was perfect and upright. The Apostle publisheth, Glory, and honour, and peace, to every man that worketh good, Rom. 2. 10. They that carry themselves well either in suffering, or in working for God, shall have glory, and honour, and peace from God. No man needs blow a trumpet in his own praise, when he hath done well; as the Pharisees did, Mat. 6. What we do well, the Lord himself will report to all the world: In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

And so we have done with this third part of the Chapter, and with this whole Chapter; which contains (as you have heard) those three generals, the description of Job's prosperous estate, the description of his trials and afflictions, and the description of his carriage under those afflictions. Now when he is come off from this assault without wound, without any touch of sin, Satan perceiving himself defeated and frustrated in this attempt, will not yet give it over, he is restless, he will attempt him once more. We shall find him in the next Chapter, at the Assembly again, renewing his motion for a second assault; that he may have leave to lay his siege nearer and closer to Job; presuming, that though he had not prevailed at first, yet he shall at the second charge; let me charge him but once more, and then see his fall, he will curse thee to thy face.

CHAP. II. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Again there was a day when the Sons of God came to preſent themſelves before the Lord, and Satan came alſo among them to preſent himſelf before the Lord.

And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, from whence comeſt thou? and Satan anſwered the Lord and ſaid, from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, Haſt thou conſidered my ſervant Job, that there is none like him in the Earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and eſcheweth evil? and ſtill he holdeth faſt his integrity, although thou movedſt me againſt him to deſtroy him without cauſe.

And Satan anſwered the Lord, and ſaid, skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he give for his life.

But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his fleſh, and he will curſe thee to thy face.

And the Lord ſaid unto Satan, Behold he is in thine hand, but ſave his life.

AS the Prophet Ezekiel, when in viſion he had been ſhewed one abomination, was led forward to a ſecond, and a third, and a fourth, with, Come ſee a greater abomination then this, or thoſe. Or as the Angel proclaimeth in the Revelation, One woe is paſt, and another woe is at hand. The ſame may we ſay concerning this Hiſtory of Job's ſorrows. Having ſhewed you his firſt affliction in the former Chapter, I muſt now lead on your attentions, with, Come behold a ſecond, a greater then that; and having ſhewed you one woful day, I muſt now ſhew you a ſecond; Again there was a day when the Sons of God came to preſent themſelves.

Ezek. 8.

This whole Chapter preſents us in the general with Job's ſecond tryal: About which we may obſerve theſe particulars.

1. The occaſion of it.
2. The cauſes of it.
3. The manner of it.
4. The conſequents of it.

1. The occaſion of it was Satans appearing at that heavenly Seſſion, and being there queſtioned about that former affliction of Job, he anſwers with ſlander, and deſireth that Job may be brought about to a ſecond trial.

2. The cauſes of this affliction (as of the firſt) are two.
   1. God. And
   2. Satan.

1. God permitting and limiting it.

2. Satan provoking and then inflicting it. Both are laid down in the words of the context now read, to the end of the ſixth verſe.

3. The manner of this affliction, was the ſtriking and ſmiting of Job's body with a ſore and noyſom diſeaſe, which you have contained in ver. 7, 8.

4. The Conſequents of this affliction, or what followed upon it, and thoſe are three.
   1. His Wives ſinful counſel, ver. 9. As ſoon as ſhe ſaw him thus ſmitten, What (ſaith ſhe) doſt thou ſtill retain thine integrity? Curſe God and dye. There's her counſel.
   2. His wiſe and holy reply, ver. 10.
   3. His Friends loving viſit, ver. 11, 12, 13. They hearing of the affliction of Job, came from a far Countrey, to ſee him, and to comfort him.

Theſe are the diſtinct parts of the whole Chapter.

Theſe ſix verſes decipher the occaſion and the cauſes of Job's affliction; Satan inciting and provoking the Lord; and the Lord permitting and limiting Satan.

The three firſt contain the ſame matter which we have opened and explained in the former Chapter, and they are almoſt word for word the ſame; therefore I ſhall not need to ſtay long upon them: Only I ſhall enquire a little further about two things.

Firſt, About the day of this great appearance. And ſecondly, About the perſons appearing, who are ſaid to be the Sons of God.

To the former of theſe, the Jewiſh Doctors contend much, That this was the firſt day in the recourſe or return of the year: intimating, if not contending, that the firſt day of every year was as Gods day of general Audit, in which he conveen'd or called together his Angels, to give him an account of all the paſſages and diſpatches of the year paſt, and to give them inſtructions what to do the year coming; which opinion I leave under the cenſure of a learned interpreter, as groſs and groundleſs.

Nimis craſſum eſt. Merc.

Others fix it upon the laſt day of the week, affirming that this was the Sabbath day. And that this was a Convention or Aſſembly of the Church on Earth for the ſolemn worſhip of God upon that day, which is here called, A preſenting themſelves before the Lord; in concurrence with which opinion, the Sons of God muſt needs be interpreted holy men. I find ſome affirming, that men are not called the Sons of God in all the old Teſtament, but the Angels only: And ſo they take that Text, Gen. 6. 2. The Sons of God ſaw the daughters of men, &c. for the Angels, either good or bad, who being taken with the beauty of thoſe daughters, aſſuming bodies, came into them, of whom came the Giants. A conceit as monſtrous as thoſe Giants, and fitter for a Fabuliſt then a Divine. On the other extream, * Chryſoſtom denies that the Angels are at all called the Sons of God.

Conveniens videtur fuiſſe feſtum Sabbathi: quod tunc & commune erat omnium fidelium idemque celeberrimum. Bolduc.

* In his Homily on Gen. 6. 2.

We may walk ſafely in a middle way between theſe two. For both Angels and men are called the Sons of God: Why Angels are called the Sons of God hath been ſhewed, Chap. 1. v. 6. Men are called the Sons of God for two reaſons; either for their power, or greatneſs; ſo they, Gen. 6. 2. might be called the Sons of God, becauſe great and powerful on the earth. Or rather ſecondly, for their piety and holineſs, by which they reſemble God, and in which they ſerve God as a Son doth the Father. Indeed the Apoſtle affirms, that the priviledge of ſonſhip was brought in by the Incarnation of Chriſt, who is ſaid, In the fulneſs of time to be made of a woman, &c. That we might receive the adoption of Sons, Gal. 4. 5. But in Scripture a thing is ſpoken of as newly done, when it is more fully done, Joh. 7. 39. The Holy Ghoſt is ſaid not to be given at that time, becauſe he had not been ſo plentifully given. And the Apoſtle to the Hebrews ſpeaks, as if the way into Heaven had been but then opened, becauſe it was then more clearly opened, Heb. 9. 8 So we are ſaid to receive the adoption of Sons, when Chriſt came in the fleſh, becauſe then our Son-ſhip was more apparent, though before it was as real.

So then according to this Interpretation the ſence of the words is, That upon the Sabbath day, when the Servants of God, the faithful of that age and place were met together to celebrate the publick worſhip of God, Satan, (the evil ſpirit) who is ever ready to oppoſe and reſiſt us, to interrupt and hinder us, when we appear before the Lord in holy duties) came alſo among them to preſent himſelf before the Lord.

I propoſe this as an opinion to which my own inclination is not ſtrong. Theſe words with the context (as was noted in the former Chapter) ſeeming to me, rather a repreſentation of Gods providence towards man, then a deſcription of mans worſhip tendered unto God.

Again,

Again there was a day.

It may be yet further enquired how much time paſſed between the firſt and this ſecond day of appearance. Some affirm, it was the immediate day after: others, the immediate Sabbath after. A third opinion defers it to the year after; Satan cunningly delaying the buſineſs all that while, to the intent he might more fully ſee how the former affliction wrought, what effects it had or would have upon Job, before he attempts a ſecond.

The Text reſolveth us in neither of theſe, but leaveth it indifferent and undetermined, ſaying only, Again there was a day. It is moſt probable that there was ſuch a diſtance of time between theſe two afflictions, as was competent to a full diſcovery of Job's ſpirit, under the firſt. As when Chriſt was tempted, and had foyled Satan in that tempta on, it is Luke 4.13. ſaid, The devil departed from him for a ſeaſon; he left him probably, to ſee what effects might follow upon the former temptation: So Satan having tempted Job, and tempted him by a temptation, though one in the general, yet with a four-fold aſſault, four ſeveral Meſſengers, making (as it were) four charges upon him, he leaveth him for a ſeaſon, and again when there was a day, he returns to renew the aſſault and battery.

I ſhall paſs over the two verſes following, in all that they contain, opened in the former Chapter. But in the latter end of the third verſe, there is ſomewhat added very material, where the Lord beſpeaks Satan concerning Job, Haſt thou conſidered my ſervant Job, that there is none like him in the Earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and eſcheweth evil? (This was the Character which God gave of him before in the former Chapter, but now he goeth on) And ſtill he holdeth faſt his integrity, although thou movedſt me againſt him to deſtroy him without cauſe. This is ſuper-added to his teſtimony, his commendation is enlarged. Job (you ſee) hath gained in this conflict: he was deſcribed before as an holy man, now he is deſcribed as a tryed man, as an approved Souldier. Job hath obtained this honour in the former combat with Satan, a glorious addition to his character: As the patience and other graces of Job did increaſe, ſo did the teſtimony of God increaſe concerning him. Note from this addition only in the general thus much,

That ſuch as honour God, God will honour.

If we do any new or further ſervice for God, God will add ſome further honour and reſpect unto us. If we do, or ſay, or ſuffer any thing extraordinary for God, God will ſay, or do ſomewhat more then ordinary concerning us. The old character did not ſerve, when Job had done this new ſervice. God will never conceal any of our graces, no nor the improvement of any of our graces. If we ſpeak but a word for God, we ſhall hear of it again; God takes it and pens it down, as it is ſaid, *Mal.*3.16. They that feared the Lord, ſpake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard, and a book of remembrance was written; God ſets it down preſently: So he recorded what Job had ſpoken, and gives it him in at the next meeting with Satan. We can never looſe either by doing or ſuffering for God. All ſhall be recompenced to the utmoſt farthing. As it is uſual with Kings and great men of the world, for great ſervices done them (eſpecially in wars and battels) to make additions to the titles of honour, to give ſome new motto's, or put ſome new devices in the Coat-armour of thoſe who ſerve them. Thus doth God here. Job having play'd the man (as we ſay) or rather the Saint in that former combat, he hath a new title of honour put into his ſtile: Now it is not only Job, a man that feareth God and eſcheweth evil; but Job a man that holdeth faſt his integrity.

Conſider the words themſelves,

And ſtill he holdeth faſt his integrity.

The words (And ſtill) or to this preſent time, may have a double reference. Firſt, barely to the time paſt: Job was not only a perfect and a ſound man in former times, but he is ſo ſtill, ſo at preſent. Or rather ſecondly, it refers to the affliction and loſſes he had ſuffered; as he was in former times, ſo he is at this time; as he was in proſperous times, ſo he is in troubleſome times: When the day was light and clear to him, Job was a perfect man; and now the day hath nothing but darkneſs and gloominеſs in it, Job is a perfect man ſtill; though wounded in his eſtate, and broken in his outward comforts, yet he is as ſound and whole in his ſpirit, as ever he was. Though Cattel, Servants, Children be dead and gone, beſpoil'd and loſt; yet grace is ſafe, and faith triumphs, He ſtill holdeth faſt his integrity.

Holdeth faſt. This which we tranſlate by two words, is but one word in the Hebrew. Our language is not comprehenſive enough to expreſs the fu neſs of that word, in a word. Job doth not only hold his integrity, but he holdeth it faſt: the word implyes a ſtrength in holding, to hold a thing firmly. And more, the word hath a further Emphaſis in it; it ſignifieth not only to hold a thing by that degree of ſtrength, wherewith formerly we did hold it; but it doth import thus much, to wax ſtronger in the holding of it, to prevail or increaſe in ſtrength. As when David ſent Joab to number the people, Joab was unwilling, and ſaid to the King, Now the Lord thy God add unto the people an hundredfold; but why doth my Lord the King delight in this thing? 2 Sam. 24. 4. Then it follows, Notwithſtanding the Kings word prevailed againſt Joab. That which is there tranſlated, And his word prevailed, is the ſame with this we tranſlate here, Holdeth faſt; the Kings word did take a prevailing hold upon Joab, or held him faſt to the doing of the Kings command, though he would have got off from the buſineſs: So we may underſtand it here, Still he prevaileth or waxeth ſtronger in his integrity. מחזיק

The ſame word is uſed by the Prophet Malachi, chap. 3. 13, 14. Where God convinceth thoſe proud ſpirits that puffed at his ſervice, Your words (ſaith he) have been ſtout againſt me. That which we tranſlate, have been ſtout, is the ſame with this in the Text of Job; Your words have been ſtout, that is, they have grown ſtronger and ſtronger againſt me and my wayes; you are confirm'd in wickedneſs; whereas your hearts ſhould have been brought down and humbled, you are increaſt and hardned in your obſtinacy and rebellion. Such is the ſtrength and meaning of the word in this place. Job by this oppoſition grows more ſtrong and ſtout in his integrity, he is ſo far from being daunted, that he is encourag'd; he is as he was, nay more then he was, he is increaſed, Still he holdeth faſt his integrity.

His integrity. It is a word of the ſame root with that uſed, Chap. 1. ver. 1. There was a man in the Land of Uz, and this man was perfect; and theſe words illuſtrate and expound one another; to be a perfect man, is to be a man of integrity: there, he was a perfect man; now, he is a man holding faſt that perfection, namely, his integrity.

From this firſt branch obſerve,

Firſt, That Satan in all his temptations plants his chiefeſt battery againſt ſincerity.

Hence it is here expreſt, that Job ſtill held faſt his integrity, as if the Holy Ghoſt would intimate this unto us, that Satan pulled more at that, then at his eſtate. Satan did not care at all to pull Job's Oxen from him, or his Sheep from him, or his Children from him, but to pull his grace from him; therefore it is ſaid, Job held that faſt: Without queſtion Satan aſſaulted that moſt, which Job held moſt; the thing that Satan aimed at, was not to make Job a poor man, but to make him a ſinful man; and he would never have troubled himſelf to rob him of his riches, but only in ſubordination to the robbing him of his graces: That was the booty Satan look'd for. Satan look'd at his cattel, only as pay for his Army of Sabeans, and Chaldeans: but he look'd upon his grace (if he could have got it from him) as pay for principalities and powers. As grace gotten or improv'd is the joy of Angels: So if grace could be ſtoln away or deſtroy'd, it would be the joy of Devils. This was Satans hope.

Secondly, Note this,

That whatſoever a godly man looſeth, he will be ſure to lay hold of his graces, he will hold ſpirituals, whatever becomes of temporals.

He will be ſure to take faſt hold of theſe, when all is going; when riches are going, when children are going, when friends are going, when liberty is going, yea when life is going too, then he layes faſt hold upon his integrity; and ſaith (as Jacob to the Angel) I will not let thee go; and he ſaith it without exception: for he knows he cannot be bleſſed if that go. Integrity is his Benjamin, all the Children he hath ſhall go, but this ſon of his right hand muſt not; For indeed his life is bound up in the life of grace: And if he part with that, he muſt lye down with ſorrow in his grave. Wherefore he is reſolved not to part with that, whatſoever he parts with. As it is with a man at Sea in a Shipwrack, when all is caſt over-board, the corn that feeds him, and the clothes that cover him, yet he ſwims to the ſhore, if he can, with his life in his hand. Or as it is with a valiant Standard-bearer, that carries the Banner in war, if he ſees all loſt, he will wrap the Banner about his body, and chuſe rather to dye in that as his winding ſheet, then let any man take it from him, or ſpoil him of it, he will hold that faſt, though he loſe his life for it. So doth Job here, ſo doth every one that is of Job's heavenly temper and ſpiritual reſolution: in the greateſt ſtorm, in the hotteſt aſſault, he will wrap himſelf round about with his integrity, wind that about him, and will not let it go: Kill him if you will, deſtroy him if you will, he will never part with his integrity, though he part with life. Indeed there is nothing elſe can ſtand a man inſtead to any purpoſe; if that be loſt, all s loſt. A man that is in danger of drowning will lay hold upon any thing, upon a ſtraw, upon a ruſh, though it have no ſtrength to ſupport him: Men in danger will lay hold upon ſomewhat; they that are wiſe will lay hold upon the Rock, upon that which will do them good in an evil day; They will lay hold upon Chriſt, they will lay hold upon promiſes (in laying hold upon our integrity, all that is done) then they are ſure to live; for Wiſdom (that is Chriſt) is a Tree of life to all that lay hold upon her, Prov. 3. 18.

Thirdly, It is conſiderable, that this word is uſed for the laying hold upon our weapons, either to defend our ſelves or to offend and aſſault our Enemies, Pſal. 35. 2. David prays, that God would take hold of Shield and Buckler, and ſtand up for his help. We may note from hence,

That integrity is our arms.

Integrity is a Chriſtians weapon. Job layes hold upon his integrity as a Sword to wound his Enemy, and as a Shield and Buckler to ſave and defend himſelf.

Fourthly, From that expoſition of the word, that it ſignifieth not only to be ſtrong, but to prevail, it ſignifieth an overcoming power; he doth hold faſt, that is, he prevaileth with his integrity. We may Note,

That grace doth not only oppoſe, but conquer Satan and all his temptations.

He doth prevail in his integrity (ſo the Hebrew may be rendred in the letter.) Sometimes (you know) there is a war and oppoſition, when there is no conqueſt; a war may be carried on divers years in a Nation, or between Nations, when there is no abſolute victory on either ſide: as we ſee by woful and lamentable experience in Germany, where there hath been oppoſition, one ſide againſt another above theſe twenty years, and yet no ſide hath prevailed. But as grace makes war, ſo grace gets the better, grace gets the day, and will ſhortly make a final conqueſt; yea, there is not only a conqueſt (ſaith the Apoſtle, Rom. 8.) but through Chriſt we are more then Conquerors.

In the fifth place, I told you that the word ſignifies, to increaſe in ſtrength; he holdeth faſt his integrity, or he increaſeth in ſtrength in his integrity. Note hence,

That, True grace gains by oppoſition.

True grace is increaſed the more it is aſſaulted. Satan comes a purpoſe to deſtroy Job's graces, Job waxeth ſtronger in his graces. True grace will do ſo in whomſoever it is. Hypocrites (who have but a ſhew of grace, painted grace) fall off in times of trial, in times of temptation; that which only ſeemeth to be ſomewhat, cometh to nothing, but that which is ſomewhat, cometh to more.

Laſtly, Conſider the Emphaſis of the words. God ſpeaks of this in a kind of admiration; he putteth a greater Emphaſis upon this then upon the other part of Job's character.

Verſe 3. Haſt thou conſidered my ſervant Job, that there is none like him in the Earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and eſchewеth evil? and ſtill he holdeth faſt his integrity.

God ſpeaks of it, as a matter of wonder, a rare thing. From this obſerve,

That to hold our integrity in evil times, is not only good, but admirable.

It is that which doth even (as we may ſo ſpeak) provoke God himſelf to an admiration. It is a truth, whether it be in regard of perſonal troubles, or national troubles; to hold faſt and keep cloſe to God in ſuch diſtreſſes is admirable. To continue good, while we ſuffer evil, is the height and crown of goodneſs: As it is that which putteth one of the greateſt aggravations upon the ſinfulneſs of men, that they will hold faſt their ſins in the middeſt of judgments. The Prophet Amos, with much elegancy of ſpeech and vehemency of ſpirit, urgeth this againſt the Jews, Chap. 4. I have given you cleanneſs of teeth, yet have ye not returned unto me: I have with-holden the rain, yet have ye not returned unto me: I have ſmitten you with blaſting, yet have ye not returned unto me: I have ſent among you the peſtilence and the ſword, yet have ye not returned unto me, ſaith the Lord.

The Prophet Jeremy takes up the ſame argument, having before ſpoken of judgments ſent upon them, Yet (ſaith he) they hold faſt deceit, and refuſe to return, (Chap. 8. 5.) they held faſt deceit, though they were afflicted, that aggravated their ſinfulneſs. Now (I ſay) as it makes ſin out of meaſure ſinful, to hold it faſt when God afflicteth; ſo it makes grace out of meaſure gracious, putteth a wonderful ſplendor and glory upon it, if we hold faſt our grace, when troubles and afflictions meet us in the holding of it forth; and God will put an Emphaſis upon ſuch a one for grace, as he did upon Ahaz for his ſin, 2 Chron. 28. 22. In the time of his diſtreſs did he treſpaſs yet more againſt the Lord; This is that King Ahaz; that brand is put upon him. So there is an honour ſtamp'd on Job in this teſtimony, That in the time of his diſtreſs, he did yet more good; This is that Job: To ſerve, believe, and love God more in diſtreſs, this is integrity to a wonder, this draws the heart of God toward ſuch, & makes them truly glorious in the eyes of godly men.

That which follows in the text, doth yet more advance the honour of Job in this victory, Still he holdeth faſt, &c.

Though thou movedſt me againſt him to deſtroy him without cauſe.

Though thou movedſt me.] The word here uſed to move, ותסיתני ſignifieth more then a bare motion, it carries in it a perſwaſion, and more then a bare perſwaſion, it carries in it a vehement inſtigation: As when a man doth perſwade a thing by arguments and ſtrong reaſons; that is the force of the word; as in that place, 1 Kings 21. 25. There was none like Ahab which did ſell himſelf to work wickedneſs in the ſight of the Lord, whom Jezabel his wife ſtirred up: ſtirred up is the word in the Text, thou movedſt me; Jezabel moved Ahab, incited him, never gave him over, by arguments and reaſons, by this conſideration and that conſideration, to do wickedly in Iſrael: So here, Satan did, as it were, ply God with arguments and reaſons to inſtigate him againſt Job, Thou didſt move me againſt him. Satan is a cunning Orator, and knows how to handle a matter, that it may take with greateſt advantage.

Some may queſtion, how can this be? Will God be moved by Satan? Is not the Lord unchangeable? Have Satans words and arguments ſuch power with God, to move him to do a thing?

I anſwer it two wayes: We may clear it firſt thus; As the Saints and people of God in Prayer are ſaid to move God, and to prevail with God, they are ſaid to carry a buſineſs with God. Now you know what they do in Prayer, they do not only ſpread a Petition barely before God, but they ſtrengthen it with all the arguments they can, argument upon argument, pleading upon pleading; yet the Lord himſelf is not ſtirred, he is not changed at all by the Prayer of his people; it is not to be thought that the Lord upon the Prayers of his people, takes up any new thoughts, or puts on any new reſolutions to do this or that; for a mercy that is but a day old in regard of our Prayer obtaining it, is an eternity old in regard of God purpoſing it; therefore God is not changed at all; but he is ſaid to be moved to give or do, as or when we pray, becauſe he giveth and doth what he himſelf had purpoſed to give, when we ſhould pray: for as God from all eternity did purpoſe to give give to his people such and such mercies, so he did purpose and decree, to give them when they prayed. Now then as it is in regard of his peoples prayer and seeking for mercy, they move God; but it is only the bringing forth of that which he had in his heart from all eternity to do for them: So here in this case, God had a purpose from all eternity to try Job, and likewise he did purpose the way and the means of it, that it should be done upon the motion and instigation of Satan. For although God cannot be moved by any to do a thing, which before he intended not, he is unchangeable: yet as by his eternal will and counsel, he doth produce things in time; so likewise from eternity he did order and will the manner of their producing, he purposed to do good for his Church upon the supplications of his Servants, and sometimes to afflict his Church or Servants at the instigation of Satan.

Quanquam Deus à nullo potest moveri, ad aliquid volendum de novo, cum sit immutabilis: tamen sicut voluntate æterna producit aliquid in tempore, ita ab æterno voluit modum producendi.

Secondly, This place [thou movedst me against him] is to be understood by a figure, very frequent in the Scripture; God speaking of himself after the manner of men; because as men usually when they do a thing, or are moved by others to do it, and by perswasions are sometime prevailed with, to do that which they intended not an hour before. So God is said to do a thing upon motion, though he intended it from eternity, often descending to expres himself by that which is common to men, though his manner of doing it be transcendent, infinitely beyond men.

From the force of this word so explained, Thou movedst me against him: Observe,

That Satan is an earnest and importunate solicitor against the People and Church of God.

He without ceasing provokes God against them, he bends his wit, and strains his language to the height, in pleading against them, to get them delivered up into his hands, or into the hands of his instruments.

And if Satan be thus zealous, so importunate a sollicitor against the Saints; It may teach us to be as earnest and zealous for the Saints. Satan doth not only move, but he moveth by arguments, he incites: It is not enough to pray by proposing our desires, but we must pray enforcing and pressing our desires; such a holy unquietness of spirit, is expressed by the Prophet, Isa. 62. 1. For Zions sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalems sake will I not rest, &c. Such was that required of the Watch-men set upon the walls of Jerusalem, which should never hold their peace day nor night: Ye that make mention of the Lord, or ye that are the Lords remembrancers, keep not silence, and give him no rest till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth, Isa. 62. ver. 6, 7. This duty is now doubled on us by the great afflictions and greater fears of Sion. When Christ was in his Agony, he prayed more earnestly, Luke 22. 44. And when his Church is in an Agony, we ought to pray more earnestly. At such a time we must mingle more fire with our Prayers, we must pray more fervently. At such a time we must mingle more water with our Prayers, we must pray more repentingly: We must with Jacob, (Hos. 12.) weep and make supplication. At such a time we must mingle more faith with our Prayers, we must pray more believingly. In a word, at such a time every Prayer must be a pleading, yea a wrestling with God, a wrestling with resolution not to let him go until we have got a blessing, till we prevail with God to destroy his Churches Enemies, as Satan in the Text moved God to destroy Job, his servant and his friend. So it follows, Thou movedst me against him to destroy him.

לבלעו To destroy him.] The word Destroy signifieth to swallow up, or to devour: You have it Gen. 41. 4. where it is said, That the seven lean ears, and seven lean kine, did devour or eat up the seven full ears, and the seven fat kine. And Exod. 7. 12. the Text saith, That Moses his rod did swallow up the rods of the Magicians. Psal. 124. 3. Unless the Lord had been on our side, they had swallowed us up quick. In all these places it is the same word we have here, Thou movedst me to destroy him.

In the former Chapter, where Satan desired God to touch Job, I shewed what kind of touches Satan desired to lay upon the people of God; you see it now cleared by God himself, Thou movedst me to destroy him, to swallow him up. Thy words were moderate and diminitive, do but touch him, but thy intentions were bloody and destructive, Thou movedst me to destroy him, to make an end of him, that was thy meaning.

Without cause.] But will the Lord, the wise God, do any thing without cause? A wise, a prudent man will not do any thing without cause; though Satan may be so brutish and unreasonable to move God to do a thing for which there is no cause, would the Lord be so perswaded, by his motion, to do it without cause? The Text seemeth here to speak so, Thou movedst me to destroy him without cause; and God hearkened to his motion before, and gave him up all his estate, to do with it what he pleased.

Briefly to clear this. Without cause. It is the same original word used in the former Chapter, Doth Job serve God for nought, or without cause (as was then opened): so here, Thou movedst me against him to destroy him without cause, or thou movedst me against him for nothing, or for nought.

We may consider this phrase of speech [without cause] three wayes. First, in reference unto Satan. Secondly, in reference unto God. Thirdly, in reference unto Job himself: From each of these considerations light will shine into this point.

First, In reference unto Satan. God tells Satan, Thou movest me against him without cause; that is, Job never gave thee any cause why thou shouldest make such a motion against him; Job had never wronged thee, or done thee any hurt, as David saith of his Enemies, They are mine Enemies without cause. I was never injurious or unjust unto them. So Satan was Job's Enemy without cause; Job never gave him occasion: Indeed the holiness and goodness of Job was Satans grief, and Satans trouble; but for any other trouble or wrong Job never did him; therefore without cause, it was in reference unto Satan.

Secondly, In reference unto Satan, without cause; that is, Thou didst not alledge any sufficient cause, or charge him with any particular crime; thou didst only bring in a general suspition against him; there was not so much as a common fame (as you know it was a course to accuse men upon common fame.) So saith God here, It was nothing but a suspition raised out of thine own brain (as indeed those common fames, that we heard of not long since, upon which many were accused, yea condemn'd, were only suspitions born in the brains of those men.) So here Job was charged meerly upon the suspition of Satan; there was no crime directly alledged, nor any evil report in the world against him; cause was not shew'd legally; therefore without cause thou movedst me against him.

Thirdly, In reference unto Satan, without cause; that is, It now appeareth upon the tryal, that thou didst move me against him without cause; that which thou didst pretend to be the cause, was not found in Job: thou pretendest he was an hypocrite, and served me for himself; now thou seest thy self confuted; it appeareth he did serve me for nought, sincerely, and not for his own ends: He is no painted sepulcher, no rotten self-seeker.

If we consider the words in the second place with reference unto God, Thou didst move me against him without cause, then we must take heed of thinking that God doth any thing without cause: No, the wise God doth every thing in number, weight and measure; he doth every thing upon great reason, upon the highest reason. God will not do the lowest thing, but upon the height of reason; he doth the least thing upon greater reason then the greatest Politicians in the world do the greatest. Therefore God had reason, important reason, to give Job up to be afflicted. He did it for the tryal of Job, he did it for the magnifying of his free grace, and the graces of his free Spirit, in his weak Creature; he did it that Job might be set up as an example of patience, he did it to discover the slander of the Devil; therefore he did it for strong reasons; it was not without cause, in reference unto God himself.

Lastly, If we consider it in reference unto Job, it was not absolutely without cause neither; for though there was not that cause in him, which Satan pretended, namely, gross hypocrisie: yet if the Lord should search and sift him narrowly (as if he should search and sift the holiest of his Servants, his pure eyes, and holy nature, would find sin enough in them, which might justifie him, or shew to his Justice sufficient cause (take the sin in it self) not only to afflict them temporally, but to lay his hand upon them for ever.) Should God (I say) have tryed him throughly, and looked upon sin in it self, he might find cause to afflict him in regard of his ſin. So then abſolutely in reference unto Job, it was not without cauſe, God might have found cauſe in regard of his ſin.

But there were other cauſes in reference unto Job, it was to try Job, to exerciſe Job; it was that Job might have further honour after the tryal: There might have been a reaſon in ſin (if the Lord had marked iniquity.) And there were were many reaſons in reference to his good, why the Lord did leave him thus in the hands of Satan to be afflicted.

To wind it up: If we look upon Satan, then it was without that cauſe he pretended; it was without any direct charge, it was a meer ſuſpition, Job had never wronged him. But if we reſpect God, it is not without cauſe; God doth all things for weighty reaſons. And if we reſpect Job, God (poſſibly, yea eaſily) might have found a ſin in him (any ſin in it ſelf conſidered would do it) as the cauſe of his affliction: And he had other actual reaſons, in reference both to the being and improvement of his graces, why he left him thus in the hands of Satan.

Hence we may learn, Firſt (in that God ſaith, Thou movedſt me againſt him, to deſtroy him without cauſe)

That pure, or rather impure malice, ſtirreth Satan againſt the people of God.

Though he alwayes pretends ſomewhat in them, yet the cauſe is in himſelf. God now diſcovers he doth nothing but out of very malice, pure malice againſt his Servants. Satan hath two names in Scripture, noting his two ſpecial works, Temptation and accuſation. He ſollicits good men to do evil againſt God: Hence he hath his name, the Tempter. He ſollicits God to conceive evil of good men; and hence he hath his name, the Slanderer, or Accuſer.

Secondly, note, That God doth afflict his people ſometimes without reſpect unto their ſins. Thou didſt move me againſt him without cauſe.

It was not in regard of his hypocriſie, or of any thing thou didſt charge him with, why I did afflict him and lay my hand upon him. Though all men have alwayes ſin enough to be the meritorious cauſe, yet oftentimes ſin is not the moving cauſe of their afflictions. When the Diſciples put that queſtion to Chriſt concerning the blind man, John 9. 2. Maſter, who did ſin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? Jeſus anſwered, neither hath this man ſinned nor his parents (not as if either of them were without ſin, but to ſhew that they had not ſinned as to this purpoſe, ſc. their ſin was not the cauſe of this blindneſs, and therefore in the next words, he aſſigns the cauſe) But (ſc. he was born blind) that the works of God ſhould be made manifeſt. Afflictions are alwayes from ſin, but not alwayes for ſin. Neither are they at all for ſin (upon believers) by way of the leaſt ſatisfaction to the juſtice of God (that chaſtiſement Chriſt hath ſo fully born, (Iſa. 53.) that no Believers finger ſhall ever ake in that ſence. But they are often afflicted for ſin by way of purgation, or prevention.

Thirdly, note, That God will at the laſt give teſtimony for the clearing of the innocency of his Servants againſt all Satans malicious accuſations.

God himſelf gives teſtimony here a ſecond time concerning Job, Thou didſt move me againſt him without cauſe; thou didſt move me to it, but it is clear, and I give my ſentence, there was no ſuch cauſe as thou didſt ſuggeſt againſt him, why I ſhould deſtroy him.

When the Lord had thus called Satan to account concerning Job, whether he had conſidered him both in his radical graces, and in this additional grace, the holding faſt of his integrity; Then Satan comes forth to anſwer this alſo. Haſt thou (ſaith God) conſidered my ſervant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and eſcheweth evil? And ſtill he holdeth faſt his integrity, although thou movedſt me againſt him, to deſtroy him without cauſe? Yes ſaith Satan in ver. 4. And Satan anſwered the Lord and ſaid, Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now and touch his bone and his fleſh, and he will curſe thee to thy face.

Here is Satans anſwer, with his motion upon it.

By his anſwer he labours to blot and obſcure the glory which Job had gained in the former battel; and by his motion he labours to bring him about unto a ſecond tryal. As by his anſwer in the former Chapter (a little to compare him with himſelf) Satan ſlandered Job's actions, ſo by his anſwer here he ſlanders Job's ſufferings. There it was for ſomething that Job ſerved God, and here that which Job had ſuffered is nothing.

It is Satans trade (and he hath many children of the ſame occupation) to ſlander and to ſlight whatſoever the Servants of God, either do or ſuffer. Before he ſlandered Job's active obedience, now he ſlanders his paſſive obedience. What is this? (ſaith he) tuſh, Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he give for his life: It is a ſlight trial that he hath paſt yet; what great matter is it if he hold faſt his integrity; who would not, who could not hold faſt, for any thing that hath been done to him yet? Let us try him again.

For the clearing of this we will examine the words.

Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he give for his life.

We ſee here that malice is ſteeped in wit, Satan anſwereth by a Proverb, Skin for skin, &c. A proverbial, quick, ſharp ſpeech, the general ſence of which and Satans intendments are very clear.

The general ſence of this proverbial ſpeech is this;

That life is the moſt precious treaſure; that a man will part with any thing upon theſe terms, The ſaving of his life. That all a man ſuffers comes not very near him, while that is out of danger.

Such is the general ſence; and Satans intendment in ſpeaking this, is as clear; namely, that as Job before had ſerved God for his wealth, ſo now he doth ſerve him for his breath; that as before Job kept cloſe to God, that he might enrich him; ſo now Job keeps cloſe to God, leſt he ſhould deſtroy him. He ſeemeth to hold faſt his integrity (ſo you tell me) but it is only that he may hold faſt his life; He ſerved you before for wealth, and now he ſerves you for breath. His fear of looſing that makes him humble himſelf, and give many thanks: ſearch him to the bottom, and you will find him ſtill a mercenary ſervant, holding his integrity that he may hold in with thee, and live. This is the general drift of Satan.

But to give the ſpecial meaning of his words doth ſomewhat trouble Interpreters, Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life.

Firſt [Skin for skin] Some interpret it thus, A man will venture the skin of one member to ſave the skin of another, which being cut off, or wounded, his life is more in danger. As for inſtance, if a blow come at a mans head, he will hold up his hand, or his naked arm, he will venture the skin of his hand to ſave his head: And the reaſon is, becauſe his life is more in danger, if he be wounded in his head, then in his hand. Here is skin for skin; he gives the skin of a member which is further off from the ſeat of life, to ſave the skin of that member which is ſo near the ſeat of life.

Secondly, By skin in the former place, ſome underſtand all the outward eſtate that Job had. It was uſual in thoſe times to expreſs all riches by the word skin, and the reaſon of it was this, becauſe (as was obſerved before) their ſubſtance was Cattel, and ſo from the skin of their Cattel, they did denominate their eſtates. Or as others, becauſe their money was made of skins, and ſo they did expreſs their wealth and riches under the word skin. Anſwerable to which cuſtom, the Latin word for houſhold-ſtuffe, or houſhold goods, is derived from that word which properly ſignifies a skin, becauſe either they were wont to wrap up their goods in skins, or becauſe they did put a great value upon skins, and ſo their whole outward perſonal eſtate was comprehended under that notion. Hence that common Proverb amongſt the Ancients, Thou ſpendeſt out of another mans skin. To be liberal out of another mans eſtate, was called a being laviſh upon another mans skin. And then skin in the ſecond place doth ſignifie the man himſelf, or the perſon of a man: the thing containing, or that which covereth, being put for the whole, by a Synechdoche; the skin for the whole man. And it is uſual in good Authors to put the skin for the whole man; as to look to the skin, is to look to the whole body. Take it thus, that skin in the firſt place is all outward ward things; and skin in the second, is taken for the skin that covereth the body; and so the sence runs thus, skin for skin, &c. that is, a man will give all his outward estate, to save the flesh upon his back; that is, to save his life. As if Satan had said, this act of Job, which is so cried up, and made a matter so considerable, being examined, will be found as ordinary as the high-way. It being common, to a Proverb, for a man to part with all, that he may preserve himself.

Zanchius. There is a third Exposition much laboured by a learned Interpreter; who, by skin, in the first place, understands not generally all his estate; but more especially his apparel, his cloathing, which at the first were made of skins, and were used long after for cloathings, by Princes and great men, in divers Countries; from which the sence of the Proverb is thus given, skin for skin, &c. A man will part with his cloaths, cast them off willingly, easily, that he may save the skin of his body, save his life: And so he expounds it by that act of Job in the former Chapter, ver. 20. where it is said, that Job rent his mantle, and cast it off; as if Satan had alluded unto that; and said, no marvel if Job humbled himself to the dust, and renting his garment, cast that away, when he heard all was taken from him: Job parted with the skin, his garment, that he might move thee to compassion, and so save his other skin, the garment which cloaths his flesh; which he fear'd thou wouldst rent by wounding, and so let out his trembling soul, his beloved life.

A fourth gives this interpretation of the words, skin for skin, &c. The Original Preposition, which we translate (for) is often in Scripture likewise translated (upon) as, in בעדעיד בעד עוד 2 Kings 4. 5. The Widow went from Elisha, and shut the door upon her and upon her Son. So in other places. Then the sence is made out thus; skin upon skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life; that is, if a man had never so many skins, if it could be supposed he had an hundred skins one upon another, he would let all be taken off to save his life. That place is expounded as a parallel, John 1. 16. where it is said, that, of Christs fulness we receive grace for grace; that is, grace upon grace, or abundance of grace, all the grace we have; this grace and that grace, faith, and love, and patience, and humility; every grace, all grace you receive from Christ. Thus some illustrate these two places one by another. So Satan saith of Job here, skin for skin, that is, skin upon skin; a man will give all his skins, suppose he had many, he would part with all: or take skin for never so much of his outward estate, he will let all go to save his life.

There is yet another interpretation given of this, skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life; take the words comparatively, we translate it, yea all he hath. וכל That copulative particle, in the Hebrew, is rendered sometime and, sometime yea, sometime so; according to which last acception, the sence standeth thus: as a man will give skin for skin, so a man will part with all he hath for his life. We find some Scriptures wherein this particle is taken in the very same sence: To give you instance, Prov. 25. 3. there the Hebrew reads it thus, The heavens for height, the earth for depth, and the heart of Kings is unsearchable: Now this is clear, that the sense is comparative, and it is thus to be given, as the heaven is unsearchable for height, and the earth for depth, so the heart of the King is unsearchable: so vers. 25. of the same Chapter, it is thus read out of the Original, word for word, Cold water to a thirsty soul, and good news from a far Countrey; now we translate it according to the sense, and make it a comparison thus, As cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far Countrey. Thus also we interpret this place, and it carries a good sence, skin for skin, and all, &c. As a man would give skin for skin, one outward thing for another (for they take skin in both places for outward things, for the goods of this life) as a man would give or barter away one commodity for another; so a man will give all outward things for his life: Life is more valuable to all outward things, then any one particular thing is to another. It is ordinary to a Proverb, among men in danger, to say, Spare my life, and take my goods. How willingly doth the Mariner in a storm, unlade his Ship, and cast all his rich wares over-board, that he may preserve that precious Jewel, his Life? As a godly man will give life upon life, a thousand lives (if he had them) rather then lose his soul; so a natural man will give skin upon skin, gold upon gold, treasure upon treasure, that he may save his life. Let life lie at the stake, and a man will give all things he hath in the world for it, and think he hath a good bargain.

Here are five Expositions you see offered; the two latter to me seem the most clear, howsoever every one of them hath a fair sence in it; and so we are agreed upon the general; which is only to set forth the excellency and preciousness of life: there cannot be any miscarriage in pitching upon either of these interpretations. I shall give you some Notes from hence.

First, Observe what a blessing life is. Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life.

Life is the most precious treasure, the most excellent thing in Nature.

And let me tell you, life is the treasure that is now so much digged for; there are many abroad that are digging for your precious lives. Consider what lies at stake, and what will you give for the securing or reducing of it? Have we not cause to say of some of our bloody brethren, as Jacob did, Gen. 32. 12. when his brother Esau was marching towards him? I fear him (saith he) lest he will come and slay me, and the mother with the Children: loss of life was the thing Jacob feared. And Hesters speech in her Petition to the King, imports that all other losses might have been born, but loss of life, chap. 7. 3, 4. Let my life (saith she) be given at my petition, and my people at my request; for we are sold, I and my people to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish; but if we had been sold for bond-men and for bond-women, I had held my tongue. See how she wrought for life, for her own life, and the life of her people, and thought liberty not worth the asking for, compared with life. Moses made many demurs and excuses; I am not eloquent, &c. when God gave him commission to go into Egypt; but we hear of no delayes at all, when once God had said, Return into Egypt, for all the men are dead which sought thy life, Exod. 4. 19. God had not spoken thus, if he had not known there was such a scruple in his mind, which would have galled him worse in his travels to Egypt, then any pebble in his shoe.

Secondly, If life be the most precious thing, the richest Jewel in the world; then in the next place, learn to value your lives. You see how Satan values life here, out of an ill intent, only to extenuate and undervalue all the sufferings of Job; he sets his life at a very high rate, that he might make all his losses of no rate, not worth the speaking of. Let our intent be good, and then it is good for us to value our lives high, and to sell them at as dear a rate as we can, if we must sell them. You know what Solomon saith in the person of a natural man, A living Dog is better then a dead Lion; Eccles. 9. 4. We read what is said of the woman in the Gospel, that had spent all she had on Physitians: What was it for? Only to restore her health; which is a degree below life. Certainly if she spent all that she had, to obtain health, which is only the comfort of life, shall not we spend a part of that we have, to save our lives? As ships in danger to be wreck'd in a storm, are often preserved by casting some of their rich lading into the Sea; so it is possible, yea probable, that the casting away of some of your estates in this great storm, may be a means to save both your ship and your lives; your estates kept, may sink the Vessel, and then you must sink with it, and certainly die or swim for it; and hardly live. When Esau (Gen. 25. 32.) was hungry, and could not obtain a mess of pottage from his brother, but upon very hard terms, the sale of his Birth-right; Sell me thy Birth-right, saith Jacob; a precious Jewel indeed, which Esau should have valued more then his life; he comes to his price on this ground, Behold I am at the point to die, and what profit shall this Birth-right do to me? He was prophane Esau for saying so; that's the Apostles stile, Heb. 12. 16. It was prophaneness to prefer one morsel of meat before his Birth-right; because the Birth-right was a spiritual priviledge as well as natural: but there is no meer natural blessing, but we may both in wisdom and conscience part with, to keep our lives, when we are ready to die; ye may say, what will this estate, these riches do us good? If that, your estates may be the price of your lives, ye have reason, and it is your duty to part with them willingly; give some, give all; for what will these riches do you good, when you are ready to die; or already dead?

Further,

Further, be ready to give more then your estates for your lives. Give some of your blood for your lives; that's more: Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life. And which is yet more, give a limb for your lives. The whole is better then a part: And which is highest of all, venture your lives to save your lives. That which I intend, is only this; do not barter away your lives upon mean rates, upon low terms. If it comes to it (as we have great cause to fear it will, we see many have been put to it already) sell your lives as dear as you can. Indeed there are none in so great danger to lose their lives, as they that will not venture their lives. That of Christ, is true in this sence also, he that will save his life, shall lose it; such saving tends to undoing; yea, it tends to death. And whosoever will (venture to) lose his life, shall (most probably) find it, Matth. 16. 25. Let it not be said that you died to save charges; let it not be said, that you died to save your skins, or to save your blood; yea, let it not be said, that you died to save your lives: I mean, that you feared to hazard your lives for the securing of your lives. Give all that you have for your lives, venture life and all; your safety depends upon this hazard; by such a noble liberality, you are in the fairest way, not only to save all you have, but to gain more then you have.

Thirdly, If your lives be so much worth, what are your souls worth? What is this life, which is valued thus above all that a man hath? The Apostle James makes the question, and gives the answer, It is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away, Jam. 4. 14. A mans breath it is but in his nostrils, it is gone presently; yet you see, in a true value, all the world is below that. If you are to esteem your lives so, at what price will you set your souls? To save your lives, and save your souls, are two things. A man may save his life, and yet lose his soul; yea, many labour to save their lives in doing that, which will be the loss of their souls, poor creatures. Therefore look to that, set a high rate indeed upon your immortal souls; when estates, and liberties, and lives are called for, count them all as trash, that you may save your souls; hazard not your souls: If life be more worth then all the world, the soul is more worth then a thousand lives; What will it advantage a man to gain the world, and lose his soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? The truth is, a man shall not gain much to get the whole world, and lose his life; that loss is a loss irreparable, irrecompensible from the creature. Nature teacheth us to prize our lives above the world, and Grace teacheth us to value our souls above our lives. Therefore how unnatural are they that prefer a little profit before their lives? but O how ungracious are they, who prefer a little profit before their souls! Some will sin (as we say) for six pence; selling their own souls (as those false Prophets did the souls of their people) for handfuls of Barlie, and for pieces of bread, Ezek. 13. 19. And whereas a man should give all for his life, they will give their souls for a thing of nought. Know therefore the worth of your souls. Jesus Christ thought souls worth his life, and therefore died to save souls. How much then do our souls transcend our own lives? And if Christ laid down his life to ransom souls, do you rather lay down a thousand lives (if you had them) then endanger your souls, either by acting sin, or by submitting unto errour. In that case, let estate go, let liberty go, let life, let all go; for life hath not so much preheminence over all, as the soul hath over life.

Fourthly, If your lives are worth so much, then what is the Gospel worth? If a man would give all for his life, what should he give for his Religion, to maintain and uphold that in the purity and power of it? Life is a precious thing, a thing of great value; but when the Gospel comes in competition, then life is a poor commodity; and our breath but a perishing vapour. Such was the judgment of that great Apostle, Acts 20. 24. when the Holy Ghost had witnessed in every City, that bonds and afflictions did abide him, in preaching the Gospel; he thus resolves, But none of these things move me; neither count I my life dear unto my self, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received, to testifie the Gospel of the grace of God. His life came to a low rate in his esteem; how cheap was life, when the Gospel was spoken of? I count not my life dear, saith Paul: as all other outward things are mean and low, compared with life; so life it self is mean, a low thing, in comparison of the Gospel. This life is but the life of the body, but the Gospel is the life of the soul. Many men live, but no soul lives on this side, or without the Gospel. Now if you will offer much to save your lives, will you not offer much more to save the Gospel? In and about this, we may make the best improvement of Satans argument, Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, should he give for the Gospel, for Gospel-Ordinances, for Gospel-priviledges, for Gospel-light. Where, or for what will you venture and bid high, if not for the precious Gospel?

Lastly, If life be worth all, then hereby we may take measure of the love and bounty of Christ to poor sinners, who not only spent himself in all to his life, but spent life and all, that they might not perish; the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ was exceeding great towards us; That though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, 2 Cor. 8, 9. That though he was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God, yet he made himself of no reputation, Phil. 2. 6, 7. But how superabundant was his Grace towards us, that though he was the Prince of life, Acts 3. 15. Yet became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross, Phil. 2. 8. that we might live. If a man loves his life, so that he will give skin for skin, and all that he hath, to redeem it; then, O how did Christ love his Church, who gave not only his riches, and his reputation, but his life also for its redemption.

VERS. 5, 6, 7, 8.

But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face.
And the Lord said unto Satan, behold, he is in thine hand, but save his life.
So Satan went forth from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with sore boyles, from the sole of his foot unto his crown.
And he took him a pot-sheard to scrape himself withal, and he sate down among the ashes.

IN this fifth Verse, Satan goeth on, and makes a motion unto God (as we observed his method in the former Chapter) But put forth thine hand, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face. This is Satans motion. In the sixth Verse, we have a grant of this motion, bound up yet with a limitation, as it was in the former Chapter.

For the motion; But put forth thine hand now, and touch, &c. What it importeth, to put forth the hand, that was opened in the former Chapter, ver. 11. where we have the same expression; therefore we shall not stay upon it here. Consider now only that which is differing, a new object, upon which the hand must be put forth, and which Satan desireth might now be touched. It is the laying of his hand, not upon his Cattel, or upon his Estate, or upon his Children, but upon his flesh and his bone; Touch his bone and his flesh; that is, afflict his body: The Bone and the Flesh are the two chief parts, the material parts of the body; of them the whole Fabrick doth consist: the bone, it is as the timber in this house; and the flesh, it is as the lime and mortar filling it up. Touch this, saith Satan: And in that he saith, touch his bone and his flesh, he intends and requires a deep and a sore affliction upon his body; for if he had said only thus, touch his flesh, that had been an affliction upon his body: For we know often in Scripture, the flesh is put for the whole body, and sometimes for the whole man: therefore Satan is not satisfied with an expression general, but he putteth it in direct and express terms, Touch his flesh and his bone; that is, touch him so, as the pain and distemper may sink into his very bones, into his very marrow, touch him thus, and then you shall see what he will do.

The Bone it self is a part without feeling; yet to touch the bone, imports the greatest pain that can be felt. Touch his bone and his flesh, and then, saith he,

He will curse thee to thy face.

What it is to curse to the face, hath been opened already, in the former Chapter, at ver. 11. and I must refer you thither for the sence of this phrase; only in a word, take it thus, He will curse thee to thy face, is, as if Satan had said thus;

thus; Though Job did bless thee when he had a full estate, and though he did bless thee when thou didst empty him of his estate, and tookest all his goods from him; yet if thou do but touch his body, and afflict his bones, he will break forth into cursed language, both concerning thy person, and concerning thy service.

I will only mind you further of that which is here secretly couched in this expression, Touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face: here is a secret imprecation involved; he tacitly subjects himself to the curse of God, if Job curse not God. As if Satan should have said, If he do not curse thee to thy face, then do so and so to me; and think thus and thus of me: If you would have the meaning of Satan from the language of his Children, you may take the plain English of it thus, Touch but his bone and his flesh, and damn me, if he do not curse thee; send me to Hell presently. Satan indeed kept this cursed imprecation close wrapt up in that form of speaking; but now his Children speak it out: If you would have Satans heart from the mouths of the sons of Belial, a cursed and cursing generation amongst us, the plain English of it is this, God damn me, send me to Hell presently, if he curse thee not. Satan we see, was more modest then these sons of impudence and perdition; who openly imprecate upon, and devote themselves unto the wrath of God almost every word; these do not only imitate, but exceed the Copy which Satan sets them here, by bold blasphemy and horrid execrations.

And he will curse thee to thy face. We may from hence observe,

First, Satan had tried in vain to make Job curse God: Now he attempts a second time. Note,

That, When Satan cannot prevail against us by one means, he doth not despair of prevailing by another.

He gives not his cause over for lost, because he cannot carry it at first, he will try and try again. As it was with Balak, Numb. 23. when he sent for Balaam to curse the people, and saw the business did not prosper or succeed according to his malice, Balaam could not curse them; he brought him to another place; Come (saith he) I pray thee, I will bring thee to another place, peradventure it will please God, that thou maist curse me them from thence; though you could not do it in one place, you may in another. So Satan, if he cannot work his will one way, he will try a second or a third.

Num. 23. 27.

Satans unweariedness in a bad cause, when it succeeded not, reproves those who are so soon weary of a good one, if it succeed not: Many are ready to give up, if one means will not do it; they cast off hope, and say the cause is desperate. If one, or two, or three, or many means we use, fail, we ought to try still; never despair of the end, while the work is good, and the means are fair. In the morning sow thy seed (saith the Preacher) and in the evening withhold not thy hand; for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, this or that. I may add, with-hold not thy hand in the evening, though thou seest the morning-seed doth not prosper; this may have a blessing, though that had not.

Eccl. 11. 6.

Secondly, Observe, Satan trieth another way, and he trieth away more probable and efficacious for his ends then the former.

When a weaker will not do it, he provides stronger means. As God in punishing or chastening sinners, when a lesser judgment will not humble them, he sends a greater; God cometh not only with another, but with sorer judgments; If he will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins. So Satan, when by one temptation he cannot overcome, prepares not only another, but a stronger; he assaults them more and more: he not only musters new forces, but more compleat, to foil the soul. This should teach us, when we cannot subdue a corruption in our own hearts by one means, then to seek a better: And when by one prayer we cannot obtain a blessing, then to pray again, and to pray better; to pray with more life, with more faith, with more humility; then mix more fire with prayer, more zeal and fervency of spirit; mix more water with prayer, as Jacob, Hos. 12. wept and made supplication; above all, mix more of Christ in prayer, go out in his name and strength. When Balaks first messengers could not obtain Balaam to come with them, Balak was not discouraged or put off; but (saith the Text) Balak sent yet again Princes, more, and more honourable, Numb. 22. 15. Let not us be discouraged if our first prayers (which are our Messengers to God) are not answered; but let us send more and more honourable, more strong cries, more spiritual desires, which may take upon the heart of God. Why should Satan do more against us, then we will do for our selves?

Lev. 26.

Thirdly, Note this for our own caution,

That, We must not only expect continued or renewed afflictions and assaults from Satan, but we must expect greater and greater afflictions and assaults from Satan.

He hath some assaults that are but as Footmen, he will bring out his Horsemen at the next bout; And if having run with Footmen, they have wearied thee, how wilt thou contend with Horses? Jer. 12. 5. Be ready then, not only to run with the Foot, but to contend with Horses; prepare your selves for other, for more violent charges then you ever felt. Satan will, if he can, lay a closer siege to thy soul, then ever he hath done: As that one evil Spirit returned into the person out of whom he was gone, Luke 11. 24. with seven Devils worse then himself, so he often returns with seven temptations, worser, and stronger then before.

Fourthly, Observe what Satan picks out to be the matter of this second and stronger temptation; it is, to pinch Job in his flesh, to pinch his body. Note from hence,

That, The pain of the body is very powerful to disquiet and trouble the mind.

Satan is very confident to trouble and vex the mind of Job, by casting darts and diseases into his body. Physitians have a Rule, That the manners of the mind follow the temper of the body; and it is a more certain Rule, That the mind is much carried according to the distemper of the body; when the body is distempered, the mind is seldom at rest; the body and soul are such near neighbours, that they cannot but sympathize in each others sufferings. Some interpret that place of the Apostle, Gal. 4. 13, 14. concerning the weakness and sickness of his body; You know (saith he) how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the Gospel. We may safely joyn it with those other troubles, afflictions and reproaches which he endured, and were so great a disadvantage to his acceptance in the world. So the meaning is, that though his body was infirm, though he had many weaknesses upon him, yet he preached the Gospel. And then it follows in the next verse, My temptation which was in the flesh you despised not: observe, he calleth his bodily infirmity a temptation; the afflictions of the body, are great temptations to the soul. It is very considerable to this purpose, what the Apostle James saith, when he speaks of the several conditions of the Saints, and their duties in them, chap. 5. 13, 14. Is any man afflicted? let him pray; (he speaks that in general) Is any man merry? let him sing Psalms. Is any man sick? Is he pained by sickness in his body? What shall he do then? He doth not say, Is any man sick? let him pray; but, Is any man sick? let him call for the Elders of the Church, and let them pray over him: As if he should say, a sick man is very unfit to pray himself, though for himself; he hath need to call others to pray with him, and for him; he hath enough to do, to wrestle with his pain, and conflict with that affliction: In other afflictions, let him pray; but if he be sick, let him send for the Elders of the Church, and let them pray over him. A diseased body unfits the mind for holy duties. The prayer of sick Hezekiah is called chattering: Like a Crane or Swallow, so did I chatter, Isa. 33. It was rather chattering then praying; such a disquietness and uncomposedness was upon his spirit, through, or by the infirmity of his flesh. Pain is a piercing shaft in Satans quiver of temptations: Though the spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity, yet oftentimes, a wound in the body, wounds the soul; and the diseases of the flesh, make the soul sick: A wounded spirit no man can bear; and a wound in the body, is a burden too heavy for many men.

Pro. 18. 14.

And if it be so, then the pain and the weakness of the body is no advantage to repentance and returning unto God. How pitifully are they mistaken, who put off repentance till their bodies be in pain, till they are sick and weak; they do

do it upon this ground, because when they are in pain, they think they shall repent with more ease. Observe, if Satan thinks to have such an advantage upon a holy man, as to make him blaspheme when he is in pain, dost thou think pain will be an advantage to thy repentance? It is said, that at the pouring out of the fourth Vial, Rev. 16.9. when God did smite the inhabitants of the earth, and scorched them with great heat, that they blasphemed the Name of God (they did that which Satan presumed Job would do) and they repented not to give him glory. It is a woful thing to put off repentance to a pained body: pain in its own nature fits us rather to blaspheme and turn from God, then to return to him. Never think to have help for the cure of your souls, by the diseases of your bodies: usually we find, that either sick persons repent not, or theirs is but a sickly repentance. At the most, pain can but restrain your lusts, it can never heal them. The actings of some sins are quickened by diseases: At the most, a disease can but abate the acts of sin, it can never destroy the life of it. Death it self cannot kill sin: The sins of wicked men live when they are dead: the grave cannot consume them, no nor the fire of Hell wast their strength: the sins of unbelievers shall remain not only in their guilt, but in their power to all eternity. So much of Satans motion. But put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face.

Verse 6. And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thy hand, but save his life.

Here we have the Lords grant unto that motion of Satan, He is in thy hand, but save his life: Thou mayest do with his bone and his flesh what thou wilt, He is in thine hand. We have opened what it is to have a thing put into the hand, in the former Chapter, where the same expression is used, therefore I shall pass those words here. Note only this, that the Lord saith here, He is in thy hand, to prevent Satans cavil: as if he had said, Thou movest me to touch his bone and his flesh; well, lest thou shouldest say, that I have dealt too gently with him, and have smitten him with favour, I will put the rod or staffe into thine hand, do thou with his bone and his flesh what thou canst, spare him not. We know the Lord is able to strike stronger strokes, and give deeper wounds infinitely then Satan can, if he pleaseth; yet, the love of God to his children, stops his hand and breaks the blow: He corrects in judgment, and debates in measure, Isa. 27. 8. when he strikes his Children, he strikes them as Children, gently: Thus (2 Sam. 7. 14.) speaking of David's family, If he commit iniquity (saith God) I will chasten him with the rod of men; the word there used is Enosh, which signifies a weak man; I will chasten him with the rod of a weak man, of one that hath but a weak arm or hand, the hand of a sickly frail man: A weak, a sickly man cannot strike very hard. Thus saith God, I will chasten thy children, if they commit iniquity: they shall rather see my care, then feel my power in their corrections. Now (I say) lest Satan should pretend partiality, God puts Job into Satans hand, and gives him liberty to lay on as hard as his hand, acted with utmost malice, could smite him; thou hast liberty to smite him into the very valley of the shadow of death; to bring him so near death, that he may look into the graves mouth, but no further.

Save his life.] Here is Satans Chain, the limitation or restraint of his power. When God puts any of his Servants into Satans hand, he keeps Satan in his own hand. And as all the Elect are in Gods hand, to keep them from taking hurt, so the Devil is in Gods hand, to keep him from doing hurt to his Elect. Save his life.

The word Nepheſh here used, signifieth properly the soul; and the soul is in Scripture often put for the life; because the soul is the spring, the fountain of life; life is derived or diffused into the body from or by the soul: and as soon as the soul is parted from the body, life departs. Hence both this Hebrew word, and the Greek word ψύχη, have their names from breathing or respiring: For life goes out when breath goes out; when we cease breathing, we cease living. Our life is but a blast, a breath; The Lord formed man out of the dust of the earth, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and he became a living soul, Gen. 2.7. This is that vital spirit by which all quick things move; therefore Beasts, Birds, Fish, and creeping Things, are called living souls, Gen. 1. 20,24. And this life is called the blood, because it is contained or carried in the blood, Gen. 9.4. Further, it is very observable, that the Hebrews call the body separated from the soul, or a dead corps, Nepheſh, Num. 5. 2. c. 9. 10. c. 19. 11. Hag. 2. 14. Though the life be quite gone out, departed from the carkass or body of a dead man, yet that dead body is called life or soul; to note that it shall live again, and that the soul shall return unto it: The mystery of the Resurrection from death was implyed in the name of the dead. We find also that the Heathens called a dead body, a soul; possibly from some glimpse of the Resurrection. We lay up a soul in the grave saith the Poet. Virg. Æn. 3 Animampue ſepulchro condimus.

But how is this work put into Satans hand, The saving of his life? What is Satan become a Saviour? what salvation can we expect from him, whose name is Apollyon, and Abaddon, Rev. 9. 11. both which signifie a Destroyer. Shall we send to the Wolf to save the Sheep? or to the Vulture to save the Dove? Destruction is the delight of Satan, and it is his way; as he hath no hope to be saved himself eternally, so no will to save others temporally.

Observe, That here to save life, notes only a sparing from death; not a delivering from destruction, but a forbearing to destroy. Satan saved his life negatively, that is, he did not take it away: he cannot save positively, or restore that which was ready to perish; he doth not save as a deliverer, but as a murtherer, who would kill his brother, but cannot. He saves, not for want of will, but for want of power: when he is forced to spare, his nature is to devour. This devouring Lyon hunts for the pretious life, even when God saith, Save his life. Servat animam quia eam non perdit. Drus.

It may be questioned here, Why Satan (for that is implyed) desired so to destroy the life of Job? God would never have limited and chained him up, but that Satan had a mind to suck his blood, or afflict him unto death.

These two Reasons may be given, why Satan would have his life.

The one might be this; Because it was a thing doubtful with him (though he bragged much of it) whether he should attain his end or no, to make Job curse God; when therefore he saw he could not overcome his spiritual life, it would have been some revenge to him to destroy his natural life. As some wicked ones, his Agents, when by all their treats or flatteries they cannot make a man sin, which is to destroy his spiritual life, their revenge breaks forth against his natural life, to destroy that: This is the method of persecution, first to attempt the death of the soul, by drawing or terrifying unto sin; and if they fail of that, then death is inflicted on the body.

Or again in the second place, he being doubtful in himself (though he made no doubt in words) whether his plot would be successful, to make Job curse God; he (I say) doubting this design might not draw him to sin, resolved to take away his life, that so Job might never have told tales of his victory, or have reported his conquest to the world. At least by his death he might obscure the business, and bury it with some slander: saying that Job dyed with discontent and grief; that he blasphemed God when he dyed, that he wished for death, and could not hold out any longer. Much like that device of some Jesuits, who have blown it abroad, that our most zealous opposers of Romish errors, whom they could never move, either by writing or disputing, while they lived, have yet recanted all when they dyed. Wherefore lest Satan should have drawn a curtain over the glory of Job's victory, by aspersing him after his death, the Lord saith, Save his life, Job shall survive his troubles, that matters may come to light, and a true report be made and left upon record both of thy implacable malice and enmity, and of his invincible patience and sincerity.

And this may lead us yet further to consider, why God was so careful of that precious part, his life.

For some may say,

Had it not been glory to God, and honour to Job, (like that of Martyrdom) if he had dyed under the hand of Satan, holding fast his own integrity, blessing God even unto death?

I grant this, but yet God knew that the saving of his life would be more advantagious both to himself and his Job, for for thoſe ends: wherefore he ſaith, Save his life, deſtroy him not.

Firſt thus, God intended to make Job a Monument of mercy, as well as a Monument of ſuffering; he intended to ſet him up to all the world, as one, in whom they might behold the goodneſs of God in raiſing up, mixt with his wiſdom in caſting down; that men might learn hope from Job, as well as patience from Job. Therefore ſaith God, Save his life, I have ſomewhat elſe to do with him; I will raiſe him up again, and in him an everlaſting Monument both of his patience in ſuffering, and of my own power in reſtoring. Indeed if he had dyed in the conflict, and left his bones in the field, he had been a wonderful example of conſtancy: but he had not been ſuch an example of mercy, if his life had not been ſaved.

There may be this in it too, Save his life, ſaith God, I will have him preſerved in this combat, his courage and carriage in it is my delight. God loveth to ſee his people holding out, tugging and continuing in ſuch aſſaults and temptations. If any thing in the world gives delight to God, this is the thing that delighteth him. The Heathen thought this the ſport of their Gods: Seneca, in his Book of Providence, ſpeaking of Cato, and other gallant Roman ſpirits, ſaith, the gods delighted to look upon them in their conflicts with Fortune. To ſee them wraſtle with ſome great calamity, with ſome great danger, was ſuch a ſpectacle, as would draw off Jupiter from his greateſt buſineſs. It is a moſt certain truth, that the moſt true God doth love and delight to ſee his Children wraſtling with ſome great calamity: to ſee a poor man, who is but fleſh and blood, wraſtling with principalities and powers, with the Devil and powers of darkneſs; this is a ſight God himſelf (as we may ſo ſpeak) rejoyceth in. When Abraham had finiſhed that great combat about ſacrificing his Son, he calleth the place Jehovah-jireh, the Lord will ſee, or the Lord doth ſee, the Lord doth behold; as if that had been a ſight which God himſelf came down to look upon. As when ſome great man or ſtrange ſhew paſſeth by, we go out to ſee it; ſo God cometh down upon Mount Moriah to ſee a ſight: And what was it? To ſee Abraham in that great temptation aſſaulted and overcoming. Here was a ſpectacle for the great Jehovah, and therefore he calls the place Jehovah-jireh, the Lord hath ſeen. I doubt not but this place alſo of Job's tryal, might have born the ſame name. As the Lord will be ſeen in the mount of our afflictions to provide for us, ſo he will ſee us in the mount of our afflictions, to pleaſe himſelf. The Pſalmiſt deſcribeth God looking down from Heaven upon the children of men, to ſee if there were any that did underſtand, that did ſeek God, Pſal. 53. 2. Surely then if any do ſeek God, much more if they ſuffer from him, or for him, in a holy manner, he will look down from Heaven to ſee them.

Gen. 22. 14.

Thirdly, I will note that as another ground why God would have his life ſpared, becauſe he had much uſe of him, when he was in that condition, full of ſores and ſcabs.

A godly man is never in ſuch an eſtate, but God hath ſome uſe of his life.

Therefore ſaith God, Save his life, though he be full of ſores, or rather from the crown of the head to the ſole of the foot one continued ſore: though he be a moſt lamentable creature, and cannot wag hand or foot in any ſervice of man, yet ſpare his life, for he may thus ſtand me in very great ſtead, and do me more ſervice then many thouſands, who (as we ſpeak) are found wind and limb, and have not one blemiſh upon the whole body. A godly perſon is ever uſeful to God; though he cannot ſtir a limb, yet his life may be uſeful to God: whereas a wicked man, though ſtrong and healthy, though furniſh'd with outward comforts and accommodations, is altogether unſerviceable; he will not do God a ſtroke of work, though he have received great pay and wages aforehand. A godly man will ſerve God in and by his poverty, in and by his ſickneſs, when diſeaſed, when diſtreſſed, when nothing is to be ſeen upon him but ſcabs and boils. Grace will work through all the defects and decayes of nature. And when the life of nature can ſcarce move one member of the outward man upon the earth, the life of grace moves all the members of the inward man toward Heaven. Though the outward man periſh, yet the inward man is renewed day by day, 2 Cor. 4. 16.

Laſtly, God ſaved his life, as a puniſhment and vexation upon Satan. The Talmudiſts are vouched to affirm, that it was not ſo grievous to Job to be afflicted in his body, as it was to Satan when God reſtrained him from deſtroying his life. As if a man ſhould be permitted to crack the glaſs, but he muſt not ſpill the wine. That his life muſt be kept whole in him, was Satans wound. It is a torture to malice not to do the utmoſt miſchief. So much for the clearing of theſe words, Behold he is in thine hand, but ſave his life.

From the Lords grant, obſerve,

Firſt, That God doth oftentimes give up the bodies of his faithful Servants, to be abuſed and tormented by Satan and his inſtruments.

He is in thine hand, thou mayeſt do with him what thou wilt, on this ſide death. Touch his fleſh and his bone, or touch his fleſh to the bone; ſtrike as hard, wound as deep as thou canſt. It is ſaid, Revel. 2. 10. That Satan ſhould caſt ſome of them, that is, of the Servants of God, into priſon. God gave up their bodies to Irons and Fetters, to the Stocks and Shackles: He permits thoſe bodies, which are Temples of the Holy Ghoſt, to be thruſt into dungeons and the chambers of death.

Therefore do not think it ſtrange to ſee the bodies of the Children of God put into cruel and bloody hands; though they are veſſels of honour, and Temples of the Holy Ghoſt, yet God may give up thoſe bodies to be defiled and polluted with the outrages of the moſt abominable wretches. Conſider what the Apoſtle ſpeaks of the Jewiſh Martyrs, Heb. 11. How were their bodies abuſed and mangled? They were ſtoned, they were ſawn aſunder, they were ſlain with the ſword: they wandered about in ſheep ſkins and goat ſkins, being deſtitute, afflicted, tormented: of whom the world was not worthy. Their bodies had not a houſe to dwell in, nor garments to put on, in whoſe ſouls God himſelf dwelt, and had put upon them the garment of Salvation. Who is able to expreſs, yea, to conceive what ſtrange inventions of cruelties have been brought into the world to vex and torment the bodies of the Saints? The ſtories of the Primitive times are full: but the Fathers of the Romiſh Inquiſition have exceeded them all. Satan here invents a ſtrange diſeaſe as an engine to torture Job's body, in that he mixt the rack and the wheel, the ſword and the ſaw, the fiery gridiron and the boyling oyl: The pain of a thouſand deaths was heighten'd in that malignant deſtemper.

Secondly, He is in thine hand, but ſave his life, ſaith God. The matter wherein Satan is limited is life; thence note,

That life and death are in the hand of God.

It is truth, that all we have is in the hand of God; but God keeps our life in his hand laſt of all, and he hath that in his hand in a ſpecial manner. So David expreſſes it, Thou holdeſt my ſoul in life; though the ſoul continue, life may not continue; there is the ſoul, when there is not life; life is that which is the union of ſoul and body; Thou holdeſt my ſoul in life; that is, thou holdeſt ſoul and body together. So Daniel deſcribes God to Belſhazzar, Dan. 5. 23. The God in whoſe hand thy breath is, and whoſe are all thy wayes, haſt thou not glorified. The breath of Princes is in the hand of God; and the ſame hand holds the breath of the meaneſt Subject: This may be matter of comfort to us in ſuch times as theſe are, times of danger, and times of death; when the hand of man is lifted up to take thy life, remember thy life is held in the hand of God. And as God ſaid here to Satan, Afflict the body of Job, but ſave his life; ſo God ſaith ſtill to bloody wretches, who are as the limbs of Satan, The bodies of ſuch and ſuch are in your hands, the eſtates of ſuch and ſuch are in your hands, but ſave their lives. The life of a man is never at the mercy of a creature; though it be a common ſpeech of men, when they have a man under them, Now I have you at my mercy. Though ſome brag as Laban did to Jacob, It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt; yet God often checks them (as he did Laban) from ſo much as ſpeaking hurt, Gen. 31. 29. but the God of your Father ſpake unto me yeſter-night, ſaying, Take thou heed, that thou ſpeak not to Jacob either good or bad. Creatures, though full of love, cannot ſpeak good; and though full of malice, they cannot ſpeak bad, if God forbid: then much leſs can they do us hurt, and leaſt of all hurt our lives, if God with-hold. David triumphs in his intereſt in ſuch a God, Pſal. 68. 20. Our God is the God of ſalvation (that is, of deliverance, of outward deliverance (for that is eſpecially there meant) and unto God the Lord belong the iſſues from death, or the goings out from death, that is, God hath all wayes that lead out from death in his own keeping, he keepeth the key of the door, that lets us out from death; when a man is in the valley of the ſhadow of death, where ſhall he iſſue out? where ſhall he have a paſſage? No where, ſaith man, he ſhall not eſcape; but God keepeth all the paſſages; when men think they have ſhut us up in the jaws of death, he can open them, and deliver us, To him belong the iſſues from death: It is an alluſion to one that keepeth a paſſage or a door: And God is a faithful keeper, and a friendly keeper, who will open the door for the eſcape of his people, when they cry unto him. It is expreſt ſo in Pſal. 141. 7. Our bones are ſcattered at the graves mouth: as when one cutteth or cleaveth wood upon the earth, that is, we are even ready to die, to be put into the grave. What then? But mine eyes are upon thee, O God the Lord: in thee is my truſt, leave not my ſoul deſtitute. Keep me from the ſnare which they have laid for me. Let the wicked fall into their own nets, whilſt I withall eſcape; that is, make me a way to eſcape: As if he ſhould ſay, Thou haſt the key of the gate, by which we may iſſue out from death: Lord, I look that thou ſhouldeſt now open it for me.

Let it comfort us that God hath our lives, and the iſſues from death in his own hand. When Satan thought he had Job faſt enough lockt up in the valley of the ſhadow of death, God kept him ſafe, he opened a door and let him out.

Thirdly note, That as God hath life in his hand in a ſpecial manner, ſo he takes ſpecial care of the lives of his people.

Save his life (ſaith God) I will look to that: Pſal. 116. 15. Precious in the ſight of the Lord is the death of his Saints. Precious is their death; not that death it ſelf is precious; a privation hath no preciouſneſs in it: but their life is precious, therefore he will have a great price for their death; God puts off the life of a Saint at a dear rate. Woe unto thoſe who violently and unjuſtly take away that which is ſo precious in the eſteem of God; at one time or other he will make them pay dear for ſuch Jewels.

Fourthly, obſerve, It is mercy to have our lives, though we loſe all things elſe.

You ſee here God ſaith concerning Job, Save his life; I have given thee his eſtate, thou haſt ſpoiled that; now I will leave his body in thine hand, wound that, afflict that, but ſave his life. Here was mercy. Therefore it was a ſpecial promiſe and priviledge made and granted to ſome in times of great publick ſufferings and common calamities, as to Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, Jer. 39. 8. and to Baruch the Scribe, Jer. 45. 5. That their lives ſhould be given to them for a prey; as if God had ſaid, It is no ordinary favour, in times of common danger, to have your lives for a prey; you complain for this loſs and that loſs, and you have cauſe too, but think withall that you have your lives. And why is it ſaid, that they ſhould have their lives for a prey? A prey you know properly is that which we take out of the hand of an enemy, that which was in his poſſeſſion; the lives of theſe perſons were ſaid to be given to them for a prey in thoſe perillous times, becauſe God by his care and providence did (as it were) fetcht back their lives from the hand of the enemy: their lives in natural reaſon were in their enemies hands, but God undertakes to fetch them back, and recover them out of their hands, and ſo they were promiſed to have their lives for a prey. Thus God giveth to many of his people their lives for a prey, and they are to bleſs God in this behalf, whatſoever afflictions and troubles are upon them, that yet they have their lives.

Laſtly; We may hence raiſe our meditations to conſider the wonderful love of God to us in Chriſt: when God ſent Chriſt into the world to ſave ſinners, he put him into the hands of Satan and his inſtruments; yet he doth not ſay (as here) to Satan, Save his life: Afflict him as thou wilt, perſecute him in his cradle; deſpiſe him, ſlander him, revile him, accuſe him, crown his head with thorns, ſcourge him, buffet him, ſpit in his face, &c. but ſave his life: No, this bound is not ſet to the malice of Satan, or the rage of men, God gives them leave to take life and all. Concerning his Servant Job, God ſaith to Satan, Spare his life; but when he ſendeth his Son, he gives no order to have him ſpared, but gives his cruel enemies full ſcope. How wonderful is the love of God, who for our ſakes was ſo expenſive of his Sons life, whenas he thus ſpared the life of a Servant? If Satan had been chained up from taking the life of Chriſt, he had been at liberty to triumph over our lives, to all eternity. We had all died, if God had ſaid to Satan concerning Chriſt, Save his life.

Thus we ſee the Commiſſion of Satan againſt Job, and the limitation of it. Satan was not tied up ſo ſhort as he was in the former Chapter, and yet ſtill he is tied. There he might meddle with Job's eſtate, but not with his body; here he may meddle with his body, but not with his life: Though God lengthen Satans chain, yet he never lets Satan looſe; though he be at more liberty then before, yet he is in cuſtody; there is a But of reſtriction upon him ſtill. It is our comfort, that though Satan (as Philoſophers ſpeak of liquids, water, and the like) cannot keep himſelf in his own bounds, yet he is eaſily kept in bounds by the word and power of God.

Verſe 7. So went Satan forth from the preſence of the Lord, and ſmote Job with ſore boils, from the ſole of the foot unto his crown.

Verſe 8. And he took him a potſheard to ſcrape himſelf withall, and he ſate down among the aſhes.

So Satan went forth from the preſence of the Lord. He is preſently upon execution, as ſoon as he had his Commiſſion. We have explained theſe words in the former Chapter.

See then what he doth: He ſmote Job with ſore boils from the ſole of his foot unto his crown.

He ſmote Job, ſaith the Text. In the former afflictions Satan had inſtruments to work by: He ſtirred up the Caldeans and Sabeans: he moved the fire and the wind into a conſpiracy againſt Job: Here he (that he might be ſure it ſhould be done fully) doth it himſelf.

He ſmote Job. When the Devil ſmiteth, he ſmiteth throughly, he ſmiteth home. When Angels ſtrike, they ſtrike to purpoſe. It is ſaid Acts 12. that an Angel of the Lord ſmote Herod, and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghoſt. Spirits have mighty power.

He ſmote Job; why, he did not demand to ſmite Job, he did but deſire to have him Toucht: you heard before ſomewhat of that. Satan moves that his fleſh and his bone might be only touched; now, his motion being granted, it is ſaid he ſmote him. There are two things in this ſmiting:

Firſt, It notes ſuddenneſs: He did not afflict him by a diſeaſe that grew upon him by degrees; as you know boils and ſores ordinarily are long a gathering, breeding in, and breaking out of the fleſh; but he was all over full of theſe boils in an inſtant.

Secondly, Smiting intimates the vehemency of it, a killing ſtroke, a deaths wound; the Hebrew word ſignifieth to ſtrike to death. So here was a ſudden ſtroke, and a vehement ſtroke. It muſt needs at once wound both his mind and his body, on a ſudden, in a moment, to be filled with ſores, and covered with a ſcab; he ſaw no cauſe, he had no prognoſticks which might induce a ſuſpition that his body was in ſuch a diſtemper; and ſo it looked the more like an immediate ſtroke from an offended God. Every word hath its weight and emphaſis to add weight and anguiſh to this affliction.

It may here be queſtioned, how Satan can be ſaid to ſmite? And the ſame doubt ariſeth about this action of good Angels; one of which, as executioner of Gods wrath, ſmote of the Aſſyrians in one night an hundred and fourſcore and five thouſand, Iſa. 37. 36. and another ſmote Herod, Acts 12.

I anſwer, how Angels ſmite is a ſecret that we cannot expreſs, nor fully comprehend. For this and the like expreſſions of ſmiting, are ſuted to the nature of the Patient, not of the Agent; man being a material ſubſtance, is ſuſceptive or capable of ſmiting, or of a ſtroke: But an Angel being an immaterial ſubſtance, cannot ſmite properly, and he is therefore only ſaid to ſmite a man, becauſe we cannot ſignifie an effect or impreſſion upon a body, but by ſuch a word. We know that in the plague or other diſeaſes, when they are immediately inflicted by Angels, man receives a ſtroak, and therefore is ſaid to be ſmitten. But how the Angel gives that ſtroak, or ſmites, is not known. Man may feel himſelf ſmitten by an Angel, but how the Angel ſmites he cannot underſtand. This word is fitted to the recipient, not to the efficient cauſe of the diſeaſe, or plague, or death.

He ſmote him with boyles.] The Hebrew word ſignifieth an ulcer, a burning or an inflaming ulcer, an ulcer that cometh from extream heat, or is extream hot. Satan did (as it were kindle a fire in the bowels of Job, inflamed his blood, and heated the humors of his body, from whence theſe boiles, theſe ulcers, theſe ſores did ariſe. The Grammarians expreſs it ſometime more generally, a filthy ſcab; ſometime more particularly, an ulcer, a boile, ſometime a leproſie; it is indeed any foul diſeaſe breaking out upon the body.

The ſame word is uſed, Exod. 9. 10. where it is ſaid, that God ſmote the Egyptians and the Magicians with boyles. It was one of the plagues of Egypt that was inflicted upon Job; we need ſay no more of it then that, to ſhew that it was a grievous plague, a moſt painful ſore: for it is added in that place of Exodus, that the Magicians could not ſtand before Moſes becauſe of the boiles.

Again, it is not only a ſmiting, and ſmiting with a boile; but there is an Epithite added, he ſmote him with ſore boiles, with an evil boile: among evils ſome are worſe, theſe were the worſt kind of boiles. There are many ſorts of boiles, ſome are not ſo bad as others, though all are bad enough. Now leſt any ſhould think Job's boyles were not the moſt painful and malignant, a word is joyned to expreſs it to the height: in the kind they were boyles, and (intenſive, or) in the degree, they were the worſt and moſt tormenting boyles.

Further in the fourth place, we know it is painful for a man to have one boyle, eſpecially an angry burning one, a boile of the worſt ſort; but it is ſubjoyned, he was ſmitten with boyles, from the ſole of his foot to his crown. To be all over boyles, and to be all over-run with the moſt painful kind of boyles, what a vehement pain muſt this be? From the ſole of his foot unto his crown, there is the extent of this ſtroak. Intenſive, it was the worſt kind of boyle, and Extenſive, it was all over his body, no part free.

From the ſole of his foot unto his crown.] It is uſual in Scripture thus to ſignifie the whole body: as Deut. 28. 35. The Lord ſhall ſmite thee in the knees and in the legs, with a ſore botch that cannot be healed, from the ſole of the foot to the top of the head, or to the crown. And Iſa. 1. 6. when the Prophet would expreſs what a general blow the body politick had received from the hand of God by his judgements, (ſo it is there to be underſtood) he ſaith there were wounds and bruiſes, and putrifying ſores, from the ſole of the foot even unto the head. That is, the whole body politick, the whole State had at one time or other, or all at one time received wounds and blows, and ſtroaks from the hand of God. The extreams comprehend all the parts: That which extends from one extream or outmoſt part to another, is extended through all; from Eaſt to Weſt, is all the world over; and from head to foot, is all the body over. So then Satan ſmote him from the ſole of his foot unto his crown, is, He ſmote his whole body.

All pains and diſtempers were gathered into this one malady, and all parts of his body were ſmitten, as if they had been but one member: only his tongue was untoucht, as is commonly obſerved, That it might be free to blaſpheme God, who had thus polluted the beauty and comlineſs of his body, who had thus imbittered the comforts of his ſoul.

Job being thus ſmitten, would ſurely look out for help. Though it be exceeding ſinful (with Aſa diſeaſed in his feet) to ſeek to The Phyſitians, and not the Lord; yet it is our duty to ſeek to the Lord and the Phyſitian: To truſt in means is to neglect God; to neglect means is to tempt God. Doubtleſs holy and wiſe Job walkt in a path between theſe two; he neither truſted nor neglected means, but uſed them; yet alaſs it was with Job, as it is ſaid in the Prophet concerning Ephraim and Judah, That when Ephraim ſaw his ſickneſs, and Judah ſaw his wound; then went Ephraim to the Aſſyrian, and ſent to King Jareb: yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound. Though Job (as they in their civil ſickneſs) ſeeing his ſickneſs and his wound, had ſent to this and that Phyſitian; their anſwer would have been, We cannot heal you nor cure you of your wound. His diſeaſe was of the nature of thoſe which are called, The Phyſitians reproach: They could not diſcover any natural cauſe of it, and therefore they could not preſcribe any artificial cure of it. Phyſitians of greateſt value, in Job's caſe, were Phyſitians of no value. And therefore to ſhew that either all had in vain attempted to cure him, or that none durſt undertake the cure, the Text ſaith, That he took a pot-ſheard to ſcrape himſelf withall, and he ſate down among the aſhes.

2 Chron. 16. 12.

Hoſ. 5. 13.

Theſe words are a further aggravation of Job's affliction. When he is in this manner ſmitten, ſmitten with boyles, ſmitten with the worſt of boyles, ſmitten with boyles all over, from the ſole of his feet unto his crown: ſurely a man in this pickle had need to have ſome good tendance and looking to; ſuppoſe the Phyſitians and Chyrurgions could not cure him, yet they might eaſe him; if they had plyed him with Fomentations and ſuppling oyles, if they had bound up his ſores with fine linnen, to mitigate and mollifie them: if ſuch applications and attendance had not been a refreſhing to him, yet they would have been a reſpect to him; if they had not been an allay to his pain, yet they would have been an honour to his perſon. But (as this 8. verſe ſhews us) when the man was thus nothing but ſores, he had then nothing to help him: He might ſay (as David afterwards in a ſad condition, Pſal. 142. 4.) I look'd on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me, refuge failed, or periſhed from me, no man cared for my ſoul. When thus, Lover and Friend, Phyſitian and Chyrurgion, Wife and Servant were far from him, at leaſt in duty and affection; then he is forced to be both Patient and Phyſitian, Sick and Nurſe; he took him a pot-ſheard to ſcrape himſelf withall. Poor man! He who was lately in health, and the greateſt man in the Eaſt, being now ſick, hath nothing left him but a piece of a broken pitcher.

There are four aggravations of his affliction in this.

The firſt is this, That he could get none to dreſs him; he was fain to do it himſelf, ſaith the Text. Neither Wife, nor Servants, nor Friends would meddle with him. A hard caſe!

Then ſecondly, Conſider what a tool he had to do it with. He was left to be his own Chyrurgion, and his dreſſing inſtrument was a potſheard. The word ſignifies, ſometimes a whole earthen pot, ſometimes a broken piece of it, a ſheard as we call it. Here is no mention of fine linnen and ſalves to heal, or of oyle to ſupple theſe ſoares; only a hard pot-ſheard is the tool, and ſcraping is all the Chyrurgery. A hard caſe!

Thirdly, This intimates either that his body was ſo loathſom by reaſon of the diſeaſe, that he was loath to touch himſelf with his hands: As we ſay proverbially in our Language concerning a deformed or filthy creature; a man would ſcarce touch ſuch an one with a pair of Tongs. So, as if Job had ſo abhorred himſelf, that he was loth to touch himſelf with his bare hands, he muſt take ſomewhat, and for want of a better, a pot-ſheard to ſcrape himſelf; he had not the heart (as it were) to touch himſelf, his diſeaſe was ſo foul, that (as we ſay) it turn'd his ſtomack. This ſome give as a reaſon why he took a pot-ſheard, his body was ſo filthy that he was loth to touch it with his hands.

Or as others give the reaſon, his boiles and ſores did ſo over ſpread and envenome his hands to the very nailes, that it was a pain for him to touch himſelf: his fingers were ſo ſore, that he had ſcarce any uſe of them; this conſtrained him to make a poor ſhift, even to take a pot-ſheard to ſcrape himſelf withall. What a lamentable caſe was this!

Fourthly, There follows yet a further aggravation of his affliction. If a man be ſick and full of ſores, yet if he can get an eaſie bed or ſome ſoft place to lie upon, it is a great comfort. You know how men will remove from bed to bed, from place to place, when they are diſtempered and in pain But ſee where Job lies, he hath no down-bed nor ſoft pillows, neither couch nor chair to ſit in, but

He ſate down among the aſhes.

There are two expoſitions concerning this; for his ſitting in the Aſhes, may be taken as a voluntary act, or as a neceſſary act. Some take it as a voluntary act of Job, and that he did it Elective; when he was in that condition, he went out and choſe to ſit among the Aſhes; and ſo his ſitting among the Aſhes was a note of his humiliation and abaſement: As often in Scripture, to ſit down in aſhes, is as much as to repent and humble our ſelves deeply before God, to lie in the very duſt; as it is expreſt of Job, (Chap. 42. 6.) when he had ſeen God, I abhor my ſelf, ſaith he, and I repent in duſt and aſhes; alluding to that cuſtom of ſitting in aſhes when they did repent. So you find in that ſolemn humiliation of the Ninivites, Jon. 3. 6. that when word came to the King of Ninive (namely that Jonah had propheſied the ruine of the City within forty dayes) he aroſe from his throne, and he layed his robe from him, and covered himſelf with ſack-cloth, and ſate in aſhes. Chriſt upbraiding Chorazin and Bethſaida, tells them, that if the mighty works which were done in them had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they had repented long ago in ſack-cloath and aſhes, Matth. 11. 22. In great mournings, the Heathen uſed to ſit in or ſprinkle themſelves with aſhes. As Homer reports of Ulyſſes after a Ship-wrack, and of others, whom Druſius hath obſerved on this Text. Iſa. 61. 3. the promiſe is, that God will give beauty for aſhes; that is, they that humble themſelves and lie in aſhes, ſhall have a happy and comfortable reſtauration. So that this act of Job might be voluntary, and a geſture of repentance; ſitting down among the aſhes, to humble and abaſe himſelf before God.

The Papiſts are ſuperſtitiouſly ceremonious in this point at this day: annually obſerving a day which they affect to call Aſhwedneſday, on which they ſprinkle themſelves with aſhes, as a preparatory to their formal Lenton Repentance. But we have not ſo learned Chriſt.

Secondly, We may take it for a neceſſitated act, that he was forced to this, to go and ſit among the aſhes, (or as moſt from the Septuagint tranſlate it, to ſit down upon a dung-hill) and that in two reſpects.

Firſt, In regard of his poverty and want, as if he were ſo bereft and deſtitute of all outward things, that he had not a houſe to put his head in, nor any other conveniencies to make uſe of; but was conſtrained to go out, and ſit upon the dung-hill or amongſt the aſhes.

Secondly, Others rather conceive, that the neceſſity did ariſe from the contagion and loathſomneſs of his diſeaſe, ſo that he was forced to go out of doors, he filled the houſe with ſuch a noiſom ſmell.

Or he was forced to go out as a Leper; concerning whom the Law was afterwards, you know, that they ſhould be put out of the Camp or City; and it was a Law grounded upon reaſon, and the common light of nature, though it had a ſpiritual ſignification, as given to the Jews. The Septuagint ſay expreſly, he ſate upon the dung-hill without the City, as Lepers were wont to be, according to the Law of Moſes; and as we ſee executed in that caſe of Uzziah the King, being a Leper, he dwelt in a houſe by himſelf alone, and was cut off from the houſe of the Lord, 2 Chron. 26. 21.

But that Job ſate either without the City, or upon a dung-hill, is only a conjecture, and beſides the Text. Which way ſoever we take it, it is a great aggravation of Job's ſorrows. Take it for a neceſſitated ſitting in the aſhes abroad, it infers, that either he was ſo poor as that he had not an houſe to be in; or that his diſeaſe was ſo contagious that he could not be endured in the houſe. Or take it for a voluntary act, that he did chooſe to ſit in aſhes, it was an aggravation of his affliction; for then it notes that he was in the loweſt, in the ſaddeſt condition that can be imagined: ſitting in aſhes, being an emblem of extream ſorrow, and never uſed but in times of greateſt calamity, publick or perſonal.

So that here every circumſtance is an aggravation of Job's affliction. He was ſmitten by Satan, and he ſmote hard enough: he ſmote him, and he ſmote him with boyles, he ſmote him with the moſt malignant kind of boyles; he ſmote him with ſuch boyles all over, from the ſole of his feet to his crown; and when he was in this conditino, he had no Nurſe, no Chyrurgion, no Phyſitian to help him, he was forced to take a pot-ſheard to ſcrape himſelf: he had no ſoft bed prepared to lye on, nor (as many have thought) houſe to be in; but out of the City, or out of his houſe he muſt, and among the aſhes, upon the dung-hill. Lo, there he ſits. What one ſaid of an exact Hiſtory of a great Prince, That ſurely it was written rather in theory as a pattern or picture of a Prince, then according to the truth of a Hiſtory: So we may ſay of this deſcription of Job's troubles; that ſurely it was written rather as a ſtudied pattern of man's ſufferings, then as an accompliſht Hiſtory of the ſufferings of any man: yea who almoſt can go ſo far in imagination, as Job went in real paſſion? But we will paſs from the deſcription of his ſorrows, to ſome Obſervations upon them.

First, Here we ſee, That Satan if he be permitted, hath a power ſuddenly to afflict the body with diſeaſes, and that is a power far tranſcending all the power that is in man.

Man is able to wound the body of his brother with a material inſtrument, but all the Tyrants in the world cannot ſmite the body with a diſeaſe, or command a man into ſickneſs; though God ſhould ſay to them, as here to Satan, I give you leave, yet they muſt leave that to Satan: whoſe help is ſometime begg'd by envious wretches, who would kill their brethren without a Sword, and vex them unſeen. Man muſt have a weapon to ſmite, but Satan can ſmite and kill without a weapon, if God ſay the word. Man can ſpill the blood, but Satan can poiſon the blood: he can infect the humors, and taint the ſpirits more ſubtilly, more ſpeedily then the moſt skilful poiſoner in Rome. We ſhewed before how ſuddenly Satan can raiſe commotions in the Air, ſtormes and tempeſts there; he can do the like in our bodies: for ſuch are diſeaſes in the body as ſtorms and tempeſts in the Air. Storms make (as it were) a confuſion among the Elements, and are the diſtemper of Nature: diſeaſes make a confuſion among the humors, and diſtemper the conſtitution and ſpirits of the body. It is ſaid of the woman in Luke 13. 16. that Satan had bound her 28. yeares; Obſerve in that, the power Satan hath over the body, if God give him liberty to exerciſe it: as cruel men can bind in chains, and caſt the body into priſon for many years; ſo Satan can bind the body with a ſpirit of infirmity as with a chain.

Secondly, Obſerve this, That health and ſtrength of body are a very great bleſſing.

You ſee Satan deſires to try Job by taking away this bleſſing laſt, and he thought this would make Job curſe God: you may ſee the value of it by his deſire to deſtroy it. Health is the Prince of earthly bleſſings. We ſay, he lives miſerably that lives by Medicines, who to uphold Nature is in the continual uſe of Art. How miſerably then doth he live, whom Art and Medicines cannot reſtore to health, who is diſeaſed beyond the help of Phyſick?

I might mind you likewiſe from this, to remember what frail bodies we live in, even ſuch, as have in them the ſeeds of all diſeaſes. Sin indeed is the ſeed of ſickneſs and of death: And hence it is, that if the humors of the body be a little ſtirr'd, they quickly turn to a diſeaſe; and this houſe of clay is ready to diſſolve and fall. What is the ſtrength of the body, that we ſhould truſt it? or the beauty of the body that we ſhould be proud of it? We ſee in Job, how quickly the ſtrength of it is turned into weakneſs, and the beauty of it into blackneſs. All fleſh is graſs, and all the goodlineſs thereof is as the flower of the field; The graſs withereth, and the flower fadeth, Iſa. 40. 6.

And here likewiſe note this, you that enjoy health of body, whoſe ſtrength yet continues, and your ſelves are free from the bonds of any bodily infirmity: while you hear of one ſmitten with a diſeaſe from the crown of the head to the ſole of the feet, conſider what a mercy you have, who have no pain from the crown of the head to the ſole of the feet; who have not an aking joynt, nor pain ſo much as in a finger. It is like that many of you can ſay you have this bleſſing, you do not know what pain in any one member means; look upon a man, that knew nothing but pain, upon a man that had not one member free, and prize your bleſſing.

Such likewiſe who have pain and infirmities, in one or two, or more parts of the body, may ſee in this ſpectacle cauſe to bleſs God, that they have any part free. To have but one or but a few ſores, is mercy, ſparing mercy, when we behold another nothing but a ſore. Indeed when one member ſuffers, (whether in the body natural or myſtical) all the members ſuffer with it. But compaſſion is not ſo heavy a burden, as paſſion is. And as the ſound members ſympathize in ſorrow with thoſe that are ſmitten, ſo they that are ſmitten, ſympathize in joy with thoſe that are ſound. The eaſe of one part mitigates the diſeaſe of another; and it is an abatement of our troubles to ſee thoſe whom we love in peace. Two are better then one (ſaith Solomon,) for if one fall, the other may help him up; but if both fall, who ſhall help? And if every member ſuffer, there is paſſion in all, but compaſſion in none, much leſs ſupport or help.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Job in this condition was left of all.

Do not think it ſtrange if you be brought into ſuch ſtraights, as to be left alone, when you have moſt need of aſſiſtance. Job was as a man friendleſs, Phyſitianleſs, wifeleſs, ſervantleſs, all forſook him. It is the comfort of the people of God, that they know how to be alone, and yet can never be alone: though they be left of all viſible friends, yet they have an inviſible friend who will viſit them, ſtay with them by day, and watch with them by night; for he hath ſaid, I will never leave thee nor forſake thee. In the Greek there are two negatives to affirm this, that God will not leave his, Heb. 13. 5. And he that hath him alone, hath infinitely more then all the world in one. When Friends and Phyſitians will not come near, when Wife and Children take their leave or ſtand afar off, when Servants hold their noſes, being not able to bear the ſtinch and ill ſavour that cometh from the body; yea, when a man comes to be an abhorring to himſelf; yet at that time God delights in him, Chriſt at that time imbraceth him, and takes him in his arms, and kiſſeth him with the kiſſes of his lips, which are better then wine, yea better then life. Job was never ſo near God, ſo in the boſom of God, as when no creature in the world would ſo much as touch him; Job was never ſo beautiful in the eye of God, as when he had nothing but boiles upon him.

Fourthly, I may preſent you with Job as he was upon his Aſh-hill in want of all things; from thence be admoniſhed,

That the Children of God, his deareſt Servants may come to uttermoſt outward extremities.

When a man is among the aſhes, then he is at the loweſt: what can a man be leſs then that? The Apoſtles were made as the filth of the world, as the off-ſcouring of all things, as ſweepings and offal which are caſt out upon the dunghil; ſo was Job in the ſence of many interpreters. They who are of moſt worth may be uſed as if they were worth nothing. Job was a pearl though upon a dunghil. They who were brought up in ſcarlet embrace dunghils, ſaith Jeremy in his Lamentation for Jeruſalem, Chap. 4. 5. We may ſay, They who are brought up and clothed in better then ſcarlet, even in the robes of Righteouſneſs, and in the Garments of Salvation, may yet be brought to embrace a dunghil. There is no judging by Appearance; No man knows love or hatred by all that is before him or (upon him) Eccleſ. 9.

Laſtly, Look upon Job's ſitting in the aſhes, as a voluntary act, and then obſerve, (which is of much concernment and uſe for us now, in regard of the preſent condition we are in.)

That as the afflicting hand of God doth increaſe upon a people, or upon a perſon, ſo ought the humiliation and repentance of that perſon or people to increaſe.

When the hand of God was upon Job before, he rent his mantle, he ſhaved his head, theſe were acts of great humiliation; but now Job having a nearer and deeper affliction upon him, humbleth himſelf yet more: Then he fell upon the ground, but now he ſitteth among the aſhes. Greater afflictions call to greater humiliation. We ought not only to be humbled when God afflicteth, but to be humbled in a proportion to the affliction: As it is in regard of ſin committed, great ſins call for great ſorrow; and as it is in regard of mercies received, great mercies call for great praiſes: ſo great troubles call us to great humiliations; and ſtill the greater troubles are, the greater our humiliation ought to be. This is one way of accepting the puniſhment of our iniquities, and of improving preſent evils for our everlaſting good. Conſider whether this be not the work of this day.

We have had the hand of God upon the Nation in leſſer judgments heretofore, we have had warning-pieces ſhot off amongſt us; but now we hear the report of murthering-pieces every day. Divers years God made war upon us with the ſword of the Angel, by which thouſands have fallen in our Streets, but now God hath put a ſword into the hands of men. The former ſword was a Favour compared with this; thoſe wounds, a kiſs, compared with this. Both David and experience reſolve it thus. Many of our dear brethren are ſlain and fallen by the ſword, their blood hath been ſpilt like water, and their bones have been ſcattered as when one cleaveth or cutteth wood upon the earth. The ſpoyled cry to us for bread, the ſick and wounded for help and healing. Many Towns have been plundered, many Matrons and Virgins have been raviſhed, many Families have been ſcattered, many Wives and Children deprived of their Husbands and Parents, many Pariſhes bereft of faithful Paſtours, ſome of our Dwellings turned to aſhes; and is it not time for us, not only to rent our garments, but to ſit in aſhes? do not theſe things call us to eat aſhes like bread, and mingle our drink with weeping. Is it not time for us not only to write, but to act a Lamentation, and to ſay, For theſe things I weep; mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water? There is one thing yet, which may and ought to be a Lamentation to us, beyond all our own ſufferings, namely this, God is diſhonoured, his Name is blaſphemed, his people are reproached. The enemies ſtrike this ſword in their bones, a ſcornful enquiry, Where is now your God? Pſal. 42. 10. Should not tears be our meat day and night (as they were Davids) while they ſay continually, Where is now your God? Pſal. 42. 3. Our not ſitting in the aſhes for ſuch things as theſe will bring us unto aſhes; and if we will not ſit upon the dunghill of our ſins in humiliation, our ſins will bring us and our Land unto a dunghill of deſolation. In this day, as of old by his faithful Prophet (Iſa. 22. 12.) doth the Lord God of hoſts call to weeping, and to mourning, and to baldneſs, and to girding with ſackcloth: And not only to theſe, but to Job's poſture of ſorrow, ſitting in aſhes; the voyce of the rod calleth to this; the voyce of the trumpet heard daily in our Streets, calls to this. We have cauſe to cry out as the Prophet Jeremy, Chap. 4. v. 19. My bowels, my bowels, I am pained at the very heart, my heart maketh a noiſe in me, I cannot hold my peace, becauſe thou haſt heard, O my ſoul, the ſound of the trumpet, and the alarm of war. And becauſe the ſound of the trumpet among us, like that on mount Sinai, Exod. 19. 19. doth not only ſound long, but alſo lowder and lowder; it becomes us, not only to continue our mourning, and our crying unto God, but to cry lowder and lowder. If we increaſe not our humiliations, God will yet increaſe our judgments: if we will not ſit in aſhes, he will bring us to aſhes, and puniſh us yet ſeven times more for our ſins.

Wherefore receive the counſel of the Apoſtle James, in theſe your afflictions. Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heavineſs. Humble your ſelves in the ſight of the Lord, and he ſhall lift you up. God lifts them up who caſt themſelves down: and if (in this ſence) we be afflicted, we ſhall not be afflicted. Chriſt hath purchaſed, Free Grace beſtows deliverance; and we receive it, when we return, repent and believe. James 4. 9, 10.

VERS. 9, 10.

Then ſaid his wife unto him, Doſt thou ſtill retain thine integrity? Curſe God, and die.

But he ſaid unto her, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the foliſh women ſpeaketh: what? ſhall we receive good at the hand of God, and ſhall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job ſin with his lips.

WE have already conſidered out of the former parts of the Chapter Job's ſecond affliction: Firſt, in the occaſion of it: Secondly, in the cauſes of it: And thirdly, in the manner of it, together with thoſe aggravating circumſtances which made his ſorrows out of meaſure ſorrowful. And now we muſt look upon that Jewel among the aſhes, and conſider what befel him there: Theſe things make the fourth part of the Chapter, namely the conſequents of his affliction.

These consequents are three:
First, His Wives unseemly and sinful counsel, vers. 9.
Secondly, His wise and holy reply, vers. 10.
Thirdly, His friends visit to comfort him, vers. 11, 12, 13.

First, We will discuss his Wives unseemly and sinful counsel, Then said his Wife unto him, &c.

There are two Questions raised concerning Job's Wife.
First, Who she was?
Secondly, How it came to pass that she was spared, when all his outward comforts were removed?

For the first, in a word, It is the opinion of many among the ancient Jewes, that Job lived in the time of Jacob the Patriark: And that he took to Wife Dinah, Jacob's Daughter; but I leave the Rabbins to prove that, if they can. Why she was spared in the time of so general a calamity, may bear some further inquiry. For seeing a Wife is the chiefest of creature comforts, and the very reason why God at the first did institute that relation, was that man might have a help meet for him: it may seem somewhat
Gen. 2. 20. strange why Satan, going about to bring upon Job trouble in its perfection, should leave him that, which is the perfection of all outward comforts, a Wife. What were Job's Oxen, and Asses, and Sheep, and Camels to a Wife? And what were his Children to a Wife? When Adam had not only such a number of Cattel, but all the Cattel and Riches in the world in his possession, and under his dominion, God saw him defective till he provided him a Wife, a Wife was the complement of all. How then cometh it to pass, that when Satan would afflict Job to the uttermost, he leaves him his Wife?

To clear this, before we come to examine the words that she spake, The Jews, which are the Authors of that aforenamed opinion, that his Wife was Dinah, tell us (to lengthen out the dream) that she was spared for Jacob, her Fathers sake. It is a truth, That Children do often fare the better for holy Fore-fathers. It is no mean priviledge to be born of those that are in Covenant. As God visits the iniquity of the Fathers upon the Children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate him, so he shews mercy to thousands of those that love him, &c. Exod. 20. 5, 6. but in this place we have no stock to graft this truth upon, but a mere imagination. I pass on.

Secondly, Some conceive that his Wife was out of Satans Commission, that he had nothing to do to meddle with her, she being comprehended under that clause of exception in Chap. 1. vers. 12. All that he hath is in thy power, only upon himself put not forth thine hand; his Wife (they say) was a part of himself, according to that Gen. 2. 24. And they (viz. the Husband and the Wife) shall be one flesh. So that Satan could not smite her, but he must smite Job too; therefore she was exempted, say they, and set beyond the reach of Satans stroak.

Though this may have some shew of wit in it, and somewhat of reason too, referring unto the first part of Job's affliction; yet there is no shew of either in reference unto the second, where Satan had a Commission to afflict his body, his flesh and his bone; for then she also (take it in the sence before) was comprehended under the Commission of Satan, being (though not as Eve from Adam, bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, yet) according to the Law of marriage given to all One flesh with him, Gen. 2. 24.

Therefore in the third place, that which I conceive and agree with others in for the true reason why she was spared, is this; That she might be a further instrument of her Husbands affliction. Satan meant to make use of her for his own purpose, to drive on the main design; and whereas she should have been a help to her Husband, Satan im-
Christ. Instit. ploves her against her Husband; this was his aim, and therefore she was spared. Hence one of the Ancients calls her the strongest and fittest weapon, with which Satan did assault, the choisest Arrow in his Quiver, by which he wounded the soul and spirit of Job. She that should have had her hands busied in the washing, suppling, curing, and Greg. Mo- healing of his wounds, smites him with her tongue, a peircing and a poyson'd instrument. The rib was not smitten, that it might smite the head. Another compares her to a Ladder, by which Satan hoped to scale this impregnable Tower, that death might creep in at the window of his ears, by hearing and consenting to her sinful perswasions.

Seeing then Satan spared Job's Wife, that she might be the instrument of this additional affliction, which most conclude to be as the sting of all his afflictions;

Firſt, Note this, That Satans mercies have alwayes somewhat of cruelty in them.

He spareth his Wife, but it was that she might further vex the Husband. His mercies are like the mercies of wicked men, Their tender mercies are cruel; that is, they are no mercies at all, Prov. 12. 10. There is a punishing mercy, and there is a sparing cruelty among men. Such are Satans sparings ever lin'd with cruel and bloody intendments. Planè nulla. Jun. in loc.

Secondly, Observe, That the greatest outward blessings may prove the greatest outward afflictions.

A Wife is made a cross, a snare. Our greatest danger may be from our helper; and that which was given for our good, may be to us an occasion of falling.

Satan can make use of our friends to do us hurt by. He tempteth not only by himself, but by creatures: and not only by creatures that are at a distance from us, but by those who are neerest in relation, and by those, most. He can make a Servant, a Child, a Wife, instrumental for our ruine. In this sence, we may apply that caveat of the Prophet (Jer. 9. 4.) Take ye heed every one of his neighbour, and trust ye not in any brother. That also of Micah, Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide: keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lyeth in thy bosom. Yea, take heed of thy own bosom, Satan draws a party from our selves, against our selves. Quisque etiam sibi caveat, ne fiat organum diaboli.

Thirdly, Observe, Satan is very subtile to make choice of such instruments as may do his work most effectually.

Of all those that were about Job he could not have picked out any to have carried on his plot so powerfully and with such probability of success.

First, In regard of her nearness, she had opportunity to come unto him, and freedom to improve that opportunity. Saul knew what he did when he married his Daughter to David. I will give him her (said Saul) that she may be a snare to him, 1 Sam. 18, 21. Politick marriages are usually made for temptation, not for comfort: snares are tied fastest with a false lovers knot.

Secondly, The motion or perswasion of a Wife, whether to good or evil, are very taking upon a Husbands heart: We see it in the first Wife that ever was, she by perswasions overcame Adam unto sin, she was the Devils agent for the undoing of her Husband, and the world. Ahab was very wicked, but he had a tempter in his bosom. But there was none like unto Ahab, who did sell himself to work wickedness, whom Jezebel his Wife stirred up. Unparalell'd wickedness is ascribed to the provocations of a Wife. When a Prince hath given up his affections, and his conscience, into the hands of a malicious, wanton woman, he will quickly sell himself to such wickedness as will be his own trouble, and entitle him (like King Ahab) the troubler of the Kingdom. 1 King. 21. 25.

Thirdly, Satan knew that a wound is deeper, by how much the hand is nearer that strikes it. Afflictions press us most when they are from our friends. What thou my Son? said Cæsar in the Senate. What thou my Wife? Is thy hand upon me in my own house, might Job say? The Prophet brings in one questioning, What are those wounds? And Christ answering, Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends, Zech. 13. 6. The height of enmity is thus expresst, A mans enemies shall be the men of his own house, Micah 7. 6. This caused David to complain so bitterly, Psal. 55. 12. It was not an enemy that had done this, but it was thou my friend, and my equal, and my companion: The friend wounded more then the Sword. So might Job complain, It was not an enemy, it was not a Sabean, or a cruel Chaldean that spake this; but it was thou my equal, my friend, my companion; and which is more then all these, my Wife, my second self.

I grant that in one sence the wounds of a friend are precious: Precious are the wounds of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful. Precious are the wounds of a friend, when a friend doth wound with holy reproof; but when a friend wounds by sinful counsel, or sollicitations unto sin, those are pernicious wounds. If that which is light in us be turned into darkness (as Christ speaks) how great is that darkness? So, if that which should be our comfort, be turned into our sorrow, how great is our sorrow? Therefore we see why Satan spared the Wife, that she might be an instrument, and a most effectual instrument, either to prevail upon him, or to vex him in case he did not prevail. Doubtless Job did not feel so much smart, when Satan smote both flesh and bone, as now, when his flesh and bone smote him. Thus we see the cruelty of Satans mercy: he spared Job's Tongue, and he spared Job's Wife; he spared his Tongue, that Job might have a member free for an instrument of sin, in cursing God; and he spared Job's Wife, that himself might have an instrument to bid him sin, Curse God, and die. This was her counsel, Matth. 6.

And his Wife said unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God, and die.

Her words consist of two parts:

First, A sharp and a scornful exprobration.

Secondly, A wicked and sinful direction.

Her scornful exprobration, in these words: Doest thou still retain thy integrity?

Her sinful direction, in those words: Curse God, and die.

Dost thou still retain thy integrity?

Tantum narrat scriptura, quæ mulieris vivus & viri antidotum continent.

Words quick and short. It is probable we have here only the compendium, or brief of that discourse which passed between Job and his Wife. We have only the poyson, and the Antidote, as a learned Expositor hints it upon this place.

The Septuagint have taken the boldness (if they be not falsified) to set down his Wifes speech at large, and joyn it in with the body of the Text, thus: A long time being spent, his Wife said unto him, How long wilt thou hold out, saying, Behold, I wait yet a little while expecting the hope of my Salvation? For consider, thy remembrance is blotted out from the earth, even thy Sons and thy Daughters, the pains and travel of my womb, whom I have brought forth in vain. Thou thy self sittest here in the rottenness of worms, abiding all night in the open air. I poor hand-maid wander from place to place, from house to house, looking when the Sun will set that I may take a little repose from the pains and sorrows which now oppress me; but utter thou some word against the Lord, and die. The Greek Authors comment upon these words, as upon the Text it self. But I shall wave them wholly. Neither shall I stay here in the Explication of the words, according to our reading out of the Hebrew, because we have handled them at the third verse of this Chapter, in the testimony which God giveth concerning Job, where he speaks thus to Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, how that he is a perfect man, &c. and that he still holdeth fast his integrity? God spake it to the praise of Job, still he holdeth fast his integrity; his Wife speaks it to his reproach, and upbraideth him with it, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? The words spoken by both are the same, but the sence and intent of the speakers is quite different. God speaks them in honour to Job: his Wife speaks them in contempt of Job, and therefore she forms them into a Question, a cutting kind of speech, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? As if she should say, What? art thou so senseless and so stupid, so mad and sottish, to go on in this course still? what hast thou got by it; where are thy earnings? what is the advantage of holiness, or what is the profit of integrity, that thou holdest and huggest it so fast? Dost thou still retain thine integrity? This I conceive is the sum of the question, it is an upbraiding, a reproaching question; and from that we may Observe,

First, That those things which commend us most to God, usually render us most contemptible before the world.

Luk. 16. 15.

Dost thou still retain thy integrity?] She sleighteth him and scorneth him for this, whereas God highly commends him, speaks it to his praise. That which is highly esteemed amongst men is abomination in the sight of the Lord. And that which the Lord esteems highly, man abominates.

Secondly this, It is the endeavour of Satan and his instruments to perswade, that the profession of holiness is vain and unprofitable.

Satan hath taught wicked ones, and they (like forward Schollars say it without book) say it openly, It is a vain thing to serve the Lord: Satan would fain infuse this cursed principle into the hearts of Gods own people, and make them believe their faith is also vain. Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Come take a little counsel at the last, work like a wise man, wilt thou hold a thing thou canst get nothing by? Take it on my word, thou canst not thrive this way, thou canst make nothing of it, what dost thou mean to go on madding in such a course as this? Thou shalt never get bread by it to put in thy head, no nor water to wash thy hands; all thou getteſt by it, will be a knock, a rod upon thy back, a dishonour upon thy name. And wilt thou still be so strait-lac'd, and hold fast thy integrity?

Thirdly, Observe further from Satans intendment in putting such words as these into the mouth of Job's Wife;

That his great design is to take advantage from outward troubles and ill successes, to discourage the hearts, and weaken the hands of Gods people in holy duties.

That was his project, quite to discourage Job, and from the ill success he had in the service of God, to get him put off his Livery, and give over his service: It is the course that the world, instructed by Satan (as here Job's Wife was) still holdeth with the people of God. Their language is, why are you so precise, why so hot? &c. Do you not observe, you get nothing by your prayers? nothing by your fasting? nothing by your holiness? All that you have got you may put in your eyes, and see never the worse. Shew us some of your gains; what have you got? where are your deliverances? where are your victories? where is your salvation? you have prayed till you are almost undone, you have fasted till all is almost lost, things are worse then they were; will you still go on in these duties of fasting and praying? of humbling and seeking? of waiting and believing? This is the language of Satan, this the Divinity of Hell: And I shall answer it in one word, It is far better to dye praying, then to conquer blaspheming. Such doctrine may stop up a hypocrites mouth, and weaken his heart from duty: But it will more open the mouths, and enlarge the hearts of those who are sincere. Will the hypocrite always call upon God, will he delight himself in the Almighty? saith Job. No, he delights in God no longer, then God gives him worldly delights; nor calls upon God any longer, then sensible blessings are sent in unto him: If God stayes his hand, he stops in duty; he quickly takes up Satans lesson, and will no longer hold his integrity. But grace shews us wages in the work: A godly man hath his fruit in holiness, and therefore though he receives no outward fruit, he still holds fast his integrity. But what would Job's Wife advice him to do, in case he should let go the holiness of his life? That follows in the next words; having endeavoured to take him off from one course, she directs him to another.

Curse God, and die.

Here is the second part of her counsel, cursed counsel indeed. Curse God, and die. It is the same Original word which we have opened before, and met with two or three times already. In the proper signification it noteth blessing, and so the word is by many Expositors rendred in this place, Bless God, and die; Mr. Broughton translates it so in one entire sentence, Dost thou still retain thine integrity, blessing God, and dying? We must therefore examine both sides, that we may find out more fully the sence of these words.

Some take the words in a good sence, and some take them in an ill sence. Some take the words in a good sence, Bless God, and die; and others who translate, Bless God, and die, do yet expound it to an ill sence.

First, Some make a good construction out of these words of Job's Wife, affirming that she gave her Husband wholsom advice, and so they render the words, Bless God, and die, to this sence. What? dost thou still stand upon terms with God? wilt thou not humble thy self? shouldst thou not rather Bless God? that is, pray unto God, humble thy self, and seek his face; so to bless, signifies to pray, to make supplication. Thou seest in what a doleful condition thou art, therefore Bless God, make thy humble prayer before God, and die; that is, desire him to take thee out of this world, to release thee of thy pain; beg that he would cut the thred of thy life, which (to appearance) is the only remedy of all thy troubles; death will be thy best friend: Thou mayest die with more ease, then live as thou doest. Thy life is a continual death; it were better for thee to die once, then to die daily.

Mr. Beza is very strong in this opinion, excusing, yea acquitting Job's Wife, in making this motion to her Husband. He grants indeed that she being deceived and overwrought by Satan, did work strongly for him; yet denies, that either the counsel in it self, or in her intendments was evil. He layes the whole matter thus: That she observing her Husbands silence under the hand of God, in these great afflictions, suspected that he stood too much upon his own integrity; that he was too well opinionated and conceited of his own worth; or that this proceeded from searedness of conscience, and insensibleness of Gods dealing, and his own condition; and therefore she adviseth him to consider, that surely God was very angry with him; to consider that God had brought all this evil upon him, to humble him; and should he now defend his own innocency? should he either be silent and not acknowledge his sin, or stand upon terms with God in defence and justification of himself? Dost thou persevere in those high thoughts of thy self? will not all this bring thy stomack down? what? will not thy uncircumcised heart be humbled? Dost thou still retain thy integrity? dost thou still lean upon that broken reed, thy own integrity? Bless God; that is confess thy sins, and acknowledge thy transgressions. (Indeed confessing of sin is the blessing of God, it is a giving glory to God, our giving glory to God is our blessing of God: Josh. 7.19. Give glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him.) Thus bless God, that is, confess thy sin, and so prepare thy self to die in a holy manner; seeing thou art past hope of life, address thy self piously for death. Thus he; and all upon these grounds: First, Because he could not be perswaded that a Wife, the Governess of such a holy family as Job's was, a Wife, the companion of such a holy man as Job was, should be so full of the Devil, so wicked to speak the Devils words, with the Devils heart. And secondly, Because Satan himself could not be so senceless as to believe or hope, that such desperate counsel could ever take upon Job's heart: and therefore he conceives that she advised him only, as any one would a dying friend, or a malefactor condemned and ready to be carried to execution, yet persisting in his sin, or unlamenting the wickedness which procur'd that sentence. Her error, saith he, was only this, that she judged him wicked, because he was thus smitten; and that he trusted upon his integrity, because he held it fast: whereas indeed Job looked for no good, but out of the hand of Free-grace, and accounted his very Integrity but dung, to the righteousness and redemption of the promised Messiah.

But (with humble respect to so reverend an Author) there are two reasons strong against this Exposition, in my apprehension, which I shall propose, and submit to the readers judgment.

The first is this, It had been quite against Satans design, that Job's Wife should give her Husband good counsel: For it had been so far from being an addition to Job's affliction, that it had been a great abatement of it to hear his Wife speak so holily, and administring such wholsom counsel in the substance of it, though mistaken in the application of it to him. And surely a heart so composed as Job's was under all these pressures, would have shaped out such an answer as this: My dear Wife, I thank thee for thy care and counsel, thou hast a holy jealousie over me, that I am not in such a posture of spirit as becomes a dying man. Though there be an error in thy advise as applied to me, yet I take it as an error of love, and thy reproof though misplaced, is very acceptable and precious unto me.

But (which makes my second reason;) He reproves her for it, and tells her plainly, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh; Whereas if that had been the meaning of her words, she spake as one of the wise women; like a wise woman indeed. It is an act of wisdom and of love, both to suspect ill of another, when that suspition leads us only to advise him for his good. It is an excellent thing when jealousies are improved into faithful counsels. Surely then Job had never numbred her with the foolish women, if that speech of hers had imported only an humble preparation for his approaching death.

In the second place, Some who translate the words, Bless God and die, do yet expound them as very sinful counsel; though the words sound fair, yet the sence is made very foul. These understand them as an Irony, as if his wife scoffing and jeering her husband, had said: Dost thou still retain thine integrity? bless God, and die; thou shalt have enough of thine integrity, take thy fill of blessing of God; thou art all for blessing God, and holding fast thy integrity; go on if thou wilt, and bless God still, and see what thou shalt get by it; thou shalt have no other reward but a wound, thou shalt receive no wages of this Master but death, bless God, and die. Repeat that speech now, which you used under the first affliction; Repeat again that beloved maxime, with which you seem to be so much delighted, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the Name of the Lord; you shall see, it will not fright death away, or be any security from the grave: you thought when you spoke those words first, that they would have prevented a second trouble, and that God who saw you take the former stroak so kindly at his hand, would not strike you again: But you see, good words are no defence against blows: And if thou shouldst be so foolish, to fly for refuge to the same submissive language, experience would quickly teach thee, that as before it could not protect thee from this sore disease, so now it would be no protection from the arrest of death. Bless God, and die.

Some strengthen this sense, from the form of speaking here used, which is imperative, Bless God, and die: She bids him do it, I, do it and spare not. Such expressions import a mixture of scorn, as Lam. 4. 21. Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edom: Here is a grant, if not a command; a seeming direction, if not an injunction, to rejoyce and be glad; what is given as the occasion of this joy? The Cup also shall pass thorough unto thee; What cup? A cup of blood, a cup of trembling: And is this to be rejoyced in? Surely in such joy the heart must be heavy, and the acting of such mirth is sorrow: yet he bids her rejoyce; as if he had said, be as merry as you can, yet the the cup shall pass thorough unto thee, thou shalt not escape. So Eccles. 11. 9. Rejoyce O young man in thy youth, and let thine heart cheer thee, and walk in the wayes of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes, (do so) but know, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgement. Thus here, Bless God, and die, Go on I pray, take thy fill of blessing God, bless him as much and as long as thou wilt, yet I see the Image of death in thy face, die thou shalt. Mr. Broughton seems to incline to such a meaning in his Translation, Doest thou still hold thine integrity, blessing God, and dying? As if she had said, wilt thou be such a fool, to go on blessing God and dying, blessing God, while he is killing thee; which was indeed Jobs wisdom, and his resolution a little after, Though he kill me, yet will I trust in him.

So far of those who translate the Text, bless God, and die, with that two-fold exposition upon it; I shall now consider what sence we are to make out of these words as we translate them, and as they are indeed most generally translated. Curse God, and die: This reading of the Text, seems most answerable to Satans design, which being to provoke Job to curse God; it was most proper to sute his Wives spirit with such thoughts, and to put his own words into her mouth, Curse God, and die: This thred is of the same spinning with the former, and carries Satans plot home upon his own principles; She speaks this adversaries mind as fully as he could himself, when she bids her Husband Curse God, and die.

But could Job die when he listed, that she biddeth him Curse God, and die? What means this Language?

Some interpret her meaning to be this, die by thy own hand, destroy thy self; as sons of Belial use to say, go hang thy self, murther thy self, make an end of thy self: As God by these Plagues is thy Judge, so be thou (to end the matter) thy own executioner. Or as others; curse God, that so he may be provoked to take thee out of the world quickly. Or Curse God, and die, ease thy heart somewhat, and give it vent by breaking out against God in blasphemies, take this revenge upon him, and then let him do his worst, Curse God, though thou die for it.

Ne prius animum exhales, quam multis probris in Deum congestis dolori tuo satisfeceris. Pined.

Lastly, Curse God, that so the Magistrate taking notice of it, thou mayest be cut off by the Sword of Justice. We know blasphemers were sentenc'd to death without mercy, by the Law of Moses; and it is not improbable that the light of Nature might carry those Nations, to as high and severe a revenge, against that highest sin. We know Socrates was adjudged to death by the Athenians (as their natural natural divinity taught them) for an injurious or diſhonorable ſpeech concerning their gods. I conceive her counſel, Curſe God, and die, had ſome of theſe intendments in it; the beſt of them is bad enough, and ſo bad, that it renders this Objection againſt them all.

It is Objected, That ſurely, any of theſe carry too high a ſtrain of wickedneſs for Job's Wife; ſurely ſhe could not imagine, much leſs have the boldneſs to offer ſuch advice to her Husband.

I anſwer firſt in general, A good man may have a very bad Wife. A Husband cannot infuſe holineſs, or make his Wife good: Marriage doth not change the heart; Marriage with Chriſt doth, but not Marriage with a Chriſtian, or the holieſt man that ever lived. Therefore that reaſon is not cogent.

Secondly, This ſpeech, and a holy perſon, are not altogether inconſiſtent: poſſibly Job's Wife was a good woman, though actually ſhe ſpake thus wickedly. Divers of the Jewiſh Doctors have an opinion, that it was not Job's Wife that ſpake, but the Devil in her likeneſs, I ſhall leave that among their other dreams. It is conjectured by others (though it were not the Devil that ſpake, perſonating his Wife, yet) that it was the Devil ſpeaking in or by the perſon of his Wife, as he ſpake in or by the Serpent, Geneſ. 3. Or as perſons really poſſeſt of the Devil, who ſpeak Satans words, and do Satans works, not their own. Some (I ſay) carry it thus, that ſhe was for that time not only acted, but actually poſſeſt by the Devil, and ſo ſpeaks the Devils language: One of the Ancients is expreſs to this purpoſe, Theſe are the Devils words, not the womans words: which another illuſtrates by that in Geneſ. 3. where it is ſaid, The Serpent ſaid unto the Woman, but it was the Devil that ſpake unto the Woman by the Serpent; ſo here it is ſaid, His wife ſpake unto him, but the truth is, it was the Devil ſpake unto him, in and by his Wife. And if ſo, put the Language into the worſt expoſition given, or give a worſe (if truth will bear it) and it will be no wrong to ſuch an Orator. I believe we cannot expound the words to a higher ſence or ſtrain of wickedneſs, then Satan could ſpeak.

Chryſoſt. Dixit ad eum uxor ejus; uxorem dixit dixiſſe, ſed verè diabolus dixit, Sic namque & olim ait. Dixit ſerpens ad mulierem; ſerpentem dixit dixiſſe, ſed non ſerpens dixit, ſed diabolus qui per ſerpen: ē locutus eſt, Origen.

But we need not make Satan himſelf the ſpeaker, and yet clear the matter too; though we neither ſay as the Jewiſh Doctors, that it was the Devil perſonally, taking the ſhape of Job's Wife; or as thoſe Chriſtian Fathers, that the Devil did actually poſſeſs her; yet we may ſay (and ſo ſalve the difficulty) that ſhe was mightily over-powred, and acted by the temptation of Satan, to be an inſtrument of temptation, in this groſs manner againſt her Husband: Though ſhe were not acted as the Serpent was, in whom Satan ſpake to Eve; yet we may well ſay, ſhe was acted as Eve by whom Satan ſpake to Adam: Eve ſpake the Devils mind, being prevailed upon by his temptation, to perſwade her Husband to eat againſt the command of God; and Job's Wife overcome by a like temptation attempts the perſwaſion of her Husband to curſe God.

For as it is poſſible for one that is good, to fall into the groſſeſt and moſt blaſphemous temptation himſelf; ſo it is poſſible for one that is good, to be made an inſtrument of ſuch temptations unto others. We may ſee an inſtance near, if not fully reaching this aſſertion, in the Apoſtle Peter, who hearing Chriſt fore-telling his ſufferings, takes him aſide, and began to rebuke him, ſaying, Be it far from thee, Lord: this ſhall not be unto thee, Matth. 16. 22, 23. Peter acted Satans part, in this, againſt his Maſter, though unwittingly, yet ſo wittily, ſo to the life, that he got his name by it; Chriſt ſaid to Peter, get thee behind me Satan: It was Peter's tongue, but Satan tun'd it. Iſaac ſaid of his Son Jacob in Eſau's dreſs, The hands are the hands of Eſau, but the voyce is the voyce of Jacob. Chriſt perceived here Satans counſel in Peter's words, he ſaw the wicked ſpirit through the cloathing of Peter's fleſh; and therefore rebukes the Organ, under the title of the chief Agent, Get thee behind me Satan. Now as Peter, though a holy man and full of good intentions to his Maſter, yet ſpake the Devils mind and language ſo fully, that the Devil himſelf (as to that purpoſe) could ſcarce have mended it; ſo likewiſe Job's Wife might be a godly woman in the main, though abuſed and miſled by Satan, ſhe thus excited her Husband, in the groſſeſt conſtruction thoſe words can bear, to Curſe God, and die.

There is ſomewhat in the Text, which may give us a hint of this: that though ſhe ſpake this, yet Job eſteemed her a good woman; for, obſerve Job's anſwer to this advice. What doth he ſay? He doth not ſay, Thou wicked Woman, thou abominable wretch, why doeſt thou give me ſuch counſel; all that he ſaith is this, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh Women ſpeaketh. Obſerve it, he doth not call her fooliſh or wicked Woman, but, thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh Women; as if he ſhould ſay, How now Wife? what words are theſe that I hear from thee? thou doſt not ſpeak now like thy ſelf, I uſe to hear other Language from thee; thou and I have had other kind of conference, and I have received other kind of counſel from thee then this: Whence is it that thou art ſo unlike thy ſelf? where are thy words ſeaſon'd with Salt, which have ſo often miniſtred grace unto the hearers? thou art degenerated in manners and corrupted in thy ſpeech, thou ſpeakeſt now as one of the fooliſh Women: Intimating, that ſhe uſed to ſpeak wiſely and diſcreetly, or as Solomon deſcribes the vertuous Woman (Prov. 31.26.) that heretofore ſhe opened her mouth with wiſdom; and now ſhe ſpake only as a fooliſh or wicked Woman; He doth not ſay ſhe was one: one act is enough to aſſimilate, but it is not enough to denominate. Thus much may ſerve to evince, that though we take the words in that worſt ſence, yet it doth not neceſſarily infer, that Job's Wife was a wicked and ungodly Woman, which is the objection againſt that Expoſition.

Non eam ſtultam vocat, ſed in eo ſermone ſtultarum mulierum mores imitatam, quaſi à ſeipſa defecerit, & quaſi in alienos mores & ingenium abierit. Sanctius in loc.

From the words tranſlated, Curſe God, and die, and thus expounded, we may Obſerve;

First, That Satan is reſtleſs and unwearied in this deſign, to bring the people of God to think ill and ſpeak ill of God.

It is that he laboured for, in the carrying on of this whole buſineſs, concerning Job; and every ſtone is turned, every way tryed to accompliſh this propoſed end.

Secondly, In that he perſwadeth Job by his Wife, when he was in this woful condition to Curſe God, and die, Obſerve, That Satan would perſwade us to eaſe our ſelves of troubleſom evils, by falling into ſinful evils.

Job was grievouſly diſeaſed; you ſee the medicine and the cure that Satan preſcribeth, Go ſin, ſaith he, Curſe God, and die; whereas one of the leaſt evils of ſin is worſe then all the evils of ſuffering that can befall us. All ſorrows are more elegible then one ſin. It hath been rightly taught us from Antiquity, that the loweſt degree of a lye (becauſe ſin) is not to be made or admitted (if that medium could be aſſured ſo noble an end) for the ſaving of a World. What a Father and teacher of lyes then is Satan, who directs many a poor ſoul to ſave it ſelf from, or help it ſelf out of a ſmall affliction, by adventuring upon ſome great tranſgreſſion? Curſe GOD, and die.

Thirdly, It is ſinful to wiſh our own deaths, though we are under pains more painful then Death.

It is ſinful to deſire death abſolutely; we may deſire it with ſubmiſſion to the Will of God: To live is an act of Nature; but to be willing to live becauſe God wills it, is an act of Grace: And as it is our holineſs to do the Will of God while we live, ſo it is our holineſs to be content to live, while we ſuffer according to his Will. On the other hand, to die is an act of Nature; but to die becauſe Gods wills it, is an act of Grace: Chriſt is ſaid to be obedient unto death, becauſe he died in contemplation of Gods Decree, and in conformity to his good pleaſure. To die thus, is the duty of a Chriſtian, and the crown of all his obedience. Satan would have us live as we will, and die when we will; he tempts us as much to die when we liſt, as to live how we liſt. Satan puts Job upon it peremptorily, Curſe God, and die, deſire or procure thy own death. To wiſh death that we may enjoy Chriſt, it is a holy wiſh; but yet we muſt not wiſh that abſolutely neither, we muſt refer our ſelves to the pleaſure of God, how long he will let us conflict with our corruptions and with our luſts, with this body of death and ſin which we bear about us. But to wiſh for death, death, becauſe our lives are full of trouble, is an unholy wiſh; God may, yea and hath as much uſe of our lives in our troubles as in our comforts: We may do much buſineſs for God on a ſick-bed: We may do God as much work when we are bound hand and foot, in a priſon, as when we are at liberty; paſſive obedience brings as much glory to God as active doth: therefore we muſt not wiſh for death, eſpecially not with an abſolute wiſh, becauſe we are under troubleſom evils. And if it be ſinful to wiſh for death, how wicked is it to procure or haſten death, to pull down our houſe of clay, with our own hands, becauſe we are under troubleſom evils?

Fourthly, Obſerve further, Satan would perſwade that death is an end, at leaſt an eaſe, of outward troubles.

Wouldſt thou have an end of thy troubles and of thy ſorrows? Curſe God, and die, here is the remedy. We ſay indeed of ſome remedies, that they are worſe then the diſeaſe, but I am ſure, this is. Death to ungodly ones, it is ſo far from being an end or an eaſe of their troubles, that it is to them (as Chriſt ſpeaks in another caſe) the beginning of ſorrows, the entrance to eternal death, and the very Suburbs of Hell. Yet, how many doth Satan perſwade (when they are in Job's caſe, in great extremities) that death will be the cure of all their troubles?

Fifthly, Obſerve, That Satan would make men willing to die, when they are moſt unfit to die.

You ſee what preparation Satan directs Job unto, he biddeth him Curſe God, and die. Would not Job, think you, have been in a fit poſture, in a fit frame for death, when he had been curſing God? Repent and die, pray and die, humble thy ſelf and die, believe and die; take faſt hold of Chriſt who is our life, our way to life, and die, are the counſels and voice of the holy Ghoſt; but Satans language is Curſe God, and die, ſin and die, be impenitent and die, blaſpheme and die. And it is an experienced truth, that oftentimes they ſeem moſt willing to die, who are moſt unfit, moſt unready for death; you ſhall ſee ſome men venturing, yea caſting away their lives without fear or wit; the whole viſible buſineſs of whoſe lives, hath been nothing elſe but a working out of their own damnation, without fear or trembling: They as it were give diligence all their dayes, to make Hell and reprobation ſure, and yet go out of the World as if they were ſure of Heaven. This is Satans preparation, Curſe God, and dye.

Laſtly, Note this, That the holieſt perſon is lyable to the moſt blaſphemous temptation.

One would have wondred that Satan ſhould ever have ventured to ſuggeſt ſuch a groſs thing as this, to ſo holy a man as Job. But Satan where he hath been often foyled, growes impudent, and will then ſuggeſt ſuch things, not becauſe he hopes to prevail, but becauſe he reſolves to vex ſuch as he cannot overcom. He troubles as much and as many as he can.

So much of the counſel which Job's Wife gave him, reproving him as fooliſh and over-credulous in holding faſt (that unprofitable thing) his integrity; and adviſing him to be worſe then mad or outragious, in curſing God and dying.

Let us now conſider Job's holy and wiſe reply in the tenth Verſe.

But he ſaid unto her, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh women ſpeaketh; what? ſhall we receive good at the hand of God, and ſhall we not receive evil?

Theſe words contain Job's reply, wherein two things are conſidered. Firſt, A reproof. Secondly, A refutation.

Firſt, He rejects her counſel with a ſharp and wholeſom reprehenſion, and then he refuteth her counſel by ſtrong and ſolid reaſon. The reprehenſion in theſe words, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh women ſpeaketh. The reaſon of his reprehenſion in thoſe which follow, What? ſhall we receive good at the hand of God, and not evil?

אחת הנבלות

To begin with the reprehenſion, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh women.] In the Hebrew, woman is not expreſt, it is only a Feminine, as one of the fooliſh ones: we tranſlate it, fooliſh women; that word cometh from Nabal, which ſignifieth properly a thing fallen off like a dried leaf, or blaſted withered fruit, without life, without ſtrength, without ſap and moyſture, exhauſted and killed, thorough exceſs either of cold or heat: and ſo by a Metaphor, it noteth any one without the ſap or juyce of wiſdom, goodneſs, and honeſty; ſuch a perſon, we call, a ſapleſs perſon. Or it ſignifieth one that is vile, and baſe, and low; one that hath a baſe, withered, low, fallen ſpirit, a ſpirit fallen below all noble or holy reſolutions. Nabal, is ſuch a fool, as hath his underſtanding faded, and corrupted in regard of any holy principles, though he may be wiſe in regard of natural principles. Such the Prophet deſcribes, They are wiſe to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge, Jer. 9. 22. Hence the Latine word (Nebulo) which ſignifies a Knave, is by good Etymologiſts derived from the Hebrew Nabal; becauſe ſuch are dull-heads in goodneſs, and witty only in wickedneſs. Such was he, 1 Sam. 25. 25. Nabal is his name, and folly is with him; that proper name is the ſame with the Appellative here; that's the Maſculine, this the Feminine, Thou ſpeakeſt like a Nabaleſs: We find the word often uſed elſewhere to ſignifie wicked, worthleſs and vile perſons, Pſal. 14. 1. The fool hath ſaid, &c. Deut. 32. 6, 21. at verſ. 6. O fooliſh people and unwiſe, do ye thus requite the Lord? And verſ. 21. They have provoked me to anger by thoſe that are no gods, and I will provoke them to jealouſie by them which are not a people, and move them to anger with a fooliſh Nation; by them which are not a people, by a fooliſh Nation: A fooliſh people that deſerve not the name of a people. Look upon this word in the abſtract, folly is wickedneſs; and to work folly is in the Language of the Scripture, as much, as to work wickedneſs, to work the greateſt wickedneſs. Hence it is ſometime tranſlated villany, Jer. 29. 22, 23. The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the Kings of Babylon roſted in the fire, becauſe they have committed villany in Iſrael. And throughout the Book of Proverbs, the fool and an ungodly man, a wiſe man and a godly man, are (Synonomaes) words ſignifying the ſame thing. Thus Job reproves his Wife, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh women, like one of thoſe who have no wiſdom, no goodneſs, not any ſenſe or ſap of goodneſs in them. But who were theſe fooliſh Women, at whom he aims in this compariſon? that is not clear; ſome conceive he intends the Women of Idumea, thou ſpeakeſt as one of theſe heathen Women, theſe Idumeans; I have heard indeed ſuch Language from them when things have gone amiſs with them; I have heard them curſing their Idols, curſing their gods; I have heard them rail at fate, fall out, and wrangle with Fortune; Thou ſpeakeſt like one of them. Thou takeſt thy pattern in this, from the cuſtom of the Heathen, who uſe their gods courſely, when they think they have but courſe uſage from their gods. If their gods be angry, they will be angry with and revile their gods. Thou ſpeakeſt after the rate of theſe fooliſh women; thou didſt never hear ſuch doctrine in my family, or among thoſe who fear and love the true and ever-living God.

Job you ſee is now ſomewhat warm in his ſpeech. Job had indured much, and all his ſufferings hitherto hath not ſtirred any paſſion in him but that of ſorrow, as we ſaw in the latter end of the former Chapter: Not any angry poſture, not an angry expreſſion all along; but now, that God and the wayes of God are concerned, Job can hold no longer: this ſpeech of his Wife caſt diſhonour upon both, and now paſſion begins to ſtir, he cannot forbear her though his Wife, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh woman ſpeaketh.

Obſerve, That, Paſſion becometh us in the cauſe of God.

Our Lord Chriſt teaching his Diſciples the true meaning of the Law, tells them, Matth. 5. 22. He that is angry with his brother without a cauſe, ſhall be in danger of the judgment; but he that is not angry when there is cauſe, eſpecially when there is ſuch a cauſe as this, he likewiſe is in danger of the judgment.

Secondly, Job is not only angry with her, but he reproves her, Thou ſpeakeſt as one of the fooliſh women.

It is lawful ſometimes to expreſs holy anger and paſſion by ſharp reproofs. Juſta ira mater eſt diſciplinæ.

Chriſt who was meekneſs and humility it ſelf, yet when he hath to deal with Phariſees, he can call them a generation of Vipers, painted Sepulchres, blind guides, an adulterous generageneration, children of the Devil: Anger can hardly be silent, and that anger is admirable which speaks and sins not. He that knows not how to be angry, knows not how to love: And he that knows not how to reprove with love, knows not how to be angry.

You may discern love in Job, mingling with and moderating his reproof. Job rebukes his Wife, but it is with the spirit of meekness. First, He doth not speak positively or down right, Thou art a fool, but comparatively, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women use to speak; that seems one mitigation or allay of this reproof: yet I confess such speaking by way of similitude, hath often in it the force and intent of a direct assertion.

A other thing observable for the meekness of Job, is this; he doth not fall out with the whole Sex, and say, ye women are foolish, and ignorant, and impatient; but Thou speakest as one of the foolish women. He doth not charge the whole Sex, he knew there were wise women, as well as foolish; such Solomon describes, Prov. 31. 26. She openeth her mouth with wisdom. And we know Abigail the Wife was wise, and her Husband was Nabal, a fool. Job doth not lay it upon women in general, he falleth not out with all, because he knew there were some foolish ones, and because he saw his Wife in that act, imitating those foolish ones.

There is a third thing mitigating the sharpness of the reproof; Job doth not fall out with, or disgust the ordinance of God, because his Wife spake thus; he saith not, who would marry to be yoakt with such a one as you? It is enough to make one forswear marriage, to have or hear of such a VVife; better be in any condition then in a married condition. How often do Husbands discover this folly? if their VVives displease them, presently the ordinance of God displeaseth them, who would be married? It is very sad, when mans miscarriage makes us question or disrelish the institution of God.

In the fourth place, Job is not only not angry with the ordinance of God in general, but he is not angry with the special act of Gods providence, in his own particular choice. There are many will say, if their wives trouble them, I wish we had never seen the faces one of another, we may curse the hour we ever met together. Jobs spirit was far from this; he was indeed angry with his wife, but he was not angry because this woman was his wife: He doth not reject her because she was bad, but labours to make her better. To convince another of folly, is the readyest way to make him wise. Thus we see, though there were sharpness in the reproof to search the wound, yet there was none to exasperate the person: This reproof was an exact compound of love, and anger, of zeal and knowledge.

From the ground of her counsel, and this reproof compared together, we may Observe; That it is an argument of a low and of a foolish spirit, to judge of any mans condition by Gods outward dealings with him: For, this was it, that she grounded her counsel upon; seeing his outward condition, she thought him as a miserable man, and therefore adviseth him to curse God, and die. Thou speakest (saith he) as one of the foolish women. It is an argument of folly and madness, to judge a man miserable because poor, or unhappy, or unhealthy.

Again observe, That unworthy and low thoughts of God, argue a low and a foolish spirit. Thou speakest as one of the Nabalesses? Thou hast such low thoughts of God, and speakest so poorly of God, that at present I cannot but number thee among the fools; for as there is nothing ought to be so high in our thoughts, as God and his wayes; so we ought to have high and reverent thoughts of God and his wayes, whatsoever he doth with us: though we change, yet he and they change not; God is the same, and his service the same for ever.

Lastly, Observe, That to do or speak wickedly, is to do or speak foolishly. Sin is the greatest folly in the world, sin is a declining from the rule of right reason, both from spiritual reason and from natural; Lo, they have rejected the word of the Lord, and what wisdom is in them? Jer. 8. 9. True wisdom, is to walk by a right rule, to a right end. While we sin, lust (in some degree or other) is the rule, and self is the end; In both which we joyn hands with folly, and are the companions of fools; Thou speakest as one of the foolish women, &c.

From the reproof it self, we come to consider the reasons of the reproof. Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh; what? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and not evil? Here is the reason upon which he grounds his reproof, Shall we receive good at the hands of God, &c. The Hebrew runs thus in the letter, Shall we receive good from God? &c. The emphasis of the words carry it thus, shall we receive good with hand or heart at the hand of God, and shall we not in the same manner receive evil? The word Cabal, whence this is derived, signifieth the receiving of a thing with the hand and with the heart; that is, to receive gladly and thankfully, as it were to kiss the hand and receive a thing: Or to receive a thing with much reverence and veneration. Hence the Jewes call the Doctrine which is received and transmitted from hand to hand, namely their traditional Doctrine, Caballa: That which the word Tradition imports among the Papists, the word Caballa imports among the Jewes; Then the meaning of Job is, That good and evil are to be alike received and entertained as from God; that is, they are to be received with the same reverence and chearfulness. We receive good things chearfully, thankfully, reverently, we kiss the hand and take them. And shall we not receive evil? The words do not refer to the act of receiving, but to the manner of receiving; We shall receive evil whether we will or no, but shall we not receive it? namely so, and so, as we receive good, chearfully, thankfully, reverently, respecting God and his wayes of providence towards us. And then the question may be resolved into this affirmative conclusion; That look in what manner we receive good from the hand of God, in the same we ought to receive evil. Or thus, Where we have our good, thence we must have our evil. One and the same hand moderates and dispenceth both. Wherefore, shall we receive good, and not evil?

Shall we receive good? Some interpret the good here to be meant of the good of the next life; shall we be in expectation of everlasting good? shall we be in expectation of enjoying Christ, and seeing the face of God for ever in Heaven? shall we be at least in hope of a crown of glory, layed up in store for us? and shall we not be willing to receive evils, and digest troubles, to bear the cross a few dayes while we are here? I (saith the Apostle Paul, Rom. 8. 18.) reckon that the sufferings of this present time, are not worthy to be compared to the glory which shall be revealed. Shall we have glory in the eye of our faith, and shall we not indure a little trouble in the eye of our sense?

But rather, by good here, we are to understand the good things of this life; shall we receive good? sc. outward comforts and prosperity, and shall we not receive evil? from whom? Evil from the hand of God.

What Evil? Sooner shall the Sun send forth a cloud, then God send forth any evil properly taken; therefore evil here, is only afflictions, as contradistinct to the good before-named: So the sense is, shall we receive comforts at the hand of God, and shall we not receive afflictions? Afflictions are evil, not moral evil, not natural evil: but they are called evil, either first, because they are usually esteemed so; or secondly, because they are so to sense; or thirdly, because they are many times abused, and so in the event they prove evil unto us: lastly, they are often evil negatively, that is, they do us no good; but they are never evil positively in themselves, or relatively, as they are received from God.

Afflictiones malæ per se non sunt, sed malæ tantum vocantur quia tales vulgò æstimantur.

We may take notice (for the further clearing of this passage) of the form of the argument. It is proposed by way of question or expostulation, as we render it. What? shall we receive good? &c. There is a great deal of force in the manner of proposing; questions are full of quickness and spirit. Job doth not only give his wife a Logical reason, but a Rhetorical reason, words with life, to convince her by; What? saith he, shall we receive good? &c. As if he had said, this were an absurd thing once to imagine; a blind man may see this, it is so plain, and a fool may understand it, the reason lies all in sight; That if we receive good from the hand of God, we must at least with patience receive evil.

From this reason in general, Observe, That reproofs come then most strongly upon the heart, when they are backed with reason. Some reprove with rage, and not with reason; with passion, and not with wisdom; they reprove with their wit rather then with their spirit. Job mixes reason with his passion, and gives her an argument, as well as a rebuke.

More particularly, from the matter of this reason, Observe first, That good and evil are both from the hand of God. Give me neither poverty nor riches, saith Agur, Prov. 30. 8. both are the gift of God. Poverty is Gods gift as well as riches. If God do not give us poverty, all the world will not make us poor. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things; Isaiah 45.7. The same Prophet teacheth us that these two are equally the prerogative of God, and such a prerogative, as equally distinguisheth him from all Idols and false gods; Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods: yea, do good or do evil, that we may be dismayed, and behold it together. No creature hath ever answered this challenge, or ever shall, *Isa.*41.23. Creatures do good and evil, as ministers of Gods will, not as matters of their own. Good of every kind, and all kinds of pœnal evil come forth from God. Indeed, God usually conveyes these to us by the hand of man; but it becomes us to receive them as from the hand of God. Much, both good and evil, comes to us at the second hand, but we ought to take it as from the first. This truth well wrought upon our hearts, will make every good we enjoy better, and every evil we feel, not so bad. This latter branch shall be cast into a second Observation,

Which may be this, To look on evil as coming from the hand of God, will quiet the heart in bearing evil. Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and not evil? And this in two respects: First, because of the soveraignty of God, he being supream Lord, may do what he will: and his will being the supream rule of Justice he can do no wrong. This notion of God assures us, that whatsoever we receive from the hand of God, is just and right; hence the inference is natural, If God send evil, I must receive it quietly, for he sends it justly. Secondly, because of the assured faithfulness, and love and goodness of God to his, even when he sends them (which are all he sends) this sort of evils. As if Job had said, any thing is well-come that cometh from one that loves me, and hath done me good, as God I know doth, and hath done often, and will do for ever. Will not a man take a nominal evil kindly at his hand, from whom he hath received much real good. While we look only upon creatures and what they do, the burthen of trouble is intollerable; but as it cometh from God, from a God that loveth us, we cannot but receive it in love. Afflictions coming from the creature, are as the rod of Moses upon the ground, a biting, a stinging serpent: but considered in the hand of God, they are as the serpent in the hand of Moses, a rod to correct, and a staff to comfort us. David we know fled from Saul in fear of his life; envious, bloody Saul had threatned to kill him. In his flight, David meets with his beloved Jonathan, and saith unto him (1 Sam. 20.8.) Jonathan, if there be any iniquity in me, slay me thy self, for why shouldest thou bring me to thy Father? He would die rather by the hand of Jonathan, then by the hand of Saul; death from the hand of Jonathan who loved him, was sweet; whereas from Saul, it had been a bitter cup indeed. Take another instance. Elijah flyeth from Jezabel, 1 King. 19. 4. and why doth he flie from her? She seeks my life, saith he, to take it away. Thoughts of this pressed him so hard, that when he came into the Wilderness (the Text saith) he sate down under a Juniper-tree, and requested for himself that he might die, and said, It is enough now O Lord, take away my life. But Elijah, if thou be so willing to die, why doest thou fly from Jezebel? she would have given thee thy wish presently, and satisfied at once her own malice, and thy longing: I but death from the hand of a Jezabel was his fear, not his desire: He could welcome it from the hand of God, but not from the hand of a spiteful woman. But you will say, death is from the hand of God, though it come by the hand of the creature. True; but as every good we receive, is so much the more sweet, by how much the more we see of the hand of God in it, and less of the creature; so every evil is so much the more bitter, by how much we see less of God, and more of man in it. If God will take away my life, I am pleased, but I beg deliverance from the hand of Jezabel: He fled for his life for fear of Jezabel, but he called upon God to die. We may exemplifie this in Christ, *Joh.*18.11. The cup which my Father hath given me, saith he, shall I not drink it? It is poculum charitatis, a grace-cup to poor sinners, a cup though bitter in it self, though mixt with the wrath of God as a judge, due to sinners, yet temper'd and sweetned with a Fathers love everlastingly assured unto me; I cannot but drink it, it cometh from my Father.

But it may be objected, that I lately assign'd it as one reason, why Satan spared Jobs wife; namely, That she who was his neerest friend, being made an instrument of his affliction, the affliction might be more afflictive and vexatious; And David complains most of a friend, that smote him, Psal. 55.

I answer, when love turns to hatred, and friendship to unfaithfulness, when former kisses (like that present one of Judas) are changed into treachery; this is very wounding and grievous indeed. But when God strikes his friends, he is their friend still; when he afflicts, it is in faithfulness, (Psal. 119. 75.) He is good to us, when he sends us evil; and he sends us evil, for our good. To be smitten by a friend whose very smiting is friendship, and who heals us by wounding, cannot be offensive. Hence Davids choice, Let us fall now into the hands of the Lord (for his mercies are great) and not into the hand of man, 1 Sam. 24. 14.

Hence a third observation from the strength of the argument and reason, may be thus framed; To consider that all the good we have, descends from God, makes it both reasonable and equitable, that we should bear evil quietly when he is pleased to send it. Shall we receive good, and not evil? saith he. It is Solomons advice, (Eccles. 7. 14.) In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider. What shall we consider! Consider this, and mark it well, that as the day of prosperity was from God, so the day of adversity is from God likewise; for it follows, God also hath set the one over against the other. Therefore seeing God hath set one over against the other, thou must take the one well, as well as the other; at least thou must bear the latter as patiently, as thou didst receive the former joyfully. They who have shared with others in gains, think it but equal to share with them in losses; they set the one over against the other. And so must we in respect of Gods dispensations towards us. If we set our present wants, over against our former fulness; our present sorrows, over against our former comforts; our present sickness over against our former health; our present war, over against our former peace; If we thus set the one over against the other, our accounts will be ballanc'd, yea our former receits of good will be far greater, and out-ballance our present sufferings of evil. Especially if we remember, that we never deserved the least part of the good we have received, but we have deserved more then all the evil that we suffer. We may say as Ezra did, (Chap. 9. 13.) Thou our God hast punished us less then our iniquities; and we may say as Jacob (Gen. 32. 10.) Lord, we are not worthy the least of all thy mercies.

This argument may be of great use to us of this Nation, in these times of darkness and fear. What? shall not we receive evil from the hand of God, who have received so much good? we have received many years of peace from God, fourscore years of peace; shall we receive so many years of peace, from the hands of God, and shall we take it ill, if we receive some years of war? We have received many years of plenty, shall we take it ill if we should have some years of scarcity? We have had the Gospel many years, every one sitting under his Vine, and under his Fig-tree; what, if now, we hold the Gospel standing upon our guard, or marching in the Field? what if we hold it a while sitting in Tents, and standing under our displaied banners?

Fourthly, Forasmuch as the same word is applied here to express the act of the mind in reference both to good and evil, Observe, That outward evils are to be received in the same manner, and with the same mind that good things are received with. Yet a caution is to be given in with this. There are two sorts of outward evils or sufferings: Sin is the cause of some sufferings, and grace is the cause of other sufferings, either grace acted, or grace to be tried. Now we are not to receive the evil of suffering, whereof sin is the cause, with the same mind as we do good; joy and cheerfulness doth not become such evils. But when our sufferings are caused by grace, either of those wayes, then it becomes us to rejoyce. The Apostle saith more, Rom. 5. 3. We glory in tribulation. And again, (2 Cor. 6. 10.) as sorrowful, yet alway rejoycing. The sorrow of godly men is like the joy of the wicked, only in appearance: Paul had only a shadow of sorrow, as sorrowful; but his joy was substantial and continual, alwayes rejoycing, though his outward estate cast up, amounted but to this, poor, and having nothing. The reason is, because God is the same in all variety of estates: God loves as well when we are poor, as when we are rich, yea as well when himself smites, as when he heals. He is as good to us when we receive evil, as when we receive good: therefore if God be the same, surely we ought to be the same too, and take it as kindly at his hands, when we are impoverisht, as when we are inricht; when we are sick, as when we are in health; when we are in prison, as when we are free. Shall present evils make us either insensible of, or unthankful for past mercies? Shall present troubles be as a grave wherein to bury the memory of all our former comforts? shall (as it was in Pharaohs dream) the lean kine, and the blasted ears of corn, eat up and devour the fat kine, and the full ears? The Heathen Philosopher censures him for a fool, who thinks there is no benefit in benefits, nor blessing in blessings, except they be present: And he brands him as unthankful, who accounts the end of a mercy an injury; or thinks he is wrong'd, when free gifts are not continued. If a Heathen saw so much obligation, in the past benefits of a man; Christians should see it much more in the past mercies and blessings of their God. Wherefore, to conclude this point, with the counsel of the Ancient, Remember the heaps of good things received, weigh the good and the evil together: Thou shalt never find any mans life, at all times alike; It is the priviledge of God alone to be without changes; but if thou grieveſt at what is present, take comfort in what is past. Now thou mourneſt, but heretofore thou didst rejoyce; now thou art in want, but thou hast had abundance. We have a saying, It is a miserable thing to have been happy: But a godly man is happy in the midst of all his misery; he may say with undaunted Luther, Let him be miserable that can be miserable, I cannot. He that hath not a God to loose, nor a soul to loose, cannot be miserable, whatsoever he looses; while Christ is safe, a believer hath no reason to be unsatisfied. Thus we have discuss'd Job's answer, and have found it full of wisdom and of holiness; like those words of the Wise, which the Preacher saith (Eccles. 12. 11.) are as goads, and as nails fastened by the Masters of Assemblies. Job's words were as goads by the sharpness of reproof, to awake and quicken lazy drones; they were as nailes by the piercing efficacy and strength of reason, to confirm and fasten wavering minds.

Ingratus est, qui injuriâ vocat finem voluptatis; stultus qui nullum fructum esse putat bonorum, nisi præsentium, qui non in præteritis acquiescit, &c. Sen. ad Polyb. c. 29. Basil. Orat. 11. de patientia.

We have the word and warrant of God for this, in that high Elogium, or commendation given him at the conclusion of all.

In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

Job reproves his Wife for speaking so, and he refutes what she had spoken; in both he hits the right: Now In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

This is the same testimony for the matter, and almost the same in words, with that, given of Job's victory, in the close of the first dayes battel; and having explicated them in that place, I shall but briefly touch them here, In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

We see in general, the holy Ghost gives the victory to Job. Satan is foiled, his plot fails, the weapons of his warfare are all broken and successless; all hi fiery darts are either quench'd or beaten back upon himself: Job stands like a mighty rock, or like a house built upon the rock, unshaken, unmoved: He that is hel'd up by everlasting armes, shall stand fast for ever. In all this Job sinned not.

The words refer to what was past; for Job afterward did fail, and sinned with his lips through vehemency of pain, and heat of disputation; he spake some things rashly, though nothing blasphemously: So he confesses, Chap. 42. 13. I have uttered things that I understood not. But in all this, so far as Job had gone, he had not sinned with his lips. As Samuel after many victories and deliverances, sets up a stone or pillar with this inscription; Eben Ezer, The stone of help, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us (1 Sam. 7. 12.) So here the holy Ghost (as it were) erects a pillar, raiseth a monument of Jobs compleat and glorious victories over Satan, thus engraven, Hitherto, in all this Job hath not sinned. Yet you may remember, that such speeches concerning the Saints, are to be understood in a qualified sence, not in an abtolute sence. For, who can bring a clean thing out of that which is unclean? Perfection out of imperfection? Not to sin, is here our duty, and should be our endeavour, it shall be our reward in Heaven. On earth we are said not to sin, when we desire not to sin; as hath been more at larged shewed upon those words of the last verse of the former Chapter, In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly. There read the point handled more distinctly. For the opening of these words, note only this; that when it is said, In all this Job sinned not, there is more to be understood, then is expreſt; for Job did not only not sin, but he overcame, and triumphed gloriously over Satan: he did excellently, and he spake excellently in all this. So then, these words carry the sence not only of a bare acquittal, but of a high approbation: In all this Job sinned not with his lips.

With his lips. ¶ Some of the Jewes infer from hence, that he sinned in his heart; because it is said, he did not sin in words, they conceit there was some irregularity in his thoughts. Surely if his heart had been disorder'd, his tongue would have been disorder'd too; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, therefore it is rather an argument that his heart was free from sin, because his tongue was.

In all this Job sinned not with his lips. That is, he did not murmure, or repine, or blaspheme; these are the sins of the lips.

> Observe first, Not to sin, is the highest and truest, the most honourable and lasting victory of all.

This victory God himself applauds: the holy Ghost will cry you up for strength and valour, when you come off from a temptation untouch'd; you shall be recorded for it among Christs worthies, In all this Job sinned not.

> And secondly, To govern the tongue under great and sore afflictions, is a high act of grace.

It is spoken as matter of wonder; In all this Job sinned not with his lips. Moses, you know, was a meek man, yet he was so put to it, that he spake unadvisedly with his lips; He opened his lips so unadvisedly, that God shut him out of the temporal Canaan for it: rash words cost him dear. David was a very holy man, and very careful over his tongue, Psal. 39. 1. I said I will take heed to my wayes, that I sin not with my tongue. I will keep my mouth with a Bridle: And knowing (though as the Apostle James teacheth us, We put bits into the Horses mouthes that they may obey us, we can turn about their whole body, Jam. 3. 3.) that no bridle of his putting could keep his mouth; he puts this work into the hand of God, praying with all earnestness; Set a watch (O Lord) before my mouth, keep the door of my lips. Notwithstanding all this, we find him sinning with his lips more then once, Psal. 73. 13. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. And again, Psal. 116. 11. I said in my haste, all men are liars. Job had the prehemineence in this, he sinned not with his lips, no not when he was afflicted and smitten with bitter words: He that offendeth not in words (saith the Apostle James) is a perfect man, he is a perfect man indeed, who can rule his tongue, and so keep the door of his lips, as that he offends not either by silence or by speech. The lips do offend both wayes, negatively as well as positively, by speaking, and by not speaking: Sometimes silence is a loud sin; not speaking is to some, on some occasions, a crying sin; Job sinned not with his lips, either by being silent when he should speak, or by speaking wherein and when he should be silent. And so much concerning this second consequent of Job's affliction: His Wives sinful counsel, with his prudent and gracious answer; sharply, yet moderately rebuking; strongly, yet lovingly convincing her folly: In and by both, faithfully indeavouring at once to discover and cure her error.

The third consequent of his affliction now follows, namely the visit of his friends, described in the three last verses of this Chapter, which leads us into the body of the Book, with all the debates, disputes and arguments held and maintained with much acuteness of wit, and strength of reasoning between him and these three, his friends and visitants.

VERS.

VERS. 11, 12, 13.

Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place: Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite; for they had made an appointment together, to come to mourn with him, and to comfort him.

And when they lift up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and ſprinkled duſt upon their heads towards Heaven.

So they ſate down with him upon the ground ſeven dayes, and ſeven nights, and none ſpake a word unto him: for they ſaw that his grief was very great.

THeſe three verſes, contain the third general conſequent of Job's ſecond affliction. In the diviſion of the Chapter, we called it his friends viſit. In which viſit we may here obſerve; Firſt, the number of the viſitants. They were three. Now when Job's three friends.

Secondly, We have here the names of theſe viſitants. Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite.

Thirdly, We have the occaſion of their viſit: and that was the report of all the evil that was come upon Job. Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, then they came.

Fourthly, We have the ground of this viſit: it was a mutual agreement, or a compact made between them; ſo ſaith the Text, For they had made an appointment together to come.

Fifthly, We have the end or the intendment of their coming, what they aimed at, in viſiting Job. And the end is expreſt in the Text to be two-fold.

Firſt, To communicate with him in his ſorrows.

Secondly, To communicate unto him their comforts.

Firſt, To mourn with him. And ſecondly, To comfort him.

The former of theſe two ends, viz. their mourning with him, we have largely ſet down in the two latter verſes; they put that end into act preſently, as ſoon as they came, they fell a mourning with him. And we may obſerve five diſtinct acts of Job's friends ſolemnly condoling or mourning with him.

The firſt act is this, They wept. And to ſhew that it was no ordinary weeping, the Text ſaith, They lift up their voice and wept.

The ſecond act of their mourning was, their renting of their Mantles, And they rent every one his Mantle.

The third act was, the ſprinkling of duſt upon their heads, and the ſprinkling of duſt toward Heaven, which was another aggravating circumſtance of their ſorrow.

The fourth act was, their ſitting down with him upon the ground ſeven dayes, and ſeven nights.

The fifth act of their mourning with him, was their ſilence, And none ſpake a word unto him.

The Cauſe or the reaſon of this ſolemnity in their mourning, the reaſon of theſe five Acts, but eſpecially of the laſt, of their ſilence, is given us in the latter words of the verſe, For they ſaw that his grief was very great, therefore it muſt have great ſorrow, and great ſilence, to wait the fitteſt ſeaſon for the adminiſtring of counſel and conſolation. Thus for the parts and reſolution of the words, contained in theſe three verſes. I ſhall come to the opening of the particulars.

And when Job's three friends.

The word which we tranſlate (friends) ſprings from a root which ſignifieth to feed a mans ſelf, or others, or to eat together as Sheep eat together; and ſo from the ſame word, a Paſtor or a feeder of Sheep is derived, Pſal. 23. 1. The Lord is my Shepheard and feeder. And by a Metaphor it is tranſlated for a friend; becauſe friends do uſually feed together, eat and converſe together: So David deſcribes a friend, Pſal. 41. 9. My familiar friend that did eat of my bread. Job's viſitants are thus expreſt, his friends or familiars; The word ſometimes notes only a friend at large, or any neighbour; ſo in the Law, Exod. 20. 16. Thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs againſt thy neighbour, or (it is the ſame word) againſt thy friend: there it is taken in a large ſence, for a neighbour, that is, for any beſides thy ſelf, to whom offices of love are due, as Chriſt expounds it, Luke 10. 30. But uſually, it is put ſtrictly, for a ſpecial friend, as in Deut. 13. 6. when he ſpeaks of inticers to Idolatry, If thy friend (ſaith he) who is as thine own ſoul; there is the ſame word, and he ſhews by a circumlocution, whom he means by ſuch a friend, namely ſuch a one who is as thine own ſoul; one that lyeth in thy boſom, and is as near and dear to thee as thy ſelf. I ſuppoſe here in this place, Job's three friends were not friends at large, but intimate and ſpecial friends, or (as we uſe to ſay) boſom friends. And therefore when it is ſaid, Job's three friends, we are not to underſtand it, as if Job had but three, as if theſe were all the friends Job had; but amongſt all his friends, theſe carried away the name, theſe were the chief and choice; Job's three friends. As it is ſaid concerning David's Worthies, 2 Sam. 23. David had many Worthies, but there was a firſt three, a chief three among them all. So here, Job doubtleſs had many friends, a large Catalogue of friends, but in theſe you have the top of his friends, the chief three, the firſt three: Theſe three ſpecial friends came to viſit Job, to mourn with him, and to comfort him.

The occaſion of this viſit, preſents it ſelf next, When theſe three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon Job. [When they heard of it.] The troubles of Job were noyſed all the Country over, yea into ſtrange Countries. Two things are ſwiftly carried about upon the wings of fame, and poaſted about by reports: Firſt, The ſins. Secondly, The afflictions of Godly men. If they fall into any ſin, it will be heard of all a Country, it may be all a Kingdom over: It ſhall be told in Gath, and publiſh'd in the ſtreets of Askelon. Again, if they fall into any great affliction, every one deſcants upon it, and many will paſs deep cenſures. It becomes matter of wonder, that men eminent in godlineſs, great profeſſors, ſuch as have held forth the name, and upheld the truth of Chriſt, that they (I ſay) ſhould fall into great afflictions, is reported, diſcours'd, admir'd all a Country over.

There is nothing that is more talked of, then the trouble that befalleth godly men; When the three friends of Job heard of all this evil that was come upon him.

When this report about Job came to them, they came to Job, They came (ſaith the Text) every one from his own place. The word Place, is often uſed in Scripture, to ſignifie a Country, a City, or a Region. Now here it is conceived, that the place from whence they came, was not only the place where they dwelt, but the place where they governed. It is frequently aſſerted by the Jewiſh Doctors, with whom the Septuagint agree, and moſt of the Jeſuits are in it too; that theſe three friends of Job's were Kings, either Reges or Reguli, ſuch as had the government of thoſe Countries where they lived. Beza rejects this as a Fable, and telleth us that this opinion hath no footing or foundation in Scripture, but is grounded only upon that uſual boldneſs of the Jewiſh Doctors. But whether they were Kings or Subjects, whether they came from their private dwellings, or from the places of their dominion, needs not trouble us. This is clear, that they were great men, eminent perſons in their Country: and the diſputes which follow, teſtifie that they were men of very great wiſdom and underſtanding, according to all the learning of thoſe times.

Quod autem dicunt Hebrei totidē fuiſſe reges eſt ex audacia illis familiari, Beza.

Theſe three friends of Job's are here ſet forth by name, by a double name. By the name, firſt, of their perſons. Secondly, By the name of their Country, or of their Family. For that's a queſtion, whether the additional name be derived from the Country where they dwelt, or from the Family out of which they were extracted.

Eliphaz the Temanite, he is the firſt. We read Gen. 36. 11. That Eſau begat Eliphaz; that Eliphaz was the eldeſt Son of Eſau, and Eliphaz begat Teman. This Teman, deſcending from Eſau, is ſuppoſed to be the Father or the Anceſtor of this Eliphaz, from whom he is called Eliphaz the Temanite; and ſo Temanite, is a note of the Family from whence Eliphaz deſcended. It is uſual likewiſe in Scripture, to give ſuch additional names from the Countries or places, places, and so Eliphaz the Temanite, may be from Teman, of which we read often in Scripture: Teman signifies the South; it was a Southern Countrey.

Jer. 49.20. Amos 1.12 Obad. 9. Hab. 3.4. Teman regio Principum Edom in terra Gabalitica a Theman filio Eliphaz filii Esau sortita vocabulum, &c. Sciendum etiam quod omnis Australis regio Ebræis Theman dicitur (paulo post.) Theman juxta Ezekielem civitas Idumeæ. Eusebius de locis.

Further, Teman was a place, wherein it is observed, that the Schools of Learning were seated, Jer. 49. 7. Concerning Edom, thus saith the Lord, Is wisdom no more in Teman? Two things may be gathered from that Text. First, That Teman was in Edom, or Idumea. Secondly, That it was a place wherein there was much profession of wisdom and learning. So then, we may take the word Temanite, either as referring unto the Stock from which Eliphaz sprung; or unto the place where Eliphaz lived. The Hebrews refer it unto his Stock or pedigree: And the Caldee Paraphrase is for the place or Countrey.

Job's second friend was Bildad the Shuhite. All that I find for his pedigree, is, that he came from one of the Sons of Abraham by his second Wife Keturah; of whom it is said, Gen. 25.1. That she bare him Zimram, and Jocksham, with others, and Shuah: From which Shuah was the family of the Shuhites: And it is conceived, that Bildad was of that line, and therefore here called Bildad the Shuhite.

And for the last, Zophar the Naamathite, there is less certainty concerning him: Some will have him to be Zepha, mentioned Gen. 36. 11. who was Grand-child to Esau by Eliphaz his Eldest Son. And for his additional name Naamathite, the best conjecture which I find, takes it from Naamah, the name of a City, spoken of Josh. 15. 41. in the division of the promised Land to the Children of Israel.

Now it is said, that these three, upon the report of all the evil that was come upon Job, came to visit him; For they had made an appointment together to come; or they all agreed together; they came not by accident, but by appointment. The word signifieth, to meet by solemn agreement. Hence the place where the children of Israel used to meet to solemnize the worship of God, before the building of the Temple, was called the Tabernacle of the Congregation; because they were to congregate or meet there at set times to celebrate the Name of God, according to his own institution. And in the thirtieth Chapter of this Book, the grave is called Beth-mogned (ver. 23.) the house of the gathering together of all men, according to that Statute of Heaven, It is appointed unto men once to dye, Heb. 9.27. It is the fancy of Origen upon this place, that these three friends came at adventure, that they came all of them several wayes, unknown to, or without the privity of one another, from their several Countreys, and met, as it were by miracle, at Job's house, the same day and hour. But the Text is clear, that there was a profest covenant and agreement made, by which they came together.

They came (saith the Text) to mourn with him, and to comfort him. In these words we have the end or intendment of their coming.

נוד

First, [They came to mourn with him.] The word which we translate, to mourn, signifieth to move the body, or to pass from place to place. Cain (after that sin of his in murthering his Brother, Gen. 4.) hath this judgment pass'd by God upon him, That he should be a fugitive and a vagabond; he should be Nod, a mover from place to place: And afterwards it is said, He dwelt in the Land of Nod; which some interpret for a special place, for a Country called Nod: but it is taken by others thus, He dwelt in the Land of Nod; that is, where ever he dwelt, he found the Land, as it were, moving; it was a moving, a shaking, a trembling Land to him, He dwelt in the Land of Nod: His conscience quaking continually, by reason of the guilt that was upon him, for murdering his Brother; the earth also seemed to quake under him, whersoever he went, or dwelt. That only by the way. The same word here used in the Text, by a Metaphor, signifies to mourn, or compassionate the afflictions and miseries of another. So Nah. 3. 6. Nineveh is laid waste, who will bemoan her? And Isa. 51.19. These two things are come unto thee, who shall be sorry for thee? And the reason why this word, which signifieth properly to move, is translated to signifie mourning in compassion with others, may be, either first this; because such persons will run, go, or move from place to place, to give and administer comfort to their friends, whose afflictions affect and grieve them, as we see here in these friends of Job; they took a long journey, they moved indeed when they came to mourn. Or rather secondly, (as I conceive) for this reason, because such compassionate sorrows and mournings when our friends are under deep and sore afflictions, are usually expresst by moving the body, or at least moving some member of the body; as many times the hand is lifted up, and we stroke our breasts, or we shake the head: It is ordinary in compassionate sorrows, thus to move the hand or the head; and so the word is used to signifie mourning, from that act which accompanies or testifies mourning. And the same word is sometimes used to signifie that trepidation, or trembling of the heart, those convulsions of the spirit, upon the approaches of our own troubles. So Isa. 7. 2. That fearful motion and disquietness both of Prince and people, when they heard of the invasion of their Countrey by Rezin King of Syria, &c. is thus expresst, The heart of the King, and the heart of his people were moved, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind.

ut condo-leant aut compatiuntur, solent subinde movere caput ad testandum dolorem. Merc.

Secondly, It is said they came to comfort him. The word which is there used to comfort, signifies likewise to mourn: and especially the mournings of repentance, or to repent for sin with sorrow: The reason is given, because true comfort doth spring from repentance: Joy often ariseth out of sorrow, and so the same word is applied to both. Worldly joy and sorrow are contraries, but godly joy and sorrow are con-causes, mutually effecting and helping one another.

We have here an excellent pattern held forth unto us of our duty, in reference unto distressed persons or Nations.

First thus, It is both an act and an argument of true friendship, to mourn with and comfort those that are in affliction.

A man doth then set his seal to it, that he is a friend, when he will partake and share in his friends afflictions; when he will divide with him in all estates whatsoever it is, whether sweet or sowre, joy or sorrow, he will have his part. Many friends will come and rejoyce with you, they will come to a feast with you, they will meet at a house of mirth with you; but they fall off and go back, when they must weep with you, when if they come, they must come to a house of mourning. Solomon (Prov. 17. 11.) gives us the true character of a friend; A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity. It is the note and tryal of our love to God, when we love him at all times, whatever he doth with us: And it is the argument of true love unto our brethren, when we love and own them at all times, whatsoever they endure from the hand of God, or man: This Christ approves and commends in his Disciples, Luke 22. 28. Ye are they (saith he) who have continued with me in my temptation. It is an easie piece of friendship, or discipleship, to continue with Christ at a Feast, or at a full Table; but in a temptation to continue with him, speaks a Disciple indeed. Some friends are like the Swallow, they come in the Summer and sing with you; but when it is Winter, cold and frost, then farewell, they must seek a warmer Climate. These are summer friends; while the summer of comfort, the summer of riches, the summer of outward contentment lasteth, you cannot be rid of them: but if the winter come, the winter of trouble, and sorrow, and poverty, and sickness, they are gone; they will not once look on you, they pass on the other side of the way, as the Levite did, when he saw the man lye wounded and weltring in his blood, Luke 10. 32. These are summer friends, not winter friends, not they.

Secondly, Observe this; As it is an act and argument of friendship to do thus, so it is likewise a duty to do thus:

It is a duty to mourn with those that mourn, and to visit those that are in affliction.

Many look upon it only as a complement, to visit their sad friends; we must look upon it as a duty. Christ puts it (Matth. 25. 36.) as one of those visible acts of duty, upon which he will pronounce the blessing of that day; Come ye blessed; why? I was sick, and ye visited me. Christ is not sick in his person; he is in Heaven, where is no sin, and therefore no sickness shall ever enter: and indeed he never was sick in his person, when he was here upon the earth; Christ did not bear our personal infirmities, he bore only our natural infirmities: I know it is said, He bore our sicknesses (by compassion and by compensation) but he was not sick: Whereas then Christ saith, I was sick, he means, sick in his members: And when he saith, Ye visited me, he means, his ſick diſtreſſed ſervants: He takes it ſo kindly, when done to his, that he reckons it as done to himſelf: It is an act you ſee, and an office of love, upon which Chriſt hath a ſpecial eye. The Apoſtle James (Chap. 1. 27.) doth, as it were, put all Religion in this: It is ſuch a fruit of Religion as doth evidence the truth of Religion, and therefore hath obtained not only the name of Religion, but is made the definition of Religion. Pure Religion (ſaith he) and undefiled before God the Father, is this. What is it? To viſit the fatherleſs and the widow in their affliction. This is a definition from the effect: It is not put in general, that to viſit the fatherleſs and the widow; but to viſit them in their affliction, is pure Religion; that is, this is a fruit, that which groweth up from the root of pure Religion: if pure Religion live in the heart, this will be a fruit in the life. Wherefore look not upon the viſitation of a diſconſolate friend, as a matter of indifferency, but of duty; and do it not only for love, but for conſcience.

Thirdly, The Text ſaith, As ſoon as they heard, or when they heard of all the evil that was come upon Job, they came to mourn with him. Then obſerve,

The very report of another's ſuffering, ſhould move us to mourn and ſuffer with him.

Report ſhould bring us, when we do but hear of ſuch a thing: It is very unwarrantable to judge or cenſure a friend upon report and hear-ſay; but a report is warrant enough to pity and pray for him, to viſit and comfort him. Remember them that are in bonds (ſaith the Apoſtle) Heb. 13. 3. as bound with them: Remember them. Remembrance is of things and perſons which are abſent; remember them, though you ſee them not, though abſent from you, yet make their caſe as preſent; be as bound with them, be as afflicted with them, yea haſten into their preſence. Bear one anothers burthens, Gal. 6. 2. Rejoyce with them that rejoyce, and weep with them that weep, Rom. 12. 5. Be ye all of one mind, having compaſſion one of another, 1 Pet. 3. 8. are Apoſtolical rules for, and tryals of Goſpel-love. It was a ſad condition that David was in; and it was a very ſinful condition that others about him were in, when he ſaith, Pſal. 69. 20. I looked for ſome to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none. But if it be ſinful not to eaſe (when it is in our power) the ſorrows of others, how ſinful is it to add to their ſorrow? Such David found (typing Chriſt in his ſufferings) Who gave him gall for meat, and in his thirſt they gave him vinegar to drink. Thus the Lord complains of thoſe Heathen by the Prophet Zachary (Zach. 1. 15.) I was but a little diſpleaſed with my people, and they helped forward the affliction.

Again, If it be a duty to mourn over the afflictions of others; how exceeding ſinful is it to rejoyce at the afflictions of others? This was Edom's wickedneſs, reproved by the Prophet Obadiah, ver. 12. Thou ſhouldeſt not have looked on the day of thy brother, in the day that he became a ſtranger: neither ſhouldeſt thou have rejoyced over the children of Judah, in the day of their affliction: neither ſhouldeſt thou have ſpoken proudly in the day of diſtreſs.

We may further preſs this point, in reference unto the preſent condition of our Brethren in many places of this Nation; in reference to the whole Nation of Ireland, yea of the whole Church of God: Are they not all mourners? And if we are to mourn with private friends, much more then with publick, with whole Kingdoms and Churches. We may beſpeak all paſſengers in the language of the Prophet Jeremy, lamenting over the deſolations of Jeruſalem, Is it nothing to you, all you that paſs by England, Ireland? Is it nothing to you that travel, (though but in meditation) into the Churches of Chriſt in Germany? &c. We read of Nehemiah, Chap. 1. 4. when he heard the report of Jeruſalems deſolation, though himſelf was far off at Babylon, though himſelf was rich and full, and preferr'd in the Court of that Perſian Monarch, yet he mourned many dayes. And Daniel, (Chap. 10. 2.) mourned three full weeks, that is, one and twenty dayes together, over the diſtreſſed eſtate and condition of his people; Jeremy wiſheth, Oh that my head were a fountain of tears, that I might weep night and day for the ſlain of the daughter of my people! Chap. 9. 1. We have had many ſlain, choice ones ſlain; this ſhould be matter of mourning to us. Take heed of ſuch a ſpirit, as is reproved in thoſe, Amos 6. Who ſate upon beds of Ivory, and ſtretched themſelves upon their couches, who eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midſt of the ſtall: Who chaunted to the ſound of the viol, and invented to themſelves inſtruments of Muſick like David, who drank wine in bowls, and anointed themſelves with the chief ointments, but they were not grieved for the affliction of Joſeph. If ever that of Solomon were appliable, it is to ſuch a time as this, (Eccleſ. 2. 2.) I ſaid of laughter, thou art mad; of all worldly laughter and outward mirth, what do'ſt thou? if ever it were mad, now it is mad: Now ſorrow is ſobriety, and tears are in ſeaſon. No ſong ſo muſical as that which is ſet to the higheſt ſtrain of lamentation. I remember the Prophet Eliſha's paſſion, when he fore-ſaw evils that ſhould be acted; he looked upon Hazael, ſaith the Text, (2 Kings 8. 11.) and wept; and Hazael ſaid, Why weepeth my Lord? He replyed, Becauſe I know of all the evil that thou wilt do unto the Children of Iſrael: their ſtrong holds wilt thou ſet on fire, and their young men wilt thou ſlay with the ſword, and wilt daſh their children, and rip up their women with child. This made him weep; he wept, becauſe he ſaw blood and fire, murders and burnings in the face of Hazael; what would he have done then, if he had ſeen all fulfilled with his hand? Chriſt himſelf wept over Jeruſalem, when he propheſied how the enemy ſhould come, and caſt a trench about it, and compaſs the City round, and keep them in on every ſide, &c. Luke 19. 43. If Chriſt wept for the evils that were to come on others, how ſhould we for the evils that are already come upon us? Mine eye affecteth my heart, ſaith lamenting Jeremy (Lam. 3. 51.) An eye of propheſie hath affected ſome hearts, and ſhall not an eye of ſenſe affect ours? Our ears were ſmitten long ago, with ſad meſſages out of Germany, out of the Palatinate and Bohemia: We were ſmitten nearer home by the reports of thoſe inhumane butcheries, exerciſed upon our brethren in Ireland: We are now ſmitten at home, both ear and eye, the ſword hath paſs'd the Seas, and hath ſpilt Rivers, is like to ſpill a ſea of blood out of our own bowels; for our brethren that have been ſlain, for our brethren that are in captivity, for our brethren that have been ſpoiled, let us mourn and lament with a brotherly lamentation. It is true, they ought (as thoſe ancient Worthies) to ſuffer joyfully the ſpoiling of their goods, Heb. 10. 34. but we ought to grieve when they ſuffer the ſpoiling of their goods. It is an excellent ſpirit in them, to ſuffer it with joy; but it is a ſinful ſpirit in us, which rejoyceth, when they ſuffer. Some Trees keep their greenneſs and their leaves, Winter and Summer, let the time be what it will, hot or cold, they are alike freſh and green: Some ſpirits are like thoſe hard-grain trees: But the ſpirit of a Chriſtian ſhould be like ordinary trees, which when Winter cometh, caſt their leaves, put off their beauty and bravery. The ſtory ſaith of Nero, that when he had ſet the City of Rome on fire, he got him up to an high place, to behold the fire, and feed upon the flame, for there and then he ſung ſongs of the deſtruction of Troy: To ſing ſongs, to rejoyce in the midſt of Sions afflictions, argues not a Chriſtian, but a Neronian ſpirit. To ſhut up this point, let us prefer Jeruſalem above our chiefeſt worldly joy; let us even reſolve to enjoy nothing of the world, till we ſee Jeruſalem a quiet habitation, and the joy of the whole earth. The Wife of Phineas, 1 Sam. 4. would not enjoy her Son, (and that is the chiefeſt joy) becauſe the Ark of God was taken: She enquires, Where is the glory? As if ſhe had ſaid, you ſhew me a Son, but can you ſhew me the glory? No, The glory is departed from Iſrael, for the Ark of God is taken. There is nothing in the world to be rejoyced in, when God departs from us; and there is but little, if any thing, to be rejoyced in, when Ordinances (which are the ſigns of Gods preſence, and the means of communion with God) are taken or departing from us.

Thirdly, Theſe friends of Job came to mourn with him; they were not ſent for, they were not invited by letters or meſſengers, but they came of their own accord. Obſerve,

It becomes us well for the comforting of our friends, to prevent the invitation of our friends.

Some out of a kind of modeſty (that is the beſt we can ſay of it) will not come to a troubled friend, unleſs they be ſent for. I do aſſure you this, It is good manners to be an unbidden gueſt at a houſe of mourning.

Another thing I would offer to you from hence, is this,

It

It is said, that before they came, They made an appointment to come, to mourn with him, and to comfort him; you see they agreed upon their end, before they set a foot in the way. Note this then,

It is an excellent point of holy prudence, to be setled about our end, before we undertake or enter upon any action.

Some go about business, and they know not why; they visit their friends, and they know not for what. That was justly called a confused Assembly (Acts 19. 32.) when the most part knew not wherefore they were come together. Though no man can know the end of his action, respecting the event, yet every wise man doth and ought to know the end of all his actions, in respect of his own intendment: His end is first intended, though it be last, yea though it be not all attained. Observe further,

Wisdom doth not only propose an end, but a sutable end.

Job's three friends proposed two of the most sutable ends that could be for such a business, To mourn with him, and to comfort him. If a man were to visit or converse with a wicked man, it were good to say, I will go to counsel him, to convince him of his sin, to convert him from his sin. If I go to one who is full of doubts, it were best to say, I will go see, if I can settle and resolve him: A sutable end is the beauty and grace of all our undertakings.

Again, Consider the order and method of these two ends, it is said, They came to mourn with him, and to comfort him. Comfort is the higher and the nobler end, the last and ultimate end in regard of man; it is the end into which all actions are resolved, and all ends emptied at the last; all the acts of holiness have a tendency unto joy; all godly sorrow leads unto comfort: Therefore the Apostle writes to his Corinthians, that he was not glad, because he had made them sorrowful by an Epistle, but that they sorrowed so, as they might rejoyce. How was that? They sorrowed to repentance; their sorrow wrought repentance unto salvation, not to be repented of. But is there no more in true repentance, but only this, that it is not to be repented of? Surely yes. For if there be joy in Heaven (Luke 15.) over a repenting sinner, then doubtless, there is abundant ground of joy on earth. If Angels rejoyce when a sinner repents, much more may the repenting sinner rejoyce. So then, repentance, not to be repented of, is repentance greatly to be rejoyced in. Repentance that brings not forth joy, is to be repented of: We must mourn for all sorrows which end in sorrow; for sorrow is not good for its own sake, but for comforts sake: Job's friends came not to mourn with him, that he might mourn; but they came to mourn with him, that he might be comforted: To add sorrow unto sorrow, is to be swallowed up with sorrow; he sorrows rightly, that would be swallowed up with joy: You see the ends which these men proposed in coming to Job, To mourn with him, and to comfort him. Excellent ends both, and without all question, they did propose and purpose them sincerely. They came to mourn with him, and they mourned; they came with hearts resolved to comfort him, but they did not comfort him, they did not attain that end, they could not attain it. Then observe,

That as the way of a man is not in himself, so much less is the end of a man in himself.

The way of a man is not in himself, saith the Prophet Jeremy, Chap. 10. 23. that is, a mans actions are not in his own power, he is not master of his own will, or of his own way. If a mans way be not in himself, much less is his end in himself, that is, in his own power, to have what end he pleaseth and proposeth: Man proposeth, but God disposeth. These friends came to comfort Job, but they did nothing less then comfort him: instead of comforting, they afflicted him; which forced him to complain, Miserable comforters are ye all: And yet their errand was to comfort him.

Some indeed are of opinion, that they were false friends, that they came upon him with prejudic'd and imbitter'd spirits: but the preparatory circumstances, and manner of their coming, clears the uprightness of their intentions, and confutes that slander. Doubtless they came really to comfort him, and ease his sorrows; and yet behold they doubled his sorrows, and proved a greater affliction to him then all the rest. Job had nothing left him, but the integrity of his wayes, and the uprightness of his heart: His estate was gone, his children were gone, his health was gone, his body was broken, he was undone quite, yet he had a heart-full of integrity. And when Satan, the enemy, could not strip him of this, he sends his Wife: First, to jeer him out of it; but he shakes her off quickly as a foolish Woman: Secondly, he sends these friends, gravely and learnedly to dispute and beat him out of it, by dint of argument. O how long did these hang upon him, with many serious and weighty, with many pious and divine (much misapplied) discourse: he could not get rid of these, whose words were as drawn swords, often making his wounded soul bleed and breath out sad complaints; and yet they came to comfort him. A mans heart (saith Solomon, Prov. 16. 9.) deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps. Man deviseth, but God directeth: He orders the actions, and over-rules the ends of every creature. We can neither cut out our way, nor make up our conclusions, by our own strength or wisdom. And so much for the tenth verse, His friends visit, They came unto him.

I told you before, that the two following verses, do but set forth the particulars of the first end, their mourning. They came to mourn with him: Their mourning is expressed by many of those particular circumstances, observed in Job's sorrow, chap. 1. v. 20. therefore I shall not insist much upon them.

And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, they knew him not.

This is the preface to the several acts of their mourning.

And when they lifted up their eyes.] To lift up the eyes, is a frequent Scripture phrase for seeing, Gen. 26. 63, 64. There is a reason in nature for it, man having a special nerve in the fabrick of the eye, by the motion of which the eye turns upward. I only offer that, because the same word is used for lifting up the voice.

Afar off.] Some hence infer, that Job lay abroad; and they take this for a further argument, that he was put out of the City, or House, where he dwelt, as a Leper. But this afar off, might be within the compass of his own house, or in his Chamber; as if it had been said, as soon as they stept into the place where he lay, and espied him in such a forlorn condition, they knew him not; though it be not improbable that he was sometime abroad for the benefit of the air, by reason of the filthiness of his disease; and so his friends might find him abroad. But that he was turned out of his house, is refuted, chap. 7. 13. where he speaks of his bed, and of his couch. When I say my bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint, &c. That is, when I thought to find ease by lying down upon my bed, or leaning on my couch. Therefore he had a house furnished with bed and couch.

When they lift up their eyes afar off, [they knew him not.] We need not take it absolutely, as if his disease had so disfigured him, that he could not be known to be the same man: For often in Scripture, that which is put as an absolute negative, is intended for a weak affirmative. It is said, (John 1. 11.) When Christ came, he came to his own, and his own received him not; there is an absolute negation, (yet it followeth,) But to as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God. His own received him not, yet some did receive him: Some of his own Kindred and Countrey did receive him: So that, His own received him not, is, as if it had been said, few of his own received him, or he had but cold entertainment among his own. So Hos. 9. 6. Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit. There is the sound of an absolute denial, yet the sense will bear a weak affirmation; for it followeth, Yea though they bring forth, yet I will slay the beloved fruit of their womb. They may bring forth a few or some fruit perhaps, but I will destroy it. So here, They knew him not; that is, they could scarce discern him, or distinguish who he was, his disease and sores had so discolour'd or blotted out the lines and feature of his face, that they could not suddenly assure themselves, this was he. They stood as men amazed; What? Is this Job? What a spectacle is here? How strangely is his visage changed, and his whole body disfigured? Such kind of doubting language, doubtless past amongst them. When they saw him afar off, they knew him not. The Prophet Jeremy observes the like, after the hard siege of Jerusalem, which caused him thus to lament (chap. 4. 7, 8.) Her Nazarites were purer then snow, they were whiter then milk, they were more ruddy in body then Rubies, their polishing was of Saphire: But see the change; their visage is blacker then a coal, they are not known in the streets. Famine had eaten up, not only their flesh, but their form; misery had altered their very complexion and visage; they who shined before like Rubies and Saphires, for colour and comlinesse, were now dark as a coal, or dusky like ashes; they were not known to be the same men and women. It is said of Christ in his affliction, Isa. 52. 14. That his visage was so marred more then any man, and his form more then the sons of men. Great afflictions change the very form, and utterly blast the beauty of the body. Sin doth so change the soul, and disfigure the mind; it so deforms the spirit, and defaces the image at first stamp'd upon it, that God saith, I know you not, you are not like the men that I made. But this is the comfort of a Job, of a godly man, that when his face is most deformed, his soul is most beautified; and though a disease may disfigure him, so that his neerest friends know him not, yet God knows him still; No sicknes can wear out the markes by which Christ knows thee. When thy face is blacker then a coale, he sees the face of thy soul, shining like the face of an Angel. A person or a people are then in a woful condition indeed, when God shall say to them, as he did to those hypocritical professors, Mat. 7. 23. Depart from me, I know ye not. We may be in such a woful condition, that our friends and acquaintance coming to visit us, cannot know us; yet for the main, well enough, blessed enough at that time, beautiful in the eye, welcome into the presence of a glorious God.

They knew him not. What then? Then they lifted up their voyce, and wept.

This is the first act of their mourning. And we may observe five acts of mourning here specified; whereof, one is a natural act, and the other four are ceremonial. The natural act was this of weeping: They lifted up their voice, and wept. The ceremonial acts were these; First, They rent every one his mantle. Secondly. They sprinkled dust upon their heads towards heaven. Thirdly, They sate down with him on the ground, seven dayes and seven nights. The fourth ceremonial act was, their silence; And none spake a word unto him, for they saw that his grief was great.

First, They lifted up their voyce, and wept. The word is Baca, and from that, the place, Judges 2. 5. is called Bochim, where the people are said to lift up their voice, and weep, when the Angel reproved them. In Psal. 84. 6. we read of the valley of Baca, which some translate, the valley of weeping, or the valley of tears. Others, from Baca, a Mulberry-tree, the valley of Mulberry-trees, which being a dry place, the travellers to Jerusalem, at the solemn feasts, did so dig for water, that they made all as one well.

Further, It is said, they did not only weep, but they lifted up their voice, and wept. We may note two things in that phrase. First, The vehemency of their sorrow; as when a man doth list up his voice, and speaks, he speaks vehemently, Isa. 58. 3. Lift up thy voyce like a Trumpet, that is, speak with a loud and strong voice; so here, They lifted up their voyce, and wept, that is, they wept vehemently, they wept exceedingly. Secondly, To lift up the voyce, and weep, notes the easing of the mind in sorrow; for it is an ease to the mind burdened and oppressed with sorrow, to lift up the voyce, and weep; to cry out in sorrow, lets the strength of the sorrow out. We say, that sorrow which is included, strangles and stifles the spirit; sorrow kept in, is like fire kept in, more augmented; as David speaks, Psal. 39. concerning himself. While I kept silence, even from good, my sorrow was stirred; my heart was hot within me; while I was musing, the fire burned. His sorrow was encreased, when he had not vent for it; silent mournings are the sorest mournings: lifting up the voyce, vents the sorrow. The holy Ghost expresses great sorrow, by that of a woman in travel, crying out. To cry out, notes (I grant) great pain; and yet crying out, is a lessening or mitigation of pain. It is observed that the midwife, seeing a travailing woman hold in and conceal her pains, will bid her cry out. Some lift up their voyce, and weep, when they are not in pain, when they mourn not at all: there are Crocodiles tears, tears and voyces too of dissimulation. Ishmael had tears in his eyes, and revenge in his heart, Jer. 41. Others are in pain, and mourn, when they lift not up their voyce, nor weep; like one that hath a deadly wound, they bleed inwardly; but when there is the highest flood of sorrow in the heart, weeping will make an ebb, and you may let much of those waters (which are ready to drown the spirit) out at those sluces of the eyes. This is the first act, the natural act; They lifted up their eyes, and saw such a spectacle, as made them lift up their voyce, and weep.

There are four ceremonial acts.

First, They rent every man his mantle.] We have spoken of that, when we opened the twentieth verse of the former Chapter, together with the grounds of rending cloaths, sorrow, and indignation, &c. I shall refer you thither for further information in this point.

The second ceremonial act of their sorrow was, The sprinkling dust upon their heads toward heaven.] In ver. 20. of the former Chapter, Job shaved his head: Here is another ceremony, They sprinkled dust upon their heads; and which is yet more considerable, They sprinkled dust toward heaven. There were two wayes of sprinkling dust: there was first a taking the dust, and sprinkling it upon the head barely; and then there was another way of taking the dust, and throwing it up in the air, and so letting it fall upon the head: this act was significative, it typed, that all things were full of sorrowful confusion, the earth and the air were mingled, the heavens also were cloudy and darkned; therefore they cast dust toward heaven: For as by a stormy wind and tempest, the dust is raised, which thickens the air, and obscures the heavens; so by that act of casting or sprinkling dust in the air, stormie, tempestuous and troublesom times were signified. In Acts 22. 23. those wretched Jews to whom Paul preached, being vexed and enraged, cried out, and casting off their cloaths, threw dust into the air: Their action had this voyce in it; this man hath, or will, if let alone, fill all the world with trouble, and disturb the peace of Nations: This they expres (together with their own rage) by throwing dust into the air. It was a judgment, which God threatned his people with, that he would make the rain of their Land dust, Deut. 28. 24. And when men make it rain dust, by sprinkling it towards heaven, it sheweth great trouble or judgment upon themselves, or upon their Land. Further, the sprinkling of dust upon the head, was a memento of mortality; they put dust to dust, that man might remember himself to be but dust.

And they sate with him upon the ground seven dayes and seven nights.] Here is the third ceremonial act of their sorrow. In verse 20. of the former Chapter, it is said, Job fell upon the ground, these sate upon the ground; as falling, so sitting upon the ground, is the posture of a mourner, of a mourner greatly humbling himself under the hand of God, and the sence of his own or others afflictions. When God layes us low, he can lay us lower; and therefore it is best for us, to lay our selves as low as we can: so doth he, who sits upon the ground, if his heart sit down with him too. It is possible for the body to lie groveling upon the earth, when the spirit is nestling among the stars; not in faith, as the Saints do, but in pride, as Lucifer did, Isa. 14. 13. However, he either is, or appears to be humbled to the lowest, and emptied to the full of worldly comforts, who, with Job's friends, sits down upon the ground; especially, if he sit long there, as Job's friends did, seven dayes and seven nights. The time seems almost incredible. How could they hold out to sit so long? or how could Job, a sick and diseased man? For it is said, They sate down with him seven dayes, &c. I answer, We need not interpret it for seven continued dayes and nights, without any intermission; it is frequent in Scripture, to put a part, especially a greater part, for the whole; that which is often done, is said to be alwayes done; as, Luke 24. 53. The Disciples were continually in the Temple, praising and blessing God. And, Luke 2. 37. It is said, That Anna the Propheteſs departed not from the Temple, but served God night and day: Not that she was there without any intermission, but the greatest part of night and day, or, at the usual times both of night and day. Paul testifies before the Church of Ephesus, that by the space of three years, he ceased not to warn every one night and day with his tears, Acts 2. 31. Did he therefore actually preach three years, night and day, without intermission?

missiion? That had been a long Sermon indeed. Then his meaning is but this, that in those three years, he watched, and made use of all possible opportunities, both by night and by day, to preach the Gospel: So we may understand it here, they sate down, seven dayes and seven nights; that is, a great part of seven dayes and seven nights, or all the time of those seven dayes and seven nights, which were fitting for such a visit.

Origen will have it, seven nights and seven dayes without intermission; in maintenance of which assertion, he saith, they were preserved by miracle, without sleep, and without meat, all that time. But here is plain truth without a miracle.

Secondly, Whereas it is said, seven dayes and seven nights; we may note further, that the number seven (as other numbers) may be understood indefinitely; a certain time being put for an uncertain: as, Jer. 15. 9. The Prophet saith, She that hath born seven (that is, many Children) languisheth. And, Eccles. 2. 7. Give a portion to seven, that is, to many. Thus we may interpret it here, they sate down seven dayes and seven nights, that is, many dayes and many nights; as it is expresst of Nehemiah, c. 1. 4. that when he heard of the calamity of Jerusalem, he mourned many dayes.

Thirdly, We may take it strictly, for seven precise dayes and nights; and then it refers to the Ceremony of mourning for the dead: it was a custom to mourn seven dayes for the dead; Job's friends looked upon him as a dead man, and so they mourned for him, according to the manner of mourning for the dead. Joseph made a mourning for his Father Jacob, seven dayes, Gen. 50. 10. We have the like time of mourning mentioned, 1 Sam. 31. 13. The time of mourning varied both in times and places. The Egyptians mourned for Jacob threescore and ten dayes, Gen. 50. 3. The Israelites mourned for Moses thirty dayes, Deut. 34. 8. Which custom of mourning thirty dayes for the dead, continued long after among the Jews; for Josephus reports, that when the Jews thought he had been killed, they mourned thirty dayes for him. So that we may take it here precisely for seven dayes and seven nights, and refer it to the custom of mourning for the dead, or in cases of extream sorrow among that people. It followeth, Josephus, l. 1. de bello Jud. c. 33.

And none spake a word unto him.] This is the fourth Ceremony of their mourning, their silence. In great mourrings, silence makes up their solemnity. So, Lam. 2. 10. These are joyned together; The Elders of the daughters of Zion sit upon the ground, there is the former ceremony; and kept silence. Now whereas it is said, they kept silence, we need not understand it so strictly, as if for seven dayes and seven nights they never spake a word. It is usual likewise in all languages, and very frequent in Scripture, that what is but seldom done, or done but a little, is said not to be done at all; as in Acts 27. 33. Paul saith of those that were in the Ship, that for fourteen dayes they had fasted, having taken nothing; a thing beyond the strength of man, take it strictly, to fast fourteen dayes, taking nothing. But it is usual to say, that is not done at all, which is but a little done; They took nothing to eat, that is, they took very sparingly: they did eat only so much as would, according to our language, keep life and soul together. In Isa. 20. 3. it is said, that Isaiah walked naked and barefoot for three years: Now it cannot be conceived, that the Prophet walked, as we say, stark naked, for three years together; he is said to walk naked, because he had not such or so much cloathing, as formerly and usually he had worn. So here, they spake not a word to him; that is, they did not speak much, they spake very little to him. Or secondly, thus; restrictively to the matter; they spake not a word, by way of dispute or argument (which was the business they fell upon afterward) either to convince him or reprove him.

The reason of this fourth Ceremonial act of mourning, their silence, is added in the last words of the Chapter; for they saw that his grief was very great.

The word here used for grief, though it had been alone, without any epithete to heighten the sence, notes a very intensive, a deep and great sorrow. And it is put sometimes for grief and sorrow arising from the pain of the body; and sometimes, for grief and sorrow of mind. Now here I conceive, it may carry both senses; they saw that the grief and pain of his body was very great, his body was in a woful plight; and they saw that his spirit was much perplext too, his mind was troubled. But if this word alone signifies, as it were all degrees, and all kinds of sorrow, then consider both the variety of kind, and intention of degrees collected in Job's sorrows, which a word so comprehensive is not sufficient to express; the aid of two other words is called in to help out our conception of his sorrows. They saw his grief; they saw his grief was great: yet you have not all; They saw his grief was very great, exceeding great; this aggravates his grief, and winds up his sorrow to the highest; as if now the affliction were grown to a full stature. God threatens Babylon, Isa. 47. 9. These two things shall come upon thee, in a moment, in one day; the loss of children, and widowhood; these things shall come upon thee in their perfection. Sometimes imperfect judgments are upon a people or a person; they are, as it were, infant-judgments, judgments beginning; anon they grow to a greater height, and anon they come to a perfect stature, to be mighty ones, giantly judgments: At that time God had even brought Job's affliction to its perfection, and his grief was proportionable, very great; for this reason his friends kept silence; this reason hath an influence on all the acts of their sorrow, but especially upon this, their keeping silence; for they saw his grief was very great.

נראל מאד

From these ceremonial acts of sorrow, I have observed divers things heretofore. Now take one thing in general; That, great sufferings call us to, and warrant us in solemn mournings. Job's friends do not only mourn, but they mourn, as it were, in state; there is a kind of magnificence in mourning, a pomp in mourning; I approve not a proud pomp, but an humble pomp; they mourn, you see, with all the formalities of mourning: so it becometh us sometimes. As great mercies call for great rejoycings, so great afflictions call for great lamentings. There is a decency in it, when our affections keep pace with the dispensations of God, whether they be mercies or judgments, comforts or afflictions.

Secondly, Forasmuch as Job's friends seeing his sorrow to be thus very great, kept silence; observe,

> That, In great, in overwhelming sorrows, the mind is unfit to receive and take in comfort.

When grief is very great, words give little ease; precious words are wasted and thrown away, comfort it self is a trouble, in the greatness and height of trouble. I am sure, a mind full charged with sorrow, hath no room for comfort, is not at leisure for counsel. It is a profitable rule in visiting friends that are sick, or in distress, when you see them in extremity of pain of body, or in extremity of anguish and trouble of spirit, keep silence, wait a while: Let the waters asswage a little, and the winds fall before you meddle: Let them come to themselves before you move them. As sudden anger, so sudden sorrow is a kind of phrensie: No wise Physitian will give a medicine in a fit; the body must settle before it is fit for physick; and so must the mind too: silence is as good as physick in some distempers both of mind and body. A talkative comforter is another disease to a sick man; unseasonable counsel is a wound instead of a plaister, and instead of healing, tortures the patient. It is as high a point of prudence to know when, as to know what to advise a distressed friend. Solomon tells us in general, (Eccles. 3. 7.) There is a time to keep silence, and a time to speak: Let me advise this for one particular time or season, to keep silence; namely, the extremity and height of trouble. The Prophet Amos, chap. 5. 13. speaks of a time, wherein the prudent shall be silent; and he shews us why: In that time the prudent shall keep silence, for it is an evil time. Some interpret this, as an addition to the common calamity of those times; they should be so evil, that wise men would hold their peace. The Apostle propheses of such times, wherein men will not endure sound doctrine (2 Tim. 4. 3.) in Religion. And such times may be, wherein men will not endure sound doctrine, in policie. Then the prudent hold their peace, and none speak but fools or flatterers; such times make the quickest market for their sophisticated wares, no other will go off: such are very evil times, and this is a sore judgment upon those times. There is hope of good when wise men speak; a word from their mouths, may cure and deliver a Nation. Yet I conceive that this Text of Amos may be understood as a description of a wise mans duty; at least, of his property, in some high and great diſtempers upon a people. He ſees them uncapable of counſel; to give them good advice, is (at preſent) but the caſting of pearls before ſwine; all is loſt and undervalued, if not trampled on: yea, he ſees, that the more he labours to reform, the more he enrages them; therefore till this fit be over, prudence teacheth him to keep ſilence.

Thus alſo it is with private perſons in regard of the evils they endure; they cannot endure faithful counſel in ſuch an evil day, upon any private perſon; let the prudent keep ſilence, and wait for an opportunity, which may open a paſſage to let in their reproofs, or directions, or conſolations, with a taking advantage into the hearts of their afflicted friends and brethren. The Prophet Iſaiah ſeeing the troubles approaching Jeruſalem, reſolves to take his fill of mourning; Therefore, ſaid I, look away from me, I will weep bitterly; labour not to comfort me, chap. 22. 4. He either thought that the beholders would faint to ſee him, and therefore ſaith, look away from me; or, that ſeeing him, they would ſay, he fainted, and ſo would be giving him comfort; that therefore his ſorrow might have full ſcope, he ſaith, Look away from me, I will weep bitterly, labour not to comfort me. When a man is reſolved to mourn, let him mourn; your advice may anger him, but it will not help him: Let ſorrow have its way a while, and that will make way for comfort.

We have thus far carried on the ſad ſtory of Job's viſitation; his grief is now come to the height, It is very great. We have have alſo ſeen his friends viſit, with a double intendment, both to mourn with him, and to comfort him. We have ſeen them mourning, they fully reacht that end. We leave them now ſilent, waiting for a time to attempt and accompliſh the other end; they miſerably failed in that; it was to comfort him; but they proved miſerable comforters: which in the progreſs and proceſs of this Book, will receive a large and full diſcovery.

CHAP. III. Verſ. 1, 2, 3.

After this, Job opened his mouth, and curſed his day.
And Job ſpake, and ſaid,
Let the day periſh wherein I was born; and the night, wherein it was ſaid, There is a man-child conceived.

He former Chapter concluded with the aſtoniſhment and ſilence of Job's three friends: This Chapter begins with an aſtoniſhing ſpeech of Job. We may be as much amazed at what Job ſpake, as we were at their ſilence; and there appears the ſame reaſon of both, viz. the greatneſs of his grief. They ſaw his grief ſo great, that they forbare to ſpeak; Job feeleth his grief ſo great, that he cannot longer forbear to ſpeak; it muſt have a vent. After this, (ſaith the Text) Job opened his mouth. Why, Job had opened his mouth before, he had ſpoken twice ſince he was encompaſſed with thoſe ſorrows. True; but Job never opened his mouth as now; he opened his mouth before, to juſtifie and to bleſs his God; now he openeth his mouth, to accuſe and curſe his day; and therefore the Chapter may well begin with, After this, Job opened his mouth; he never ſpake in this manner before: for he no ſooner opened his mouth, but he curſed his day.

The Argument and ſubject of the whole Chapter is contained in this firſt verſe, the curſing of his day; and concerning this, the Chapter holdeth forth three things moſt conſiderable. There are three particulars belonging unto this Chapter.

Firſt, The matter and the manner of this curſe; what it is, and how expreſt: Job pronounceth a curſe upon his day, and unfolds the curſe; he unfolds it with much Rhetorick, and ſtrains of eloquence: Troubles will make a man Rhetorical. Job (as it were) calls up all his ſpirits, whets his wit, and heightens his invention, to prepare a proper curſe for his day. This he doth from this firſt verſe, to the end of the nineteenth.

Secondly, In this Chapter Job holds forth to us, the ground or reaſon of his curſe; he is full of paſſion, but his paſſion is rational; he curſeth, but he ſhews you why. The reaſon (with ſome occaſional intermixtures) is demonſtrated from the ninth, to the end of the nineteenth verſe. If I am asked a reaſon of my anger, why I am ſo bitter againſt my day, this is the account I give; Becauſe it ſhut not up my mothers womb, &c.

Third'y, We have an enforcement of this curſe upon his day, by a vehement expoſtulation againſt the lengthning and continuance of his dayes. He complained in the beginning of the Chapter, that ever he had a day; and now he complains as much, that he hath any more dayes. He wonders why his life began, and he is troubled becauſe it doth not end. Wherefore is light given unto him that is in miſery? &c. This expoſtulation concludes the Chapter.

The nine former verſes contain the firſt diviſion of the Chapter, Job's curſe upon his day; both the matter and the manner of the curſe.

We have this curſe, firſt pronounced upon his day in general: Then Job opened his mouth, and curſed his day.

Secondly, He fixes a curſe upon his day, in the ſeveral parts of it. Take a natural day, for the ſpace of four and twenty hours, and then it conſiſteth of two parts, of day and night, light and darkneſs. According to which diviſion, the curſe runs, v. 3. Let the day periſh wherein I was born, and the night wherein it was ſaid, a man-child is conceived.

Thirdly, He pronounceth a ſpecial proper curſe upon each part of his day. Take the day for the light, for that ſpace between Sun-riſing and Sun-ſet; he curſes that, verſ. 4, & 5. Let that day be darkneſs, let not God regard it from above, neither let the light ſhine upon it, &c.

Then follows a curſe upon the night, in verſ. 6, 7, 8. As for that night, let darkneſs ſeize upon it, let it not be joyned unto the dayes of the year, &c.

So then, Job pronounceth this curſe, firſt, in general, againſt his day.

Secondly, He divides the curſe upon the ſeveral parts of the day.

Thirdly, He faſtens a ſpecial curſe upon each part.

You ſee how accurate, how exact Job's ſorrows have made him.

We will begin with that which is firſt here; the curſing of his day in general, contained in the firſt verſe.

Then Job opened his mouth; or, after this, Job opened his mouth, and curſed his day.

Then, or, After this, hath a double reference.

Firſt, After the ſeven dayes ſilence, after his friends had ſate by him ſo long upon the ground, neither moving queſtion, nor adminiſtring a word of conſolation; then Job opened his mouth. Or, ſecondly,

After this; that is, After his ſorrows were (as it were) boyled up to the height, and began a little to remit, ſo as he could breath, recollect himſelf and conſider, in what condition he was.

After this; After there was ſome allay, ſome ebb and fall of his overflowing ſorrows, then he breaks forth in theſe words. Sorrow doth ſometimes not only oppreſs the ſpirit, but ſtop the mouth; I am ſo troubled, that I cannot ſpeak, ſaith David, Pſal. 77. 4. That he could not ſpeak for trouble, ſpeaks the greatneſs of his trouble. Plenty of ſorrow, makes a ſcarcity of words: Hence ſometimes the Saints

Ora leves loquuntur, ingentes ſtupent. Vehementiam doloris exprimit, quod dicit ſe non eſſe locutum. Muſc. in Pſal. 74. 4.

Saints in great afflictions and grief of mind, pray and cry much to God, when they speak little. Hanna continued praying before the Lord, (2 Sam. 1. 12.) Eli the High-Priest marked her mouth (saith the Text.) Now Hanna, she spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard. Would you know why, in so much praying, there was no speaking; why her heart spake, and not her tongue. Her self gives the reason at verse 15. I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit. And verse 16. Out of the abundance of my complaint and grief, have I spoken hitherto, &c. not with my lips, but with my heart. All which is given us at verse 10. She was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the Lord, and wept sore. Thus it was with Job, sorrow silenced him, sorrow in the height caused that high silence, but as soon as that asswaged, Then he opened his mouth and spake.

Altum silentium.

A man cannot speak till he open his mouth; yet to open the mouth and speak, is more then to speak.

First, To open the mouth and speak, is to speak with a loud or clear voice; as he that speaks softly, is said to speak in his throat. Or as they who have familiar spirits, or Wizards, are said to peep, and to mutter, Isa. 8. 9. A Witch, or Wizard, is called there, and in other places of Scripture, (Levit. 20. 27. Deut. 18. 11.) Ob, which signifieth a bottle, or bladder, because such being possess'd or acted by an evil spirit, spake with a hollow voice, as out of a bottle, and (as some affirm) with swollen bellies: From which manner of utterance, the Greeks call them Belly-speakers. And Junius, upon that of Isa. 8. 19. apprehends this as a description of those Hell-prophets, in opposition to the true Prophets, who used to speak with a clear, loud, distinct voice: Or as Job here, to open their mouths and speak.

Secondly, To open the mouth and speak, is as much as to say, he spake with his mouth: And there is an elegancy in that; as in those like expressions, I heard it with mine ears; that is, I did certainly hear it, or I did fully hear it. I saw it with mine eyes; that is, I am sure I saw it. So the Scripture saith, We are bought with a price, 1 Cor. 6. 20. A thing cannot be bought, but with a price; there must be some price or other, either money, or money-worth, somewhat answering the intrinsick value of every thing that is bought; but to shew that we are bought with a full price, that Christ did not compound our debt with his Father, but paid the uttermost farthing, it is said, We are bought with a price. So the Prophet Malachy tells the sacrilegious Jews, Ye are cursed with a curse, chap. 3. 9. A man cannot be cursed but with a curse; but to shew the greatness of the curse, he saith, Ye are cursed with a curse. So here, Job opened his mouth and spake, or opened his mouth and cursed; that is, he cursed his day greatly, even with a bitter and grievous curse. He cursed it (as he said) to purpose. Thus to shew the excellency of Christ's Doctrine, that his was A Sermon of Sermons, and he the Messenger, the Interpreter, the One of a thousand, yea, the One of All the Thousands that ever shewed to man his uprightness: The Gospel saith, Matth. 5. 1. When he saw a great multitude, he opened his mouth and spake. Hence,

Cum enim aliquis loquitur ex impetu passionis, non ipse aperuit os suum, sed passione agitur ad loquendū, non enim per passionem nostri actus domini sumus, sed per solam rationem; Consuetum enim est apud sapientes ut ex ratione loquantur passionum motus, quos sentiunt. Aquin. in loc.

In the third place, To open the mouth and speak, is to speak upon mature deliberation, to speak considerately, prudently, punctually, to speak elegantly, to speak orderly, to speak the words of truth and soberness. A fool is said to speak with an open mouth; but a wise man openeth his mouth and speaks. A wise godly man hath his tongue at his command; but a fools tongue commands him: His tongue runs faster then his wit, as we say. A fools mouth (as Solomon tells us, Prov. 15. 2.) poureth out foolishness: Their mouths are alwayes open; and therefore they cannot be said to open their mouths: A fool hath not a door to his mouth (therefore also he cannot be said to open his mouth) much less hath he a lock and a key, a bolt or a bar to his mouth: but a wise man hath a door to his mouth; yea his mouth is lockt with Wisdoms key, and that unlocks it. I will open my mouth (saith the Psalmist. Psal. 78. 2.) in a Parable. Parables are the speeches of wise men; yea, they are the extracts and spirits of Wisdom. The Hebrew word signifies, to rule, or have authority: because such speeches come upon us with authority, and subdue our reason by the weight of theirs. Now when he is about to speak Parables, he saith, I will open my mouth. When Wisdom calls for audience and obedience, Prov. 8. 6. she saith, Hear, for I will speak of excellent things, and the opening of my lips shall be right things. David invokes God to open his mouth, when he would shew forth that excellent thing, the praise of God, Psal. 51. 15. God opens not the mouth of a fool, neither doth a fool open his mouth and speak, but his speech opens his mouth.

Figuratè enim & scitè dicta Parabolæ vocantur, quia authoritatem habent & in sermone dominantur.

But did Job open his mouth in this sence wisely and discreetly? did he well to be so angry with his day? spake he wisely in cursing his day? I answer, Though there was much passion in this speech, yet Job spake out of much deliberation; he considered what to speak before he spake. A man may speak with much passion, and yet speak out of much deliberation; and so did Job here; in that long silence he was learning what to speak. And as there was much heat of passion, so there was much light of wisdom in what he spake.

Fourthly, To open the mouth and speak, is to speak boldly and confidently, to speak with freedom and liberty of speech; (as the Greek word signifies) to speak all a mans mind, without fear or favour of any man, Prov. 31. 8, 9. Open thy mouth for the dumb; open thy mouth, judge righteously, &c. that is, be bold for those that are poor, and dare not appear themselves; speak thou aloud for the dumb, and freely for those that cannot plead their own cause, or make out their own innocence. The Apostle begs of the Ephesians, Chap. 6. 19. that they would pray, that utterance might be given him, that he might open his mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the Gospel: and neither fear the faces of men, nor conceal the truth of God.

παῤῥησίαν λαλεῖν. Job 7. 26. ἐκ πᾶν omne. & φήσις dictio, quum quis omne id dicit quod ad rem pertinet, nihil veritus offensionem eorum quibuscum loquitur.

You see then by the opening of this expression, there was more then bare speaking meant, when Job opened his mouth and spake: When a wise and a holy man opens his mouth, you may look for more then words, even the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

Let us now examine what treasure we can make of those words which Job spake, when he opened his mouth.

He opened his mouth, and cursed his day.

But is there any treasure in a curse? except that which the Apostle speaks of, as the fruit of Gods abused patience, Rom. 2. 5. A treasure of wrath. Or did Job deliberate for a curse? was he moulding and fashioning so deform'd an issue as this in his thoughts so long? Yes, saith the Text, He opened his mouth, and cursed his day.

The word here used, to Curse, is not the word which we have met with so often in the two former Chapters; where Satan undertook that Job would curse his God. That word, in its native sence, signifies to bless. But here, when Job curseth his day, a word is used, which hath neither name nor shadow of a blessing: And it is derived from a root, which signifieth a thing that is light, moveable, or unsetled. And so by a Metaphor, it signifies any thing, or person, which we despise, contemn and slight, or the act of despising and cursing; and the reason of it is, because those things which we despise, contemn, or curse, we look upon as light things, trivial, or vain, or hurtful: On the contrary, the word in the Hebrew for honour and glory, comes from a root which signifieth heavy, or ponderous, because that which we honour and respect, we look upon it as a thing that hath weight and substance in it: And the Apostle calls that most glorious estate of the Saints in Heaven, A weight of glory, 2 Cor. 4. 17. The opposite word which we have in the Text, is frequently translated, to despise, or contemn, and likewise to curse and blaspheme; and doth properly signifie such a cursing, as arises from the contempt, or light esteem, which we have of a thing, or person. So we have the word clearly used, Levit. 20. 9. Every one that curseth his father, or his mother: Now observe, cursing of the father, or mother, it is directly opposed to the fifth Commandment, which saith, Thou shalt honour thy father and thy mother; thou shalt look upon thy father and thy mother as upon persons of weight and honour, whom thou art bound to reverence and esteem; so that to curse the father, or mother, is to account them vile and contemptible. The same word expresses, that villanous act of Shimei, 2 Sam. 16. 15. who came forth, and cursed David still as he came. That act was alike opposite both to the rule and word of the fifth Commandment, which saith, Honour thy father, &c. taking in the civil father as well as the natural: Shimei's cursing David, lightly esteemed David; he did not look upon on him, in or according to the weightineſs and honour of his Kingly Perſon, or of his Kingly Office; A King is a weighty perſon, a Crown is a weighty thing; Shimei deſpiſed and ſo curſed both. Sometimes the word is tranſlated directly to deſpiſe: I will give you two Texts for that. Gen. 16.4. When Hagar ſaw ſhe had conceived, her Miſtreſs was deſpiſed in her eyes; (it is the ſame word with that uſed here for curſing,) the meaning is, ſhe did lightly eſteem her Miſtreſs: Thus ſhe thought: now ſhall I have the honour of raiſing Abraham's family; now I am at leaſt as good a woman as my Miſtreſs; thus ſhe deſpiſed Sarah. Again, 1 Sam. 2. 30. where the Lord ſaith concerning Ely's ſons, Them that honour me, I will honour; and they that deſpiſe me, ſhall be lightly eſteemed. I will make little account of them that make little account of me, and woe be to thoſe (though all the world honour them) whom God deſpiſeth: That man looſes more then honour, whom God doth not honour: And they who deny God his honour, deny him all good, and offer him all evil; ſuch a deſpiſing of God, is a curſing of God.

Further, to curſe (if we conſider it in the nature of the thing, and not ſtrictly in the literal ſence of the word) is to wiſh evil to a thing, or perſon: This alſo is the meaning of the curſe in this place; for when Job explains this curſe in the parts of it, he doth (as it were) with wonderful art and skill, gather together whatſoever may be thought the evil of a day, or the evil of a night, and calls it up, to ſeize upon them. A curſe, or to curſe, vertually contains in it all evil: As a bleſſing, or to bleſs, contains in it vertually all good. Every mercy we enjoy, is a bleſſing ſpecificated: And ſo any evil that falls upon man, (as Sword, Famine, Peſtilence, &c.) is a curſe ſpecificated; howſoever poſſibly thoſe things which are in their nature evil, and in their matter a curſe, may be qualified (in reference unto ſome perſon) into a bleſſing. But take a curſe properly, and it containeth all evil, and only evil in it. Therefore as when God had given the Word an eſſe, a being, that he might give it, a bene eſſe, a well-being, he adds to the work of Creation, the word of benediction, And God bleſſed them, and ſaid unto them, be fruitful, &c. Gen. 1. 22, 28. So afterward, when man had ſinned, and the Lord intended to leave the world groaning under part of thoſe evils which ſin had brought upon it, he wrapt up all in the word of a curſe, Curſed be the ground for thy ſake, &c. Gen. 3. 17. So then when Job curſeth his day, he wiſheth all the evil to it, that a day is capable of. And Job opened his mouth, and curſed his day.

But, what was this day that Job was ſo angry with it? and that his paſſion doth ſo burn againſt it?

The Text ſpeaks indefinitely, Job curſed his day.

Some underſtand it of the day of his preſent ſuffering, he curſed the day on which ſuch troubles befel him: And we find ſometimes in Scripture, that a day put thus alone, is an evil or a troubleſome day: As in the twelfth verſe of the Propheſie of Obadiah, the Lord rebukes the children of Edom thus, Thou ſhouldſt not have looked on the day of thy brother; that is, the day of thy brother Jacob's ſufferings, the day wherein I had him under my rod, and afflicted him. So the day of the Lord, is the day of the Lords anger, when he pours wrath and trouble upon the earth; Iſa. 2. 12. The day of the Lord of hoſts ſhall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up, and he ſhall be brought low. The day of the Lord, or the day of a man undetermin'd, often ſignifies an evil day.

But here we may rather underſtand it for that day which was as the occaſion, or for the occaſional day of all Job's troubles, and that was his birth-day: If his birth-day had been prevented, all his troubleſome dayes had been prevented; therefore he falls out with that, as himſelf explains it, ver. 3. Let the day periſh (ſaith he here) wherein I was born, and the night in which it was ſaid, there is a man-child conceived. It is uſual to call a mans birth-day his day, ſo the Scripture is conceiv'd to ſpeak, Hoſ. 7. 5. In the day of our King, the Princes have made him ſick with bottels of wine: That is, on his birth-day, which among Princes is commonly ſolemniz'd with feaſting: As we read of Pharaoh, and of Herod. So then, the day is his birth-day, the day of his nativity: which ſome take preciſely, for the day upon which he was born; and others more largely, for the annual return of that day; as if he had laid in a curſe for a day, whenſoever or how often ſoever it ſhould return in the years of his life.

A little further to clear the ſence of this curſe, let us conſider the whole matter, as we have conſidered the words. There are two or three Queſtions, which being debated and reſolved, will give light to this context.

Job, you ſee, takes upon him to curſe: Firſt, it may be queſtioned, whether a curſe be in the power of man, or no? Can a man curſe perſons, or things?

Surely bleſſings and curſings are both in the hand of God; whether we reſpect perſons, or things. There is a miniſterial curſe, and a miniſterial bleſſing in the power of man: but it is not in the power of any man, magiſterially to make any thing, or perſon, bleſſed, or to make any thing, or perſon, accurſed. It was a great brag which Balack made of Balaam, (Numb. 22. 6.) I wot (ſaith he) that he whom thou bleſſeſt is bleſſed, and he whom thou curſeſt is curſed. He thought he had the curſe in his command, he could curſe whom he pleaſed, and what he pleaſed, and when he pleaſed; but he was deceived; he reckon'd beyond his ſtrength, and beyond the ſtrength of a creature. What the Apoſtle ſpeaks in another caſe concerning the miniſtery of the Word, Paul may plant, and Apollos may water, but it is God that giveth the increaſe, is as true in this; one man may plant a curſe, and another man may water it with a hearty wiſh that it may grow, but it is God only that giveth the increaſe of evil, and the decreaſe of good. Curſes are not in the power of any creature; if they were, we ſhould have a miſerable world quickly. How many ſhould we ſee daily blaſted with the breath of malicious execrations? Some mens mouths are full of curſing, Pſal. 10. 7. They love curſing, they cloath themſelves with curſing as with a garment, Pſal. 109. 17, 18. Curſing (as one of the Ancients complained in his time) is now made the common weapon of anger; and wrath wiſhes that evil, which (becauſe of weakneſs) it cannot work. If curſing could have done it, we had not been a people at this day. How often hath Balack (out of fear, or envy at our proſperity) ſent to Balaam (I mean the falſe Prophet that dwells on the ſeven hills) come curſe Iſrael, come defie England? how often hath that Balaam curs'd our Iſrael? We have heard of his Anniverſary Anathemaes, wherein this Church and State have been ſtruck with the thunder and lightning of his Papal curſe. But the curſe cauſeleſs (ſaith Solomon) ſhall not come. And we may ſay to England, as Moſes did to Iſrael, concerning Balaam's curſe, Deut. 23. 5. Nevertheleſs the Lord thy God would not hearken unto Balaam: But the Lord thy God turned the curſe into a bleſſing unto thee, becauſe the Lord thy God loved thee. And what David pray'd about Shimei's curſe, we have ſeen come to paſs: The Lord hath requited us good for his curſing, 2 Sam. 16. 12. We have far greater cauſe to fear the bleſſing of Rome, then the curſe of Rome. But to return. The reſult of all is this; When God pronounceth a curſe, he makes it to be a curſe; man at the worſt, can but wiſh a curſe and pronounce it. Man is but the Miniſter, God is the Maſter of the curſe; God can inflict it, man can but think or wiſh it.

Prima ſemper irarum tela ſunt maledicta, & quæ non poſſumus imbecilles, optamus irati. Votis malis pro armis utimur. Salvian l. 3. de gubern.

Another thing here queſtionable is, Whether it be lawful to curſe the creature? Job curſeth his day: The rule of the Apoſtle is, Rom. 12. 4. Bleſs, and curſe not.

In ſome caſes, to curſe is Gods Command and our duty, and then we are Gods Miniſters for wrath againſt the wicked. Many times man (though forbidden) curſes, then it is his ſin, and he is Satans miniſter for evil againſt his brother.

There are ſome caſes wherein we may curſe. When the the Patriarch Jacob was upon his death-bed, and bed of bleſſing, yet he pronounced a curſe upon the rage and anger of his two ſons, Simeon and Levi, Gen. 49. 7. Curſed be their anger, for it was fierce, and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and ſcatter them in Iſrael. We may curſe the plots and counſels of wicked men, enemies of Chriſt and of his people: we may curſe the perſons of wicked men, as inplacable enemies of Chriſt, and of his people: So David more then once in the Book of Pſalms; yet it is to be conſidered, that ſome of thoſe Pſalms are Propheſies of a curſe, not pronunciations of a curſe. And in in all lawful curſings we muſt obſerve theſe two rules. Firſt, To aim the curſe at the deſtruction of the ſin, not of the ſinner. Secondly, Where the ſinner appears incorrigible, ble, yet to desire the clearing up of Gods Justice in punishing, not the punishment it self. To curse any thing, or person, passionately, is infirmity: To curse any thing, or person, maliciously, is gross impiety.

There is a third doubt, the resolving of which will further clear the Scripture to us; that is, Whether a day, be an object capable of a curse, or no? It is a Question moved by the School-men, Whether a blessing and a curse do belong to any but a reasonable creature? or whether any thing else be a subject capable of a blessing or a curse? And they resolve it, That nothing is properly the subject of blessing and cursing, but a reasonable creature. Therefore a day which is a part of time, is in it self uncapable of a curse: Those things only are capable of penal evils which are capable of moral evils: A day is not, cannot be morally evil, though there be many moral evils acted in the day. The Apostle adviseth us, To redeem the time, because the dayes are evil, Ephes. 5. 15. Times are called evil, in regard both of troublesome evils and sinful evils: From evil men, and evil manners, dayes are denominated evil; yet dayes in themselves are not evil morally, and so not lyable to a curse, which is a penal evil.

Aquin. 22. 2æ. 76. Art. 2. q. Benedictio vel maledictio propriè ad illam rem pertinet, cui potest aliquis benè vel malè contingere, sc. rationali creaturæ. creaturis autem irrationalibus, bonum vel malum dicitur contingere, in ordine ad creaturam rationalem, propter quã sunt. Aquinas ubi supra.

Further, Those creatures which have life in them, and have no reason in them, are on the same ground incapable of a curse. Whereas it is said, that God cursed the ground, and cursed the Serpent, Gen. 3. 14, 17. neither the ground nor the Serpent were cursed in themselves, or for their own sakes. The Serpent, an unreasonable creature, had not the knowledge of God; and the earth, a senseless creature, could not feel the power of God; therefore the curse upon those creatures, was only in order to, and as a punishment of the sin of man. The Text is expres, Gen. 3. 17. Cursed be the earth for thy sake: The earth there comprehends all the creatures living on the face of the earth, besides man: These are cursed for mans sake. As those creatures at the first received not a being, or a blessing, for themselves, but for mans good, so they receive not any evil or curse, but for mans punishment: So we are to understand those places in Deut. 28. Cursed be thy basket and thy store, &c. God threatens a curse on these creatures, the fruits of the earth, &c. in order to mans disobedience: But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his Commandments, &c. that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee, ver. 15. Observe, That the curse is threatned to come on them, to overtake them: When the basket was curs'd, when the increase of the kine and the flocks of the sheep were cursed, man was cursed: For we may say in the letter, as David did in a figure, when the Angel of the Lord smote his people with the Pestilence, (2 Sam. 24.) Alas, what have these sheep done? that they should be smitten with a curse. As in pulling down the house of a Traitor, the revenge is not taken against the materials of the house, but against the Master of the house. So then, for the resolution of this point, take it thus, No creature below man, is, or can be, accursed by God, or man, properly, terminately, or ultimately: That is, in it self, for it self, or from it self, but only improperly and relatively, namely, with respect to what man should do, hath done, or suffered. First, in reference to what man should do; so Christ cursed the Fig-tree, to teach man either the duty of fruitfulness to the glory of God, or of faith in the power of God. Secondly, in reference to what man hath done, the sin of man, thus God cursed the Serpent and the ground: The Serpent was cursed, both for admonition to man, and for a punishment on man: God to admonish man, how much he hated sin, punishes an irrational instrument of sin, and by that enmity planted in the Serpent as a curse, punishes mans too much familiarity with the Serpent. And as the enmity of the Serpent was mans scourge, so also was the barrenness of the earth: That barrenness in bringing forth good fruit, that fertility in bringing forth bryars and thorns, were both as rods for the back of man. Thirdly, the irrational or senseless creatures are cursed in reference to that which man suffers. Thus David cursed the Mountains of Gilboa, 2 Sam. 1. 21. because there Saul and his beloved Jonathan were slain by the sword of the Philistines, Because there the shield of the mighty was vilely cast away, the sword of Saul, as if he had not been anointed with oyl. In this sence, (as David cursed a place) so Job curses a time, his day; the day which either gave occasion to his sufferings, or the day in which he actually suffered such a world of evils. Thus also Jeremy curses his day with a vehement curse, Jer. 20. 14. Cursed be the day wherein I was born; let not the day wherein my mother bare me be blessed: And not only so, but he curses the man who first reported his birth, ver. 15, 16. Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, saying, a man-child is born unto thee, making him very glad. And let that man be as the Cities which the Lord overthrew and repented not: and let him hear the cry in the morning, and the shooting at noon-tide, &c. And why so bitter a curse? was it against the day for it self, or against the man himself? Jeremy shews it was not, ver. 18. Wherefore came I out of the womb to see labour and sorrow, that my dayes should be consumed with shame? To curse any thing under the notion of a creature, or as it is the work of God, is to blaspheme God; to curse any unreasonable or insensible creature in themselves, or to take revenge on them, is to be, if not senseless, yet (I am sure in that act) unreasonable. So far of this cursing his day in general. It follows, Maledicere rebus irrationalibus in quantum sunt creaturæ, est peccatum blasphemiæ, maledicere eis in se consideratis est otiosum & vanum. Aquinas ubi supra.

Verse 2. And Job spake and said.

This verse is only a transition into the matter of the next, it is as if the holy Ghost had said, Job cursed his day: and would you know how he cursed it? He did it after this manner, or in this form of words, Job spake and said, thus, &c. Only note, that the word which we translate speak, is in the Original answered; and so often in Scripture, he is said to answer who begins to speak; Job answered and said.

Respondere sæpe dicitur qui orditur sermonem, etiamsi nulla interrogatio præcesserit. Drus.

We shewed you before, that this day in general was the object of this curse; now he curses it in the parts of it, the day and the night. Let the day perish, &c. At which words the stile alters; that which you read forward to the sixth verse of the forty-second Chapter, is sacred Poetry; Job breaths out his passion in verse, and in verse receives his answer. It is questioned, whether Job at that time opened his mouth, and vented his sorrows in verse? or whether it were after contrived so by the Penman of this Book. As I see no profit in moving this question, so I think there is no possibility of resolving it: And therefore I leave it as I found it, a quere still. Only this is observable; that writing in verse is most sutable, where the matter written is deeply steep't in, and chiefly wrought out of our affections. Hence we find, That those parts of Scripture, which set forth strongest affections, are composed in verse: As those holy flames of spiritual love between Christ and his Spouse in the Canticles of Solomon: The triumphant joy of Deborah, after deliverance from Sisera's Army: Of Moses and Miriam, after the destruction of Pharaoh: The afflicting sorrows of Hezekiah in his sickness: And the Lamentations of Jeremy, for the captivity of the Jews: The Book of Psalms, is, as it were, a throng of all affections, Love, joy, sorrow, fear, hope, anger, zeal, every passion acting a part, and wound up in highest strains by the Spirit of God, breathing Poetical eloquence into that heavenly Prophet. So this book of Job, whose subject is sorrow, hath a composure answerable to the matter. Passion hath most scope in verse, and is freest when tyed up in numbers. The words follow;

Let the day perish.

What this day was, we shewed you before: It was the day of his nativity; The day (saith he) wherein I was born. How should this day perish?

To perish, signifies first, not to be. A thing is said to perish, when it is annihilated, when it returns to nothing: As the Psalmist speaks, Man being in honour and understandeth not, is compared to the beasts that perish. The perishing of a beast, is the non-entity of a beast; when a beast dieth, it perisheth, it is not: A beast is no more, but vanisheth quite, and is gone for ever. Then, such mens likeness to a beast, is not in perishing, but in the want of true understanding: He doth not say, man perisheth like a beast, but he is like a beast that perisheth. A wicked man, how honourable soever, is a brutish man, ver. 10. For he knows nothing spiritually; and what he knows naturally, in that, like a brute beast, he corrupts himself, as the Apostle Jude speaks, ver. 10. of his Epistle. But between the perishing of a foolish man and a beast, there is a vast difference: A beasts perishing is a not-being; a foolish mans perishing is a miserable being.

For

For secondly, To perish, signifies often a miserable being, as in John 3. 16. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth, should not perish, &c. Not perish; the meaning of it is, not that all unbelievers shall loose their very beings, become a nothing, and with their existence part from their essence. Some wicked beastly men would be glad of this, that they might live here wickedly, and afterward die like beasts, in that sence, eternally: If this were the perishing, that is threatned unbelivers, many of them would be ready to say out of love and liking to their lusts, as Esther did out of love and zeal to the Cause of God, If we perish, we perish: If this be to perish, let us perish. But that perishing is of another nature; They that believe not shall perish; that is, they shall live and perish; they shall be, and be miserable for ever; the wrath of a displeased God, and the sting of a polluted conscience, shall torment them to all eternity.

Thirdly, To perish, is to be impaired, or loose former dignity and respect. So let the day perish, may be taken in this sence, let not that day be solemnized, let it not be remembred with wonted joy and gladness. A day which hath usually been solemnized, may be said to perish, when that solemnity is laid down, and utterly disus'd. In ancient times (and the custom in some places remains to this day) Great men and Princes kept the memory of their birth-dayes with feasting and triumph. Thus we read, Gen. 40. 20. And it came to pass the third day, which was Pharaoh's birth-day, that he made a feast unto all his servants. And Matth. 14. 6. we read, That when Herod's birth-day was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them. It is generally conceived, that Job did solemnize his birth-day; and so many Interpreters take those feasts, spoken of in the first Chapter, to have been, the birth-day feasts of Job's Children. Origen in his fragments upon Matthew, affirms, that the Scripture gives no testimony of any one good man celebrating his birth-day: The truth is, while we reflect upon our birth-sin, we have little cause to rejoyce in our birth-day: The new-born Infant seems to forbid this solemnity, and by his tears weeps and speaks down this joy. The birth-day of nature should be mourned over every day, much more upon the day of our birth. The birth-day of Grace is our joy and our glory, and is worthy to be rejoyced in, not only in this day of Grace, but in that of glory, and so it shall. Eternity, which is the day of glory, is one continued triumph for our birth-day in grace. Notwithstanding this, I see no cogent reason, why a godly man may not celebrate and rejoyce in his naturall birth-day; so he rejoyce in God, who took him out of his mothers womb, and hath preserved him ever since he was born. So then, we taking Job's day for his birth-day, he saying, Let that day perish, means, let it be no more solemnized, let there be no more joy, no feasts upon that day.

Or fourthly, Let that day perish, may be thus understood, let not that be reckoned upon, let it be lost, let it not be counted in the Calender of the year. A day whereof no use is made, is called in Scripture, a lost day, a fallen or perished day. In the sixt of Numbers, the number of dayes is prescribed for the separation of the Nazarites, thus and thus it shall be, and so many dayes: Now, if the Nazarite had continued many dayes, according to the Law of his separation; yet if he were polluted with a dead body before the full number was accomplisht, then he must begin again, for (saith Moses) The dayes that were before shall be lost, because his separation was defiled; ver. 12. In the Hebrew it is, All the other dayes shall fall; he must not reckon upon those: So here Job saith, Let the day perish; that is, let it not be numbred or reckon'd, let it be as a day lost or fallen. So then the sum of all is this; let the joy and solemnity of my birth-day be laid aside, let it never be celebrated more in the return of the year. I could wish that day had never been, but seeing that is impossible, it having been already, yet let it be as if it had never been, let it be put out of all accounts, let it be taken off from all records; and not only not remembred with mirth and feasting, but not be remembred at all.

And the night wherein it was said, a man-child is conceived.

So we translate: The elegancy of the Hebrew speaks thus, The night which said, a man-child is conceived; as if the night had been the messenger, and had brought word of his conception. Some render the Hebrew word [Hara,] (which we translate conceived) Born, applying both parts of the verse to his birth, Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said a man-child is brought forth: And the Original word will beat it, being used (as learned Mercer observes) for production as well as conception. So 1 Chron. 4. 17. And she bare Miriam and Shammai, &c. She bare, is the word in this Text of Job: We may take it either way; the sence is clear according to our translation, that Job sends this curse beyond his birth-day, even to the night wherein he was conceived. Or if we refer it no further back then to his birth: It is as if he had said, whether I were born by night or by day, let the time of my birth be accursed; if it were upon the day time, Let that day perish wherein I was born: Was I born in the night? Let that night perish wherein it was said a man-child is brought forth: This distribution notes a resolvedness to curse it; and least he should miss the time of the day, he curses both the divisions of time, in every day. As Benhadad in his charge for the taking of those young-men, that came out of Samaria, to shew how fully he was resolved to have them taken, saith, Whether they be come out for peace, take them alive; or whether they be come out for war, take them alive, 1 Kings 20. 18. as if he had said, I'le have them taken whatsoever comes on't, or for whatsoever they come, they shall not escape. Or as Herod, who, that he might be sure to slay Christ in his infancy, commands all Infants to be slain: So Job, that the curse might not miss the time of his birth-day, curses all the time of that day, the day, and the night. For though a man be born in the night, yet that is not called his birth-night, but his birth-day: And to be born, is to come into the light, though the birth-time be the darkest of the night. Hence the Heathen called their Juno, whose help they invoked in time of womens travail (Deam lucinam) the Goddess bringing into light.

So much for the opening of this curse, both in the general and in the parts of it, respecting the object day and night. In the next words he cuts out, or proportions a special curse, as the portion of each part: The day hath a share, and the night hath a share, each by it self. Before I open this box of curses any further, I shall observe somewhat from the discovery thus far made.

And first I must answer a doubt arising upon the whole matter; for it may be questioned upon this you have already heard, though we carry on his complaint no further, How Job can be set up with so much admiration for a mirror of patience, who makes such bitter complainings, and breaks out into such distemper'd passion, cursing his day? May he not rather be an example of impatience? an unimitable pattern of an unquiet and uncomposed spirit? Are these the words of patience and sobriety? Is this the language of submission and humility, Cursed be my day? He seemeth to be so far from patience, that he wants prudence; so far from grace, that he wants reason it self and good nature; his speeches report him mad or distracted, breaking the bounds of modesty and moderation, striking that which had not hurt him, and striking that which he could not hurt, his birth-day. In this Job appears much like that proud Emperor Zerxes, of whom the Historian reports, that when the raging Hellespont broke down the bridge that he had made over it, he in a rage caused some hundreds of stripes to be inflicted as a punishment on those waters, and caused a pair of shackles to be cast upon those waves, to teach them subjection: was not this madness? what cared the waters for stripes? or why should Zerxes take revenge upon the waters? And was not Job as mad? what cared his day for the curse? or why should Job take revenge upon his day? But as the Prophet saith, Hab. 3. 8. Was the Lord displeased against the rivers? was his wrath against the sea? Should the Lord set his anger against irrational creatures? Doubtless he doth not. Therefore enquire further into the matter: So did Job fall out with his day? was he angry with his day? This is yet further to be enquired into and answered.

Herodotus.

There are some who on the one hand prosecute the impatience of Job with much impatience, and are over-passionate against Job's passion. Most of the Jewish Writers tax him at the least as bordering upon blasphemy, if not blaspheming. Nay, they censure him as one taking heed to, and much much depending upon Aſtrological obſervations, as if mens fate or fortune were guided by the conſtellations of heaven, by the ſight and aſpect of the Planets in the day of his Nativity; as if Job had obſerved ſome malignant conjunction of the Stars upon that day: As if like the ſuperſtitious Heathen, he divided dayes into lucky and unlucky, good and bad dayes; as if he had denied the providence of God, at leaſt the particular providence of God, in guiding individual perſons or paſſages of our lives here below.

There are others, who carry the matter as far on the other hand, altogether excuſing, and which is more, commending, yea, applauding Job, in this act of curſing his day: they make this curſe an argument of his holineſs, and theſe expoſtulations as a part of his patience; contending firſt, that they did only expreſs (which he ought) the ſuffering of his ſenſitive part, as a man; and ſo were oppoſite to Stoical Apathy, not to Chriſtian patience; to a ſtone, not to a man.

Secondly, That he ſpake all this, not only according to the law of ſenſe; but with exact judgment, and according to the law of ſoundeſt reaſon: And which is far more, that he ſpake all this, not out of impotent anger againſt his day, but out of perfect love unto his God; that he ſpake this curſe, not in his own, but in the behalf of God; pleading for the providence of God, againſt the ſurmiſes of men; for (ſay ſome) he feared leſt his friends, ſeeing him (whom they ever took for a godly man) thus afflicted, ſhould accuſe the providence of God. As if he had ſaid, I would I had never been born, or it had been better for me not to have been born, rather then I ſhould be an occaſion for any to take up hard thoughts againſt God, or that his name, through my ſufferings, ſhould ſuffer. So that the love of God, not wearineſs under, or unwillingneſs to be under the croſs, conſtrained him thus to ſpeak: And if he was beſides himſelf (as the Apoſtles word is) it was to God, 2 Cor. 5. 13.

I do not ſay, but that Job loved God, and loved him exceedingly all this while; but whether we ſhould ſo far acquit Job, I much doubt; eſpecially ſeeing Job himſelf ſaith, chap. 42. I have ſpoken, I will ſpeak no more: If Job had ſpoken ſo much, from the love of God, and to the honour of God in this curſe, having ſpoken once, he ought to have ſpoken again and again: And had it been ſo, ſurely Job might have ſpared his repentance, as to this point, and needed not have ſaid, Now I abhor my ſelf, and repent in duſt and aſhes: If Job had ſpoken all this according to exact reaſon, and the exactneſs of holineſs, he had no reaſon to repent; eſpecially to repent in duſt and aſhes, for what he had thus ſpoken: No man needs abhor himſelf for that, wherein he both intentionally and actually honours God.

We muſt therefore ſtate it in the middle way; that Job is neither rigidly to be taxed of blaſphemy or prophaneneſs, nor totally to be excuſed; eſpecially not flatteringly commended for this high complaint. I conceive, it muſt be granted, that Job diſcovered much frailty and infirmity, ſome paſſion and diſtemper in this complaint and curſe; yet notwithſtanding we muſt aſſert him for a patient man, yea, for a mirrour of patience; and there are five things conſiderable for the clearing and proof of this aſſertion.

As firſt, Conſider the greatneſs of his ſuffering, his wound was very deep and deadly, his burden was very heavy, only not intollerable. The ſufferings of Chriſt, being exceeding great, cauſed him to complain, that his ſoul was exceeding ſorrowful, even unto death; Mat. 27. 38. yet in this complaint, there was not the leaſt imaginable touch of impatience. When he hung upon the Croſs, he cried out, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? verſ. 46. yet in this cry, no impatience. To cry out for every light touch, argues indeed a vain and an impatient ſpirit; but he that ſometimes fetches a groan under a weight of ſorrow, is yet untoucht in his wiſdom, or in his patience. In ſuch a caſe, to cry out, is a diſcovery of humane frailty, but not of ſinful frailty; Grace doth not take away ſenſe; it heightens nature, but it doth not aboliſh it. Conſider how much Job endured, and then you will find little impatience, though he complained much.

Secondly, Conſider the multiplicity of his troubles; they were great and many: many little afflictions meeting together, make a great one; how great then is that which is compoſed of many great ones? Many pebble ſtones will make a heavy burden; how then is he burdened, who hath (if ſuch a thing may be ſuppoſed) many mill-ſtones upon his back? Job's afflictions came upon him as an Army, and encompaſt him round about. He had many particular afflictions, any one of which might make a very patient man complain; then Job who bare them all, was not impatient though he complained.

Thirdly, Conſider the long continuance of theſe great and many troubles; they continued long upon him, ſome ſay they continued divers years upon him. We uſe to ſay, a light burden is heavy, if the journey be long; a man may bear any thing for a brunt, or for a ſpurt; but to have a ſad load continued upon the ſhoulders all the day, pinches ſore. Job's load lay upon him day and night, day after day; yea, moneth after moneth, chap. 7. 3. I am made (ſaith he) to poſſeſs moneths of vanity: yea, as ſome have calculated them, his troubles continued year after year, for ſeven years. Though a man make ſome, yea, great complainings, under many, great, long laſting afflictions, an eaſie Apologie may acquit him of impatience.

Fourthly, Conſider this, that his complainings and acts of impatience were but a few; but his ſubmiſſions and acts of meekneſs under the hand of God, were very many. Now we know, that one, or a few acts, though evil, do not denominate a perſon, eſpecially when they are ballanced by many acts of good in the ſame perſon, and about the ſame thing. How often doth Job, in this Book, breath forth patience, humility, faith, love, and ſtedfaſt truſt in God, whatſoever he ſhould do with him; theſe ballance his complainings, yea indeed, they over-ballance them ſo much, for the ſetling of our judgments, about Job's patience, that they leave not ſo much as an opinion of the contrary.

Fifthly, Take this into conſideration, that though he did complain, and complain bitterly, yet he recovered out of theſe complainings; he was not overcome by impatience, though ſome impatient ſpeeches came from him; he recalls what he had ſpoken, and repents for what he had done. See how he ſubmitteth himſelf (chap. 42.) how low he lies before God, even in the duſt; and ſaith, I will ſpeak no more. If I have been impatient, I will uſe no more impatient ſpeeches; if I have been impatient, I repent of it; I repent of it in duſt and aſhes: To repent of impatience, takes away the imputation of impatience; and to ſay, I will do evil no more, gains (through the mercy of God in Chriſt) an acceptance of us, as if we had done no evil: A man is a conqueror, though in the battel he ſuffers many foils, and receiveth many wounds, and loſeth much blood; though for a great while in the day a man be worſted, yea, though a whole Army be worſted; yet if in the evening, in the cloſe of the day, he and they keep the field, and foil the enemy, the day is won, and victory goes on this ſide. Job was in a great battel, in a ſore fight of afflictions; though it be granted, that he received ſome wounds, and had ſome foils, and ſometimes looks as if he had been beaten, and ſpeaks as if he had been overcome; yet in the cloſe, in the evening, in the making up of all, he went away a conqueror; the concluſion was victory and glory; Job had the victory, and God the glory: Therefore, as the Apoſtle James, chap. 5. 11. when he ſpeaks of enduring with joy, refers us to the end of Job's day of trouble, to the end which the Lord made; ye have heard (ſaith he) of the patience of Job, and have ſeen the end of the Lord. So look to the end of Job, to the end which (through the ſtrength of the Lord) Job made, and there you ſhall ſee patience having a perfect work; or, the perfect work of patience. Look not alone upon all the actings of Job, when he was in the height and heat of the battel; look to the on-ſet, he was ſo very patient in the beginning, though vehemently ſtirred, that Satan had not a word to ſay; look to the end, and you cannot ſay, but Job was a patient man, full of patience, a mirror of patience, if not a miracle of patience; a man whoſe face ſhined with the glory of that grace, above all the children of men.

So much for that queſtion; I ſhall now add two or three points of obſervation.

The firſt thing then that we may obſerve from hence, is this; If we compare Job in the two former Chapters, with Job in the third, we ſhall find that the caſe is altered with him; him; he ſcarce ſpeaks like the ſame man. Hence obſerve in the general,

That, The holieſt perſon in this life, doth not alwayes keep in the ſame frame of holineſs.

There is a great deal of difference between what he ſpake in the former Chapters, when he heard of, and felt theſe things firſt; and what he ſpeaks now. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; bleſſed be the name of the Lord. Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and ſhall we not receive evil? This was the language we lately heard; but now curſing: certainly his ſpirit had been in a more holy frame, more ſedate and quiet, then now it was. At the beſt, in this life, we are but imperfect; yet at ſome time we are more imperfect then we are at another: Faith is never very ſtrong; yet at ſome time Faith is weaker then at another: Our love to Chriſt is never very hot; but yet at ſome time it is colder then at another; we cannot keep it in the ſame degrees of heat. A man at one time can both do and ſuffer, and a while after, he can neither do nor ſuffer as he could at that time; he is out of frame, and bungles in both. Take the life of a Chriſtian all together, it is a progreſs, it is a continual growing; yet take his life apart, conſider him in every circumſtance and ſtage of his life, then there are many ſtops and ſtands in his life, yea, many declinings: As it is with a Child; take a child, and his life, from his birth to his full age, is in a growing condition; yet conſider him at ſome particular time, and the child may abate; the child may not only be ſtronger, but much weaker then he was a year or a moneth before: So it is with us from the firſt hour of our ſpiritual life, till we attain full ſtature of it in Chriſt; only this is our comfort, that in heaven our ſouls ſhall be ſet up in ſuch a frame of holineſs, as ſhall never be moved nor abated in the leaſt degree: look in what frame the hand of God ſets us up in that day, we ſhall continue ſo to all eternity; and that will be the higheſt and moſt exquiſite frame both of holineſs and of delight. But now we are up and down, one day patient, and another day impatient; now believing, and another day diſtruſting; now the heart melts and is very tender, anon it is very hard and relentleſs. How meek a man was Moſes, not ſuch a man for meekneſs upon the face of the whole earth; and yet at one time paſſionate, and at another ſo angry, that he ſpake unadviſedly with his lips. How full of faith was Peter at one time, how reſolved to ſtick cloſe to Chriſt; yet ſhortly after, how full of fear, and for fear, denying Chriſt. We who receive good gifts and perfect gifts, are ſubject to turns and variations; only he from whom every good and perfect gift comes, is without variableneſs or ſhadow of turning.

Secondly, Obſerve, That, Great ſufferings may fill the mouths of holieſt perſons with great complainings.

Job was not only afflicted, but afflicted greatly: Job did not only complain, but he complained greatly: You ſee what complainings David made in his great troubles, Pſal. 77. 2. In the day of my trouble I ſought the Lord, my ſore ran in the night and ceaſed not, my ſoul refuſed to be comforted. So Heman, Pſal. 88. 3. My ſoul is full of troubles, and my life draweth nigh unto the grave: And, ver. 15. I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up: while I ſuffer thy terrors, I am diſtracted. Hezekiah, under the greatneſs of his affliction (Iſa. 38. 14.) ſaith, Like a Crane or Swallow, ſo did I chatter; I did mourn as a Dove, &c. Jeremy, a holy Prophet, ſpeaks, if not out-ſpeaks Job in his complaint, chap. 20. 14. Curſed be the day wherein I was born; let not the day wherein my mother bare me be bleſſed: Curſed be the man who brought tidings to my father, ſaying, a man-child is born unto thee. He doth not only curſe his birth-day, but the meſſenger of his birth; and he curſes both with a word of deeper deteſtation then Job employed to eaſe or empty his troubled ſpirit by. Job's word ſignified but his diſeſteem, and himſelf regardleſs of his day; but Jeremy employes that very word, through which God poured out his wrath and everlaſting diſpleaſure upon the Serpent and the Devil, Gen. 3. 14. in each of theſe Jeremy went a ſtrain of impatience beyond Job, and yet holy Jeremy ſtill. The Lord (ſaith the ſame Prophet, chap. 8. 14.) hath put us to ſilence, and given us waters of Gall to drink, becauſe we have ſinned againſt the Lord. When we remember our own ſins, we have reaſon to be ſilent, though the Lord feed us with waters of Gall, bitter waters. And if we be ſilent, and open not our mouths, becauſe we have ſinned; he bears with our cry, as we are pained: he knows whereof we are made, and remembers that we are but duſt. A little thing troubles our fleſh, therefore it is no wonder, if fleſh and blood cry out in great troubles, though they be ſubdued by grace unto the Spirit. And if God (in this caſe) bears with us, we ought alſo to bear with one another, and not to be ſcandalized or take offence, when we ſee good men mourning and lamenting under the evils which they endure. He that underſtands man, will compaſſionate the ſorrows, not queſtion the ſincerity of a complaining, groaning brother.

Thirdly, Job complaineth bitterly, and he curſeth; but what doth he curſe? He curſeth his day. From hence obſerve,

That, Satan with his utmoſt power and policy, with his ſtrongeſt temptations and aſſaults, can never fully attain his ends upon the children of God.

What was it that the Devil undertook for? was it not to make Job curſe his God? and yet when he had done his worſt, and ſpent his malice upon him, he could but make Job curſe his day; this was far ſhort of what Satan hoped. Doubtleſs, when the Devil heard the word curſed come out of Job's mouth, he then began to prick up his ears, and triumph; ſurely now the day is mine, now he will curſe his God; but at the fall of that word, curſed be the day, Satans hope falls, and down goes he. That word, day, was darkneſs to the Devil, and as the ſhadow of death; he fails of his end, and is confounded, he goes away aſhamed, and hath not a word more to ſay; but leaves his friends to ſay the reſt. The gates of hell ſhall never prevail againſt thoſe who are founded on free grace, and the Rock Jeſus Chriſt.

Fourthly, Obſerve, That, God doth graciouſly forget and paſs by the diſtempered ſpeeches and bitter complainings of his ſervants, under great afflictions.

Job ſpake this curſe; but when God comes to queſtion with Job, we do not hear a word or tittle of this curſe charged upon him: God takes notice that he had ſpoken of him the thing that is right, chap. 42. 7. God commends him for what he had ſpoken well; but Job doth not hear a word of what he had ſpoken ill: When the iniquity of his ſpeeches was ſought for, there was none; and his failings, they could not be found; for God had pardoned them; as the Prophet ſpeaks of Iſrael and Judah, chap. 42. 20. Our Lord Chriſt ſaith, that of every idle word you ſhall give an account at the day of judgment; and by your words you ſhall be juſtified, and by your words you ſhall be condemned, Mat. 12. 36, 37. We had need look to our words: God writeth what we ſpeak, and keepeth a book of all we ſay. You will ſay, how then were Job's diſtempered complainings forgotten, and all taken for well ſpoken, that he had ſpoken? I anſwer, Firſt, None of Job's were idle words, though there was an error in his words. Secondly, His right words were more then his erring words. Thirdly, His heart was upright when his tongue ſlipt. Fourthly, He repented of thoſe ſlips and errors. And laſtly, God forgiving, blotted them out of his book for ever. Further (in a ſence) we may ſay, that God makes allowance to his people for ſuch failings; not allowance of connivance and diſpenſation; God doth not diſpenſe with any to do the leaſt evil, or expreſs the leaſt impatience in their ſpeeches; but he makes an allowance of favour and compaſſion, conſidering their weakneſs and the ſtrength of temptation, he abates proportionably, when in ſuch a condition they ſpeak impatiently; though their actions and ſpeeches want ſome grains of that weight which they ought to have, yet weighing them in the ſcale of favour, with his gracious allowance, they go for currant, and paſs in account with God, as good and full pay of that duty he expects from us, and we owe unto his Majeſty.

VERS. 4, 5, 6, 7.

Let that day be darkneſs, let not God regard it from above; neither let the light ſhine upon it.

Let

Let darkneſs and the ſhadow of death ſtain it, let a cloud dwell upon it, let the blackneſs of the day terrifie it.
As for that night, let darkneſs ſeize upon it, let it not be joyned unto the dayes of the year, let it not come into the number of the moneths.
Lo, let that night be ſolitary, let no joyful voice come therein.

WE have already given the Analyſis and parts of this Chapter: The ſubject of it is Jobs curſe upon his day. The firſt ſection of it in the nine firſt verſes, contains the matter and the method of that curſe.

And he curſeth his day, First, In general (verſ. 1.) After this, Job opened his mouth, and curſed his day. Secondly, He curſeth it in both the parts of it, (verſ. 3.) Let the day periſh in which I was born, and the night in which it was ſaid, there is a man child conceived.

In theſe ſix verſes which remain, appertaining to the firſt Section, he affixes a particular curſe to each part of his day; taking a day, for a natural day, and then dividing it into day and night, he gives a ſpecial curſe to each of theſe parts; A curſe upon the day, and a curſe upon the night.

The curſe powred out upon the day, lies in the fourth and fifth verſes of this Chapter, Let that day be darkneſs, let not God regard it from above, neither let the light ſhine upon it; let darkneſs and the ſhadow of death ſtain it, let a cloud dwell upon it, let the blackneſs of the day terrifie it.

Here are ſix diſtinct branches of this curſe.

First, Let the day be darkneſs.

Let the day.] Here we are to take day, not for a natural day, but for the day as it is the continent of light, the whole ſpace of time from the riſing to the ſetting of the Sun. Now ſaith he, Let the day be darkneſs.

Be darkneſs.] There is a great aggravation of miſery in that, as Chriſt ſpeaks, Mat. 6. 23. If the light that is in thee be darkneſs, how great is that darkneſs? While Job wiſheth that his very day, which is light, ſhould be darkneſs, how great a darkneſs doth he wiſh unto it; And if the day be darkneſs, how dark muſt the night of that day be?

Then again, Let the day be darkneſs, he doth not ſay, let the day be miſty, or cloudy, or dusky, or dark, he doth not wiſh it like that day deſcribed, Zech. 14. 6. It ſhall come to paſs in that day, that the light ſhall not be clear nor dark; but he ſaith, Let it be darkneſs. Both in Scripture and common language, Abſtracts are emphatically ſignificant, and carry more then an ordinary ſenſe in them. When David ſaith, Pſal. 27. 1. The Lord is my light, there is more in it then if he had only ſaid, the Lord doth enlighten me: So to ſet forth the woful condition of thoſe who are unregenerate or in the ſtate of nature, the Apoſtle tells them, Epheſ. 5. 8. Ye were ſometimes darkneſs; not only in the dark, but darkneſs: So here, to expreſs how great a curſe he wiſhes upon his day, Job ſaith, Let the day be darkneſs it ſelf.

Now darkneſs may be taken two wayes: Either Properly, or Improperly.

Proper darkneſs is nothing elſe but a privation of light, it is no poſitive creature, it hath no cauſe in nature, but is the conſequent of the Suns abſence. When Job wiſhes, let that day be darkneſs, we may underſtand it of this darkneſs: as if he had ſaid, whenſoever that day cometh about, in the recourſe and revolution of the year, let it be darkneſs, or a very dark and gloomy day. This had been a great evil upon his day. This kind of darkneſs was one of the ten plagues with which God ſmote Egypt. And yet there is darkneſs, which is a greater evil then this, I mean darkneſs improperly taken: and ſo frequently in Scripture any ſorrowful, troubleſome, ſad condition, is expreſs'd by darkneſs. A condition of darkneſs is a ſad condition, a dark day is as much, as a ſad day; So then, Let that day be darkneſs, that is, let it for ever be accounted a ſad and ſorrowful day. Thus the Prophet Joel, Chap. 2. 2. calls a day of great trouble, a day of darkneſs and gloominеſs, a day of clouds and of thick darkneſs. When Solomon, Eccleſ. 12. 2. would ſhew by way of Antitheſis, the ſad and evil condition of old age comparatively to youth, he unfolds it by darkneſs; remember now thy Creatour in the dayes of thy youth, make haſte, ſerve God betime; But what needs ſuch haſt? I tell thee why, as times change, ſo thy eſtate will change: Evil dayes will come, I therefore counſel thee to do it, while the evil dayes come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou ſhalt ſay, I have no pleaſure in them: while the Sun, or the light, or the Moon, or the Stars be not darkened. A day without pleaſure, is a day without the Sun: take away the joy of a day, and you take away the light of a day. Young-men have the Sun, and the Moon, and the Stars, all kind of light and comfortable influences upon them; but theſe will be darkened and eclipſed when old-age cometh, that will put out or at leaſt obſcure your light, your day will be gone, and your night will have neither Moon nor Star in it; therefore work while you have light, that is, while you have health and ſtrength of body, while you have freedom and activity of ſpirits, fit for that great ſervice, remember, that is, know and ſerve your Creatour.

So in the Text, we may take darkneſs improperly, as darkneſs notes an uncomfortable eſtate, and it is uſed in Scripture to note a two-fold uncomfortable eſtate. First, An eſtate of ſin; Secondly, An eſtate of miſery. This latter darkneſs is the daughter of the former. The Prophet Iſaiah, Chap. 9. 2. ſpeaks of the people that ſate in darkneſs: which is repeated, Mat. 4. 16. that is, in the darkneſs of ignorance, of ſin and guilt. They had natural light enough, and they had civil light enough, abundance of outward comforts: they had health, and ſtrength, and riches, and peace, and plenty, but they had not a Chriſt to take away their ſins, and cleanſe their conſciences, and therefore they were a people that ſate in darkneſs. Jobs curſe intends not this darkneſs of ſin, but that other improper darkneſs, the darkneſs of ſorrow, the darkneſs of penal evil; As if he had ſaid, let ſorrow and ſadneſs over-ſhadow, let mourning and tears overwhelm, let calamity and trouble for ever poſſeſs the day upon which I was born.

Let not God regard it from above.] Here is a ſecond part of the curſe, and a more grievous curſe then the former.

Let not God.] We may obſerve here the Name whereby God is expreſſed, it is Eloah.

The learned Hebricians obſerve ten ſeveral Names of God in Scripture, three of which note his Being: Jehovah, Jah, Ehejeh. Three his Power: El, Eloah, Elohim. Three his Government: Adonai, Shaddai, Jehovah Tſebaoth. One his Excellency, or Super-excellency: Gnelion. The Name Eloah here uſed, is derived from El, which ſignifieth Mighty, and ſo by that addition to the word, there is an addition made to the ſenſe, Eloah is Moſt Mighty, or Almighty. This word in the ſingular number is very rare; the Name Elohim, which is the plural, is very frequent in holy Scripture: Chriſt upon the croſs cryes out to God by his Name in the ſingular number, Eloi, Eloi, my God, my God, as calling for the Almighty power of God, to ſupport and carry him through his ſufferings. David uſeth it in the eighteenth Pſalm, verſ. 31. Who is God ſave the Lord? Who is Eloah ſave Jehovah? that is, who is a mighty ſtrong God, ſave the Lord Jehovah, ſo the next words explain it, Who is a rock ſave our God? So Job being about to implead and accuſe his day, calls to the mighty God (as it were) to judge this day to his everlaſting neglect; Let not God regard it from above.

Regard it from above.] The word ſignifies ſometimes to inquire and ſearch after, or to take an account of a thing exactly and judiciouſly; as they that are called to reckoning or to judgement, are enquired after: and ſo it hath relation to that Name of God, Eloah, a powerful or mighty Judge. Let not God regard it, let not God take any account of it, or enquire after it, let it paſs as not worth the looking after. דרש Simmo jam dicio inquireret

Secondly, The word ſignifies to have a care of a thing, to have a thing or perſon in account, as well as to call unto account: to take care and be watchful over another for good, is our regarding of it. In this ſenſe the word is uſed, Deut. 11. 12. where Moſes ſpeaking concerning the Land of Canaan, ſaith, It is a Land which the Lord thy God careth for. [Careth for] is the ſame word with this; and this Text may well be expounded by that which follows as the meaning of it, The eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year, even unto the end of the year. So that to have regard to a thing, to a day, or to a perſon, is to make account of theſe, to take care for theſe for their good, as a part of ones charge or duty, or as an act of grace and bounty. When Job ſaith, Let not God regard it, this may be the ſenſe, let not God take any care for it, or make any account of it; let not his eyes be upon it to do it any good, or to do any extraordinary good upon it: let it not be honoured by God with any ſpecial work of providence, which might make it recorded and remembred with honour among men.

The Apoſtle, Rom. 14. 6. ſpeaks of mans regarding of a day, He that regardeth a day, regardeth it unto the Lord. The Apoſtle treats in that Chapter about the obſervation of dayes: finding that many believers could not be taken off from ſolemnizing thoſe feaſts, which were of Gods own founding and inſtituting among the Jewes, he adviſes that they ſhould not be judged or hardly cenſured, for going according to their conſcience; for he that out of conſcience and according to his light regards, that is, doth ſolemnize or obſerve a day, he regards it to the Lord, that is, to the honour of God, and with a ſincere deſire to pleaſe him. But the thing I aim at in alledging this Text, is to give light to the point in hand, what it is to regard a day. The Apoſtle is plain, that Mans regarding of a day, is to have a day in ſpecial account, as thoſe dayes were, which God inſtituted among the Jewes for ſpecial ends, commanding them to obſerve them, and promiſing a bleſſing in their obſervation. Proportionably Gods regarding of a day, is the ſpecial eſteem he hath, or care he takes of it, & the eſpecial bleſſing he poureth down upon it. Some practical truths are hence obſervable.

Firſt, Conſider theſe two parts of the curſe, as they are placed in ſucceſſion one after another, or in conjunction one with another, Let the day be darkneſs, and let not God regard it from above. This may teach us, That there is no day ſo dark, or condition ſo troubleſom, but if God regard and take notice of it, man may take comfort and rejoyce in it. Though the day be darkneſs, Gods eye will make it light; his regarding is a bleſſing: we never looſe all, till God leaves us. If in the hour and power of darkneſs, (as Chriſt calls the time of his paſſion) God do but lift up the light of his countenance upon us, we ſhall be ſaved. Jobs wiſh of darkneſs, had done his day no great hurt, unleſs he had taken the eye of God off from it alſo. All the light that is in the world, the light of Sun, Moon and Stars, is but darkneſs to us, if God hide his face; but let Sun, Moon and Stars hide their faces, let all creatures withdraw their comfort, if God regard us we are well: Therefore Job puts the ſting of the curſe in Gods not regarding and withdrawing from his day.

Secondly, When he wiſhes that God would not regard his day, he deſires God to lay aſide or ſuſpend his continual work.

Obſerve then, That God doth obſerve and take particular notice of every day. As all perſons ſhall be accountable to him for their actions, ſo alſo for their time: God will inquire after every inch of time, after every moment of our lives. Many men regard not a day, they value not their precious time, they know not how to ſpend or be rid of it, how to wear it out and paſs it away: But God obſerves and regards every moment. The Apoſtle calls to redeeming of time, Epheſ. 5. 16. And he ſubjoyns a motive, Becauſe the dayes are evil. We may give in this of Job for a motive: God regards time, therefore let us redeem time. If a day be within Gods regarding, ſurely it may command ours.

Thirdly, Let not God regard it. We may obſerve,

That the bleſſing and comfort of every day, depends upon the care and reſpect of God to it. The eyes of all things look up unto God. Why do all things look up to God? It is that God may look down upon them: If God look down upon the creature, then the creature revives and is refreſhed; there are influences from the eye and ſight of God, which are able to quicken the deadeſt times, and make glad the ſaddeſt hearts. As we pray for and humbly expect every day our daily bread from God, ſo every day doth (as it were) expect a daily bleſſing from God, which is his regarding of our dayes.

It is the greateſt evil that can befal the creature, when God regards it not; all the bleſſings of the creature are bound up (like Jacobs life in the life of Benjamin) in that reſpect which God beareth to them, and in the care which he hath of them. The Apoſtle Paul, diſputing with the Philoſophers of Athens, ſhewes the ſtate of that time, which they accounted ſuch a golden-age, (Acts 17. 30.) The time of that ignorance God winked at, ſo we tranſlate it; the word properly ſignifieth, God did over-look that time: And there are ſome tranſlations which expreſs it in the very term of the Text, The time of that ignorance God regarded not. For we are not to think, there ever were any times, which God winked at in the matter of his Juſtice, ſo as not to call them to an account: I grant that times of ignorance are comparatively winked at in reſpect of Juſtice, God will not proceed ſo ſeverely with them as with knowing times: but God never winketh at any perſon, or at any times, how ignorant ſoever, ſo as to let them go unpuniſhed, and never call them to an account. Such connivence God hates, as being inconſiſtent both with his providence and his Juſtice. The Apoſtle is direct: They who ſin without law (that is, without the knowledge of the law written) ſhall periſh without law, namely, the written law, onely according to the ſentence of that law, which the finger of nature hath written in their hearts, Rom. 2. 12. Ignorance ſhall not be ſo winked at, as to be altogether excuſed. How then did God wink? There is a two-fold winking. Firſt, Of diſreſpect. Secondly, Of diſpenſation. Gods winking is his diſreſpecting. He winked at thoſe times, that is, he lightly paſſed them by, his eye was not upon them for good, he regarded them not in ſuch a manner as to provide for them and ſend amongſt them that great bleſſing, which now (ſaith Paul) he ſends you by my hands, the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt.

When the bleſſed Virgin heard by that meſſage of the Angel, that ſhe ſhould be mother to the Saviour of the world, ſhe bleſſeth God in this phraſe, Thou haſt regarded the low eſtate of thine handmaid. When God in a way of favour doth but look towards us, our loweſt eſtate is raiſed up, Thou haſt regarded the low eſtate of thine handmaid. It is but a look of gracious regard from God, and all is well with man. On the other ſide, if God take off his eye, wink and diſregard, all is blaſted, yea accurſed, our high eſtate falls, our comforts are ſowred and turned into a lump of ſorrow. We may ſay of all outward excellencies as Haman did, Eſther 5. 13. of all his honour, and greatneſs and favour at Court, All this I have, but all this availeth me nothing, ſo long as I ſee Mordecai the Jew ſitting at the Kings gate. All his comforts were clouded, all the light of his high eſtate was eclipſed, becauſe there was a new Star, Mordecai, ſhining ſtill at the Kings gate. Much more may we ſit down, and caſting up all that we have and are, make the foot of our account nothing, without the favour of God; what do riches, what doth credit, what doth beauty or parts avail us, if God regard not? all is nothing at all without God. What are times, what are dayes, what is your condition if God withdraw himſelf? this aggravates the curſe, this is mournful, when God regardeth not. Job goes on to a third branch of the curſe. Let not God regard it,

Neither let the light ſhine upon it.

That which before he ſpake againſt his day, by wiſhing it darkneſs, he ſpeaks over again and more in other words, by wiſhing light might be denied and with-held from it. To have no light, is not a bare repetition or an explication of what it is to be in darkneſs, but it is an addition to, or an aggravation of it: So the Prophet, Iſa. 50. 10. by him that walks in darkneſs, and hath no light, ſets out the ſaddeſt condition of an afflicted ſoul. No light, is not only darkneſs, but pure darkneſs; as when the Apoſtle John would advance the glory of God, he ſaith, God is light, and in him there is no darkneſs at all, (1 Ep. c. 1.) God is pure light; ſo darkneſs without light, is pure darkneſs.

Let not the light.] As darkneſs, ſo light may be taken either properly for natural light, that which God firſt created: light was the firſt perfect viſible creature, light was the firſt dayes work, and by the work of the fourth was gathered into thoſe heavenly veſſels, the Sun, Moon, and Stars, and there put, that it might be diſpenſed and carried about the world, eſpecially by that Chariot of the Sun. Let this light, this natural light be with-held, let it not ſhine (ſaith Job) upon that day. The withdrawing of natural light is a great affliction to the world: Light is the moſt incorporeal of all corporal things; the ſpiritualneſs of it, ſhews the goodneſs of it: light is the beauty, and diſcovers all the beauty of the world. As a goodly adorn'd furnish't room without a window, or a candle, such is the world without light. Light is not onely the light, but the life of the world, it quickens and comforts the motions of nature; it is the instrument by which all the influences of Heaven are communicated to the Earth, which being stopt, the course of nature stops: this caused a great Philosopher to cry out (when at the passion of Christ the light of the Sun was totally eclipsed) Either the God of nature suffers, or the whole frame of nature dissolves. Was it not then a dreadful curse, when Job wishes the light (taking it for natural light) might not shine upon his day?

But further, take it improperly, then, let not the light shine upon it, hath this voice in it, Let there be no comfort, no joy, no good thing in the compass of that day. Light in Scripture expresses all good; as darkness all evil. That great blessing which was promised unto the Church in the great restauration of it, is shadowed by light, and by an increasing light, in Isa. 30. 26. Moreover, the light of the Moon shall be as the light of the Sun, and the light of the Sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven dayes, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound. We are not to conceive, that there shall be such an increase of the natural light of the Moon or of the Sun, but there shall be an increase of the comfort of the people of God, which shall be as if the Moon and the Sun had in one day the light of seven dayes, as if the Moon had got the light of the Sun, and the Sun had got a sevenfold light more then it had before. And he who is the chief, the choicest and most transcendent blessing of all, the joy of all our hearts, Jesus Christ, is called light, he came as light into the world, he is the light of the world, the Sun of righteousness. The creator of all good things, found nothing so good to shew his own goodness by, as light. Christ is light, God is light, and in him there is no darkness at all. If then we take Jobs speech metaphorically or improperly, Let not the light shine upon that day, it amounts to a higher loss then the former, Truly (saith Solomon) light is sweet, and it is a pleasant thing to behold the Sun; and we may say truly, all sweetness is light, and every pleasant thing is as the Sun: Though the Sun shine upon us, yet if comfort be removed from us, we are in darkness. Such a condition the Prophet speaks of, (Isa. 50. 10.) Who is among you that feareth the Lord, and obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light. No light, is no comfort, none for the outward man, none for the inner man, both being benighted, both deserted. Hence observe,

That it is a greater judgement to have good things removed from us, then to have evil inflicted on us. He speaks more against the day, when he saith, Let not the light shine upon it, then when he saith, Let it be darkness. The punishment of loss is greater then the punishment of sense. He that is deprived of all good, is by that act invested with all evils. The most woful condition of ungodly men in this life, is expresst by the punishment of loss, There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked, Isa. 57. 21. That they have trouble is not so bad, as that they have no peace. And the worst part of that everlasting wo which ungodly men shall suffer, is a punishment of loss: The heat of the fire shall not trouble them so much, as the want of light: God hath fully resolv'd that their day shall be darkness, that himself will never regard it from above, nor let the least beam of the light of his countenance shine upon it. Hence the condition of the damned is called outer darkness, (Mat. 22. 13.) By outer darkness, Christ means darkness without any ray of light: Outer darkness is their portion who are without, Rev. 22. 15. As the greatest blessing we receive by Christ is positive, Joh. 3. 16. God so loved the world, that he gave his onely begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him, should not perish, (here is the removing of evil) but have everlasting life, here is the bringing in of good: And this is the better part of the blessing. So on the other side, to have all good, light and life removed, is the most bitter part of the curse.

Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it.

Darkness and the shadow of death.] These words are the fourth branch of the curse upon his day; he repeats the former curse, but with new additions; He had said before, Let this day be darkness, now he saith, Let darkness and the shadow of death stainit.

The shadow of death.] The word considered in the composition of it, may be translated image of death. And because the shadow of a body gives us the image of a body, (as in the shadow of a man, you have the image and proportion of a man; in the shadow of a Tree, you have the image and representation of a Tree) because (I say) the shadow gives the image of a body, therefore the Hebrewes by a Metonymie, call an image a shadow: So that the shadow of death, is such darkness as is like death, the very image of death: He was not contented in general to say, Let darkness stain it, but if any would know what kind or degree of darkness he intends, these words expound his meaning to be, the worst darkness that can be: Any darkness is evil, but darkness and the shadow of death is the utmost of evils. David put the worst of his case, and the best of his faith, when he said, Psal. 23. 4. Though I walk in the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; that is, in the greatest evil, I will fear no evil. The estate of those men who lived beyond the line of the Gospel, (and that is a very doleful place to live in, though a paradise for outward pleasure) is thus described by the Prophet, Isa. 9. 2. The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light, (Jesus Christ,) they that dwelt in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined. Again, The shadow of a thing in Scripture, notes the power of a thing; and to be under the shadow of a thing, is to be under the power of a thing. The bramble (Judg. 9. 15.) said unto the trees, if in truth ye annoint me King over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow: that is, trust to that help which I am able to afford you. So likewise, to be under the shadow of the Almighty, under the shadow of his wings, is, to be under the power of the Almighty, for safety and protection: Thus we may conceive it here, to be under the shadow of death, is to be so under the power or reach of death, that death may take a man and seize upon him when it pleaseth. Though I walk in the valley of the shadow of death, that is, though I be so near death, that it seemes to others death may catch me every moment; though I be under so many appearances and probabilities of extream danger, that there appears an impossibility (in sense) to escape death, yet I will not fear.

Thirdly, To be under the shadow of death, is to be under the influences of death; the influences of death are those fears and doubtings, divisions and vexations of spirit, those distractions and distempers of mind which fall upon man, in times of imminent and unavoydable danger. Let the shadow of death stain it, that is, let it be filled with those fears, and cries, and confusions, which usually accompany or prepare the way for death.

Fourthly, Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it, that is, such darkness as dwells with death, such darkness as fills the house of death, the grave: The grave is a dark house. We use to say of that which we would have forgotten, let it be buried in darkness. There is no work in the grave, and therefore there needs no light in the grave, neither indeed can there be.

Lastly, thus; Darkness and the shadow of death, that is, deadly darkness, thick stifling darkness, such as is in deep pits and mines under the earth, where vapours and noisome damps do many times strike men with death. We may here take notice, how Job heaps up words, words very like in sound, and all alike in sense, or concurring to make up one sense: Such amplifications in Scripture, are vehement asseverations: As John 1. 20. It is said of the Baptist, He confessed and denied not, but confessed, I am not the Christ: And those phrases, Thou shalt die, and not live: I shall not die, but live; Thou shalt be low, and not above. So Job of his day, Let it be darkness, let not the light shine upon it, let darkness and the shadow of death stain it.

The word which we render (stain,) signifies properly to redeem a thing, either by price or by power, to redeem a thing by paying for it, or to redeem a thing by rescuing of it. Hence among the Jews, he that was to redeem his deceased brothers land, and marry the widow, was called Goel, from this word, as we may read in the fourth of Ruth. So the avenger of bloud was called Goel, Numb. 35. 12. because he likewise did redeem the bloud of his brother, fetch it back again as it were by a price in the execution of justice. The learned Junius, with some others, translates according to that sense of the Original word, O that dark- ness and the shadow of death had redeemed that day, or fetched back that day; (he refers it to the day past upon which he was born) and so takes it for an allusion to the first state of things. We know at the first, darkness had dominion over all, over all that Chaos or rude matter which God made at first; Darkness (saith Moses) was upon the face of the deep, Gen. 1.2. Then God gave a command to light, saying, Let there be light, ver. 3. presently light went forth and rescued the creature from under the power of darkness. Now, saith Job here, O that darkness and the shadow of death had redeemed that day, or fetched again that day out of the hands of light! Oh that darkness had recovered that which in the beginning was under its power! that so my day being wrapt up in darkness, might be without form and void.

But the word is frequently translated, (and well here,) to pollute or to stain a thing; as Mal. 1.7. Ye offer polluted bread upon mine Altar, and ye say, wherein have we polluted thee? And that of lamenting Jeremy, They have polluted themselves with blood, so that men could not touch their garments, Lam. 4. 14. So darkness is said to stain or pollute the day, as filthiness or blood stains and pollutes, discolours and defiles the beauty of a garment: Darkness obscures and blinds the beauty of the most glorious creatures, natural darkness doth it. Suppose you should come into a room furnished with the most exquisite and costly ornaments, hung with the most curious and lively pictures, if there be no light there, the beauty of all is lost to us, darkness stains it; you may have as good a sight in a dungeon as there. Again, take it for Metaphorical, or improper darkness, that also stains the beauty of the creature; if you have never so great a stock and estate of riches, or honour, &c. let but sorrow and trouble, war and divisions arise, the beauty of all is stained. What is honour then, but higher unhappiness? And what are riches then, but golden thorns? What is liberty then, but freer misery? And what is strength then, but stronger pain, and an ability to bear a heavier burden of affliction? The glory and beauty of the creature is gone in dark times; when such a day comes as Joel speaks of, A day of blackness and gloominess, where's your bravery? what becomes of your fineness? But that which stains the creature most, is mystical darkness, the darkness of ignorance, and of sin; the darkness of guilt, and of Gods displeasure: O how is the beauty of the soul (which is far more glorious then all visible creatures) how is the beauty of that stained, when it lyes under any of these darknesses! Hence therefore, we see what a blessing light is, and how we are bound to bless God for light, for natural light, for the outward light of a comfortable condition, but especially for the light of his countenance, which is better then life; for the light of knowledge, for the light of grace, how should we for ever bless the Father of lights?

Let a cloud dwell upon it.] This is the fifth branch of the curse. A cloud (as Naturalists teach) is a thick vapour raised up by the heat of the Sun to the middle region of the Air, and there by the cold condensed becomes so thick, that it stops and intercepteth the light: Clouds and darkness go together, as in Psalm 97. vers. 2. If there be Clouds, there is darkness; Clouds and darkness are round about him. So that to say, Let a cloud dwell upon it, is but a further emplifying of the same thing; before it was, Let darkness be upon it; now, Let a cloud dwell upon it.

Dwelling, notes the continuance and consistency of darkness; he doth not say, let a Cloud pass over it (for Clouds properly are unfixed, Clouds move continually, and are carried on the wings of the wind;) But Job would have his cloud a fixed cloud, a cloud so black and so strong, as might not be dissolved, but cause a continual eclipse upon the day.

A Cloud, and the dwelling of a Cloud, imports sometime the care and protection of God over his people, Exod. 40. 38. We read of a Cloud that was continually over the Tabernacle, A cloud was over it by day, and a pillar of fire by night. In the fire there was direction, in the Cloud protection, and mercy in both. So Isa. 4. 5. God promiseth to create upon every dwelling place of Mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud. Which is expounded in the close of the verse: For upon all his glory (his Church and Saints) there shall be a defence. But here the Cloud, and the dwelling of it, notes continued darkness: As if Job should have said, If the light do shine upon that day, I wish that a curtain might be drawn perpetually between the World and the Sun, let a Cloud dwell before the face of the Sun, which may muffle it, and intercept those beams which would enlighten and refresh the earth.

Clouds are refreshings; yet Clouds you see may prove afflictions: As a Cloud is a protection at one time, so it may be an affliction at another: As a Cloud shadows us from the heat, it is a blessing; but as a Cloud eclipses the light, so it is a curse: The same creature may be employed both for a curse, and for a blessing. Yet further, Job would not only have it a dwelling Cloud, but a condensed Cloud. Some Clouds are so thin, that the Sun appears, and light shines through them: Job desires this may be thick enough, not only to cause darkness, but to cause blackness: Which is the last branch of his curse upon his day.

Let the blackness of the day terrifie it.

Job's heart was so full of passion, that his sorrows could not come out at once, he takes time and breath. Now saith he, Let the blackness of the day terrifie it.

Blackness is more then darkness; therefore we find blackness an addition to darkness, in the Epistle of Jude, ver. 13. where giving divers elegant characters of wicked men, whom he calls spots in their feasts of charity, clouds without water, trees without fruit, raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame, wandring stars: And what is the portion of men thus qualified, but hell, wrath, and vengeance? So he tells us in the next words, To whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever. Darkness, and the blackness of darkness, is the portion of those that shall for ever lye under the wrath of God; blackness of darkness is the beauty of Hell; that fire will besoot the damned to all eternity: Then the blackness of darkness, is the darkest darkness that can be imagined. Blackness of darkness was Egypts plague; that was darkness, and thick darkness, darkness to be felt, Exod. 10. 21. so dark, that no man could see another, neither arose any from his place for three dayes, ver. 23. this was blackness of darkness; the picture of Hell, that chamber of darkness. The word in the Hebrew, signifieth heat and blackness: The reason is given, because heat makes things black and swarthy; from the same word those Idolatrous Priests spoken of, 2 Kings 23. 5. were called Chemarims, or the black Priests; and they were called so, either from the black vests or garments which they commonly wore; or from the heat and fire of their furious zeal, either in the defence, or exercise, of their superstitious worship; or from the smoaky Incense which they offered, fit enough to black themselves, but no way pleasing unto God.

Let the blackness of the day terrifie it.] Terrifie what? Terrifie the day. The day is not capable of fears, or of affrightments; but the meaning is this, let the blackness of the day make it a terrible day; or let it be a terrible day, by reason of the blackness of it: As we use to say, such a day was a terrible day, it was a black day.

Changes in the course of nature are full of terror. That which is proper and natural to the day is light; therefore to see the day covered with blackness, must needs affright us: when we look for light, as they in the Prophet, and behold darkness, that troubles; but when we look for light, and behold blackness, that terrifies. The vulgar Latine translation reads it thus; Let (as it were) the bitterness of the day terrifie it: The bitterness of the day, are those sad accidents and troubles which fall out upon that day. To which sence the Chaldee Paraphrase thus expounds it; let such bitternesses of the day afflict it, as the Prophet Jeremy was afflicted with, for the destruction of the Temple; or as Jonas when he was cast into the Sea. Hard bondage made the lives of the Israelites bitter, Exod. 1. 14. And when the Lord threatens to turn their feasts into mourning, and their songs into lamentation, he concludes thus, And I will make it as the mourning of an only son, and the end thereof as a bitter day, Amos 8. 10. Hence afflictions are called, gall and wormwood, bitter things. And the Chaldeans, whom God made so great a scourge to his own people, are called a bitter Nation, Hab. 1. 6.

We have opened these words, which concern the curse upon Job's day. Now follows his curse upon the night.

Verse

Verſe 6. As for the night, let darkneſs ſeize upon it, let it not be joyned to the dayes of the year, let it not come into the number of the months.

Verſe 7. Lo, let that night be ſolitary, let no joyful voice come therein.

He goeth on in his former paſſionate Rhetorick, to load the night with as many evils (if not more) as he had done the day; As for that night, let darkneſs ſeize upon it.

We have heard of darkneſs before, darkneſs upon the day. What doth Job mean here to call for darkneſs upon the night? The night is it ſelf full of darkneſs; yea darkneſs is proper to the night. Is it any curſe to ſay, let Wormwood be bitter, or to ſay, let Lead be heavy? the natural property of a thing cannot be the puniſhment of a thing. How is it then that Job ſaith, Let that night be darkneſs; or, Let darkneſs ſeize upon it.

Though it be true, that darkneſs is proper to the night; yet there are degrees of darkneſs, and every darkneſs is not proper to the night. The word here uſed for darkneſs, is obſerved by Grammarians, to ſignifie an extraordinary thick darkneſs, yea darkneſs joyned with tempeſt: Let thick tempeſtuous darkneſs ſeize upon, or take hold of that night; for the word ſignifies, to graſp or take a thing in ones hand, let darkneſs graſp it. Though the night be dark, yet it may be darker; we call ſome nights light nights, in compariſon of others.

אפל Tenebroſus turbo. Vulg.

Note, That there is no eſtate ſo ill, but it is poſſible it may be worſe.

The night is dark, yet you may ſuper-add darkneſs to it: and though the condition of any perſon, or people, be as the night, dark, yet the darkneſs may increaſe more and more to a perfect night. You know what God ſaith concerning the people of the Jews, when he threatned them with troubles, I will puniſh you yet ſeven times more for your ſins. God can make ſuch a night, as that the former night ſhall ſeem a day to it: God can add darkneſs to the darkneſs of the night: God can add bitterneſs to the bitterneſs of Wormwood, and make Lead more heavy then Lead: There is no man on earth in ſo ſad a condition, but he may be in a worſe. Art thou poor? God can ſend thee ſuch poverty, as that thy former poverty was riches compared with this. Art thou weak and ſick? God can add more ſickneſs, and make thee ſo weak, that thy former ſickneſs may be accounted health, and thy weakneſs ſtrength, compared with this. In this ſence darkneſs ſeizeth upon the night. He wiſhes a ſecond evil upon that night.

Let it not be joyned with the dayes of the year.

Hieron. Septuag. Some read it thus, Let it not be computed in the dayes of the year. Others, Let it not be in the dayes of the year. This is another evil he calls down upon the night. The glory of the night conſiſteth in its conjunction to the day; hence light and darkneſs put together, come both under the denomination and notion of day. Night is called day, as being a part of the natural day: Now that which is the chief priviledge of the night, this curſe ſtrikes at: Job would have it rent and diſ-joynted from the day. Let it not be joyned to the dayes of the year.

Diſunion and diviſion is a great curſe, when the night is not joyned to the day, it is the curſe of the night. The Rabbins have a conceit, why after the work of the ſecond day was finiſhed, God (beholding what he had done) did not add any approbation to it: when he made the light, which was the firſt dayes work, he approves it, God ſaw the light, and ſaid it was good; but to the work of the ſecond day, God ſubjoyned no approbation, by ſaying it was good; The reaſon (I ſay) which many of the Rabbins give of it, was this, becauſe then was the firſt diſunion, that made the firſt ſecond, that ever was, All before was one, (ſub unifſimo Deo) under the one-moſt God; I ſhall leave this fancy to the Rabbins. But there is ſomewhat in the notion it ſelf, namely, that diviſion and diſunion are the evils of the creature. The night hath glory by union with the day; the weakeſt things, and the obſcureſt things, have an honour by being joyned with the ſtronger and more excellent.

And as theſe natural diſunions are the affliction of natural things; ſo civil diſunions, and civil diviſions, are much more the affliction of People and Nations. Chriſt aſſures us, That the ſtrongeſt Kingdoms divided cannot ſtand, Mark 3.24. Weak things are ſtrong by union; and that not only by union with the ſtrong, but by union among themſelves. Weak things united are ſtrengthened; joyn weak with weak, and they are ſtrong. And things obſcure, united, are honourable, eſpecially if united with that which is honourable: The glory of the Wife is in the band of union with her Husband; She ſhines with the rayes of her Husbands honour: Whatſoever natural, or civil excellency is in him, reflects upon her: The woman is the glory of the man, (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, 1 Cor. 11.7.) in regard of ſubjection: It is mans glory, that God hath given him ſuperiority over ſo excellent a creature. But in another ſence, the man is the glory of the woman; ſhe communicates with him in all his dignity, how great ſoever. Thus alſo the day is the glory of the night: The night ſhines by her marriage with the day. Job ſues out a divorce between them, Let it not be joyned to the dayes of the year.

And let it not come into the number of the months.

The Original may be tranſlated, In the number of the Moons: The ſame word, among the Hebrews, ſignifieth the Moon, and a Month: as likewiſe among the Grecians: and the reaſon is, becauſe their Months were counted by their Moons; and the Moon is renewed every Month. Every Lunation made a Month; and thirteen Lunations made a year; their Month conſiſting of twenty eight dayes, which is a Lunary Month: So that when Job ſaith, Let it not come into the number of the Months, he would take away one ſpecial benefit of the night: And it is as if he had ſaid let that night be uſeleſs, and ſtand for nothing in the Calender of the year. To every thing there is a ſeaſon, and a time to every purpoſe under the Heaven, ſaith the Preacher, (Eccleſ. 3.1.) So every ſeaſon hath ſomething to do, and there is a purpoſe for every time under Heaven. A purpoſe for Summer, and a purpoſe for the Winter; a purpoſe for the day, and a purpoſe for the night. And for any of theſe to be diſappointed of their purpoſe, is (ſo far as they are capable of affliction) their affliction. We may obſerve hence;

ירח Antiquiſſima fuit in menſibus Lunarius noctiũ & Lunationũ obſervatio, quod & ipſum menſis nomẽ teſtatur, quod apud Græcos à Luna dicitur, nam (μὴν) mẽſis eſt, & vero (μήνη) Luna, Pined. in loc. Summa hoc vult, deletur è Calendario. Druſ.

That it is a great curſe upon any creature, to be made an uſeleſs creature, to ſtand for nothing.

This is to looſe the end of its being; and therefore it muſt needs looſe the happineſs of its being. Every thing was (by the Law of its creation) ordained for ſome uſe, and therefore cannot but be unhappy when it is made uſeleſs. And if it be the glory of inanimate creatures when God will uſe them, or when men make uſe of them for God; how unglorious then is the condition of thoſe men, who are, as (God ſpeaks of that King, *Jer.*22.28.) Like a deſpiſed broken Idol, which hath no honour, and is of no uſe; Who are as veſſels wherein there is no pleaſure, veſſels laid by the walls, (as we ſpeak) laid aſide, as unfit or unworthy to be lookt after, and employed in any publick ſervice.

Lo, let that night be ſolitary, let no joyful ſound come therein.

This ſolitarineſs of the night may have reſpect to the former words: He would not have it joyned to the dayes of the year; he would not have it come in the number of Months. What then? Then it muſt needs be like a ſolitary widow, all alone; Let that night be ſolitary. Or ſecondly, his meaning may be this, Let there be no meetings that night. The night is not ſolitary in it ſelf, but then the night is called ſolitary, when the ſociety of friends is ſtopt and interrupted. It was the cuſtom of thoſe times, and it is a cuſtom continued in many places to theſe times, for friends to meet in the night: and ſuch meetings make night as day; good ſociety is comfortable: A ſolitary condition is a ſorrowful condition. So then, Job compleats his curſe in this verſe, and makes up a full ſum of miſery upon his night. What can be ſaid more againſt it, then now he ſaith. He had before wiſht it dark in it ſelf, divided from the day, of no number in the months: And now he would not have friends meet to refreſh themſelves by mutual communion and loving converſe that night. Much of the comfort of our lives is brought in by the ſociety of friends. Man is defined a sociable creature, as well as a reasonable creature; solitariness is opposite both to the nature and happiness of man. Wo be to him that is alone (saith Solomon) two are better then one, and especially in times of trouble. As our comforts are multiplied upon them that are near us, so our sorrows are allayed and eased by them. There is a solitariness which is the sweetest part of our lives, when we retire a while from the world, from the throng of men and business, that we may be more intimate with Christ, and take our fill in communion with him. To go alone, that we may meet with God, is Heaven upon earth; but to be so left alone and scattered, that we cannot meet with men, is (if not a hell, yet) one of the greatest afflictions upon the earth. Such solitary times are sad times.

Let no joyful voice come therein.] As if he should say, If men will meet that night, and converse together, let them meet only to mourn together, and let their conversation be made up with mutual sorrows; let them only tell each other the sad stories of their afflictions. Thus let them meet to lament together; but let none meet to rejoyce together; let there be no meeting with any joyful voice that night. He alludes again to the custom of those times, which were wont to have, as meetings in the night, so to rejoyce in those meetings: They feasted with songs and musick, a joyful voice was in their meetings. Musick is sweetest in the night: The stilness of the night gives advantage to the voice. The Roman History tells us, that their greatest feasts, their most luxurious banquetings, and curious musick, was in the night. The Apostle alludes to that custom when he saith, They that are drunken, are drunken in the night, (1 Thes. 5. 6.) Works of darkness seek times of darkness. He that doth evil hateth the light, John 3. 21. principally the light of knowledge, and withall the light of sense. There are two Opinions about this joyful voice, which I shall but name, and pass on. First, The Chaldee Paraphrast will have this joyful voice to be the voice of the Cock, Let not the Cock crow that night; the crowing of the Cock is a comfortable voice in the night: The Cock is a natural Cock, and by his crowing tells us the hours of the night: As if Job had said, instead of the chearful voice of the Cock, let that night be filled with the doleful voice of the Owl, or of the Skreech-owl. A second Opinion saith, this joyful voice which Job puts from, and denyes his day, was the voice of the Stars, spoken of, as they would have us to conceive, Chap. 38. 7. When the morning Stars sang together, and all the Sons of God shouted for joy. But to leave these as fancies, rather then expositions: The interpretation given is clear and sutable to the method of the curse: Job would have no meeting on that night; or if any were, he forbids their joy, Let no joyful voice be heard therein.

Monstra volant, dirae strident in nocte volucres, Nocturnaeq; gemunt striges, & feriata bubo Damna canans. Statius, l. 3.

It is a great evil upon any time, when the voice of joy is taken away from it: It is a great evil upon times, when joyful meetings can no more be observed; when if any do meet, they meet and sigh together; they meet and lament together; they meet and bemoan each others losses and calamities. The Prophet Amos speaks of a time, when the songs of the Temple shall be howlings, (Chap. 8. ver. 3.) And ver. 10. I will turn your feasts into mourning, and your songs into lamentation. It is very sad, when the songs of our private houses are changed into howlings: but much more when the songs of the Temple. Both these are pronounced against Babylon, as a part of that dreadful curse which God will pour out upon it, when his wrath comes to the utmost, Rev. 18. 22. The voice of harpers and musitians, and of pipers and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and the sound of the mill-stone shall be heard no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee: That is, O Babylon, there shall be no joyful voice any more at all in thee: Not the voice of musick; no, not the voice of a mill-stone. We have great cause to fear, that the joyful voice may suddenly be taken away, not only from our nights, but also from our dayes; not only from our houses, but also from our Temples: For the voice of sin hath been heard from both. Darkness hath begun to seize upon our light; the seed of division is not only sown, but sprung up among us; our troubles increase; yea, our joyful voice is already changed into the sound of the Trumpet, and the Alarm of War, into the neighings of Horses, and the confused noise of bloody Battels, Isa. 9. 5. And which may afflict our hearts more, we hear the mournful voice of the Widow crying out, My Husband, my Husband. We hear the mournful voice of the Orphan crying out, My Father, my Father. It is time for us to sit solitary and alone; to mourn every family apart, and our wives apart, (Zach. 12. 12.) to lift up our voice in prayer night and day, least the joyful voice be utterly taken away, and for ever silenced amongst us: Lest it be said of us as of Jerusalem, (Lam. 1. 1.) How doth the City sit solitary, that was full of people? How is she become as a widow? She that was great among the Nations, and Princes, among the Provinces, how is she become tributary? As that Heathen said of the time past, I had perished, if I had not perished: So we may say of the time to come; We shall mourn, if we do not mourn; we shall be solitary, if we sit not alone. Our nights of sinful joy in chambering and wantonness, have bereft us, and will bereave us more of refreshing joyes. And instead of the voice of friend and brother, you may hear only the voice of the enemy, and avenger: and that is no joyful voice. When Jacob was informed of the approach of Esau his bloody brother, he puts all things in order, and presently the Text saith, Jacob was left alone, Gen. 32. 24. What, deserted? did his company run from him? No, it was an elected solitariness, not a necessitated solitariness, he desired to be alone; and he staid alone, that he might not be alone: He staid alone, that he might get God nearer in communion with him and his; that his family might not be scattered from him, and his house left desolate. So, if we would be voluntarily alone, from the world, to be with God, wrastling out nights in prayer as Jacob did, we might (as he did) prevent solitary nights, and prevail with God by the voice of prayer, in the mediation of Jesus Christ, and the powerful cry of his blood, to continue unto us the voice of joy.

VERS. 8, 9.

Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up their mourning.
Let the Stars of the twi-light thereof be dark, let it look for light, but have none; neither let it see the dawning of the day.

IN the former verses, Job himself curseth the night; in this he inviteth others, to curse it; that his sorrow might appear not only serious, but solemn, he calleth for those who made mourning their profession, and to weep for and with others, their trade: such as used to rise early, and awaken their companions to come away, and joyn in prepared and studied lamentation. This I take to be the sum and sence of these words, which yet in the letter are very full of difficulty, and have divided Interpreters exceedingly. I shall briefly touch the most of those sences given, and then more fully present you with what I apprehend as sutable to this Text, and consonant unto Truth.

First, Take a brief of the divers readings of this verse. Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up their mourning: So we in our Bibles.

The vulgar and the Septuagint read it thus: Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up Leviathan.

Another renders the latter clause, Who are ready to raise up the Dragon. Theodot.

Mr. Broughton's translation runs thus; May they curse it who do curse the day, who will hunt Leviathan.

Junius and Tremelius, have a translation different from all these, I would they had cursed thee that inlighten the day, who are ready to stir up Leviathan, or the Whale. That which all other Interpreters I have met with, call cursing of the day, they call inlightning the day.

You see there is much variety about the rendring of these words out of the Hebrew. And there is as much diversity of opinion grounded thereupon.

First, Some apprehend, that Job in this verse alludes to the custom of a certain people in Ethiopia, called the Atlantes

Hi solem transcendentem exercantur, eique praeteria omnia convitia ingerunt quod torridus ipsos & regionem perdat, Herod l. 4. ad finem. Atlantes diris solis ortum excipiunt, Solin. c. 4. Polyhist. Atlantes & solem Orientem & Occidentem dira imprecatione contuentur, Plin. l. 5. c. 8. Pined in loc.

lantes, frequently mentioned in divers Hiſtories, who living under the torrid Zone, in an extream hot Climate, uſed to curſe the Sun when it aroſe, becauſe it ſcorched them with vehement heat: This made them in love with the night, and hate the day. And ſo the ſence is made out thus, Let them curſe this night, who uſe to curſe the Sun-riſing every day, whoſe pain heightning and imbittering their ſpirits, cauſed them to pour out the moſt bitter and revengeful execrations.

But I will lay this by, though ſome ſet much ſtore by it, as a ſpecial treaſure of invention: For I much queſtion, not only whether this cuſtom of curſing the day amongſt that people, was known unto Job, but whether he ever heard of ſuch a people, being ſo remote and diſtant from him.

Secondly, I ſhall a little open the meaning of that Tranſlation given by Junius, Let them curſe it who inlighten the day; who are ready to raiſe up Leviathan, or the Whale.

By thoſe who inlighten the day, he ſaith, the Stars are underſtood; Let thoſe curſe thee who inlighten the day; that is, let the Stars curſe thee: And who are ready to raiſe the Leviathan; that is, let the Winds be againſt thee; let the Winds curſe thee, or be a curſe unto thee. The reaſon he gives, is, becauſe Stars are (Illuſtratores Diei) the inlightners of the day: And to ſalve it, we muſt not (ſaith he) take the day ſtrictly for a day artificial, for then the Stars are of no uſe; but for that part of the day natural which is dark, namely, the night; the Stars are inlightners of the day, namely, of the dark part of the day, the night: And ſo Job calls here to the very Stars, that they ſhould oppoſe and trouble that night.

We read in that notable Hiſtory, Judg. 5. 20. That the Stars in their courſes fought againſt Siſera; ſuch expreſſions there are, making, as it were, the Heavens angry, the Stars to oppoſe the deſigns of men. The Hoſt of Heaven is under the command of the Lord of Hoſts, when he calls them forth to the help of his people. Thus he conceives Job inviting the Stars to take part with him in this quarrel againſt his night: Let the Stars curſe the day, thoſe inlightners of the day.

Then he underſtands by them that ſtir up Leviathan, the Winds; thoſe words (Who ſtir up Leviathan) are (ſaith he) a Periphraſis, or deſcription of the winds. The reaſon which he gives is, becauſe when great Winds ariſe, and blow ſtrongly, that mighty Fiſh, the Whale, or Leviathan, lying at the bottom of the Sea, by the motion of the waters is rouſed and ſtirred up, and ſo mounts to the ſuperficies or top of the water, or appears above it. Thus the Winds raiſe up Leviathan. His ſence from both is, that Job ſets the Stars and the Winds againſt this night, and bids them combine to make it troubleſome and tempeſtuous. This Opinion, for the reverence of the Authors name, deſerveth to be looked upon with reſpect; but I ſhould not (neither do I) apprehend that to be the meaning of Job in this place.

Thirdly, The difficulty is reſolved by making theſe words an alluſion to Fiſher-men, as if Job here did but deſcribe the condition of thoſe, or ſhew what by accident doth befall thoſe, whoſe trade and art is to catch Leviathan, or the Whale. Theſe take the word Leviathan in the proper ſence, for that mighty Fiſh deſcribed in the 41. of this Book of Job, Canſt thou draw out Leviathan with an hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou letteſt down? &c.

Adjunctus, ſociatus unde Leviathã triſſyllabum cum affixo. Qui hujuſmodi magnos piſces piſcantur, de nocte eos invadunt in tenebris, & ideo quando dies incipit apparere maledicunt diei, quia per hoc eorũ opus & intentio impeditur. Aquinas in loc.

Leviathan is derived from Lavah, which ſignifieth joyned or coupled together; whence (to note it by the way) the word Levi, or the name of the third Son which Jacob had by Leah. She called his name Levi, For now, ſaith ſhe, will my Husband be joyned unto me, becauſe I have born him three ſons, Gen. 29. 34. The ſame reaſon is given, why that dreadful Fiſh is called Leviathan. His deſcription clears this, Job 41. 15. His ſcales are his pride, ſhut up together as with a cloſe ſeal; one is ſo near to another, that no air can come between them, they are joyned one to another, they ſtick together that they cannot be ſundered. He hath his name Leviathan, from the cloſe-joyning or compactedneſs of the ſcales, that cover or harneſs him like an impenitrable armour of proof. Now taking the word thus properly for the Fiſh Leviathan, Job is conceived to allude to the cuſtom of thoſe who hunt for the Whale: who obſerving the night to be moſt advantagious for that work, are troubled at the approach of light; and therefore the Fiſher-men, as ſoon as ever they ſaw day begin to break, curſed the day, as an enemy to their ſucceſs in purſuing and killing the Whale. That fiſhing is a buſineſs of the night, is evident from the ſpeech of Peter to our Saviour Chriſt, (Luke 5. 5.) Maſter we have fiſhed all night, and have taken nothing. According to which alluſion, the meaning of Job muſt be; As if he had ſaid, I will not ſtrive any longer for words to expreſs my paſſion againſt this night; let it be blaſted with the curſe of thoſe who are moſt skilful in the dialect or language of execrations; even with ſuch a curſe as thoſe ſea-hunters, the fiſhermen, uſe to pour forth upon the day, when it breaks too ſoon for their profit, ſo that they are hindred in catching of Leviathan, or the Whale.

There is a Proverb amongſt us, If you ſwear, or curſe, you will catch no fiſh: And it ſeems theſe were wont to ſwear and curſe when they could not catch. And hence it was a Proverb in other Countries, when they would ſet out an enormious ſwearer, or one given to prophane curſing, they ſaid, He ſweareth, or he curſeth like a fiſher-man: A generation of men whom that age had branded on the tongue, whoſe mouths were full of curſings, and their ordinary diſcourſe, as much oaths as words.

Piſcatore aut nauta maledicentior.

But againſt this expoſition experience is objected; that the uſual time of fiſhing for the Whale, is in the day, not in the night. If it be ſo, then the ground of this opinion is quite overthrown. That ſome kind of fiſhing is a night work, the words and practice of Peter before mentioned, are proof enough: Whether Whale-fiſhing were exerciſed in the night, I ſhall not much contend to prove, ſeeing I approve but little of that interpretation which is bottomed and built upon it.

Beſides, I find others, who ſticking to this tranſlation, (the ſtirring of Leviathan) do yet wave and paſs by this conceit of night-fiſhing: And they ſay that the curſe here, is not to be referred to their rage againſt the light, becauſe it brings the day; but to the day, becauſe it brought them no ſucceſs. So that, day is not oppoſed to night; but a good or ſucceſsful day, to a bad or ſucceſſleſs day of fiſhing. And then the ſence is to this effect, that Job calls for ſuch a curſe upon this day, as prophane fiſher-men, who attempt to catch the Whale, uſually ſpend upon that unhappy day wherein they looſe their labour, and after all their hazard and coſt come home empty.

Piſcatores diei maledicunt in quo iis non accidit bonus piſcatus

And when it is objected againſt this Opinion; Why doth Job mention Leviathan, or the Whale, if that be his meaning, to allude unto the ſinful paſſion of diſappointed fiſher-men; for vain men, in that employment, are as apt to curſe and be paſſionate, when they miſs of their intendments in labouring to catch any kind of fiſh?

To this anſwer may be given in two things. Firſt, this buſineſs of fiſhing for the Whale, is a buſineſs of great charge, and greater danger: and becauſe greateſt loſſes raiſe greateſt paſſions, and the higher our diſappointments are, the higher is our language; therefore Job, who intended here the higheſt and greateſt curſe, wiſhes it parallel with that, which the greateſt curſers belch forth, when (as they pretend) they have greateſt occaſions, yea (as they call reaſon) reaſon to curſe: And who ſhould theſe be but ignorant, or idolatrous fiſher-men, and they at ſuch a pinch, when they have loſt the hope of their greateſt gain. As if Job had ſaid, let as big a curſe fall upon that night, as ever fell from the mouths of thoſe prophane fiſhers, not only when they have been ſucceſſleſs in fiſhing for a Herring, or a Sprat, but when, after all their pains and coſt, they cannot take Leviathan. Micah's Mother curſed, when the eleven hundred ſhekels of ſilver were ſtollen from her, Judg. 17. 1, 2. To looſe what we hope for, vexes corrupt nature as much as the loſs of what we have. They who have no treaſure in Heaven, and to whom godlineſs is not more then earthly gain, cannot but be enraged, when the hope of their gain is gone upon the earth.

Secondly, We may ſay, he nameth the Leviathan by a Synechdoche, one principal for all, or for any: The chiefeſt of a kind is put for all the kind: And then it is appliable to thoſe ſea-hunters, whatſoever game they purſue. I ſhall touch one way more of illuſtrating the Opinion of thoſe, who take Leviathan in this Text for the Whale. We may conceive it thus, that Job doth not here allude to fiſhing for the Whale, and ſo to that ſucceſſleſs fiſhing which provokes to curſing. But take it in the general: The Whale (we know) know) is a very formidable monster to Sea-men, and Marriners, the whole ship with the lading of it, and all their lives being endangered if a Whale strike it. So we may understand that of Job, speaking of Leviathan, Chap. 41.25. When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are affraid. Now the Whale being so formidable and dangerous to Seamen; they perceiving the Whale near them, or themselves at unawares ready to stir up or raise the Whale, are exceedingly afraid; And as great fear in some sets them a praying, and causeth strong prayers, so fear in others sets them a cursing, and causeth strong curses. Prophane marriners, seeing themselves in such imminent danger by the approach of the Whale, presently curse the day that ever they loosed anchor or set sail from the Harbour; the day that ever they fell within the reach of this sea-monster, now ready to sink their vessel, and overwhelm them all. Such a curse Job wishes upon that night, the night of his conception, as men of this rank conceive and bring forth in the day of their most pressing fears, when anguish and sorrow take hold of them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they cannot escape.

Thus I have given you the sum of those apprehensions which are offered for the making up of this Exposition; namely, That the word is here to be taken for that mighty fish Leviathan; And that either in respect of those who make it their business and go out purposely to catch Leviathan, or of those who unawares are ready to be catcht by Leviathan: The former disappointed of their hopes, and the latter surprized with fears, making a curse their refuge, and easing themselves by execrations.

There is a fourth opinion which giveth the sense of these words quite another way, though it retains the same translation. For passing by the allusion to fishing or customes of fishermen, they make these words as a character or description of the extreamest and vilest of wicked men; as if Job saying, Let them curse thee that curse the day, who are ready to stir up Leviathan, had said, let the worst or most wicked among the children of men curse this night; And we know, that the worst of men are most for cursing, they curse deepest; as the best of men are most for prayer, and they pray highest and holiest. So then, Jobs mind being to lay the forest curse upon this night, thinks or finds his own spirit too straight, his own heart not large enough to do it; therefore he doth (as it were) call in aid from those Masters of cursing, Let the most expert, the most skill'd in cursing, such as are verst in oathes and blasphemies, the very dregs and scum of men, let them poure out the dregs, the worst, the bittrest of their curses upon that night.

But how shall we make out this notion, that the vilest of men are here described? That we must consider and open further, to shew the substance and dependance of this opinion.

The worst and wickedest of men are conceived to be here meant in two expressions.

First, by them who are said to curse the day, Let them curse it who curse the day.

Secondly, in these words, Who are ready to raise up Leviathan. Both these are supposed as descriptive circumlocutions of the most wicked and vilest men.

How so?

First, They that curse the day. That which a man hates, he is forward enough to curse: Wicked men love darkness, and they hate the light, therefore they curse the light. Light is of two sorts, either natural, that of the Sun; or metaphorical that of knowledge. Take light either way; take light properly for the natural light: or take light improperly for the light or the day of knowledge, wicked men, and especially the worst of wicked men, will be found cursers of the day. First, They are so expresst in this book of Job, respecting the natural day, chap. 24. where having described many acts of violence committed by cruel oppressors, who know not God, vers. 1. he concludes, vers. 13. They are of those that rebel against the light, they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the pathes thereof. And vers. 16. In the dark they dig through houses which they had marked out for themselves in the day time, they know not the light, for the morning is to them even as the shadow of death: If one know them, they are in the terrours of the shadow of death. Men, to whom the morning is a terrour, and light as the shadow of death, cannot but curse the day, whose approach hinders them in their night-works, in their black designs and purposes. Secondly, Other Scriptures discover more deadly hatred in wicked men against the light of knowledge; they rebel more against the day of grace then against the day of nature, or the natural day: The former hinders only the outward practise of sin, but this opposes the inward principles of sin. We see what cold entertainment, yea what war this light found in the world, and why, (John 3.19, 20.) Light is come into the world, (that is, Christ and the knowledge of his wayes) and men (not men in general, but ungodly men) loved darkness rather then light; Why? Because their deeds were evil, (evil deeds, and evil doers seek covert in this darkness) for every one that doth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, least his deeds should be reproved. They are ignorant willingly, that they may sin more freely: For though they are resolved to sin in and against the light of knowledge, yet they had rather sin in, and with the darkness of ignorance; no man can sin with so much ease and delight in this light, as he can in darkness. A man that hath light in his understanding, can hardly sin without smart upon his conscience: Hence they who love sin hate knowledge. On this ground it is as clear as the day, that wicked men are (Lucifugæ) such as avoid, shun and hate the day, no marvel then if they curse the day; And to be angry with, or curse, the day, is an evidence (as clear as the day) of a wicked man. He that desires not to know the truth, hath no desire to practise it; and he who hates the knowledge of the truth, hates the practise of it; yea he therefore hates knowledge, because he hates practice: The is wickedness at the height. To commit a sin against light, is not so great an argument of an evil heart, as to be troubled at the light which rebukes or would prevent the committing of that sin. Thus we see in what sense, by those who curse the day, we may understand the worst of wicked men.

But for the second part, [Who are ready to raise up Leviathan.] How is this a description of wicked men?

To make out this, we must expound Leviathan, not properly for the Whale, but improperly and mystically for the Devil, that great Leviathan: Under which name, he with all spiritual wickednesses, the opposers of Christ and of his Church are comprehended by the Prophet (Isa. 27.1.) In that day the Lord with his sore great and strong sword shall punish Leviathan, the piercing serpent, even Leviathan the crooked serpent, and he shall slay the Dragon in the sea. Now they that raise up this mystical Leviathan the Devil, are surely the vilest men.

But who do thus? or how can this be done?

They are said to raise up Leviathan, who seek occasions of sinning, such as do not stay till Satan tempts them, but they (as it were) tempt Satan. They are so hasty, so forward to do evil, that they think the Devil comes not fast enough, and therefore they do even go out to meet, provoke and raise up the Devil, they invite temptation: There is a truth in this, All sins are not from the temptations of Satan; our own hearts are not only the soil, and have in them the seed of all sin; but they are sun and rain, to warm and water those seeds that they may grow. And as a godly man (from the new principle at first planted in him by the holy Ghost) doth often stir up the holy Ghost to come and help him, he doth not alwayes stay till the holy Ghost sensibly comes, but finding his own weakness and wants, and deadness to and in duty, he goeth and stirreth up the spirit of God, and prayeth that the holy Ghost would breath upon him, quicken and enliven him in prayer and other holy duties. So many ungodly wretches do not stay for Satan, or wait till he comes to tempt them, but they (such is their desperate wickedness and delight in sin) wish that he would tempt them ofter. They do not only keep open house, and open heart for him, ready to entertain and welcome him when he comes, but they go forth to solicit his company and his coming. This is to stir up Leviathan.

Illi parati sunt suscitare Leviathan, qui student ad suggestiones diaboli implendas, Aquin. in loc. Qui sibi ipsis occasiones quærunt peccandi elegantèr dicuntur suscitare diabolum.

So that the whole sense according to this exposition may be given to you thus, as if Job had said, Let this night be cursed with a grievous curse, even with as black and foul a curse as can be moulded and fashioned in the heart, or spit out out of the mouthes of the vilest miscreants, even of such as are so set upon sin, that they hate the light and curse the day which either the Sun makes in the air, or which knowledge makes in their hearts, lest that should stop and hinder them in the acting of sin; yea let such a curse be upon it, as they use to vomit out, who are so set upon mischief, and engaged to their lusts, that they pray in aid from the Devil, to assist and quicken them in their wickedness; that so their natural corruptions being oyled and smoothed with his temptations, their motions to sin (and indeed to Hell) may be swifter and more violent. These are they that give diligence to make their damnation sure: These are they from whom the kingdom of Hell suffers violence, and these violent ones (rather then not have it) will take it by force. Surely their damnation sleeps not, who (least they should not sin enough) awaken the Devil to shew them sinning opportunities. To such as these (according to the interpretation now suggested) Job commits his night to cursing, Let them curse it who curse the day, &c.

Now though there be a truth in the things which are asserted in this opinion, taken abstractedly; though it be a truth that wicked men are such as curse the day of air-light, and the day of knowledge-light; though they are often so mad to be sinning, that they provoke and tempt the Devil, yet I will not give this for the sense and meaning of the words: rather you may take it and make use of it as an Allegory upon, then an Exposition of, the Text.

The last opinion, with which I shall conclude the opening of the words, is this: That Job in this verse, doth allude to the custom of his own countrey, and of other Eastern Countries, who had certain persons amongst them, both men and women, whom, upon solemn occasions either of joy or sorrow, they were wont to hire or call in for reward, to come and help them out either in rejoycing or in mourning. We find mention of such in Scripture divers times, who were thus called and invited or hired to mourn and lament, in times of sad and sorrowful accidents, whether personal or publick. These had (Lacrimas venales) tears to sell, or sale-tears, making both a profession and a profit of mourning. Such the Prophet speaks of, Jer. 9. 17, 18. Thus saith the Lord, Consider ye, and call for the mourning women, (he speaks of them as of a society or sister-hood well known, and as well custom'd) and cunning women, that they may come, (that is, women cunning in mourning.) And let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that our eyes may run down with tears, and our eye-lids gush forth with waters: for a voyce of wailing is heard out of Zion, How are we spoiled? And vers. 20. Teach your daughters wailing, and every one her neighbour Lamentation; (you see it was an art taught amongst them,) for death is come up into our windows, &c. In 2 Chron. 35. 25. We have a record to the same effect, concerning the lamentation for Josiah. And Jeremiah lamented for Josiah, and all the singing-men and singing-women spake of Josiah in their lamentations to this day. So that there were both men and women prepared and usually called forth to lament such occasions of sorrow. Again, Amos 5. 16. Therefore the Lord, the God of Hosts, the Lord saith thus, wailing shall be in all streets, and they shall say in all the high-ways, Alas, Alas! And they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skilful of lamentation to wailing. Observe here different mourners, they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skilful of lamentation to wailing. You see he speaks of two sorts of persons, they shall call the husbandman to mourning; Husbandmen are such as mourn when they mourn, when they mourn, they mourn indeed, they mourn down-right; but besides these who mourned (Ex animo) really, there was another sort who did but personate sorrow, and act a part in grief; so saith the Prophet, Call in some who are skilful of lamentation, men or women who have studied the point, and know how to move a passion, and to heighten an affection beyond that which the plain husbandman can do; Let the husbandman mourn, but besides that, let there be art and solemnity in the mourning, call in those that are skilful of Lamentation. There was a kind of profession, trade or art of mourning; which is further evidenced, (2 Sam. 14. 2.) Joab sent to Tekoah to fetch thence a wise woman, (which is interpreted in the words following, to be a woman skilful in lamentation,) and said unto her, I pray thee fain thy self to be a mourner: Thou art a cunning woman, thou knowest how to act the part and postures of a mourner to the life, Go to David, and fain thy self to be a mourner, and as a woman that had a long time mourned for the dead. And it is observed to this day in many places, (and as I have been informed frequently in Ireland) that not only friends and neighbours are called to lament at the funeral of their friends and neighbours, but many others no way related, scarce ever known to the person deceased, who come professedly to strain for tears, and make lamentable out-cryes over the dead. To such a custome or profession Job here alluding, saith, Let them curse it who curse the day.

If it be objected, that this Text speaks of such as curse the day, and not of such as mourn upon or bemoan the day. That is easily removed, because upon those days of mourning, they were wont to mix execrations with their lamentations, and curses with their tears: crying out, oh the day! alas for the day! oh that ever such a day came! In the thirtieth of Ezekiel, vers. 2. The Lord saith, Son of man, propheste and say, thus saith the Lord God, howl ye, wo worth the day. These did curse the day: and such were hired in that sense to curse the day. As Balaam (who loved the wages of unrighteousness) was hired to curse the people of God, Numb. 22. So then the cursing here meant, was a doleful wish, that the day had not been, or that such things had not happened upon that day: And so these words, Let them curse it who curse the day, who are ready to raise up their mourning, are only a circumlocution, describing those mercenary cursers or mourners: As if Job had in more words said thus, Let this night be cursed in as high a strain, and mourned over with as enlarged sorrows, as the art and invention of those, whose trade is cursing, and who have tears at command, ever did or can put forth, when hired on purpose to mourn over the saddest spectacles and most calamitous events.

Now this being taken for a ground-work, that in those times and Countries, men and women were hired to mourn, and that an art of mourning was then profest; the difficulties that are in the Text opposing this, are further to be examined: For here still it seemeth doubtful, how this word Leviathan can fall in with such an interpretation, or be applied to those hired and professed mourners. Towards the clearing of which, I shall a little open three words.

The first is (Gnatidim) who are ready: which signifies a prepared and meditated active readiness; as we find in two Texts of the Book of Hester, The copie of the writing for a commandment to be given in every Province, was published unto all people, that they should be ready against that day, chap. 3. 14. and again, chap. 8. 13. So that in Job, to be ready to raise up their mourning, notes more then an immediate going about a thing; As we say, I am ready to do a thing, that is, I will or must do it presently: For it notes also a studied readiness or preparedness to do a thing.

The second word is (Gnour) to raise up, which is properly to raise from sleep, as in that place, Psal. 44. 23. Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord? Arise, cast us not off for ever.

The third word is (Leviathan) which hath two other significations, both appliable to this interpretation.

First, Divers of the Rabbins translate it by the Hebrew word (Ebel,) which signifies mourning or sorrow; and with the pronoun affixed, their sorrow or their mourning. And this is asserted by the learned Mercer, for the plainest meaning of the word, and so found in the writings of the Hebrew Doctors, which also directly answers our translation, who are ready to raise up their mourning.

Secondly, The word (Leviathan) is derived (according to the opinion of others) from Lavah, i.e. joyned or associated. Hence Leviath, i. e. society or fellowship: to which the same pronoune being affixed, the word Leviathan is made up, and according to that extraction and composition, is rendred (societatem suam) their society or their company. And the word in this derivation and construction of it, falls in with the sense of the former interpretation, who are ready to raise and stir up their company, namely to go forth and mourn, or their company of mourners. And the reason is two-fold, why they are, or may be, said to raise up their company of mourners.

First, Because those solemn mourners were usually a great many, common expectation. It is noted as an aggravation of that peoples affliction in the Prophet, We looked for peace, and behold, no good came; and for a time of health, and behold trouble, Jer. 8. 15. For a people to be in expectation of ſome great mercy, doubles the ſorrow of their miſcarriage: Now in theſe times, we being in our night of trouble, and (as it were) looking when day will break, when our peace will return, when truth will prevail and be ſetled, when error and the abettors of it ſhall be overthrown: How would it augment our ſorrows, if we, looking for theſe mercies, ſhould not have them? As it is a greater affliction to be miſerable to be miſerable, when we have been happy; ſo when we have long hoped to be happy. God expreſſes himſelf, as much troubled, when he loſes his expectation from us: It provokes the Spirit of God to anger againſt us, when he looks for the fruits of his care and love in our obedience, and findeth none (Iſa. 5.) God looked that his vineyard ſhould have brought forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes. He looked for judgment, and behold oppreſſion; for righteouſneſs, & behold a cry: This diſappointment provoked the Lord to lay his vineyard waſte. So in the Goſpel, when Chriſt cometh to the fig-tree three years ſeeking or looking for fruit, and findeth none: What then? Cut it down, ſaith Chriſt; he is very angry, thus miſſing his expectation. Now, as it provokes the anger of God to come looking upon man, his creature, for duty, and finds none; ſo it doth likewiſe exceedingly grieve the ſpirit of man, when he looks to God for mercy, and finds none. And how juſt is it, that God ſhould croſs our expectation, when we ſo often croſs his. No marvel if we look for light, and behold darkneſs; for peace, and behold trouble; for ſucceſs, and behold diſappointments: whenas God looks upon us for repentance, and behold preſumption; for faith, and behold unbelief; for patience, and behold complaining; for reformation, and behold backſliding; for fruit, and behold barrenneſs, or but leaves.

Solent in luctu voce flebili, & lacertis manibus verberantes ad lachrymas populũ provocare. Hic enim mos permanet in Judea, ut mulieres sparsis crinibus nuditisq; pectoribus voce modulata omnes ad fletum concitent. Hieron. in c. 9. Jerem.

Exposui cũ Hebræis Leviathan simpliciter, pro אבלם luctum suũ, ut sit Nun pro Mem, sicut alias hæc confundi videas. Quo significatu in scriptis doctorum Hebræorum occurrit, & ex lingua Syriaca Sumptũ est vicinum nomini, אליא sic & Chaldæus vertit. Simplicissimum est Leviathan pro luctu exponere cum Hebræis, Mere.

Fourthly, He ſaith, Let it not ſee the dawning of the day, that is, let it be quite out of hope ever to receive any light; therefore let it not ſee ſo much as a glimpſe of light. It is the ſtrongeſt denial of the whole, to deny the leaſt of the firſt part: As when the Apoſtle would have us abſtain from all evil, he exhorts us to abſtain from the appearance of evil (1 Theſ. 5.) So here, when Job would put his night quite out of hope to ſee the day, he ſaith, Let it not ſee (ſo much as) the dawning (that is, the leaſt appearance) of the day. And this, as it is the laſt, ſo the heavieſt ſentence upon his night. Hence obſerve,

That, A hopeleſs condition is the worſt condition of all other.

Let a night be never ſo dark, never ſo tempeſtuous, yet the hope of a morning is a mercy and a light. A man will bear any heavineſs, when he can ſay as David, Heavineſs may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. Solomon tells us, that the hope deferred makes the heart ſick, Prov. 13. 12. How ſick then are they who are hopeleſs, or, who have quite loſt their hope? Everlaſtingneſs is the head of the arrow, the ſting and poiſon of all miſeries, it is indeed the ſting of Hell; that hell is ſuch a night as never ſhall ſee the dawning of the day, hath more torment and pain in it, then all the pains in hell. As the puniſhment of loſs in hell, pinches more then the puniſhment of ſenſe, ſo in the loſs, this pinches moſt that the loſs is irrecoverable: They are deprived of the glory of God, and ſhall never ſee the leaſt ray of it for ever; they are in darkneſs, and they have no hope of light at all for ever.

As that which makes heaven ſo full of joy, is, that heaven is above all fear; ſo that which makes hell ſo full of terror, is, that hell is below all hope; heaven is a day which ſhall never ſee any approaches of night, and hell is a night that ſhall never ſee any dawnings of the day. So, proportionably in any affliction of this life, to be hopeleſs of deliverance, to ſay it ſhall never have end, I am in ſuch a night as ſhall have no day. no, not the dawning of a day, this is the utmoſt evil, the extremity of affliction.

So much concerning the curſe it ſelf, which Job powred out with ſo much paſſion, both againſt the day of his birth, and the night of his conception. We ſhall now here ſee the reaſon of this paſſion, in the words which follow.

VERS. 10, 11, 12, 13.

Becauſe it ſhut not up the doors of my mothers womb, nor hid ſorrow from mine eyes.
Why died not I from the womb? why did I not give up the ghoſt when I came out of the belly?
Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breſts, that I ſhould ſuck?
For now ſhould I have lien ſtill, and been quiet, I ſhould have ſlept; then had I been at reſt.

WE are now come to the ſecond general part of this Chapter. You may remember, the whole was divided into three Sections. The firſt ſhewed us the curſe which Job powred out upon his day. The ſecond, The cauſe or ground of that curſe. And the third, A vehement expoſtulation about the continuance of his life, and the lengthning of his dayes.

We have heard the curſe opened already in the nine former verſes, now followeth the cauſe of the curſe. Job gives an account or reaſon of his paſſion: If any ſhould check him with, Why doſt thou thus breath out complaints againſt the day of thy birth? why doſt thou write ſuch bitter things againſt the night of thy conception? he anſwered as David did his brethren, in another caſe, 1 Sam. 17. Why, what have I done or ſpoken? is there not a cauſe? Or, as Jonah, when God reproves him about his paſſion for the withered gourd; Doſt thou well to be angry? Jonah replies, yes, I do well to be angry, even unto death, chap. 4. 9. So ſaith Job here to any that ſhould rebuke him with, do you well to be thus angry with your day? yes, I do well to be angry with my day, and I ſhew you why; becauſe it ſhut not up the doors of my mothers womb, &c.

The reaſon of the argument ſtands thus; There is cauſe I ſhould curſe that day and that night, which not hindring my conception or my birth, brought me forth upon the ſtage of the world, to act a part in all theſe ſorrows; but the day and the night did not hinder my conception or my birth, therefore I have cauſe, I have reaſon enough to break out in ſuch complaints, and curſe them: I do it, becauſe theſe ſhut not up the doors of my mothers womb. This is the argument or reaſon by which he defers his paſſion; and this argument will be found to have more paſſion in it, then reaſon, if we examine it to the bottom. For he complains of that as the cauſe, which was not the cauſe of his troubles: what did the night or the day, that he thus chargeth them? they had no efficiency in bringing thoſe evils upon him; circumſtances are not cauſes: Effects are produced in time, but time doth not produce effects; only this we may ſay to help it, he doth not curſe the day, as if he could have ſhut the doors of his mothers womb, but becauſe on that day thoſe doors were not ſhut.

But leaving the reaſon of his ſpeech, we will conſider the ſence of it.

The Hebrew word for word is thus rendred, Becauſe it ſhut not up the doors of my belly. And that the Chaldee Paraphraſt renders thus by way of explanation, becauſe it did not ſhut up the doors of my lips; the mouth (ſaith he) being (as it were) the door or the in-let to the belly or ſtomach, every thing goeth in by that door; and ſo he carries the ſence thus, let that night be curſed, becauſe it did not ſtop my breath, and ſo make an end of me. The Septuagint hath it thus, Becauſe it ſhut not up [the doors of my mothers belly) which anſwers our Tranſlation, the doors of my mothers womb. Mr. Broughton to the ſame ſence; Becauſe it ſhut not up the door of the belly that did bear me, that is, my mothers belly.

Quia non cluſit portas maxillarum mearum, quæ ſunt oſtia ventris.

πύλας γαστρὸς μητρὸς μου. Sept.

I ſhall in ſilence paſs over that ſecret or myſtery in nature, which may be the ground of this expreſſion. There are two ſecrets in Divinity, which are the grounds of it; and of them I ſhall ſpeak.

The firſt is this, When God layes that affliction of barrenneſs upon the woman, he, according to the phraſe of Scripture, is ſaid to ſhut up the womb; and when he ſendeth the bleſſing of fruitfulneſs, he is ſaid to open the womb. We have both, Gen. 20. 18. When Abimelech had taken Sarah, Abraham's wife, the Lord faſt cloſed up all the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech. The meaning of it is this, he made all the women barren; or with-held the bleſſing of conception; tion; the Jewiſh Expoſitors render the meaning of the very words of this Text, that the Lord had ſhut up all the doors of the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech. And ſo likewiſe for fruitfulneſs God is ſaid to open the womb, as Gen. 29. 31. And when the Lord ſaw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb; but Rachel was barren. Then, to ſhut the doors of the womb, notes the power of God in denying; and to open thoſe doors, the bleſſing of God in giving conception and making fruitful.

Secondly, It may refer to the birth: for, there muſt be an opening of thoſe doors, and that by an Almighty power, for production as well as for conception, and therefore David (Pſal. 22. 9.) aſcribes it to the Lord; Lord thou art he who tookeſt me out of my mothers womb. It was not the Midwife did it; it was not the womens help that ſtood about his mother, But Lord thou didſt it: The hand of God only is able to open that door and let man into the world: Unleſs he (as we may ſo ſpeak) turn the key, the poor Infant muſt for ever lye in priſon, and make his mothers womb his grave.

In either or both theſe reſpects Job here ſpeaks againſt the night, becauſe it ſhut not up the door of his mothers womb, to ſtop his conception, or ſtay him in the birth: For then, either he had not been, or he had not been brought forth as the ſubject of all thoſe calamities.

Hence obſerve, firſt, That fruitfulneſs or conception is the ſpecial work and bleſſing of God.

God carries the key of the womb in his own hand. From him we receive life and breath, (Acts 17. 25.) yea in his book are all our members written, which in continuance were faſhioned, when as yet there was none of them: We are fearfully and wonderfully made: Our ſubſtance is not hid from God, when we are made in ſecret, and curiouſly wrought in the loweſt parts of the earth. As the holy Ghoſt admirably and moſt elegantly deſcribes the conception and formation of man in the womb, Pſal. 139. 14, 15, 16.

There are four keyes in nature, all kept in the hand of God.

Firſt, The key of the Rain. The Clouds cannot open themſelves, the Flood gates of Heaven cannot be unlocked, nor thoſe ſluces opened to let down a drop of Rain, until God turn the key, Deut. 28. 12. The Lord ſhall open unto thee his good treaſure, the Heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his ſeaſon.

Secondly, The key of Nutrition, or of Food, Pſal. 145. 16. Thou openeſt thy hand and ſatisfieſt the deſire of every living thing. The ſtrength of the creature is ſhut up in the hand of God, and until he unlock his hand; the creatures cannot ſtrengthen or nouriſh us, though we have our houſes and our hands full of them.

Thirdly, The key of the Grave, Ezek. 37. 13. I will open your graves, and cauſe you to come out of your graves. We are ſo faſt lockt up in death, that all the power in the world is not able to releaſe us, till God ſpeak the word, and turn the key of the Graves door. That place in Ezekiel is meant (I know) of a civil death: But it is as true of natural death: And the argument is ſtronger for it: If when a Nation (as the Nation of the Jews then did) lyes in the grave of bondage and captivity, no man can unlock that door without the key of Gods ſpecial providence; much leſs can any hand or power, but his, open the door, and bring us out of the grave of our corporal diſſolution.

There is this fourth key, belonging to the door ſpoken of in the Text, The door of the womb: Which was ſhadowed in that Ceremonial Law among the Jews, of giving their firſt-born unto God, as a thankful acknowledgment, that the beginning of all propagation and increaſe was from him.

Further obſerve, That our birth and production is the ſpecial work of God.

Thou art he that tookeſt me out of my mothers womb, (ſaith David.) And he apprehended the power of God, ſo great in his natural birth, that he from thence takes an argument to ſtrengthen his faith, that God could do any other thing for him, how hard ſoever. He knew he could never be in ſuch ſtraights, but the power of God could deliver him, when he once remembred that it was God who took him out of his mothers womb: For in the words immediately fore-going, he bringeth in his enemies laughing at, yea reproaching him, and ſaying, He truſted in God that he would deliver him, let him deliver him, ſeeing he delighted in him: They jeer him with his God, Let him deliver him. David anſwers, What do you think God cannot deliver me? Lord (ſaith he) thou art he that tookeſt me out of my Mothers womb. Can I ever be in ſuch ſtraights as I was then? Can I be ever in a more helpleſs condition? Can I ever be in more need of an Almighty help, then when I was ſtrugling to get into the world? There is more of the power of God put forth in bringing a poor Infant into the world, then in bringing him out of any trouble or ſtraight he can fall into, in his travels through the world: And hence the great deliverances of a people from danger, and their reformations from error, are called a birth, as King Hezekiah ſpeaks in his meſſage to Iſaiah, 2 Kings 19. 4. The children are come to the birth, and there is no ſtrength to bring forth. As if he had ſaid, Great things are now attempted, but nothing can be perfected: Great troubles are diſcovered, but we cannot be delivered by any humane power or policy: Therefore lift up a prayer for the remnant that is left. Every new deliverance and reformation of a Church is a new birth of that Church. Who hath heard ſuch a thing? who hath ſeen ſuch things? ſhall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or ſhall a nation be born at once? for as ſoon as Zion travelled, ſhe brought forth her children. That is, Sions mercies were ſpeedily and ſuddenly obtained. She uſes to have long travail and many throes, but now the mighty power of God opened the door of the womb, a door of hope, and Sion was eaſily delivered of a man-child. A glorious mercy, Iſa. 66. 8. You ſee how the holy Ghoſt parallels the working of great things for the Church, to the travail of a woman; whoſe Infant ſticks in the birth, if God ſuſpend his help; but if he open the door by a hand of gracious providence, ſhe brings forth, Even before ſhe travails, (as the ſame Prophet ſpeaks,) and before ſhe is in pain ſhe is delivered. I have adventured to lengthen out this notion ſomewhat further then that hint in the Text doth well bear, only becauſe we being a people now in ſtrong travail, and wanting ſtrength to bring forth, may be directed to conſider whoſe hand holds the key, which opens the womb of Nations as well as perſons, and at the turning of whoſe hand, we ſhall quickly be delivered; and being delivered, we ſhall quickly forget all our pains and pangs, for joy that a man-child, ſuch a maſculine bleſſing, is born into the world. But the Text goes on ſtill in tears. As follows.

Nor hid ſorrow from mine eyes.

The word which we tranſlate ſorrow, ſignifies more properly labour, and wearineſs, or the wearineſs that doth ariſe from labour, and ſo from thence it is tranſlated to ſignifie any kind of ſorrow or trouble.

Becauſe it hid not ſorrow from mine eyes.] By the hiding of ſorrow from his eyes, he noteth only thus much, that he ſhould have been delivered from the ſenſe and experience of ſorrow. He had miſt thoſe evils which he met with, ſince his coming into the world, if thoſe doors being ſhut, had ſhut him out of the world. When ſorrow is hid from our eyes, then all evil is removed; as in that ſpeech, (Iſa. 65. 16.) Becauſe the former troubles are forgotten, becauſe they are hidden from mine eyes; that is, as if he had ſaid, we fear no trouble, no danger, no evil hangs over our heads; now the former evils are forgotten, they are hidden from mine eyes: As we uſe to ſay of great dangers, that they are imminent dangers; they hang over our heads, or hang before our eyes; becauſe they lye ſo near, and are in ſuch readineſs to oppreſs and fall upon us.

Now when Job ſubjoyneth ſorrow to his birth; as if as ſoon as ever the doors were open for him to ſtep into the world, the firſt object he met with was trouble, and he was ſaluted by ſorrow as ſoon as ever he ſaw the light.

Obſerve, That man is born to ſorrow.

He ſees ſorrow the firſt thing he ſees. Sorrow is the firſt acquaintance. The connexion is very cloſe, Becauſe it ſhut not up the doors of the womb, nor hid ſorrow from mine eyes. Eliphaz tells us (chap. 5. 7.) That man is born unto trouble, as the ſparks fly upward. He is born to it; the expreſſion implyes, that trouble and ſorrow take hold of us, and we enter upon, and take hold of trouble, as ſoon as ever we enter upon the world, we are born to them; trouble and ſor-row are a mans inheritance; as an Heir is born to his land or eſtate. Man hath a right to thoſe troubles; they are his birth-right, and all his birth-right by nature; and as ſoon as ever he is born, he takes poſſeſſion of ſorrow, or ſorrow poſſeſſes him. Many a man is born to riches, and a great eſtate, but he ſtayeth a great while for the poſſeſſion of them; man is born to trouble, and he enters upon that as ſoon as ever he enters the world; ſorrow is not his inheritance in reverſion, but in poſſeſſion; Even as the ſparks fly upward; that explains it to be ſo, as the ſons of the Coal, (ſo the Hebrew) that is, ſparks, as ſoon as ever they are born out of the coal, fly upward, and are preſently aſcending; ſo is man tending unto trouble. Few and evil have the dayes of the years of my life been, ſaith Jacob, (Gen. 47.9.) How few ſoever they have been, they have been evil: if his life had been but one day, that had been an evil day. If his life had not been lengthened to the leaſt number of dayes, yet his evils had multiplied to a number: in few hours we have many ſorrows.

Some make the Infants tears a preſage of theſe ſorrows, as if he wept to think upon what a ſhore of troubles he is landed: Or rather, into what a Sea of ſtorms he is lanching, when he comes into the world; ſuch ſtorms as he ſhall never be fully quit of, till he is harboured in his grave. Wherefore as the Angel ſaid unto the woman, Luke 24. 5. Why ſeek ye the living among the dead? So I may ſay to you, why ſeek ye peace in a land of trouble, and joy in a land of ſorrow? Theſe are reſerved for us in our Countrey which is above, expect them not here, for this is not your reſt.

Secondly, we may note from this expreſſion, Nor hid ſorrow from mine eyes,

That the ſight of the eye wounds the heart.

He doth not ſay, and hid trouble from my ſoul, or trouble from my ſpirit, but hid ſorrow from mine eyes. It is a proverbial ſpeech among us, What the eye ſees not, the heart grieves not. And when the Lord would ſhew how he was moved with the ſufferings, and knew the ſorrows of his people in Egypt, he doubles it upon this ſence, I have ſeen, I have ſeen, or I have ſurely ſeen the affliction of my people, Exod. 3.7. Your ſorrows are not hid from mine eyes. Mine eye affects my heart, ſaith the Prophet Jeremy, Lam. 3. 51. That is, mine eye afflicts mine heart. While Jeremy went about the City, and ſaw many woful ſpectacles in the ruine and captivity of his people, that ſight ſmote him to the heart. It is ſaid, that when Chriſt came to Jeruſalem, and beheld the City, he wept over it, Luke 19. 41. And for the ſorrow of repentance, the ſight of the eye hath a great influence upon the heart, They ſhall look on me whom they have pierced, and they ſhall mourn, &c. Zech. 12.10. As the eye doth affect, or rather infect the heart with ſin, from ſin-occaſioning objects; a ſin that is in the eye will be preſently at the heart; which cauſed Job to ſay, (Chap. 31. 1.) I made a covenant with mine eyes, why then ſhould I think upon a maid? He meaneth, ſinfully to luſt after her: As if he had ſaid, there is a quick, a ſpeedy paſſage from the eye to the heart, though in the fabrick of the body there ſeems a great diſtance between them: Therefore I have made a covenant with my eyes to avoid occaſions of ſin, leſt mine eyes ſhould pollute my heart with motions unto ſin. And as it is in pleaſure-provoking objects, that which is a pleaſure to the eye, will preſently be a pleaſure to the heart, a refreſhing to our ſpirits: And that pleaſure which ſhall laſt for evermore in Heaven, is from a viſion that ſhall laſt for ever. Joy ſhall for ever be before the eye, and therefore joy ſhall for ever fill the heart. The joy of Heaven conſiſts in viſion, in ſeeing God as he is, (1 John 3. 2.) or in ſeeing face to face, (1 Cor. 13. 12.) which is the viſion beatifical. So likewiſe there is an afflicting viſion. The eye affects the heart with ſorrow-occaſioning objects; if ſorrow be in the eye, it will not ſtay long from the heart. Hence when Sarah, Abraham's Wife, was dead, Abraham thus beſpeaks the people among whom he dwelt, If it be your mind, that I ſhould bury my dead out of my ſight, &c. (Gen. 23. 8.) It did afflict the heart of Abraham with ſorrow, to ſee the body of his deceaſed Wife, or the Coffin wherein ſhe lay, whom he had ſo intirely loved, therefore bury her out of my ſight. It is very obſervable, that when Joſeph would do ſomewhat purpoſely to afflict and touch the heart of his brethren with more remorſe for their former unkindneſs unto him, the hiſtory ſaith (Gen. 42. 24.) That he took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes: He heard them in their private conference whiſper one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we ſaw the anguiſh of his ſoul, when he beſought us, and we would not hear, therefore is this diſtreſs come upon us. When Joſeph perceived their conſciences began thus to work, he reſolves to give them a pill at their eyes, (even a doleful ſpectacle, yet the lively picture of their dealing with him) to make their conſciences work faſter, with godly ſorrow: He took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes. And Judah, when he pleadeth afterward, Chap. 44. for the carrying back of Benjamin, you know what a pathetical Oration he makes; O, ſaith he, do not detain Benjamin, for when I come to thy ſervant my father; and the lad be not with us (ſeeing that his life is bound up in the lads life) it ſhall come to paſs, that when he ſeeth that the lad is not with us, he will dye, ver. 30, 31. That very ſight will kill my father: and for me to ſee my father dye, will be death to me alſo: For ſo he concludes, ver. 34. How ſhall I go to my father, and the lad be not with me, leſt peradventure I ſee the evil that ſhall come upon my father. Oh (ſaith he) let me carry him back; my father will dye if he ſee not the lad, and ſo ſhall I, if I ſee the evil that ſhall come upon my father: He knew that ſight would be as a ſword to his heart, and as a dagger in his bowels. The Lord threatens his people thus in caſe of diſobedience, Deut. 28. 31. Thine Ox ſhall be ſlain before thine eyes, thine Aſs ſhall be violently taken away from before thy face. Thy ſons and thy daughters ſhall be given to another people, &c. So that thou ſhalt be mad for the ſight of thine eyes which thou ſhalt ſee, ver. 34. and ver. 67. He ſhews what convulſions and diviſions of ſpirit, the viſions of the eye would bring upon them. In the morning thou ſhalt ſay, would God it were even; and at even thou ſhalt ſay, would God it were morning, for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou ſhalt fear, and for the ſight of thine eyes which thou ſhalt ſee. The fear of the heart, and the ſight of the eye, are nearly joyned. The ſight of the eye cauſed the fear of the heart, and both were as concauſes of thoſe diſtracting thoughts, and wiſhes, of haſtning the morning to the evening, and again ſuddenly reducing back the evening to the morning. Unleſs ſorrow be hid from the eyes, it can hardly be kept from the heart. It is an uſual cuſtom, if a man be but let blood, to bid him turn away his head, if he be faint-hearted, for the ſight of his bloud will make his heart faint: And ſo from more ghaſtly ſpectacles, men commonly turn away their faces, &c. Which is to hide ſorrow from their eyes. It follows,

Why died I not from the womb? why did not I give up the ghoſt when I came out of the belly? why did the knees prevent me, &c.

Theſe two verſes contain a further aggravation of the former reaſon by three other ſteps. Before he ſpoke againſt his conception and his birth, now, Why died I not from the womb? As if he had ſaid, though I were conceived, and ſecondly, though I were born, yet why did not I make my cradle, my grave, or my firſt ſwadling clothes my winding ſheet; though I were born, yet why did not I dye ſo ſoon as ever I was born? Why dyed I not from the womb? why gave I not up the ghoſt when I came out of the belly? Having received the diſcourteſie of a birth, death would have been a favour: It had been beſt for me, not to have been born, and next beſt to have died quickly, or as ſoon as I was born; that's the meaning in general of the eleventh and twelfth verſes. But I ſhall a little examine and enlighten the particular expreſſions.

Why did I not give up the ghoſt? The Hebrew is but one word, which coſts us five in Engliſh, I give up the ghoſt; the word ſignifieth, that laſt act of thoſe who are in the agony of death: In the Greek and Latine that act is expreſt by one word, Luke 23. 46. Where it is ſaid, that Chriſt gave up the ghoſt. The word is conceived to note a willing chearful reſignation of our ſelves in death; a dying without much reluctance or reſiſtance, a being active in death rather then paſſive, we call it well a giving up the ghoſt. Some apply it only to the death of the godly, (as Gen. 25. 8.) of Abraham, &c. whoſe lives are not violently ſnatcht from them, but willingly ſurrendred. When a godly man dyes a violent death, he doth not dye violently: Whereas a wicked wicked man dyes violently, when he dyes naturally: and though ſometimes (being weary of his life, or deſpairing of relief) he drives out his ghoſt, yet in a ſtrict ſence he never gives up the ghoſt. It is ſaid to the wicked rich man in the Goſpel, (Luke 12. 20.) Thou fool, this night ſhall thy ſoul be required of thee; demanded indeed; but O how unwillingly doth the rich man pay his natural debt, who is ſo able to pay all civil debts. Yet it muſt be confeſt, that we find the word often uſed promiſcuouſly, applyed as well to the death of the wicked as of the godly: To Iſhmael (Gen. 25. 8.) as well as Abraham, to Ananias and Saphira, Acts 5. 10. Yea it is applied to the death of any or all living things, Gen. 7. 21. And all fleſh dyed that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattel, and of beaſts, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man.

Then again, If I had not ſo much favour to dye as ſoon as ever I came from the womb, or to dye in the very birth; yet, Why did the knees prevent me? or the breaſts that I ſhould ſuck?

Here are two ſteps aggravating the cauſe of his curſe againſt his day. If I had not been born dead, ſaith Job, or dyed naturally as ſoon as I was born, yet why was I not left to periſh? I ſhould have dyed quickly, if they had let me alone, though I were born alive into the world; that is the meaning of thoſe words, Why did the knees prevent me? why was there any care taken of me? why did the Midwife and the aſſiſtant women take me upon their knees? why did they waſh me, ſwathe me, and bind me up? If they had not been ſo kind, it had been a kindneſs unto me; if they had ſpared their labour, they had done me a favour; If they had omitted their care, how many cares had I eſcaped?

Why did the knees prevent me? or (which is a further ſtep, and the fifth ſtep by which this ſpeech aſcends) why the breaſts that I ſhould ſuck? As if he had ſaid, If they would needs be ſo favourable as to take me up upon the knee, to waſh me, to bind me up and cloath me, yet why was the breaſt preſented to me? why was I layed to the breaſt? If they had kept me from ſucking the breaſt, I ſhould have ſuckt but little breath, I had dyed quickly.

So that in theſe words there are five gradations, by which Job aggravateth the cauſe of this curſe againſt his day. Firſt, Becauſe he was conceived. Secondly, Becauſe the door was opened for him to be born. Thirdly, Becauſe being born, he did not preſently give up the ghoſt, or dye as ſoon as he came into the world. Fourthly, Becauſe there was ſo much care taken for him, as to take him upon the knee, and bind him up. Fifthly, Becauſe there was a breaſt provided, and paps for him to ſuck: If any of theſe latter acts had been neglected, Job had dyed, and ſo eſcaped all theſe enſuing troubles of his life, Sorrow had been hidden from his eyes.

And it is obſerved (eſpecially in theſe latter acts of this gradation) that Job alludes to the cuſtom of thoſe times, wherein unnatural women left their children upon the cold earth, naked and helpleſs, as ſoon as they were born: or caſting them out, expoſe them to miſery, or the caſual nurſery of nature lent them by beaſts, more merciful then thoſe beaſtly mothers, who would not afford them knees to prevent, nor breaſts to give them ſuck. As in that place, Ezek. 16. 4, 5. the woful condition of ſuch an Infant is expreſt, to ſhadow out the ſinfully polluted and wofully helpleſs eſtate of that people, and of all people by nature, till the Lord prevents them by the knees of free grace, and ſuckles them with the breaſts of his conſolation. Thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite (of a barbarous people; and what then?) In the day thou waſt born, thy navel was not cut, neither waſt thou waſhed in water, thou waſt not ſalted at all, nor ſwadled at all, none eye pittied thee to do any of theſe unto thee, but thou waſt caſt out in the open field, to the loathing of thy perſon, in the day that thou waſt born. Now this is a certain rule, that ſuch parabolical and allegorical Scriptures are grounded upon known cuſtoms and things in uſe: It is certain there were ſome ſo unnatural to their Infants, that they would beſtow no care upon them when they were born, neither waſh, nor cleanſe, nor bind them up, but caſt them out, (as the Prophet ſpeaks) to the loathing of their perſons. The Heathen Romans had a ſpecial Goddeſs, or Deity, whoſe name imported her care and office, that Children, when they were born, ſhould be taken up from the earth, and ſet upon the knee. And for the preventing of this unnatural cruelty, (very frequent, as it ſeems, amongſt them) the Thebanes made an expreſs law, that Infants ſhould not be neglected or caſt out when they were born, though the parents thought they would be a burden to them by reaſon of the charge, or no delight to them by reaſon of their deformity.

Parabolæ non ſumuntur niſi ab his quæ crebro & de more fiunt.

Levana dea pro levandis è terra infantibus, Aug. de Civ. Dei. l. 4. c. 11 Thebanorum lex. de non exponendis infantibus, Apud Ælian. de Var. Hiſt. l. 11.

Now ſaith Job, I could wiſh, I had ſuch a father, or ſuch a mother, or ſuch friends, who forgetting natural affection, would have caſt me out when I came firſt into the world; Why did the knees prevent me? From hence alſo we may obſerve, Firſt, That an Infant, as ſoon as he liveth, hath in him the ſeeds of death.

So Job ſpeaks of himſelf, Why dyed I not from the womb? why did I not give up the ghoſt when I came out of my mothers belly? Or why was I not ſtifled in the womb? why was ever that door opened to let me into the world? I could have dyed as ſoon as I lived. Not only is man acting ſin, but his nature infected with ſin, the ſubject of, and ſubjected to the power of death: ſo the Apoſtle teacheth us, (Rom. 5. 14.) Death reigned from Adam to Moſes, even over them that had not ſinned after the ſimilitude of Adam's tranſgreſſion: And who were thoſe? Even little Infants; they had life, yet death reigned over them, they were under the dominion of death, and ſubject to that King of terror. Sin is the ſeed of death, and the principle of corruption. God doth Infants no wrong when they dye; their death is of themſelves, for they have the ſeed of death in them: We may affirm in one ſence, that when Infants dye, they have no loſs; and we are ſure (in every ſence) when they dye, they have no wrong: All death (except death to ſin) is the wages of ſin, and therefore can be no injury to the ſinner.

Secondly, We may obſerve concerning man in his birth, what a helpleſs creature man is. If I (ſaith Job) had been left a little, I had been gone quickly, there had been an end of me, I could not have helped my ſelf: if the knees had not prevented me, if the breaſts had not given me ſuck, if I had been deſtitute of theſe ſuccours, then preſently I ſhould have been free among the dead, I ſhould have been quiet and gone into ſilence.

Thirdly, Obſerve, That every ſtep of life ſtands in need of a ſtep of mercy.

When the Infant is conceived, there muſt be an act of mercy to quicken it, an act of mercy to nouriſh it in the womb; an act of mercy for the birth, and an act of mercy, being born, to take it upon the knee, an act of mercy to bind it up, an act of mercy to give it ſuck. The beginning of our lives, and the progreſs of our lives, our generation, and our preſervation, call for acts of mercy, or elſe (poor creatures as we are) we quickly periſh and return unto our duſt. We owe our lives to God at firſt, and we owe them every moment; if he did not renew mercy every moment, we could not continue life one moment: As it is with our ſpiritual life, ſo it is with our natural; Our lives are hid with Chriſt in God, Col. 3. 3. Of and from our ſelves we cannot ſubſiſt, either in grace or nature. It follows,

For now ſhould I have lyen ſtill, and been quiet, I ſhould have ſlept; then had I been at reſt.

Theſe words are an inlargement of the former reaſon taken from a deſcription of the ſtate and condition of the dead; For now (ſaith Job) I ſhould have lyen ſtill. If you ſhould ask me a reaſon of my former reaſon, Why was I ſo angry with that day, or night, wherein I was conceived and born, wherein I had that (to me unacceptable) mercy to be preſerved and kept alive? This I ſubjoyn for the reaſon of it, If none of thoſe unwelcome favours or natural rights had been done me, then, I had lyen ſtill, I had been quiet, I ſhould have ſlept, I had been at reſt: Either I ſhould have been as one that never was, or I ſhould have been at reſt and quiet. The argument lyes thus; Reſt and quiet are deſirable things, but death, in the omiſſion of thoſe ſuccours, would have given me reſt; therefore I deſire thoſe ſuccours had been omitted. This concluſion is in the eleventh and twelfth verſes, which we heard before. The aſſumption is in this thirteenth verſe, which he further confirms in the six verses following, by an argument which we may thus form. I will prove, saith he, that in death I should have rest, and been quiet, and lyen still, for all conditions and sorts of men are quiet and lye still in death. There (or in that estate) where all degrees and sorts of persons are at rest, there sure I should have found rest; but in death all sorts and degrees of persons have found rest, therefore I should have found rest too.

Now that all sorts of people lye still, and are at rest in death, he proves by an elegant enumeration of the several sorts and conditions of men. He makes an argument by way of induction of all or most of the ranks of men. First, He shews it in Kings and Counsellors of the earth; these men that make such a bustle in the world, when once they are dead, they are quiet enough. And then he shews it in Rich men and Princes, who load themselves with thick clay, who toil and moil all their dayes to heap up and amass much wealth; when these come to the grave, there's an end of all their labours, then they must give over all their pursuit of riches. Fourthly, He shews it in children, either abortives, born before natures time, or born in full perfection of nature, ver. 16. Lastly, He shews it in oppressors and the oppressed; in prisoners and those that imprison them; in the small and in the great; in the servants and in their Masters: Thus making an enumeration of all these, from thence he infers; That if all these are quiet, when they are in the grave, then surely his condition had been so too; I should have been quiet, and lyen still, then I should have slept and been at rest.

We must here take notice, that Job speaking of the state of death, speaks only in reference to an outward condition, and our resting from outward calamities and troubles; he doth not handle the point at all concerning mans eternal estate: For, death is not rest to all sorts of men in that sence: Kings, and Counsellors, and rich men, &c. may rest from the troubles of this world, and go to a world of everlasting troubles. Such a total rest is the sole priviledge of the Saints. Thus only blessed are the dead which dye in the Lord, from henceforth, yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works follow them, Rev. 14. 13. When the Saints dye, they rest from their labours, and their works follow them (through free grace) in glorious rewards. When the wicked dye, they rest from their labours, but their works follow them (through divine Justice) in everlasting punishments. And Job resting assured of his own eternal rest, wishes only a rest from those temporal commotions.

Apertè his verbis ostendit, se adeo de futura vita securũ esse, ut tantũ uerit solicitus de quietè & præsentibus calamitatibus.

Further, We may observe four words used by Job to express the same thing. First, I should have lyen still. And been quiet, there is a second. I should have slept, there is a third: And fourthly, Then I had been at rest.

I should have lyen still.] The word signifies to lye down in any kind, and it signifies to sleep, Gen. 19. 4. Before they lay down; that is, before they went to bed: It is applyed likewise to the sleep of death, 2 Sam. 7. 12. Isa. 43. 17. They shall lye down, they shall not rise; (they shall dye, so the next words expound it) They are extinct, they are quenched as tow.

And been quiet.] The word signifieth also to be silent; we may put both together, Then had I lyen still and been silent; and you know, death and the grave are called silence; I had been like those that go down into silence (saith the Psalmist, Psal. 115. 17.) that is, like those that go down into the grave. And Hezekiah in his mourning describes that silence, Isa. 38. 18. The grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee.

Securus fuit, in pace degit, etiam siluit.

I should have slept.] Sleep is the image of death; and death is more then the image of sleep: Sleep is a short death, and death is a long sleep. Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to everlasting contempt, Dan. 12. 2. Our friend Lazarus sleepeth, (saith Christ to his Disciples, John 11. 11.) but I go that I may awake him out of sleep. In the fourteenth verse, Jesus said unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead.

Then had I been at rest.] We usually say when a man goes to sleep, he goes to rest: Yet rest is more then sleep, for sometimes a man sleeps when he doth not rest, his very sleep being troubled, and he troubled in his sleep: But when rest is joyned with sleep, it is perfect sleep. The word here used, signifies a very quiet, setled and peaceable condition.

Hence Noah had his name, And he called his name Noah, saying, this son shall comfort us, concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed, (Gen. 5. 29.) He was rest and comfort to the old world, by preaching righteousness, even the righteousness which is by faith, which alone gives rest unto the soul, and is able to refresh us in the midst of all those toils and labours which that first curse brought upon the world, both new and old. Such rest and sweet repose had I found (saith Job) from all my toil in the house of death, and bed of the grave.

Having thus, four words concurring in the same sence, we may here not unprofitably take notice of that elegant multiplication of words in the holy Scriptures. There, store is no sore, and variety is no superfluity, yea, there tautology is no superfluity: It is the usual rhetorick of the Holy Ghost, to speak the same thing in divers words, yea sometime in the same words: We find such a congeries or heaping up of words, used for the most part in some heat of passion, or vehemency of spirit: As first, when God would express a great deal of anger and wrath against a people, he speaks thus, (Isa. 14. 22, 23.) I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of hosts, and cut off from Babylon the name and remnant, and son and nephew, I will also make it a possession for the Bittern and pools of water, and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction. Here are a multitude of words, and all tending to the same purpose, setting forth the fierceness of Gods anger, and the resolvedness of his judgment for the ruining of Babylon. The towring confused pride of the King of Babylon, is presented to us in such a heap of words, (Isa. 14. 13, 14.) hear the pure language of pride from that Kings heart; Thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into Heaven, I will exalt my throne above the Stars of God, I will sit also upon the mount of the Congregation, I will ascend above the heights of the clouds, I will be like the most High. The manifold apostacies and backslidings of Judah, are described in many words by the Prophet Zephany, chap. 1. 6. And them that are turned back from the Lord, and those that have not sought the Lord, nor enquired for him: (Chap. 3. 2.) She obeyed not the voice, she received not correction, she trusted not in the Lord, she drew not near to her God. When our Lord Christ would shew the extream ignorance and darkness of his Disciples, in those great Articles of his sufferings, death and resurrection, having taken the twelve unto him, and discoursed of those points, he concludes, Luke 18. 31, 34. And they understood none of these things, and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things that were spoken. As if Christ had said, their ignorance in these mysteries was so great, that they had not the least glimpse or glimmerings of light about them. So here, I should have lyen still, and been quiet, I should have slept, and been at rest, and all to note the uninterrupted quiet and tranquillity of the grave. As if he had said, Had I dyed then, not only had not these storms been upon me, nor these waves gone over me, but the least breath of wind had never blown upon me. Hence observe,

First, That in regard of all outward troubles, death is the rest of man.

Blessed are the dead that dye in the Lord, for they rest from their labours. And they who dye out of the Lord, rest from all that labour they have had in this world. There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest, Eccles. 9. 10. This life is a day of working, and death is a night of resting. The Sun ariseth, man goeth forth to his labour until the evening, Psal. 104. 23. When the Sun of our life ariseth, we go forth to our labour, until the evening of death. This life is a continued motion; death is a continued rest. This life is but noise and tumult; death is silence. Our life is a stormy passage, a tempestuous sea-voyage; death bringeth us to the harbour.

There is a four-fold rest which we obtain in death. First, A rest from labour and travel; no working there. Secondly, There is a rest from trouble and oppression; no wars, no bloody battels there. Thirdly, There is a rest from passion; no sorrow, no grief shall afflict us there. In the grave there is a fourth rest better then all these; a rest from sin, a rest from the drudgery of Satan, a rest from the winnowings and buffettings of Satan; a rest from the law of our members, warring against the law of our minds. When

Saul

Saul went to the Witch of Endor for advice with Samuel, that Samuel, or the Devil in the appearance of Samuel, speaks as one disturb'd being raised from the grave; *Why (saith he) hast thou disquieted me to bring me up?* 1 Sam. 28. 15. I was at rest, why didst thou call me up to a land of trouble? It is the observation of an ancient Father, and the resolution of an ancient Council, concerning Christs weeping over Lazarus, John 11. That not his death, but his rising drew those tears. When Christ came to the grave where Lazarus lay, the Text saith, that Jesus wept. Why did Christ weep, saith Jerome, in comforting a mother that had lost her daughter? It is clear, that Christ wept over Lazarus that was dead; but he did not weep thy tears: Christ did not weep because Lazarus was dead; but he wept rather, because Lazarus was to be raised up again; he wept to think that his friend Lazarus should be brought back into so troublesome a world. And it was the resolution of the third Toletane Council, That Christ did not weep over Lazarus because he was dead, but because he was to be raised up again to feel the burdens and afflictions of this life: that was their apprehension of it. And it is a truth, that whosoever lives the common life of nature, lives in trouble: But such is not the life of him who is raised from the dead: The lives of such, though here upon the earth, must needs lye out of the common course: And what their condition is, is such a secret as we cannot understand but by injoying it.

Again, from that particular expression, in that he saith, I should have slept, we may observe,

That as death is the rest of the whole man, so death is the sleep of the body.

So you find it often in the Scripture; Our friend Lazarus sleepeth, saith Christ, when he was dead, John 11. And the Apostle, 1 Thes. 4. 13. I would not have you ignorant concerning those which sleep; that is, concerning those who are dead. Lighten mine eyes (saith David) lest I sleep the sleep of death; or as the Hebrew, Lest I sleep death, Psal. 13. 3. And hence the grave is called a bed, Isa. 57. 2. The righteous are taken away, &c. they shall enter into peace, they shall rest in their beds. When a righteous man dyes, or is taken away, he is but gone to bed. Therefore we call those places where the dead are laid up and buried, Dormitories, or sleeping places. Both the Greek and Latine words meet in the same signification.

κοιμητήριον Dormitorium.

Some of the Ancients were of opinion, that this sleep took hold of, and seiz'd upon, all man, namely, upon his soul as well as upon his body; asserting, that the soul is in a sleep, or slumber; that is, that the soul, from the time of its disunion from the body until the resurrection, lyes still without any motion or operation. I grant that many operations of the soul do cease when it parteth from the body. There are some acts of the soul which are organical; and there are other acts that are inorganical, or immaterial: The organical acts, that is, whatsoever the soul acts by the members of the body, those acts, I say, must needs cease; but the soul can act of it self without the assistance of the body; as we may collect by many experiments while our bodies and souls are joyned together. How often do we find our souls at work, when our bodies lye still and do nothing; when sleep binds up all our senses, and shuts up the windows of the body so close, that we can neither hear nor see: yet then the soul frames to it self, and beholds a thousand various shapes, and hears all sorts of sounds and voices; then the soul sees, and the soul hears, the soul deviseth, and the soul discourseth, the soul grieves, and the soul rejoyceth, the soul hopes, and the soul fears, the soul electeth, and the soul refuseth: All this the soul doth in dreams and visions of the night, when deep sleep falls upon man. So also in extasies and ravishments, the body is, as it were, laid by, as useless and uninstrumental to the soul. I knew a man in Christ about fourteen years ago, (so the Apostle Paul saith) whether in the body, I cannot tell, or out of the body, I cannot tell, God knoweth, 2 Cor. 12. 2. As if he had said, I was lost as to my body, I could not tell what I was, I did not feel my self; yet he had mighty operations in his soul, his spirit wrought strangely, and then took in such revelations of God and from God, as his bodily organs could never fashion into words, or represent by speech: He heard * unspeakable words, which is not * lawful (or possible) for man to utter. The soul hath an ear to hear such words as the body cannot find a tongue to express. So the Apostle John in his divine ravishments, I was in the Spirit upon the Lords day. As for his body, that was, as to that business, laid by and suspended, as useless in that day; and his spirit called up to that angelical work, the receiving of visions and revelations from on high. And among other things which John saw, He saw under the Altar the souls of them that had been slain, for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: These souls were not asleep, though their bodies were, for they cryed with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood, &c. Rev. 6. 9, 10. From all these Texts and experiences we may conclude, that the soul wakes while the body sleeps that sleep of death. And the death of the body is called a sleep.

* Quæ fando explicari a quoquã homine non possint. Beza.

* Quæ nulla vi ne Sanctorum quidem possint explicari, nempe quia divinum est numen. Sic explicat Clemens Alex. Strom. 5. Beza.

First, Because as sleep, so death brings the body to rest, as was observed in the former point.

Secondly, Natural sleep is not perpetual, we sleep and wake again; so though the body lye in the grave, yet death is but a sleep, the man shall awake and rise again.

Thirdly, As a body asleep can easily be awaked and called up by the power of man; so the body, being dead, can with infinitely more ease be raised by the power of God: It is but a call from Heaven, and we awaken out of the dust; God can beyond all comparison more easily awaken us from that dead sleep of death, then we can awaken one another from the lightest slumber.

There are two Questions which I shall propound and endeavour to resolve upon the whole matter of this context.

First, We find Job complaining, because things were not otherwise ordered about him; he is troubled, because he was born, or because he was not cast away in the birth; for then it had been better with him, he had been asleep and quiet; he was troubled things were with him as they were. Hence it may be questioned, Whether it be lawful for us to wish, or to desire, that had not come to pass, which wee see come to pass? And are we not bound to rest satisfied with the present and fore-past dispensations of God, and so be content with the things that are, or with things as they are?

For this, I say in general, such wishes or desires are not sinful. It is not absolutely sinful, to wish that not to be, which is: Nay, some things which are, ought to be wished they had not been; and it is a sin not to wish, they had not been. As those things that are displeasing to God, provocations to the eyes of his glory, things that are dishonourable to God, we ought to wish that such things had never been. God himself wisheth in that manner, Psal. 81. 13. O that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my wayes! They did not walk in his wayes; he wisheth they had; he desireth they had been better, more holy and more obedient then they were. To wish that a thing had not been, out of a tenderness that God should be offended by sin, is not only lawful, but very commendable. But to wish things otherwise then they are, as murmuring against, and misliking Gods administration, or out of a tenderness, because we suffer, is not only sinful, but abominable: When our wills rise up against the will of God, when we cannot be contented to be what God will have us to be, and to suffer what God would have us suffer; when we, who should learn to be content in every estate, are angry with our estates, and on that ground wish, O that this had never been, O that I had never seen this day, because it hath so much trouble in it; this wish hath I know not how much evil in it. So likewise when man shall (as it were) take upon him to direct the Almighty and only wise God in governing the world, secretly surmizing, or openly complaining, that things might be dispenced and manag'd with more wisdom, justice and moderation; such boldness is plain blasphemy. Some are ready to say in their hearts, about the Lord Christs governing the world, as Absalom did concerning his Father David's government of Israel: Things are carried, as if there were none deputed to hear or redress the wrongs of men. O that I were made Judge of the world, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come to me, and I would do him justice: Things should not go thus if I had the ordering of them; such boldness is highest blasphemy. And yet with caution of due reverence to the Name of God, he gives us leave to debate the matter with him, both concerning the ſtate of things in publick, and our own perſonal eſtates.

First thus, If we, while we are debating, adore his ſacred Juſtice and unſearchable Wiſdom, in that which we neither ſee, nor are able to underſtand. Thus while the Prophet Jeremy took liberty to plead with God about the miniſtrations of the world, he humbly premiſes, Righteous art thou, O Lord, when I plead with thee; yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments: why doth the way of the wicked proſper? We may ask God the queſtion, and plead with him about his judgments, but we muſt not have the leaſt jealouſie or ſuſpition of his righteouſneſs, or of his judgments.

Vid ſemper retinter. Demiſs. ἀμεμπτον καὶ ἀμεμπτον, eſſe Deum.

Secondly, We may ſit down and bewail the ſtate of things, or our private eſtates; In that ſence we may wiſh things not to be that are, ſo as to bewail that ſuch things are; and this is it which Job eſpecially doth in this Chapter, he ſits down bewailing his condition: And ſo may we while we keep within our bounds, and duly regulate our lamentings. The bounds and rules may be ſuch as theſe. First, Deal not too much with the creature, either in complaining of the creature, or in complaining to the creature. Let ſecond cauſes paſs, or look upon them but in the ſecond place: pour your complaints into the boſom of God. Secondly, Conſider from whence your bewailings move; take heed they ſpring not from delicacy of ſpirit, or an unwillingneſs to lye under the croſs, becauſe it ſpoils your fair ſhew in the fleſh: While we bewail our own croſs, or publick croſſes, we ſhould be working our hearts to a willing and chearful ſufferance of the croſs. Though a man doth not love that which he bears, yet let him love to bear: It is an high ſtrain of ſpiritualneſs in bearing, when a Chriſtian can ſay, I love not that which I ſuffer, yet I love to ſuffer: I love not that which I bear, yet I love to bear. To bear, is the patience of neceſſity; to love to bear, is the patience of vertue: To love to bear, hath in it the higheſt affection, and the loweſt ſubjection unto Chriſt. The Apoſtles ſpirit was raiſed to this heroick pitch, and ſomewhat above it, when he ſaid, I rejoyce in my ſufferings, Col. 1. 24. (Joy is a degree beyond love) when he ſaid, I take pleaſure in reproaches, in neceſſities, in perſecutions, in diſtreſſes for Chriſts ſake, 2 Cor. 12. 10. (Pleaſure is a degree beyond joy.) But eſpecially when he ſaid, I glory in tribulations, Rom. 5. 3.) And God forbid that I ſhould glory (in any thing elſe) ſave in the croſs of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Gal. 6. 14. To glory in a thing is more then to take pleaſure in it. Again, take heed your complaints and bewailings do not ariſe out of diſtruſt and unbelief; ſuch complainings are provocations. It was called the provocation, when the people of Iſrael made ſuch diſtruſting complaints, Pſal. 95. 8. Harden not your hearts as in the provocation in the day of temptation in the wilderneſs. And that the provocation lay in their unbelief, the Apoſtle is expreſs, Heb. 3. where quoting this text of the Pſalm, he concludes his whole diſcourſe thus, ver. 19. So we ſee they could not enter in becauſe of unbelief. If we mix faith with our tears, and while we bemoan our condition, yet believe, that God is good, and good to us; that God is all-ſufficient, and all-ſufficient to deliver us; we may wiſh that the things that are, were not; and that God, who changes not, would make a change in our eſtate.

Gal. 6. 12.

Tolerare eſt patientia neceſſitatis, amare tolerare eſt patientia virtutis.

For the cloſe of this point, I ſhall lay down theſe three Concluſions.

First, A man may deſire that, which God wills not, and not ſin in that deſire: As the deliverance of a people whom God will deſtroy.

Secondly, A man may ſin in deſiring that, which God wills: When it is the will of God that the father ſhall dye, the child ſins in deſiring it.

Thirdly, A man may, without ſin, deſire that not to be, which God wills; or which is the ſame, that not to be, which is: ſuch deſires being qualified according to the cautions before given.

There is a ſecond queſtion ariſing upon a part of this complaint: For Job complains not only of his troubles, but of his life: And ſeems to have been angry with his very being; while he wiſhes he had never been conceived, or that his Mother had been denyed the bleſſing of conception. The queſtion then is, Whether an evil or a troubleſome being be worſe then no being? Or whether it be better not to be, then to be miſerable?

I anſwer, There is a twofold miſerable being, one Temporal, the other Eternal. An eternal miſerable being is eternally worſe then a not being. But a temporal miſerable being, at the worſt, is better then a not being: And the reaſon is, becauſe our being is far more excellent then the outward comforts of our being, theſe being only accidental to our being; and therefore it neceſſarily follows, that it is better to be without outward comforts, then to be without a being. Again, life is better then all outward things, (Satan ſpake truly in the former Chapter, All that a man hath will he give for his life.) That which a man parts with rather then his life, is below his life. If then life be better then riches, or health, or pleaſures, then much more is our being better then all theſe. As a man may hold his life when all his eſtate and comforts are gone, ſo he doth hold his being when his life is gone: Life is brittle ware at the beſt, but mans being is of an everlaſting make. I know there are ſome who diſpute and conclude, that a being, even an eternally miſerable being, is better then no being: And I grant it is ſo in a metaphyſical, or a philoſophical notion; but in a theological notion it is not. A Philoſopher (keeping within the ſphere of Nature) can ſee no miſery ſo miſerable, or evil ſo bad, as not to be. But a Divine can, he ſees two things worſe. First, An everlaſting ſtain and guilt of ſin lying upon the ſoul. Secondly, The everlaſting wrath and diſpleaſure of God poured out upon the whole man. Hence Chriſt ſaith of Judas, who betrayed him, Mat. 26. 24. It had been good for that man, if he had not been born; becauſe that accurſed act, joyned with his impenitence and unbelief, ſubjected him to everlaſting miſery, to wrath for evermore; It had been good he had never been born; rather then to fall into ſuch a ſin, and from that to fall into Hell. Not to be born, is in this place, as much as not to be. And it had been good for him not to have been born, is as much as to ſay, it had been better for him not to have been born. It had been better for him not to have been, then to have committed ſuch a ſin, to lye under ſuch wrath, and to looſe ſuch happineſs for ever. Though a ſtate of damnation (conſidered abſtractedly) be better then no ſtate all, that is, then a not being; yet, in the concrete, it is not better to be damned then not to be: In it ſelf, eternal miſery is better then a non-entity; but a man eternally miſerable is worſe then a non-ens. And without doubt it will be the eternal deſire of the damned (and that deſire is both a part and an increaſe of their miſery) that they never had been, or now might ceaſe to be, rather then continue to be miſerable.

Si natus non fuiſſet ille homo, i.e. ſi nunquam proceſſiſſet à non eſſe ad eſſe. Melius quippe fuiſſet nunquam fuiſſe quam tanta flagitia perpetrare, gratia quoque & gloria in æternum privari: ſed & appetibilius eſt homini abſolutè non eſſe, quam eſſe damnatum, propter æternam pœnatiſſimamq; miſeriam, Dionyſ. Carthuſ. in Mat. 26. v. 24.

Now to ſhut up and reſolve the queſtion, as to the ground of it, Job's complaint in this Text. I ſay, Job was only in the preſent feeling of temporal troubles, and he was beyond the fear of eternal: Therefore number this among his failings, that he wiſht he had never been conceived, becauſe he was thus afflicted.

VERS. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18.

With Kings and Counſellors of the earth, which build deſolate places for themſelves.
Or with Princes that had gold, who filled their houſes with ſilver.
Or as an hidden untimely birth, I had not been, as Infants which never ſaw light.
There the wicked ceaſe from troubling, and there the weary be at reſt.
There the priſoners reſt together, they hear not the voice of the oppreſſor, &c.

FRom the tenth verſe of this Chapter to the end of the nineteenth, we have ſhewed you, that Job layeth down the cauſe of his former bitterneſs and complainings againſt his day. At the tenth verſe he is angry, becauſe it hindred not his conception and his birth: And at the thirteenth he giveth a further cauſe of that cauſe; For then (ſaith he) I ſhould have been at reſt. Now being about to prove, that in death he ſhould have found reſt, he doth it by an induction of particulars. As if he had thus ſaid: Where all ſorts of perſons, even they who have been hardeſt wrought, and moſt troubled in the world, find reſt; there ſurely I ſhould have found reſt alſo: But in death, perſons that have been hardeſt wrought, and moſt troubled in the world, world, find reſt; therefore there I ſhould have found reſt too. Now for the proving of this aſſumption, that in death all ſorts of perſons find reſt, even thoſe who have been moſt travail'd, tired, and worn out in the world: To prove this (I ſay) he gives inſtance in divers, almoſt all ranks, degrees and conditions of men.

First, In thoſe who are great, rich and wiſe, in Kings and Counſellours of the earth, which build deſolate places for themſelves. And in Princes who had gold, who filled their houſes with treaſure, &c.

With Kings and Counſellors of the earth.

מלך Regnavit Conſilio & Legibus.

With Kings.] The word here uſed, properly noteth ſuch as rule by Law, ſuch as are oppoſed to Tyrants, who rule according to the dictates of their own will. With ſuch Kings Counſellours are uſually joyned; With Kings and Counſellours of the earth. Great Princes have their Councils; and it is a happy conjunction when good Kings and good Counſellours meet together. Yea many times bad men are good Kings, when they are attended with good Counſellours: Whereas evil Counſellours often make a good man a bad King, and by their poiſonous whiſpers and inſtillations at the ear, corrupt the hearts, and taint the ſpirits of the beſt Princes. In the multitude of Counſellours (ſaith Solomon, Prov. 15.21.) there is ſafety. The ſafety of Kings, and the ſafety of Kingdoms, doth conſiſt in following this multitude. Where there are good Counſellours, and a multitude of them, we may expect good, and much good, a multitude of bleſſings upon a Nation.

Now when Job had named theſe eminent perſons, Kings and Counſellours, he addeth ſomewhat further by way of their deſcription, he giveth as it were a character of them from their ſtudies and imployments, With Kings and Counſellours of the earth, which build deſolate places for themſelves.

It may ſeem very doubtful what is here meant by theſe deſolate places, and the building of them. The word in the Hebrew is, deſolations, or deſtructions; It comes from Charah, which ſignifies to dry up, becauſe dry places are deſolate places, as a deſolate wilderneſs for the drineſs of it, being unfit to ſuſtain man or beaſt. Hence the name of the Mount Horeb, Exod. 3.1. called ſo from drineſs, becauſe there was no water, Deut. 8.15. The ſame word alſo ſignifies a ſword; becauſe the ſword (as we ſee by woful experience) makes places deſolate. But what Job ſhould mean by this, That Kings and Counſellours of the earth, build ſolitary places for themſelves, is queſtionable.

First, Some take it for an expreſſion of vaſt and mighty buildings, Pallaces and houſes of ſuch largeneſs, and content, that when great Princes and Kings have their full retinue and families in them, they can ſcarce be ſeen: But I ſee no reaſon at all for that ſenſe, and therefore I paſs it; a little touch will make that opinion deſolate.

Others by theſe deſolate places, conceive that Job meaneth Forreſts and Parks, places of pleaſure, which Kings and great men uſe to build and make up for delight and recreation.

Or thirdly, That by deſolate places, are meant houſes built in deſolate or ſolitary places, in Woods and Forreſts. Princes and great men will have their houſes far remote from Towns and places of reſort, that they may be free from ſuitors, and retire when they pleaſe from the throng of the multitude. It is ſaid concerning Solomon, 1 King. 7.2. that after he had built the Temple, and his own houſe, for his Kingly reſidence, he built a houſe in the Forreſt of Lebanon; But this may be called a building in, rather then a building of, deſolate places.

Innuit loca vaſta & deſtructa deſolataq; quæ ipſi extruebant ad nomen ſibi comparandum. Druſ.

Fourthly, Rather, I conceive that Kings and Counſellours of the earth may be ſaid to build deſolate places, when finding places deſolate and ruined, they, with vaſt expences raiſe up and build ſtately Fabricks upon them, to get themſelves a name. As want and poverty, war and troubles turn a Pallace into a deſolate place; ſo riches and plenty, power and peace meeting together in Kings and great men, turn deſolate places into Pallaces. Kings and Counſellours are of ſuch wealth and power, that they can alter the moſt deſolate and ruinous places, into delicate edifices and ſtately dwellings.

Or laſtly, Which doth beſt ſuit with the ſubject of Jobs diſcourſe or curſe in this Chapter. He ſpeaking ſo much of death, by the deſolate places, we may underſtand, Tombs and Sepulchers, places of burial, which Kings and Counſellours build to, or for, themſelves: And ſo taken, the ſence may be given thus, as if Job had ſaid, if I had died, I ſhould have lien in the grave with as much eaſe and quiet, as thoſe great Princes and Kings of the earth, who build themſelves ſtately monuments to lie in; It would have been as well with me as with any of them, though interr'd under ſtately tombs. We know it was an ordinary thing for Kings and great men (eſpecially in ancient times) to prepare for themſelves coſtly monuments while they lived, as houſes for their bodies being dead: Which grew to ſuch exceſſive charge among the Romanes, that they were forced to make a Law to reſtrain it. The Egyptians beſtowed more care and coſt in building their tombs then their houſes. Even Abraham (Gen. 23. 16.) bought him a burying place before he built himſelf a houſe; though while he lived, he dwelt in a moveable tent, yet he would be as ſure as he could of a certain grave. And good Joſeph of Arimathea had made himſelf a ſepulcher in a rock, Mat. 27. 60. And it is ſaid of Abſolom, 2 Sam. 18. 18. That in his life time he had taken and reared up a pillar, (that is, he had artificially raiſed a great pile of goodly ſtones) in the Kings dale, For he ſaid, I have no ſon to keep my name in remembrance; And he called the pillar after his own name. Now as this pillar was to keep his name, ſo he intended it likewiſe to keep his body when he ſhould die; For it being related in the verſe before, how as ſoon as he was ſlain, they made no more ado with him, but caſt him into a great pit in the wood, and laid a very great heap of ſtones upon him. The holy Ghoſt, to ſhew us the vanity of man in preparing for a dead body, while he neglects an immortal ſoul, and how God diſappoints the vain conceits of men in ſuppoſing to perpetuate their own name and greatneſs; The holy Ghoſt (I ſay) to ſhew this, preſently ſubjoyns in the ſacred ſtory, Now Abſolom in his life time, &c. As if he had ſaid, Do ye obſerve how this ambitious Prince was buried, even tumbled into a pit with a rude heap of ſtones caſt upon him. This man had prepared himſelf another kind of monument, even a ſumptuous pillar, &c. So that under, or by, that pillar, he had archt a curious vault for himſelf to be buried in, called Abſaloms place, namely, his burying place.

Noſtræ quidē legis interpretes, quo capite jubent ſumptus & luxum removere à Deorum manium Jure, Intelligunt imprimis ſepulchrorum munificentiam eſſe minuendam. Cicero. Major apud Egyptios ſepulchrorū quā domorum cura.

Inane monumentū quod vocatur κενο ταφιον Jun. in loc.

And the word which we have here for deſolate places, is in Scripture clearly applied to the grave, or a place of burial. We have it in Ezek. 26. 20. where the Prophet foreſhewing the deſtruction of Tyre, ſpeaks from the Lord, thus; When I ſhall bring thee down with them that deſcend into the pit, and ſhall ſet thee in the low parts of the earth, in places deſolate of old. There are three words in that verſe, and they are all Synonima's, words of the ſame ſignification; First, The pit: Secondly, The low parts of the earth. Thirdly, The deſolate places; and all theſe are but ſeveral expreſſions for the grave, or for a place to bury in: It is no more but this, When I ſhall bring thee down, even with thoſe that lie buried in the grave. So that the word which we tranſlate deſolate places, being alſo in other places uſed for the grave or a place of burial, we may very well expound it ſo here, that deſolate places are the graves or ſepulchers of Kings, and Princes, and Counſellours of the earth; which we may do eſpecially, becauſe Job treats in this place about death, and the ſtate of the dead.

Now Tombs and Monuments may be called deſolate places in two reſpects.

First, Becauſe when the body is layed in there, all company and all friends leave it; you ſhall have a mighty train following their friend to the grave, but there they leave him. Kings and Counſellours have ſtately Funerals, but when their ſubjects or friends, favourites or flatterers, have brought them to the tomb and opened the door of the grave, they go no further, they will not go in with them, and dwell with their bodies in the duſt of death, as much as they honour'd or ador'd them when they lived: ſo that, they are in deſolate places.

Secondly, Graves may be called deſolate places, becauſe Tombs and Sepulchres were in deſolate places, they were made in ſome high Mountain or caved Valley, in ſome place remote from the company and habitations of the living; for in former times they did not bury in Cities or in Towns, but in places where few came, till they were carried ried, and therefore properly called deſolate places. It is obſerved, that among the Romans, the firſt Emperour that was buried in Rome was Trajan. And the law of the the twelve Tables did prohibit both the burial and the burning of the dead within the City. So then it is clear, that anciently Tombs and Monuments were erected in deſolate places, and that great coſt was beſtowed in building and beautifying of them; both which favour and illuſtrate the expoſition given. It follows in the Text;

Eutrop. lib. 8. In Urbe ne ſepelito neve urito.

Or with Princes that had gold, who fill their houſes with treaſure.

The word Sar, a Prince, in the Hebrew, as in moſt other languages, ſignifies the chief, the head, the firſt. Some Criticks conceive that our Engliſh word [Sir] comes from it; it is very near in ſound, and ſo is the French word [Mounſier] to this Original for a Prince or Chief.

שר

Job deſcribeth Princes thus, they are ſuch as had gold. noting both what the ſtudy and indeavours of Princes are, namely, to lay up gold; and likewiſe what is requiſite for them. Gold is of great uſe in a high eſtate; Treaſures are neceſſary for Princes. Princes that had gold. Therefore Solomon that wiſe Prince ſaith of himſelf, Eccleſ. 2. 8. And he putteth it among his Princely works, I gathered me alſo ſilver and gold, and the peculiar treaſure of Kings. When the Wiſe-men came to Chriſt, the firſt thing they offered him was gold, and they did wiſely, for he was a Prince: gold being the chief, and as it were the prince of Mettals, is a very proper offering for Princes. And howſoever wiſdom and goodneſs, juſtice and clemency are far more neceſſary requiſites in Princes then gold, yet there is ſuch a neceſſary conjunction of theſe two, that we find him in the Prophet (Iſa. 3. 7.) refuſing the government becauſe he was poor. Be thou our Ruler (ſay they v. 6.) and let this ruine be under thine hand, that is, be thou our Prince, and take charge of us; Not I ſaith he, I will not be an healer, for in mine houſe is neither bread nor cloathing, make me not a Ruler of the people; As if he had ſaid, I am but a poor man, a man of a weak eſtate, Princes muſt have treaſure and great eſtates to bear up the dignity of their places. As covetouſneſs, ſo poverty is very unbecoming in a Prince. The Roman ſtory tells us, that when two great Councels ſtood in competition for a great employment in the affairs of that Common-wealth, One of the Senators being askt upon which of the two he would beſtow his vote, anſwered, upon neither: And gives this reaſon, One hath nothing, and the other can never have enough; One was ſo poor that he had nothing to ſupport him, and the other was ſo covetous that nothing would ſatisfie him. Therefore, as before Job joyned Counſellors with Kings, ſo here he joyneth gold with Princes; The next expedient for Princes to counſel and wiſdom, are gold and treaſures. We find indeed, that God gives it in charge to the Kings of Iſrael, concerning their gathering of treaſures, that they ſhould not be exceſſive, (Deut. 17. 17.) Neither ſhall he greatly multiply to himſelf ſilver and gold. He doth not ſay, your Prince or your King ſhall not multiply ſilver or gold, but he ſhall not greatly multiply ſilver or gold, that is, he ſhall not ſet his heart upon them, or think he never hath enough, he ſhall not greatly do it, but let him be careful to do it proportionably to his occaſions either of peace or war.

Valerius Maximus. l. 6. c. 4.

Further, It is added, Who fill their houſes with treaſure. The word which we here tranſlate treaſure, is ordinarily tranſlated ſilver. The root from which it ſprings, ſignifieth to deſire, and the reaſon is, becauſe treaſure, ſilver or gold, are ſuch deſireable things, or things upon which the deſires of moſt men are ſet: therefore the Hebrews give ſilver a name proper to its own nature, or rather to the nature of men, whoſe deſires are enflamed after it. With this deſireable thing, Princes fill their houſes.

בכף Argentum quod ab omnibus appetitur.

What are theſe houſes?

A houſe is a place wherein man liveth, or inhabiteth while he liveth: this is the ordinary acception of the word; and ſo it may be taken here, for the ordinary dwelling houſes or Pallaces of Princes; and then it is an heightning of the ſenſe, They had gold, yea, they had ſo much, as they filledthe ir houſes with it.

Then again, (That we may keep in this clauſe to the expoſition given in the laſt, of the deſolate places,) we may underſtand by the houſes that theſe Princes filled with treaſure, the graves, the Tombs wherein they were buried; And it is the language of Scripture, to call the grave a houſe, mans houſe. Two Texts I will give you for it, one out of this book, Job 30. 23. where Job ſpeaking of the grave, calleth it the houſe appointed for all living; And Eccleſ. 12. 5. where Solomon calls it our long home. Man dieth, and goeth to his long home; the word in the Original is, he goeth to the houſe of his age, or to the houſe of age. God is called the rock of ages, becauſe he is an everlaſting ſtrength, Iſa. 26. 4. The grave is called an houſe of age, becauſe it is a very laſting houſe, an abiding houſe, a houſe where man muſt abide till God ſound him up by the voice of a Trumpet to the reſurrection. So then the grave is likewiſe called an houſe, the houſe of all living, becauſe thither every one that is living is travailing, man travails to the grave as to his houſe; And a long home, in oppoſition to our ſhort home, our uncertain abode in thoſe houſes wherein we dwell upon the earth.

Princes (ſaith Job) that had gold; and this is one uſe they make of it, they fill their houſes, that is, their graves or their tombs with this treaſure. In thoſe times (it ſeems) they did not only beſtow great coſt upon their Tombs and places of burial, but they put great ſtore of treaſure into the Tombs with them. According to this interpretation, the meaning of Job may be thus repreſented, If I had died before, and had been buried poorly and obſcurely, yet I ſhould have done as well as Kings and Counſellours, who with vaſt expence of treaſure build ſtately Tombs for themſelves, yea as well as Princes that put their treaſure into their Tombs with them.

That it was a cuſtom to put in much treaſure into Tombs, is obſerved by Joſephus in his 13th book of Antiquities and 15th chapter, ſhewing how Hircanus opened Davids Sepulcher, and took out three thouſand Talents. And in his 16th book, chap. 11. he notes, that afterward Herod opened the Sepulcher of David, and thought to have found a great deal of treaſure there, but found only ſome precious garments, &c. And the ſtory is famous out of Herodotus concerning Semiramis, That ſhe having built a ſtately Tomb, makes this inſcription upon it, Whatſoever King ſhall ſucceed here and wants money, let him open this Tomb, and he ſhall have enough to ſerve his turn; Which Darius in after-ages being in ſtraights for want of treaſure attempting to do, in ſtead of money found only this reproof written and laid up there, Unleſs thou hadſt been extreamly covetous and greedy of filthy lucre, thou wouldeſt not have opened the graves of the dead to ſeek for money. The Lord threatens by the Prophet Jeremy, that the Chaldeans ſhall bring out the bones of the King of Judah, and the bones of his Princes, and the bones of the Prieſts, and the bones of the Prophets, &c. out of their graves, chap. 8. 1. It is conceived that the reaſon why the Chaldeans digged up and raked in the graves of the Jewes, was not ſo much from cruelty as from covetouſneſs: They having heard that the Jewes uſed to put rich ornaments upon the dead, or riches into their graves with them. Or this might be as a juſt puniſhment of that greedineſs after gain, ſo eminent in the Jewes, that the Prophet in the very Chapter where this is threatned, chargeth them thus, verſ. 10. Every one from the leaſt to the greateſt, is given to covetouſneſs. Thus it is clear, that there was a cuſtom to put riches and treaſure into the grave with the dead, to which Job might allude in this place.

Joſeph. lib. 13. Antiq. c. 15. & lib. 16. cap. 11.

Herodotus, lib. 1.

So much for the opening of the words. From the ſenſe given,

Obſerve, firſt, That neither power, nor wiſdom, nor riches, are any priviledge at all againſt the ſtroake of death.

Here are Kings, men that have great power; Counſellours, men full of wiſdom; Princes that have riches, ſo much gold that they can ſtuff their graves with it: yet theſe cannot defend themſelves againſt death. Death will not obey the authority of Kings, nor doth it fear their frowns; the ſubtilty or policy of Counſellors is not able to defeat it; there is no eloquence, no Rhetorick can perſwade death to depart; all the gold and riches in the world cannot bribe death or ſtay its hand; I (ſaith Job) ſhould have found Kings and Counſellors, and rich men, even all theſe in the grave, and we ſhould have reſted together. Riches avail not in the day of wrath, (Prov. 11. 4.) but righteouſneſs delivereth from death. Righteouſneſs deliver- eth from death? why, shall not righteous men die? Surely Job might have said, with righteous men, with holy men should I have rested; with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob, these are in the grave, death seized on them as well as other Princes, and Kings and Counsellors: How then doth Solomon say, that righteousness delivereth from death? Death is there either to be understood of some dangerous judgment; for, saith he, riches avail not in a day of wrath, that is, in a day of publick calamity; but righteousness delivereth from death; that is, from those troubles and dangers: God hath respect to a righteous person, and hideth him from that death. Or, righteousness doth deliver from death, that is, from the evil of death, from the sting of death, from the bitterness of death; the bitterness and evil of death is past to a righteous man: but riches they avail not at all; they cannot at all, as not deliver from death, so not mitigate the pain, or pull out the sting, or sweeten the bitterness of death; yea rather, riches increase all these: That is a truth, O death! how bitter is thy remembrance to a man that is at ease in his possession? Men may put their riches with them into the grave, but riches cannot keep them a moment out of the grave. This thought, How bitter!

Secondly, When Job speaks of Kings, and Counsellors, and Princes, these great men of the world, he sheweth us, what their study and business for the most part is in the world; it is about worldly things: They build desolate places, they have gold, they fill their houses with treasure; these are their employments, the current of their cares and endeavours runs out this way. Hence observe,

That, The thoughts of the greatest and wisest of the world are usually but for, and about the world.

The poor receive the Gospel, and the rich receive the world. As the godly man is described by his faith, Abraham believed God; by fear, by uprightness, by justice, as Job in the first Chapter of this Book; by meekness, as Moses, &c. by the heavenliness of their spirits and conversations; Our conversation is in heaven, Phil. 3. 20. so worldly men are described by their proper studies. Kings, Counsellors, and Princes build palaces, gather riches, heap up gold; they buy, they sell, they build, they plant, they eat, they drink, as the worldly world is pictured, Luke 17. 27, 28. In Psalm. 17. great men are called, the men of the world, as if they were for nothing but the world, or all for the world; as if all their provisions were laid in for this world; so it follows, who have their portion in this life, ver. 14. It is a sad thing to have received our portion. It is said of the rich man, Son, remember that thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things, thou hast had thy portion. In Psal. 49. 11. it is said concerning such men, that their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations; and they call their Lands after their own names. Their inward thoughts are upon these things; It is somewhat a strange kind of speaking, to say, their inward thoughts; for there are no thoughts but inward: thoughts are all wrought in the secret shop of the heart. But there is an elegancy in it, the Hebrew is, their inwards, their internals; their inwards are, how they may get themselves a name and riches; not only are their thoughts about these things, but the very inmost of their thoughts; the most retired thoughts and recesses of the soul are about these things; these lie nearest to their hearts: as the story saith of Queen Mary, when she died, she bade them open her, and they should find Calice at her heart; it was a pitiful case, that a rotten Town should lie (where Christ ought) at the heart of such a Princess: The heart is the place where Christ and the thoughts of heaven should lodge: all below heaven, should be below our hearts. But as a godly mans inward thoughts are for heaven, and the things of heaven, for grace & for holiness; so he hath thoughts upon the world, but (if I may so speak) they are his outward thoughts, not his inward thoughts; that which lies nearest his heart; his inward thoughts are for heaven; so the inward thoughts of worldly men are for the world: The Apostle might well say, Not many wise, nor many rich, nor many noble are called. The thoughts of wise Counsellors, of potent Kings, and rich Princes, are legible in their actions.

Internum vel interiora.

Thirdly, Having expounded these desolate places to be Tombs, and these houses Graves; observe,

That, Some take in their life-time, more care for their Sepulchers, then they do for their Souls.

Here are great men, what do they? They build desolate places; they will be sure to have stately monuments: And they had gold; they will be sure to fill their graves with treasure, they will be buried richly, or they will have their riches buried with them; but what care did these take for their poor souls in the mean time, where they should lie? Had they taken order what should become of their souls? When all things are disposed of, this choice piece, for the most part, is left undisposed of, unprovided for: Some will carefully provide for their children, they will provide for their families, they will provide for their dead bodies, for their carkases; but for their immortal souls there is no provision made: While their bodies are assured of a resting-place, they may say of, and to their departing souls (as that trembling Emperor bespake his) O our poor fleeting, wandring souls! whither are you going, where is the place of your rest? As it is said of Absolom in the place before cited, He in his life-time had reared up a pillar (a monument, or a Tomb) for himself, in the Kings dale. What a careful Prince was this for his body? But how careless was this Prince for his soul? He will have a pillar to preserve his name, and yet runs out in rebellion against his own father, to the destruction of his soul. The great business of the Saints on earth, is, to get assurance of a place for their souls to lodge in when they die; it troubles them not much, what lodging their bodies have, if they can put their spirits into the hand of Christ: What though their bodies be cast upon a dunghil, or trodden upon, like mire in the streets, by cruel men? A heathen said, The loss of a Funeral, or a Sepulcher, may easily be born: I am sure a Christian may. That loss will never undo any man, especially not those that believe: For in the person of such, the Apostle speaks, 2 Cor. 5. 2. We know that if our earthly house of this Tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. All that rich worldlings, and ungodly great ones can say when they die, is, We know when the earthly house of this Tabernacle shall be dissolved, we have a building of man, a stately tomb made with hands, and with all the skill of the cunning artificer; we have seen it done already, or we have taken order in our wills to have it done. The believer erects his pillar in heaven, and his whole life is a preparation for his house which is above; and often he settles the business so, that he can say, I know, that when this house of my body is taken down, I have a building, &c. And he can say, I know, with far greater assurance then any worldly man, who hath sealed it in his will, that thus and thus his body shall be intombed. It is a sad thing to take care for a rotting carkass, and forget an immortal soul.

Facilis jactura sepulchri.

Job, having thus parallell'd or compared himself in death, with Kings, Counsellors, and Princes, notwithstanding all their pompous Funerals and curious Tombs, passeth, as it were, in the next verse, to the other extream.

Verse 16. Or as an hidden untimely birth, I had not been, as infants which never saw light.

As if he had said, if any think that I have strained too high, in making my self equal in death with Kings, &c. yet surely I should have been as those, that never knew themselves to be in this world; or as those that the world never knew to be, that is, as an hidden untimely birth; or, as infants which never saw light.

An hidden untimely birth.] The word [Nephel] in the Hebrew, for an untimely birth, comes from [Naphel] which signifieth to fall down, or to fall off, as untimely fruit falls off from a tree; which falling off before it is ripe, is unprofitable and useless. When the mother miscarries, her fruit is like the fruit of a tree, shaken off and falling down before it be ripe, or in the blooming. And the same word is used in the Hebrew, to signifie a Giant: There were (Nephilim) Giants in the earth in those dayes, Gen. 6. 4. And the reason why they are so called, is, as some apprehend, because they were Apostates, such as fell off from God, from true worship and Religion: Or, because they did fall upon men, as that phrase is applied to cruel men, they did fall upon the poor: So the word is used, chap. 1. ver. 15. of this Book. The Sabeans fell upon Job's Oxen, &c. They who fall fall from God by impiety, will quickly fall upon men by cruelty. Or, because the dread and terrour of them made men to fall down for fear before them. It is very observable, that the same word should signifie an infant of less then a span long, and a Giant (it may be) of more then six cubits and a span (1 Sam. 17. 4.) and both upon equal reason, and with equal significancy.

Further, We may take notice, that the Hebrews express any dead body or carkass by the same word; the dead body of the oldest man is called Mappeleth, from the same root and reason too in part, from which they denominate an untimely birth, that never lived a day. When the old man dies, he falls as well as the newly conceived embryon; the one falls off as a blossom from the tree, and the other as the fruit fully ripe, which (if you pull it not off) must fall off. The Greek word for a dead body, and the Latine, have the same reason of their derivation; namely from falling; so saith Job, I had been as one of these untimely births, that fall to the earth before their time. The Apostle Paul saith concerning himself (1 Cor. 15. 3.) I was as one born out of due time; I was an untimely birth. Some of the Naturalists say, that word signifies such abortions as are after the seventh, and before, or at the fortieth day of conception. Others, that it signifies those who are born the eighth moneth; which, usually as they are untimely, so they die. Now Paul calleth himself an untimely birth, to suit the humble thoughts which he had of himself, with an humble expression of himself; which reason he seems to give in the next words, ver. 9. For I am the least of the Apostles, that am not meet to be called an Apostle, &c. Even as an untimely birth is not fit to be called a birth; or, because children that are so born, are very imperfect, they are lesser and weaker then those of full growth: So saith he, I am as a poor abortive, as a child born out of due time; I am the least of the Apostles, and am less then the least of all Saints, Eph. 3. 8. I am not come to that stature and growth of a timely birth. Secondly, He calleth himself an untimely birth, or one born out of due time, probably for this reason, because of the suddenness or violence of his conversion; for you know, every abortion or untimely birth comes from some sudden danger into which the mother falleth; some strain or violence causeth abortion: Paul in this sence was an untimely birth, his conversion was a wonderful violent conversion; Christ came upon him of a sudden, whereas the other Apostles were a great while a forming, a shaping, a fitting to an Apostleship; but Paul was, as it were, in a moment conceived and born, brought forth and perfected an Apostle; and so from the suddenness and violence of his new-birth, he may call himself an untimely birth.

But to pass on from that, to the words of Job, As an hidden untimely birth, I had not been. Here are two things distinct about this birth. First, It is called an untimely birth. Secondly, A hidden birth.

An untimely birth is called a hidden birth, because it is hid from the eyes of others; abortives are unpleasing and undesirable spectacles, therefore they are covered, and laid by; there is no remembrance of their form or likeness; therefore Solomon speaking of an untimely birth, Eccles. 6. 4. thus describes it, He cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness.

As a hidden untimely birth, [¶ had not been.]

An untimely birth is said not to have been. A not being is taken two wayes. First, Strictly, for that which never had any life at all; and so some interpret this; for there are abortions or untimely births before quickning, or before there is any life. Secondly, Not to be, is, not to subsist, or not to live: When that which hath lived, dies, it is said not to be. The Prophet brings in Rachel, weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they were not, Jer. 31. 15. that is, because they were dead. Joseph's Brethren, pleading before unknown Joseph, tell him, Thy servants are twelve brethren, and behold, the youngest is this day with his father, and one is not, Gen. 42. 13. that is, one is dead. So Jacob speaks at ver. 30. of the same Chapter; Joseph is not, &c. Hence that answer of the wise man to Alexander, who demanding of him, whether the living or the dead were more in number? said, the living; for the dead are not.

As infants that never saw the light.] This clause may be an exposition of the former clause, shewing what Job means by an untimely birth; even an infant that never saw the light. Yet all infants that never see the light, are not untimely births. Infants are often still-born, when their mothers have gone out their time to the last hour, before the pains of travail come upon them. And therefore I rather understand this as distinct from the former. In the one Job intending such as are born before time, which births are commonly called abortions or miscarriages. And in the other, those who die in the birth, who are commonly called still-born. The word which is here used for an infant, signifies properly a weaned infant; but it is likewise transferred to signifie an infant dying in the birth; which is therefore said never to see the light; so Solomon expresseth it too, in that place, Eccles. 6. 5. Moreover, he hath not seen the Sun: And in allusion to this, David, when he curseth the plots of wicked men, that though they have conceived mischief, and though they have gone with it a long time, and are ready to bring it forth; yet, in Psal. 58. 8. saith he, Let them be (that is, let their counsels and designes be) like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun; that is, let them be dashed and blasted, let them never bring forth their poysonous brood, to the hurt and trouble of the world. To these, saith Job, I am sure, I should have been like, if not to Kings and Counsellors, and it had been as well, and all one to me. In death, untimely births, and those that go down to the grave, as a sheaf of corn that cometh in ripe, are all one; there is no difference in the grave, between the Infant that never saw the sun, and him that hath lived to see an hundred recourses of the sun.

The speech of Job proceeds to a third soft; he strengthens his argument of rest in death. I should certainly have had rest in death; for in death, even they who have been most vexed, who have had least rest, who have been even restless in the world, they have found rest in death; this he clears by a further induction, in vers. 17, 18, 19.

There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest.

There the prisoners rest together, they hear not the voyce of the oppressor.

The small and great are there, and the servant is free from his master.

When he had spoken of the rest of death, concerning those great and mighty ones; and the rest of death, concerning untimely births and infants; then he speaks of the rest which poor oppressed ones, or which wicked oppressors have in death; all these have a rest in regard of outward bodily troubles, agitations and labours, in the grave, therefore certainly there I should have been at rest.

There (that is, in the grave) the wicked cease from troubling.] True rest and wickedness never meet; rest and the wicked meet but seldom. And it is but half a rest, and it is rest but to half a wicked man, to his bones in the grave; and it is rest to that half but for a little time, only till the resurrection.

The word which is here used for wicked, is considerable: Though every wicked man be a sinner, yet every sinner is not a wicked man: It is one thing to sin, and another thing to be wicked; there are divers words in the hebrew tongue, which signifie, as it were, the divers statures of sinners, and the degrees of sin; and the hebrew, which usually expresseth many things by one word, doth here use many words to signifie one thing, only differing in degree.

First, A sinner is called sometime [Cata] that's the lowest expression; noting one that doth miss a mark, or his way; he aimes at the mark, yet misses it; he would go in the right way, yet mistakes it, or is misled: So every man, the holiest men are sinners; they often miss the mark, the white which God sets up, though they take their aim, and carefully level at it.

vel infirmitate carnis committuntur, Moller. in psal. 106. v. 6.

Secondly, A sinner is called [Peshang] which signifieth a willingness to sin, and an unwillingness to obey; it signifieth pride in sinning, or a sinning from pride, which is plain rebellion.

Thirdly, The word here used, and in divers other places, signifieth wickedness in the height, and men most active in wickedness. So that when Job saith, There the wicked are at rest, he means, those who had been restless in sin, who could could not sleep, till they had done mischief, nor scarce sleep for doing mischief; he means those, who had out-run others in the sinful activity, or rather turbulency and unquietness of their spirits; such as are without peace themselves, and seek to molest and disturb the peace of others: The Prophet describes them to be like the troubled sea, which cannot rest, (Isa. 57. 20.) The proper signification of the word (wicked) in the hebrew, is the word unquiet, vexatious, or without rest, 1 Sam. 14. 47. Whereſoever Saul turned himſelf, he vexed the enemy. So, Job 34. 29. And the reason of it is given, because men of this height and stature in sin, are men of troubled, unquiet and restless spirits. As it notes a height in holiness and grace, to have a kind of unquietness upon the spirit, till we can do good, and compass holy designs and purposes; when we are not only pious, but zealous; as David resolves, Psal. 132. 3, 4. Surely I will not come into the Tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed; I will not give sleep to mine eyes, nor slumber to mine eye-lids, until I find out a place for the Lord, &c. So unquietness upon the spirit, till it can put sin into act, and compass an evil project, notes a compleatness in the sinner. Sin wakes and works in them to purpose, who cannot sleep till they have wrought out their sin; of these, it is properly, that Job speaks here; these troublers of themselves, and troublers of Israel; these, whom the Lord shall trouble this day, or one day: There so, in the grave, these wicked ones cease from troubling; there they have a kind of rest, being dead, who could not rest while they lived; there, at least, they cease from raging. This word (Ragaz) notes any vehement motion, either of mind or body, arising from fear, or grief, or anger, or the concurrence of them all: As when David heard of the death of Absolom, the text saith, 2 Sam. 18. 33. The King was much moved, &c. He was, as it were, for a time, enraged and distracted, much troubled, I am sure, with passions, or the working of many passions together. The word, you see, in the hebrew, hath a near affinity in sound and sence, with our English word raging; and we translate it so, Psal. 2. Why do the heathen rage? It is the same word; so here, the wicked cease from raging, or, from troubling; that is, from that madness of rage in troubling the poor, especially such as fear God: Wicked men are not only sinful, but they are mad in their sin; as Paul speaks of himself before his conversion; I punished them oft in every Synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange Cities, Acts 26. 11. In Paul unconverted, see the picture of a wicked mans spirit; he could not cease from troubling, but in death he shall.

And there the weary are at rest.

The weary.] Some, by the weary, understand those whom the wicked have wearied, by troubling them; and that is a truth, that in the grave, the wearied, those that wicked men have turmoiled and vexed, are at rest. But rather, by the wearied, we are to understand only the wicked themselves; There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest, that is, there those wicked men, who weary and tire out themselves with vexing and troubling of others, are at rest; they then cease from those vexatious undertakings, which have consumed their spirits, and worn out their bodies; and the reason why I rather expound the weary to be the wicked (though the other be a good sence) is, because Job afterward speaks of the rest of those that are wearied, who are passive under the cruelties and plottings of those wicked ones, There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest. Hence observe,

First, That, Wicked men are troublers both of themselves and others.

There the wicked cease from troubling; as if the wicked did nothing in the world, but trouble the world. As before Job had given the special character of great ones and Princes, They get Gold, build Palaces and Sepulchers, and fill them with treasure: So, when he speaks of wicked ones, he saith, There the wicked cease from troubling; as intimating, that while they live in the world, they are a perpetual trouble to the world. The Prophet Isaiah is express, (chap. 57. 20.) The wicked are as the troubled sea, that cannot rest; they can do any thing better, then be quiet; they have not strength enough to sit still, they cannot rest. King Ahab had this apprehension of Elijah (1 Kings 18. 17.) when the Kingdom of Israel was full of trouble (for God did vex them with great adversity.) Art not thou he (saith Ahab) that troubleth Israel? No, saith Elijah (who could make up a better judgment then Ahab, in that point) I am not he that troubleth Israel, but it is thou and thy fathers house. Ahab had sold himself to work wickedness, and so had stock enough to purchase trouble for Israel: Wicked ones are the troublers of all; they are troublers of their own families, troublers of the places and cities where they live, the troublers of a whole Kingdom, troublers of the Churches of Christ, and the troublers of their own souls; they are born to trouble both active and passive, they love to trouble, and they have what they love: It is the character, and the argument of an extream wicked man, to be a troubler; even as it is a great argument of great grace, when you see one a comforter of others, or busie to help others, to do good to others: The tree is known by its fruits.

Secondly, Taking the latter words of this verse (There the weary be at rest) for those wicked men who are wearied by troubling others, we may observe,

That, Wicked men, by troubling others, do as much weary and tire out themselves.

And though they find, that in troubling others, they weary themselves, yet they will not give it over, they will trouble still. Job saith thus of a wicked man in chap. 15. of this Book, v. 20. The wicked man travaileth with pain all his dayes; not only doth he put others to pain, but himself is in pain: and they are frequently expressed in Scripture, as wearying themselves; sometimes, as weary of themselves; so Jer. 9. 5. They weary themselves to commit iniquity. And, Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels, Isa. 47. 13. Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way, Isa. 57. 10. and that was but a way of troubling the Church: She wearieth her self with lies, Ezek. 24. 12. The sins which wicked men commit only in and against themselves, weary them; but they are most wearied, when they are persecutors of others. It is observed of Antiochus Epiphanes, that famous troubler of the Church (by him that hath written the Itinerary of the Saints) that he did undertake more troublesom journyes, and went upon more hazardous designes, meerly to trouble, and vex, and oppose the Church of the Jews, then ever any of his predecessors did about any other conquest or noble enterprize; that he travelled more miles to do mischief, then (as the Author doth compare their journies) any of the Saints did to do good; and therefore he concludes the story of him, with this general truth concerning persecutors, All such wicked men go with more trouble to eternal death, then the Saints do to eternal life; they toil themselves more, and suffer more, to work out their own damnation, then the godly do, in working out their salvation: To be wicked in the height, is the height of trouble. Solomon saith, that a good man is merciful to his beast, but a wicked man is unmerciful to himself; he will tire himself more then a good man will tire his beast. This is a certain truth, he that will follow sin, and serve his own lusts (especially the lusts of pride and oppression, whosoever serveth those lusts) serveth a hard master, a master that will make him toil and sweat, and weary himself while he lives, and at last pay him with death. The work of sin is bad enough, but (as to the sinner) the wages of sin is worse.

The last thing I shall note from it is this; There the wicked cease from troubling. There, where is that? At the grave, when they come to die, they make an end of their troubling, not before. Hence observe, Wicked men will never cease troubling, until they cease to live.

In the grave they cease troubling; there they are at rest; If they should live an eternity in this world, they would trouble the world to eternity. As a godly man never gives over doing good, he will do good as long as he lives, though he fetches many a weary step; so wicked men never give over doing evil, until they step into the grave: And the reason of it is, because it is their nature to do evil; and that which men do naturally, they do alwayes, they never give it over. Nothing but death can suspend and stop nature.

There are indeed two cases wherein wicked men cease troubling, troubling, while they live; one is, when they are desperate in their designs, and see they cannot by troubling themselves, trouble others sufficiently; when they cannot have their will, nor compass their ends fully; they being in despair of doing the mischief they would, will do no more: So the Historian notes concerning Diocletian, the most bloody persecutor that ever the Church had; at last he gave over the empire, and declined the government (not because he was weary of persecuting, but he was weary of being disappointed) because he saw he could not hatch that which he had long brooded, or bring forth those designes he had contrived for the utter extirpation of the Christians: Being thus out of hope to do all the mischief he intended, he puts himself out of power to do that mischief, resignes the Empire. A second case, wherein wicked men cease troubling, is, when they have fully attained their ends in this life; sometimes they bring their work to such a perfection, to such a period, that they think they have attained all, all their plots have taken, all's theirs; and when they have fully done the Devils work, then he gives them a play day, they have some cessation: But otherwise, except in these two cases, they never cease from troubling; therefore the Apostle Paul, Gal. 5. 12. prayeth, that they which trouble them, might even be cut off: As if he had said, they are such a kind of men, there is no curing of them; they will never have done doing mischief, until they be cut off by death. As God threatens death, to deter men from sin; so sometimes, he is (as it were) constrained to send death to keep men off from sin: A godly man saith, If God kill me, yet will I trust in him; and some wicked men say (in effect, if not in the letter) till God kills us, we will sin against him. The Psalmist asks the question, Psal. 94. 4, 5. How long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph? How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves? They break in pieces thy people, O Lord. What answer shall we give, what date shall we put to this, How long? The answer is given, ver. 23. The Lord shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the Lord our God shall cut them off. As if he had said, except the Lord cut them off in their wickedness, they will never leave off doing wickedly. The wicked (saith Hannah, in her song, 1 Sam. 2. 9.) shall be silent in darkness. The wicked will sin while they have any light to sin by; therefore God puts out their candle, and sends them down into darkness, and there they will be quiet; The wicked shall be silent in darkness. They will sin against the light of the word, as long as they enjoy the light of the world; and do the works of spiritual darkness, till they are shut up in pœnal darkness. It follows,

Existimant aliqui Diocletianum etiam dolore motum fuisse, ut imperium deponeret cum perficere se non posse videret ea quæ contra Christianos molitus fuerat. Chr. Pez. Mellif. hist. Par. 2.

Quam mortem comminatus est Deus homini, ut à peccando illum deterreat; eandem ipsum infert ut à peccando cesset.

There the prisoners rest together, they hear not the voyce of the oppressor.

Here is another sort [The prisoners.]. The word is, those that are bound: And these prisoners may be of two sorts. First, Slaves and captives, who are under hard task-masters, such as set them to hard labour; or, men that are in debt, and put into prison, by cruel Creditors: Prisoners, in either of these respects, are at rest, or they rest together in the grave: When they have paid that debt to nature, all their other debts are discharged; death is their debt to nature, and when they have paid that debt, they (saith Job) receive an acquittance (a quietus est) they rest together; when they have done that work, the work of dying, poor captives and prisoners have done all, and paid all.

Will It is added [They hear not the voyce of the oppressor.] The word which we translate an oppressor, signifieth, by violence to compel one to work or to pay a debt: So the Task-masters, Exod. 5. are said to compel the people with violence, to go on about the work. The same word signifieth both an Exacter and an Oppressor; an exacter of debt, an exacter of tribute, an exacter of labour; in all these wayes the word is used: and because those three (tribute, debt and labour) are demanded many times against right and equity, often with much violence and cruelty, therefore the word signifies also an oppressor: Exaction is alwayes within a step of oppression, and is often put for the same; and because oppressors use bitter words, and hard speeches, wounding with their tongues, as much as with their hands; therefore poor prisoners dying, are said to be free from the voice of the oppressor. Poor prisoners hear not the voice of the oppressor in the grave; there they are beyond the sound, and out of the hearing of those vexing, railing task-masters, or exacting creditors. Hence observe,

First, That, An estate of bondage is a miserable restless estate.

There the prisoners rest together. Captives and bond-men have little rest, until they rest in the grave: The language of prisoners is a sorrowful language; their speech is sighs, Psal. 79. 11. Let the sighing of the prisoners come before thee. And, Psal. 12. 5. Because of the oppression of the poor, and for the sighing of the needy. It is a restless condition, which yields nothing but sighs and groans: Indeed we read in the Acts (chap. 16. 25.) of prisoners that spake another language, even the language of joy; we read there of the singing of the prisoners; Paul and Silas did not sigh, but sing in the night, while they were bound in prison; but this was extraordinary: They, receiving enlargement of heart, and wonderful consolation from the holy Ghost, pray in prison, and sing praise to God; Christ sent the Comforter that night to them, who made them a feast in the prison, and they sung to it, they made musick, heavenly musick; they sung praise to God. It was not from the good chear, or any comfortable message which they had from the Jaylor, or from their oppressors; but Christ came and visited them: any place, or any estate is comfortable, when Christ is present to the soul; but in it self, imprisonment is a sad condition. Therefore the Apostle biddeth us, remember those that are in bonds, even as bound with them, Heb. 13. 3. And Christ takes a prison-visit as a special point of service and kindness done unto him; I was in prison, and ye visited me; Mat. 25. 36. I, in my afflicted members was in prison, and your visit was an ease to my affliction, and (as it were) a loosening of my chains. Now therefore remember the bondage and captivity, the hard usage and imprisonment that many suffer from their Oppressors. Let the sighing of the prisoners come up before you, even the sighing of those Josephs, whose feet are hurt in the stocks, and the iron enters into their souls; as some translate that Psal. 105. 18. When you are at your tables, and have plenty, then remember the bread of adversity, and water of affliction which many poor prisoners, are served with, and must be contented with every day, or starve in prison. When you are in your pleasant warm chambers, and soft beds, think of the cold, loathsom dungeons and hard boards, in which, and on which many of them lie. And when you hear the voice of love, and such speaking to you, who have the law of kindness in their tongues, Prov. 31. 26. then remember those who hear the voyce of the oppressor. From which, take this second Observation,

That, The words of oppressors are wounding words.

The voice of an oppressor is a terrible voice; and therefore Job puts this in, as a special priviledge, that the poor prisoners shall have in the grave, They shall not hear the voice of the oppressor: Who can rest where they speak, or hear their words, and not be troubled? Therefore, not to hear the voice of the oppressor, is a circumlocution, noting full liberty. The wild Ass is so described, Job 39. 7. He regardeth not the crying, or the voice of the driver; the original word is that in the text, he regardeth not the voice of the oppressor, or of the exacter. This is the liberty of the wild ass, which was never in hand or under burdens; whereas other asses that are in hand, and are employed to bear and travel, they must be at the voice of the driver, they hear the voice of their oppressors; and some men are very unmerciful to their beasts; it is grievous to the poor cattel to hear the voice of such drivers; and the groans of those beasts will rise up in judgment against their drivers: And if so, how then will the groans of the Saints rise up against their drivers? We have heard of oppressors turned drivers, they have driven their poor brethren as beasts or cattel, before them; and more cruel then any such driver; they have not suffered them to drink of the pudled water through which they passed: And yet more, the words of these drivers, as goads and staves, beat their ears, and prick'd them to the very hearts in their passage. The voice of these oppressors is the voice of scorn, the voice of slander and reproach; and David shews us from his own experience, how reproaches work (Psal. 42. 10.) as Non audire vocem exactoris, circumlocutio est maximæ libertatis.

with a sword in my bones mine enemies reproach me: And the Apostle (Heb. 11. 36.) speaks of the believing, persecuted Jews, that they had this tryal of cruel mockings; their oppressors sharpened their tongues, as well as their swords, against them. The tongue wounds deeper then the sword; the tongue wounds the spirit, but the sword cannot reach beyond the flesh: And God will take as deep, if not a deeper revenge upon oppressors for their tongue-woundings, then for their sword-woundings: hard words as well as hard blows must be accounted for. And the Apostle Jude assures us, ver. 15. That the Lord cometh to execute vengeance upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly amongst them, of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. If any shall say, when did we speak against the Lord? Christ will answer as in the Gospel, (Matth. 25.) In as much as you have spoken against any one (and you have spoken against many) of the least of these my brethren, ye have spoken against me. To how many of my brethren, have you said, many times, Where is now your God? To how many have you said, as they (Psal. 22. 9.) in that propheſie of Christ, You trusted on the Lord, that he would deliver you, let him deliver you? To how many have you said, Where are your prayers and fastings? where are your hopes? These are hard speeches. This voice of the oppressor cuts the heart of the poor prisoner; he can with more ease dye, then hear such blasphemies and reproaches. The wicked (Mal. 3. 13.) bluster and speak big against God himself; Your words have been stout against me, saith the Lord: if wicked men will speak stoutly against God, the high God, how stoutly will they speak against a poor oppressed captive, that lyes under their feet?

Seeing then it is such a wound, and a terror, to be under the power of insulting oppressors, who will not only strike with the sword, but strike with every word: Let us pity and pray for those that are under the hands, yea, feet, and which is worse, under the tongues of such drivers; pity them, in regard of the wants which they feel, and of the reproachful words that they hear. And let us betimes hearken to another voice, that we may not at last come to hear this voice, O that my people had hearkened unto me (saith God, Psal. 81.) If we would hearken to the voice of God, we should not hear the voice of such men. It is the punishment which God lays upon a people, (and it is a sutable punishment) for not hearing his voice, that he gives them up to hear this voice: when a Nation will not hear the voice of the Prophets, then they must hear the voice of oppressors: Let us hasten to hear the voice, the sweet voice, the pleasant voice of our God in his Ministers of the Gospel, lest we be given up to hear the dreadful, grating, cutting voice of such, who are the Ministers of Gods just displeasure against a disobedient people. If we, like the deaf adder, stop our ears at the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely, (Psal. 58. 5.) doubtless the Lord will (yea he hath done it in part already) send Serpents and Cockatrices among us, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite us, (with bitter and sharp words,) Jer. 8. 17. Let us therefore so hear the voice of the word, that we may be delivered from this rod of the voice (which smarts worse then the voice of the rod,) and and from the scourge of tongues. And let us pray, that God would hasten the performance, either of that gracious promise, (Isa. 14. 2.) They shall take them captives, whose captives they were, and they shall rule over their oppressors: or of that (Isa. 60. 17.) that he would make those great and notable changes in the Church, and give us for brass gold, and for iron silver, and for wood brass, and for stone iron: That he would also make our Officers peace, and our Exactors righteousness: This will be a time of refreshing indeed. And as the time of the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy Prophets, since the world began, Acts 3. 21. namely, when our Officers shall be peace, and our very Oppressors righteousness: When the very troublers of a people become their peace, how great is that peace? when they who were the oppressors of a people, are turned to be, very righteousness, how great is that righteousness? And where there is great righteousness, and great peace, how great is the joy of that people? Yet however the wise God shall order these outward dispensations, yet His prisoners have freedom in, though not from their captivity; and they shall hear the voice of his Spirit speaking more comfort to their hearts, then the voice of their oppressors can speak terror to their ears: and their ears shall not long be smitten with the hard speeches of ungodly men; death, a blessed death, will shortly lead them into the house and chambers of silence, where, as Job here speaks, they shall never hear the voice of the oppressor any more.

Vers. 19. The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master.

The last instance which Job gives of rest in death, is contained in this nineteenth verse. In the words before he said, There the prisoners rest together, they hear not the voice of the oppressor: here he adds, The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master.

The small and the great are there.

Small and great.] There is two-fold quantity, in which men may be considered. There is a natural quantity, and there is a civil quantity; and in both quantities, small and great are there.

First, There is a natural quantity, by which men are distinguished into small and great; children, and men of full growth: In the grave such small and great are mixed: little children, children of a span long, mingle their dust with men of highest stature.

Again, There is a civil quantity, and so the small are the poor, the low, and the mean; they are small ones in a civil account: And civil greatness, is power, riches and honour; the honourable, they are the great men, and the rich are great men, in a civil quantity; so the word is used, Chap. 1. ver. 3. Job was the greatest of all the men of the East; he was the greatest in civil quantity, in regard of his power, honour and riches. The Prophet Jeremy opposes the poor and the great, (Chap. 5. ver. 4, 5.) Therefore I said, surely these are poor, &c. I will get me unto the great men, scil. the rich and honourable, the Princes and the Magistrates.

The small and the great are there. In Scripture, when we find the two extreams, (small and great are extreams in quantity) we are to understand all the middle acts, or things, or persons, that is, all that lyes between those extreams. We read such Scripture language concerning the actions of men, Psal. 139. 2. Thou knowest my down-sitting and my up-rising: Here are two extreams, the two terms of a mans actions and of his life, his down-sitting, and his up-rising; now when it is said, God knows these two, we are to understand, that God knows whatsoever a man doth, all his actions between his down-sitting and his up-rising. So in that promise of a continual blessing from God: Psal. 121. 8. The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in. Here are two extreams; between these, we are to include and suppose all that a man doth while he is abroad. God shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in; that is, every thing thou takest in hand (according to his will) from the time thou goest forth, or beginnest thy work in the morning, till thy coming home from work, or the end of thy work in the evening; thus it is clear about things, or actions: It is likewise clear about persons, Psal. 49. 2. when David calls high and low, rich and poor, to hear, he calls all to hear; Give ear all ye inhabitants of the world, ver. 1. So when it is said in this Text, The small and the great are there, it is not, as if those were only there; or that those of a middle quantity, either in regard of natural, or civil proportion, were not there; for death seizeth upon middle men, as well as small and great: There are graves of all imaginable sizes, and dimensions, between small and great: According to that of the Apostle, Heb. 9. 27. It is appointed to men once to dye; to men indefinitely, of what sort, or degree, or size, or quantity, or quality soever: It is appointed to men; therefore small and great are there; and many of all sorts are there.

There is a further elegancy yet in the original; we read it, Small and great are there, but the Hebrew, strictly read in the letter, runs thus, The small and the great are there the same: Or as Mr. Broughton renders it, Little and great are there all one. The words taken thus, yield these two points to our meditation.

First, this; Death seizeth equally upon all sorts and degrees of men.

Ex æquo ille sunt tam parvi quam magni, secundum illud, Mors sceptra ligoni-bus æquat. Drus.

The ſmall and the great are there; The ſmall cannot eſcape the hands, or ſlip through the fingers of death, becauſe they are little; the greateſt cannot reſcue themſelves from the power, or break out of the hands of death, becauſe they are big.

That the ſmall are there, ſhould be an admonition to young ones, Take heed of putting off repentance until you are great, for the ſmall are in the grave: That the great are there, ſhould be an admonition to the greateſt and ſtrongeſt, to prepare for death; for all your ſtrength and greatneſs, your honours, your ſwelling titles, your vaſt riches, cannot oppoſe, much leſs prevent, or overcome death. The ſmall and the great are there.

Secondly, Obſerve, That death makes all men equal; or, That all are equal in death.

As death equally takes hold of all men, ſo death makes all men equal; not only are the ſmall and the great there, but there the ſmall and the great are the ſame: Death takes away all diſtinctions, and the grave knows no difference among the ſons of men. While men live, they are at a great diſtance one from another. There is, and there ought to be, diſtinctions among men; and men ought to know their terms of diſtance, and to acknowledge men in their greatneſs, power, and places. As there is one glory of the Sun, and another glory of the Moon, and another glory of the Stars, for one Star differeth from another Star in glory, 1 Cor. 15. 41. So there is one terreſtial glory of Kings, and another glory of Nobles, and another glory of the Common-people, and theſe have not the ſame glory in common; even among them, one man differs from another man in this worldly glory; but when death comes, there is an end of all degrees, of all diſtinctions, There the ſmall and the great are the ſame. As the Apoſtle ſpeaks of our being in Chriſt, in regard of the priviledges of the Goſpel, Col. 3. 11. In Chriſt there is neither Jew, nor Gentile; there is neither male, nor female; there is neither bond, nor free; that is, all have a like and an equal ſhare in Chriſt, and in the priviledges of the Goſpel: the Goſpel makes no diſtinction between poor and rich, in regard of ſpiritual priviledges and benefits; ſo death takes away all diſtinctions in regard of civil priviledges: In death there is neither ſmall, nor great, neither male, nor female; neither bond, nor free; the greateſt ſhall lye as low as the ſmalleſt; and the higheſt, as low as the meaneſt; every one there ſhall be but as his neighbour, and as his brother in the fleſh. There is but one diſtinction that will out-live death; and death cannot take it away; the diſtinction of holy and unholy, clean and unclean, believer and an Infidel; theſe diſtinctions remain after death, and ſhall remain for ever; but rich and poor, honourable and baſe, high and low, King and ſubject, theſe diſtinctions ſhall be done away, and forgotten, as if they had never been: no difference, no diſtinction, (but that which God makes, and that which Grace makes) can ſtand out againſt the power and ſtroke of death; There, the ſmall and the great are the ſame.

And the ſervant is free from his Maſter.

The ſervant.] There are two ſorts of ſervants. There are ſome who are voluntary ſervants, and others who are ſervants by conſtraint. There are ſome who might be free, but they will not; and there are others, who would be free, but they cannot. Of the former ſort we read a Law, Exod. 21. 5. where the ſervant that loved his Maſter, and refuſed his freedom, ſaying, I will not go out free, muſt be brought before the Judges, and have his ears bored through with an awl, in token of his willingneſs to ſerve that Maſter for ever. Others are ſervants by conſtraint, as the people of Iſrael in Egypt; who were made to ſerve with rigour, Exod. 1. 14. to ſerve whether they would or no, which is ſervitude rather then ſervice.

We may underſtand the Text of both, The ſervant; that is, either he that doth voluntarily ſerve, and willingly puts himſelf under the command of another; or he, which is under the command of another whether he will or no: to both theſe death giveth freedom, whether their Maſters will or no; The ſervant is free from his Maſter.

The word which we tranſlate [is free] noteth that formal manumiſſion, or ſetting at liberty, which is uſed in places, or Corporations, where freedoms are either purchaſed by money, or deſerved by appointed ſervice.

And the word here tranſlated, [Maſter] is plural, Maſters: It is one of the Names of God, Adonai, which Name the Lord hath from government: That very name is given to Maſters of Families, becauſe they ought to govern and order the affairs and buſineſs of the family, with wiſdom and juſtice; Every Maſter of a family, is a governour of the family; he is (as it were) a King in his own family. The ſervant is free from his Maſter.

Tria ſunt quorum terminatio pluralis & ſenſus ſingularis, videlicet Adonim Dominus, Elohim Deus, Bagnalim, Herus.

Hence note, Firſt, Sin brought in ſervility, and the ſubjection of man to man.

I ground it thus, becauſe Job ſpeaks of ſervice, as of an eſtate of affliction, as of an eſtate of trouble, under which many groan, and ſets them free.

In the ſtate of innocency, there was a dominion granted to man over the beaſts, but there was no dominion granted to man over man: In the ſtate of integrity relations ſhould have continued, but ſubjection ſhould not have been found: only that natural ſubjection of Children to Parents; but as for civil ſubjection, there had been no ſuch thing in the world. Before man forſook the ſervice of God, he needed none to ſerve him; ſervice comes in by ſin, and the increaſe of it, by the increaſe of ſin: As we ſee, when Canaan was ſo vile as to forget the duty of a ſon, he is ſet below, or in the worſt condition of a ſervant, Gen. 9. 5. Curſed be Canaan, a ſervant of ſervants ſhall he be unto his brethren; that is, the loweſt and moſt abject ſervant: As God of Gods, is the greateſt God; and Lord of Lords, is the higheſt Lord; ſo ſervant of ſervants, is the loweſt, the baſeſt ſervant: So then, as civil ſubjection came at firſt from ſin, ſo the increaſe of ſubjection, which is to be a ſervant of ſervants, came from the increaſe and progreſs of ſin.

Gen. 1. 26.

Peccatum ubi intravit, libertatem perdidit & corrupit poteſtatem naturæ datam. Chryſoſt. Hom. 29. in Gen. Subſtantivũ ſeipſum genitivo caſu regens, ſuperlativam locutionem cum ſingulari energia denotat. Buxtorf. Servus abjectiſſimus.

Obſerve ſecondly; A ſervant is not in his own diſpoſe.

Though he be a voluntary ſervant, yet he muſt ſerve the lawful will of his Maſter. He may, yea he ought, in every ingenuous ſervice, to ſerve willingly; but he is not at his own will, to ſerve when, or where, or how he will.

Some have thought they have freedom from ſervice, by the liberty of the Goſpel, or Goſpel-priviledge: and that is the reaſon why the Apoſtle, 1 Tim. 6. 1. gives that rule, Let as many ſervants as are under the yoak, count their own Maſters worthy of all honour, &c. He ſpeaks of believing ſervants. Some preſumed they had ſuch freedom by Chriſt, that they might caſt off ſubjection to men: No, ſaith the Apoſtle, As many as are under the yoak; that is, while they continue ſervants, they muſt ſubmit to their condition; yea, though their Maſters be unbelievers, as the next verſe ſhews, And they that have believing Maſters, let them not deſpiſe them, &c. nothing takes away ſubjection, but death; For as he that is called in the Lord, being a ſervant, is the Lords free-man, 1 Cor. 7. 22. So he that is the Lords free-man, being called to it, is and ought to be mans ſervant: The Centurion in the Goſpel ſhews the ſervants duty; I ſay unto one, go, and to another, come, and he cometh, and to my ſervant do this, and he doeth it. The ſervant is at his Maſters beck, not at his own diſpoſe, and nothing can free him but death, ſo long as he continues under the yoak, in that relation.

Hence obſerve, Thirdly, That death concludes the ſubjection of man to man.

In the grave, or There, the ſervant is free from his Maſter; there is no more ſervice due to man, when once Death, that King of terrors, hath carried us into his dominions.

VERS. 20, 21, 22.

Wherefore is light given to him that is in miſery, and life unto the bitter in ſoul?
Which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more then for hid treaſures:
Which rejoyce exceedingly, and are glad when they can find the grave, &c.

AT this twentieth verſe, the third and laſt Section of the Chapter begins, Wherefore is light given to him that is in miſery, and life to the bitter in ſoul?

In

In the former part of the Chapter, Job wished that death had surprized him as soon as ever he set foot into the world, yea before he came into the world, that he might have dyed in the very womb: Here Job begins to expostulate, why he having made so long a journey, and in his latter time so troublesome a journey in the world, why (I say) he is not (at his request) cut off and taken away, by the stroke of death; Why is life given to him that is in misery, and life to the bitter in soul? We may frame his argument thus, out of his words, as they are here couched; There is no reason, or if there be, shew me a reason why his life should be prolonged, who liveth miserably, and would dye willingly: But I am the man who live miserably, and I would dye willingly: wherefore then? where is the reason, or shew me a reason why my life is prolonged? That is the force of his argument. The main Proposition of the argument is contained in vers. 20, 21, 22, 23. namely, that there is no reason why a man that liveth miserably, should be denied to dye, Wherefore is light given to a man that is in misery? He endeavours to prove the Assumption at vers. 24. where he shews that he lived in great misery, which he doth amplifie in the two last verses of the Chapter. This may serve for the sum, and scope, or intendment of this last Section.

To the words themselves. Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery?

Wherefore. There is a wherefore in Scripture, first of doubting; and secondly, there is a wherefore of mourning; and thirdly, a wherefore of complaining. In this wherefore, in this question, we may include all three. Job doubteth; and Job mourneth; and Job complaineth; Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery?

Wherefore is light.

Ad quid prodest homini in miseriis constituto, quod lucem cognitionis habeat, cum per eam consideret mala quibus affligitur. Aquin. in loc.

Light. Some take light here for knowledge; Wherefore hath a miserable man so much knowledge to see himself, and to know himself miserable? It is some abatement to the sense of misery, not to know that we are miserable; Wherefore is light given? If I did not understand the sadness of my condition, it would be less to me. There is a truth in that; and it is the thing that will so much torment and vex the damned to all eternity, that while they are in the darkness of hellish misery, they shall have so much light in Hell, (I mean the light of knowledge concerning their own condition, whereby they shall fully and clearly discern their own unhappiness;) if they were ignorant and did not know how miserable they were, their estate were far less miserable. On earth, the light of the knowledge of Gods will increases the sin of men; in Hell, the light of the knowledge of their own woe, will be an increase of their punishment. As Christ saith to the Jews, John 9. 41. If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say we see, therefore your sin remaineth. So we may say of those who are separated from Christ for ever; if ye were blind, ye should have no sorrow; but now because in that estate of utter darkness, ye shall have both eyes and light to see your misery, therefore your sorrow shall remain. When a wicked man goes to the generation of his fathers, where he shall never see light, scil. of comfort, Psal. 49. 19. even then he shall have light enough, (and more then he would have) to see his sorrow. And in Hell he shall be as much pained with, and hate the light of his own condition, as upon earth he hated and was pained with the light of divine revelation, John 3. 20, &c. So that the damned shall for ever cry out, Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery?

Yet I take not this to be the sence here, Wherefore is light? by light here understand natural light, and then it is no more but this, Why do mine eyes behold the Sun? Wherefore doth the light shine upon me, when as I am under the clouds and in the darkness of this condition? Or by light, we may understand life; and so the sence is, Wherefore is life continued, (which is expressed in the next clause,) to him that is in misery?

To be in misery, is more then to be miserable. As to be in the flesh, notes, a meer carnal man, and to be in the spirit, notes a very spiritual man; so to be in misery, notes a very miserable man. The Hebrew word properly signifies, labour: At the tenth verse it was translated, sorrow: And it notes any toilsome molestation, which either we our selves endure, (Psal. 25. 18.) or cause others, by guile or mischief done them, to endure. Hence it is translated guile, Psal. 55. 11. and mischief, (Psal. 94. 20.) because by these, one man troubles and vexes another, to the making of him miserable.

miseria, & sæpe utro modo sumitur sonjunctim, ut in Ecclesiaste, ubi vitæ humanæ calamitas & miseria ipso vocabulo explicatur.

And life to the bitter in soul.

Life. Is the union of soul and body: when life departeth, soul and body take leave and part. The Philosopher defines life to be the bond or colligation of soul and body together: Now (saith Job) why is this life? why is this bond continued to a man whose soul is in bitterness? While my life was pleasant, it was pleasant to live; while my soul was sweet, it was sweet to have it knit to my body; but now my soul is in bitterness, or I am bitter in soul, and what sweetness or pleasure can I find in my body?

לְמָרֵי נָפֶשׁ Qui præ calamitate animo sunt acerbo & perpetua mœstitia; Merc.

To the bitter in soul. Notes deep, intrinsical, or inward sorrow; the greatest sorrow, makes the soul bitter: As in Scripture, when we find Soul added, respecting the evil of an estate, or the good of an estate, evil and good are meant in the highest degree: As when Christ saith, Mat. 26. 38. My soul is exceeding heavy, or exceeding sorrowful, even unto death; that is, I am in the lowest deeps of sorrow: Sorrow unto death, is sorrow within one step or degree of death. My soul is sorrowful. There can be no sorrow but in the soul; the body (take it as distinct from the soul) is not capable of sorrow; sorrow is a passion, or an affection of the soul, an affection of the mind, and therefore all sorrow is seated in the mind; yet when our Lord Christ saith, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, it is far more then to have said, there is sorrow, or exceeding much sorrow in my soul. So here, this phrase, To him that is bitter in soul; or whose soul is bitter; notes the most bitter and grievous sorrow. When the Psalmist would set forth the great sorrow of Joseph in prison, Psal. 105. 18. One Translation saith, That the iron entred into his soul; and the Hebrew, word for word, is this, His soul came into iron. We know the soul is so pure, and spiritual, that iron cannot enter it; We know that only the body can be bound with chains. The soul could quickly slip from the most watchful Keeper, and break out from the strongest irons, were it not to keep company with the body. Whereas then it is said, His soul came into irons; it is only to shew, that Joseph was under very sore affliction, even the sorest affliction of the body. As on the other side, when Mary said, My soul doth magnifie the Lord, my spirit rejoyceth in God my Saviour. We know, nothing properly can magnifie the Lord, or rejoyce, but the spirit or the soul; yet when she saith, My spirit doth rejoyce; this notes a deep, pure, internal, spiritual joy, with which she was ravish'd at that time: And as they, who rejoyce in soul, would even willingly be rid of their bodies, they are above the body: So they, who are bitter in soul, are desirous to be rid of their bodies; the body is a burden when the soul is bitter. This bitterness of soul caused those bitter complaints before, and now this vehement expostulation.

Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery?

Wherefore? We are apt to think there is no reason for that, for which we can see no reason. Job was in a dark condition, and could not see the reason, and therefore almost concludes there was none. When we are posed, we think all the world is posed too. If we cannot interpret and expound the dealings of God, we think none can; nay, in such cases, some are ready to think (at least to speak, as if they thought) that God himself can scarce give a good account of them: This wherefore goes through the earth, and reaches Heaven. Tell me, O my friends, shew me, O my God, Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery?

Why Job, there may be many reasons, many answers given to this, wherefore a man should be in light, though he be in misery; and why his life should be continued, though his soul be in bitterness. What if God should appear and tell thee, It shall be thus; and the reason of it is, because I will have it so: Is not that therefore answer enough, to any mans wherefore? The will of God is reason enough for man, and ought to be the most satisfying reason: If God say, I will have life remain in a man, that is bitter in soul, that man should say, Lord, it is reason I should, because it is thy pleasure, though it be to my own trouble. Yet it is but seldome that God makes his will his reason, and answers by his bare Prerogative: He hath often given weighty reasons to this quæry. First, The life of nature is continued, that the life of grace may be increased. Again, Such live in sufferings, That they may learn obedience by the things which they suffer. God teacheth us by his Works, as well as by his Word, his dealings speak to us: And, It is as great an act of holiness to submit our selves to the will of God in his works, as it is to the will of God in his word. Another reason of this wherefore, may be this, God sets up some as patterns to posterity; He therefore gives the light of life to some that are in misery, to shew that it is no new, nor strange thing for his Saints to be in darkness: And what if God doth it to magnifie the strength of his own power in supporting, and the sweetness of his mercy when he delivers such bitter souls?

Further observe, First, That the best things in this world may come to be burthens to us.

See here a man, weary of light and life. Light, one of the most excellent creatures that God made, the most excellent next to life; yea life, the best, the most excellent thing in nature; both these become burthensome. How gladly would Job have been rid of light? how gladly rid of his life? Consider then, how burthensome other things (which at the best are burdens) may be unto you: If you hear a soul complaining of light and life; and why are these given me, when I am in misery? Then what comfort, think you, will honour give you? or what comfort will riches give you? or what comfort will beauty give you, in such a condition, as makes you weary of light and life? What comfort will sin give you? what ease will your lusts give you, in such a condition, as makes you weary of light and life? I never heard of any of the Saints, that were troubled at any time with their grace, or weary of the favour of God; I never heard any of them say, why is grace given to one that is in misery? or the light of Gods countenance to the bitter in soul? I never heard any say, wherefore is faith given to a man that is in misery, or hope and patience to the bitter in soul? Grace was never a burden to any man, under greatest burdens, or unsavoury to the bittrest soul; when you are weary of all other things in the world, these will be your supports. Therefore labour after those things which you shall never be weary of, even after those things which will be more pleasant to us, then ever light was, when light shall be to others more troublesome, then ever darkness was to any; let us labour after those things which will be more sweet to us, then ever life was, when life shall be to others, more bitter, then ever death was to any.

Secondly observe, It is a trouble to possess good things when we cannot enjoy them.

Would you know, how Job spake here as one weary of light and life? It was not under the notion of light and life, as if he had been weary of these in themselves, but it was because he could not enjoy these. Solomon assures us, (Prov. 25. 20.) that, As he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vineger upon Nitre, so is he that singeth songs to an heavy heart. Musick to one that is in sorrow, doubles his sorrow, why? because he cannot enjoy the musick; a heavy heart can worse intend musick, then a heavy ear; only those things which we can enjoy in the use of them please in the possessing of them: Of all temporals, the possession and enjoyment may be separated; but for spirituals, the very possession of them is joy, therefore enjoyment; their presence is a pleasure, and therefore their presence shall ever please. We may distinguish between their use and their comfort, but we can never separate them.

One thing further, When Job saith, Wherefore is light given, and life given? The meaning of it is, wherefore is light continued, and wherefore is life continued? for he speaks of himself and others that had light and were alive, and yet he saith, wherefore is light given? &c. From this we may learn, That Every act of continuance of good things to us, is a new act or deed of gift to us. Mercy is given, every moment it is enjoyed: not only is a new mercy, and a renewed mercy, a new gift, but continued mercy is a gift and a new gift; life is a new gift every hour of time we live on the earth; and glory will be a new gift, every minute of eternity we shall live in Heaven.

Which long for death, and it cometh not, and dig for it more then for hid treasures.

This 21. verse doth further explicate who are the bitter in soul, even such as long for death; when a soul (from natural principles) finds a sweetness in death, that soul is in bitterness; Our affliction and our misery is indeed wormwood and gall, (as the Church complains, Lament. 2. 19.) when death is as honey, and long'd for as the honey-comb. There is bitterness in the death of the body; and yet some are so bitter in soul, that they account the very bitterness of death, sweetness; They say not as Agag, (1 Sam. 15. 32.) Surely the bitterness of death is past, but O that the sweetness of death would come. To be rid of sin makes us long for death spiritually; to be rid of pain makes us desire death naturally; therefore he saith, the bitter in soul long for death.

The word which we translate [by longing] signifieth a very vehement desire, as you know in our tongue, to long for a thing is the highest and hotest acting of desire, after a thing. It signifieth properly to gape or to breath: Hence (by a Trope) it signifieth strong desire; because they who desire a thing much, are said to gape or breath after it; just as an hungry man gapes after meat, whersoever he sees it, and his mind runs upon it, when he cannot see it. That is the force of the word. Hence also the wotd is used in Scripture, to note the strong actings of faith, and vehement expectations of hope in God; when the soul is raised up mightily to believe the word of promise, then it longs after and opens its mouth wide (as it were) to receive the thing promised. As in *Isa.*8.17. I will wait upon the Lord, who hides his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him. The Prophet Hosea applies the word to robbers and thieves, who stand watching and longing for the traveller, and looking at every turning, chap.6.9. As troopes of robbers wait for a man. Yet further to clear this, we may take notice, that in the Hebrew there are two words which come from this root, whereof the one signifieth the Palate of the mouth; because the palate is the part affected with the taste of such meats, as we long for; Hence we say, the mouth waters after such or such a pleasing dish. The other word signifies a Fish-hook, and the reason is double, either because those hooks are pleasantly baited, which when the fish sees, he longeth after it, and greedily swallows it down: Or because when the angler hath cast in the hook, he is in great expectation, waiting and looking earnestly when the fish will be enticed, and bite. By all these uses of the Original word, we may collect the exceeding intensiveness of that desire which is here expresst by longing for death: They long for death, even as a hungry man longeth for any meat, or as a woman with child longeth for some special meat, as a fish longs for the bait, or as an angler longeth till the fish bites, or as a believer (which as it is the spiritual, so the most ardent desire of all) desires to have any promise fulfilled, upon which he hath pitched his faith, and anchors at by hope.

חַכָּה Hamus, quòd in eũ pisces inhient, vel potius quod pisces expectet.

Which long for death, and it cometh not, that is, it cometh not so soon as they would have it; for death will come at one time or other, but death doth not come at their time, or their pace. It cometh not, in the Hebrew it is only thus, which long for death, and it is not; we supply, it cometh not.

And dig for it more then for hid treasures.

To illustrate the greatness of this desire after death, he addes a similitude of those who seek for treasures; if there be any natural desire more strong, then that of a woman with child, or a longing woman, it is the desire of a covetous man, the desire of gain or treasure; covetousness is the strongest appetite.

Observe but what a gradation there is in this expression, to set forth the greatness of their desire after death: they do not only long for it, but they dig for it. Digging you know is no ordinary labour, it is an extraordinary work, a hard labour. As longing is a strong desire, so digging is strong labour, hard labour. And then, it is no ordinary digging neither, but digging for a treasure; men will dig hard for treasure; you see men will dig hard for a stone, for iron, for coals, how then will they dig for a mine of gold or silver? A man will dig the earth for a little money; but when a man diggeth, hoping to find money in the earth, that will make him work indeed; now they dig after such a manner: and beyond that, he saith, they dig for it as for hidden treasure; that is a further degree of their endeavour after it.

That which we translate, hidden treasure, is but one word in the Hebrew. It signifies any hidden thing, especially treasures; because treasures use to be hid, or close laid up. And there is a twofold hiding of treasures; there is a natural hiding, and there is an industrious and artificial hiding. There is a natural hiding, so treasures are hid, that lie in the bowels of the earth, they are naturally hid. Then treasures are hid by industry and by art, when we are afraid we shall be spoiled of our treasures, or that they shall be taken away; then there is a hiding of them, and often a digging to hide them in the earth: As in any times of spoil and violence, if a rich man hear that the spoilers are nigh, he presently hides his treasure. Now either as robbers dig and search for treasures industriously hid, or as miners dig and search for treasures naturally hid, so (saith Job) with such earnestness do these dig for death.

There is one thing to be resolved here by way of question before we come to the Observations; namely, whether it be lawful to wish for, or to desire death? Job here proposeth such as long for death: Is it lawful to desire death? doth he speak here only (de facto) of a thing which some do, or of that which may be done.

I answer, First, That death in it self is no way desirable, and it is not an object of desire. We cannot desire that (for it self) which is an enemy, or destructive unto us. If any should desire death as death, or under the notion of death, they should desire that which is destructive, that which is their enemy; so the Apostle calls death, 1 Cor. 15. The last enemy which shall be destroyed, is death. Death is an enemy, therefore (as death) no man can desire it. Indeed, many have desired death, but still we find somewhat else at the bottom of that desire. But what bottom or ground makes the desire of death lawful? I answer,

First, It is a holy desire of death, if we desire death to be free from sin; when the soul saith thus, because I see, only the end of living will be the end of sinning, therefore I long for death, that I may sin no longer.

Secondly, It is lawful to desire death, that we may have more full communion with Christ the Lord of life. I desire to be dissolved, saith Paul; but why? not that he desired dissolution, but that he might be with Christ, Phil. 1. 23. Christ is life, and Christ is our life. It is better to enjoy life, then to live; how much better then is it to enjoy Christ, who is life, then to live?

To both these, we may refer that of the Apostle, 2 Cor. 5. We that are in this Tabernacle, groan, being burdened; they were burdened with sorrows, and burdened with sins, while they were in the tabernacle of the body; yet (saith he) it is not that we would be uncloathed, but cloathed upon; he did not groan for the grave, but for glory; not that he might be uncloathed, but cloathed with immortality; not barely that he might die, but that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

Under these notions we may desire death; yet with this caution, that for the time of it, we refer our selves to the good pleasure of God. For what the Apostle James speaks of the inordinate desires, and absolute resolves of worldly men, about gaining in that or t'other City, is by allusion, appliable to these spiritual greedy merchants, after heavenly glory, chap. 4. 13. Go to now, ye that say, to day or to morrow we will go into such a City, and continue there a year, and buy, and sell, and get gain, &c. For that ye ought to say, if the Lord will. So I may say, go to now, ye that say, to day or to morrow I would die (for to die, to us is gain, Phil. 1. 21.) and go to that heavenly City, that City having foundations, whose builder and maker is God, and continue there for ever, taking in, and enriching our selves with that glory which Christ hath bought; for that ye ought to say, when the Lord will, or now if the Lord will. On such conditions as these, and with this caution, we may desire death, yea, long for death.

But to long for death, only to be rid of the troubles of this life, to desire to lie down to sleep in the bed of the grave, only to ease our flesh, and rest our outward man, is sinful. The Apostle saith (Acts 20. 24.) I count not my life dear, so I may finish my course with joy; but we shall account our lives too cheap, if we fear to finish our course with sorrow, if we think, that it is not worth the while to live, unless we live in outward comforts; we exceedingly undervalue our lives, when a cross in our lives makes us weary of our lives. This was Jonah's infirmity, when he had taken pet about the gourd (chap. 4.) he would needs die; and he concludeth the matter, it is better for me to die then to live; and all was, because he could not have his will, because he was troubled. This also was Elijah's infirmity, when he was persecuted by, and fled for his life from Jezebel, 1 Kings 19. 4. He requested for himself, that he might die, and said, it is enough now, O Lord, take away my life; for I am not better then my fathers. This is an infirmity at the best. We ought rather to seek to God, that he would remove the evil from us, then remove us from the evil; for God hath a thousand doors to let us out of trouble, though he doth not open the door of the grave, to let us in there, and out of the world. He can end our troubles, and not end our lives.

Periniquum est non alia relinquere Deo levandæ ærumnæ rationem quam si vitam adimat, &c. petendũ ergo potius; ut ne vultus sui luce illustret, quam ut tenebris mortis obruat.

Yet such a wish is much allayed, yea (in some cases) lawful, if we keep the former caution, and say, if the Lord will. If we refer our selves to the will and good pleasure of God, we may desire to be laid to rest by death, that we may be rid of those pains and evils which we suffer in this life. And yet I desire rather to raise the spirits of all above these troubles while they live, then satisfie them how they may desire freedom from them by death. When Solomon returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the Sun, and beheld the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power, but they had no comforter: then he praised the dead, which are already dead, more then the living, which are yet alive (Eccl. 4. 1, 2.) that is, he pronounced the dead to be in a better condition then the living. Yet know, that Solomon in this place, speaks the words of meer natural reason, not of divine reason: For he speaks (though with a divine spirit) yet in the person of a natural man. Natural reason saith, it is better to die, then live under oppressions; but divine reason saith, there is more honour to be gained by living under oppressions, then there is ease to be attained by dying from under them. To bear a burden well, is more desirable then to be delivered from a burden; especially, if while we are bearing, we can be doing, doing good (I mean) and I mean it especially, if we can do publick good. A Christian should be content, yea, he should rejoyce, in suffering much evil upon himself, while he can be doing any, especially if he can do much good to others. A graciously publick spirit will triumph over personal troubles and labours, so long as he sees himself a blessing or a help to the publick; and though he longs to die for himself, and to be with Christ, which is better; yet he is loth to die, so long as he can say with blessed Paul, Nevertheless to abide in the flesh, is more needful for you (or others) Phil. 1. 24. When an heathen Emperor, Cæsar, said, he had lived long enough, whether he respected Nature or Honour; Tully, the Orator answered him well; But you have not lived long enough for the common-wealth. Much more may we say, when we see able and godly men longing for death, because they have lived long enough, whether they respect common nature, or their own honour; But you have not yet lived long enough for the Church of God, and for the common good of his people. We should be willing to live so long as God, or his people, have a stroke of work to be done, which our abilities and opportunities fit us to do. In this sence, a living dog is better then a dead lion, Eccles. 9. 4. That is, it is better to live (though we are the meanest) working for God, then die, or be dead, though we have been the chiefest.

I enlarge this the rather, because of the present troubles, and the infirmity of our flesh, which sometimes is ready to envy those who die, because we live in sorrow; and is not satisfied with this, that our souls are here sheltered from death, and under the covert of Christ, unless our bodies also may be sheltered in death, and lie under the covert of the grave. So much to that question.

Let us note something from the words themselves; Which long for death, and it cometh not; and dig for it more then for hid treasures. Observe,

First, That, Many afflictions, to our ſenſe, are worſe then death.

They long for death, becauſe they are in miſery. It is ſaid, and it is a truth, O death! how bitter art thou to a man that is at eaſe in his poſſeſſions? And there is a truth alſo in this, O death! how ſweet art thou to a man that is bitter in his ſoul? It often falls out, that to die, is but a ſhort affliction; but affliction many times is a long and continued death, a frequent death; as the Apoſtle ſpeaks of his afflictions, in deaths often (2 Cor. 11. 23.) That there is a bitterneſs in death, the ſpeech of Agag implies (1 Sam. 15.) Surely the bitterneſs of death is paſt; yet while a man (as lamenting Jeremy complains, Lam. 3. 19.) remembers his afflictions, and his miſery, the wormwood and the gall, that is, his afflictions and miſery, more bitter then gall and wormwood, his ſenſe overcomes his judgment, to conclude, that there is a pleaſantneſs in that bitter thing which we call death.

Secondly, Obſerve, That, As death finds many before they look for it, ſo ſome look for death, and cannot find it.

How many are there, whom death ſurprizes before they are aware, and ſeizeth upon them, when they think not of it? when as others are expecting, and longing, and gaping, and gaſping after death, and they cannot meet with it, it cometh not. Indeed, it is a great deal better for a man to expect death when it cometh not, then to have death come upon him, when he expects it not. Some are calling for death, crying out for death, before they know how to die, before they know how to live, yea before they know why they lived. It were well for ſuch, if they might loſe their longing, and long for death long enough before it cometh; for upon the matter (poor ſouls) they long for hell, while they long for death; and while they are haſtning from that life and miſery, which will quickly have an end, they are plunging into that death and miſery which will never end.

Thirdly, Obſerve, As death is a puniſhment to moſt; ſo, not to die, is a puniſhment to ſome.

Job ſpeaks of it as an affliction upon ſuch; they long for death, and it cometh not. Death is an affliction to all; it is a puniſhment to all unbelievers, a puniſhment with a ſting: And as all wicked men are puniſhed with death, ſo ſome of them are puniſhed with this, that they (for the preſent) cannot die (Rev. 9. 6.) In thoſe dayes men ſhall ſeek death, and ſhall not find it; and ſhall deſire to die, and death ſhall flee from them. It is laid as their puniſhment, that they ſhould live, and as an affliction beyond all their afflictions, that then they could not die. They are in a ſad condition, who can have no remedy or cure of their troubles but death; but how ſad is their condition, who cannot obtain that remedy? It is like the puniſhment of the damned in hell, they ſhall long for death, but it will not come; and they ſhall ever ſeek for death, but ſhall never find it. No wicked man did ever part ſo unwillingly with his ſoul when he died, as he will unwillingly meet with it, when he riſeth again. And as the firſt death doth part ſoul and body unwillingly, ſo the ſecond death keepeth ſoul and body together unwillingly. They have a taſt of this miſery in this life, whoſe ſouls are truly ſaid to be impriſoned in their bodies: And O how deſirous are they to dig down theſe mud-wals, and make an eſcape, but cannot?

Fourthly, Obſerve, It is an affliction to Nature, to be debarred of any thing it deſireth, how deſtructive ſoever it be unto it.

It is (in one ſence) a natural deſire, to long for death; and yet death is the deſtruction of nature: A man under diſtempers of body, a diſeaſe, a Fever, &c. is often troubled and grieved, becauſe he cannot have thoſe things which will hurt him; he longs for ſuch meats and drinks, as given him, would kill him, and yet a denial angers him. The hope of death deferred, will make the heart ſick; and when the deſire (death deſired) comes, it is as a tree of life. Grief ariſeth from the unſatisfaction of our deſires; and therefore though the thing had, which we deſire, will undo us, yet the not having it, doth afflict us.

Which long for death, and it cometh not; and they dig for it more then for hidden treaſures. Take ſomewhat from this latter branch, and they dig for it more then for hid treaſure. As ſoon as ever Job had expreſt their longing deſire after death, you ſee preſently, he tells us that they dig for death. Hence obſerve,

That, Where deſires are true, they preſently produce endeavors.

He that longs for a thing, will labour for it, they are digging preſently (Prov. 18. 1.) Through deſire, a man having ſeparated himſelf, intermedleth with all wiſdom: If it be death a man deſireth, he will be endeavouring after it. There are ſome velleities, liſtleſs wiſhings and wouldings, which produce no endeavours; but true deſires are ever active; natural deſires are ſeconded with natural endeavours, and ſo ſpiritual deſires with ſpiritual endeavours. If a man deſire death, he will dig for it; ſurely then, he that deſires Chriſt, and longs for eternal life, will be digging for the enjoyment of them. Obſerve further,

That, Proportionably to the ſtrength of our deſires, is the ſtrength and earneſtneſs of our endeavours.

As real deſire cauſeth real endeavour, ſo ſtrong deſires cauſe ſtrong endeavours: It was not a bare deſire, but an earneſt longing (as was cleared in opening the words). And it is not a bare labour, but hard labour; digging is ſtrong labour. A meer natural man, whoſe deſires after ſin, are ſtrong and vehement, acts ſin with equal vehemency. The Holy Ghoſt ſaith, he doth evil as he can, that is, to his utmoſt cunning or ability; he draws iniquity with cords of vanity, and ſin as it were, with cart-ropes. He doth evil (ſaith another Scripture, Mic. 7. 3.) with both hands greedily. To do a thing with both hands, notes the greateſt endeavour. As when the Phariſees are ſaid not to touch the burdens which they laid on others with their little finger, it notes their refuſal of the leaſt endeavour, Mat. 23. 4. So a ſpiritual heart, having his deſires turned heaven-ward, he digs for heavenly treaſure every day, and gives diligence to make his calling and election ſure. They who have ſtrong deſires after Chriſt, labour ſtrongly after Chriſt. So they are expreſt (Prov. 2. 4.) where Solomon ſpeaks of Wiſdom, which is Chriſt, and all that is Chriſts; If thou ſeekeſt her as ſilver, and ſearcheſt for her as for hid treaſures; ſuch is the ſearch and endeavour that ought to be after Chriſt, and ſuch it will be, if there be true and great deſires after Chriſt.

Thirdly, In that he ſaith, They dig for it, as for hid treaſure, we may obſerve,

That, The beſt things are hardeſt to come by.

If you will have treaſures, you muſt dig for them; you may have pebble-ſtones, flints, above ground; but treaſures lie deep: And in proportion, the better every thing is, the more digging it requireth; and the beſt things ought to be moſt digged for. They that will have the great bleſſing, muſt wreſtle for it; or the Crown, they muſt ſtrive for it. We muſt dig for heavenly hidden treaſure, before we have it; and yet both the treaſure, and the ſtrength to dig for it, are freely given.

Fourthly, obſerve, That, Thoſe things which we eſteem moſt, we labour to ſecure moſt.

It is ſaid, that they digged for treaſures, and that the treaſures were hid. I told you, in opening the words, there is a natural hiding of treaſure, and an induſtrious hiding. Take it in the laſt ſence; men that have treaſures, will labour to preſerve them: why? becauſe treaſures are much eſteemed, and the things we eſteem moſt, we preſerve moſt. In the Hebrew, the word that ſignifies treaſure, ſignifies the hiding of treaſure, or hidden treaſure. Among all treaſures, ſpiritual treaſures are moſt hidden; they are ſo hidden, that they are called myſteries, or ſecrets. The knowledge of Chriſt was a hidden treaſure, for ſome thouſands of years. The Apoſtle, in his time, calls it, the myſtery which was kept ſecret ſince the world began, Rom. 16. 25. Again, he calls it The wiſdom of God in a myſtery, even the hidden wiſdom which God ordained before the world, unto our glory; which none of the Princes of this world knew, 1 Cor. 2. 8, 9. And as ſpiritual knowledge, ſo our ſpiritual life, is called a hidden life; your life is hidden with God in Chriſt, Col.

Col. 3. 3. And as our life, ſo our ſpiritual comforts are hidden; therefore called Hidden Manna, Revel. 2. 17. All our ſpiritual eſtate is treaſure, and it is all hidden treaſure, ſo hidden, that the Saints dig deep to find it, and when they have found it, they hide it, as Chriſt ſhews us, (Mat. 13. 44.) ſpeaking of the Kingdom of God, which he compares to a treaſure hid in the field, the which when a man hath found, he hideth: He hideth it, not to obſcure it from the light, but to ſecure it from danger. Mary hid thoſe precious ſayings of Chriſt, her Son, and her Saviour, in her heart, Luke 2. 51. And David having found the Commandments of God, which he prized above any treaſure, above thouſands of gold and ſilver, he hid them in his heart. Thy word (ſaith he) have I hid in my heart, that I might not ſin againſt thee, Pſal. 119. 11.

Verſe 22. Which rejoyce exceedingly, and are glad when they can find the grave.

Having ſaid, That they long for death, and dig for it as for hidden treaſure. Now ſuppoſing, that they find death, he ſhews how it affects them; They rejoyce exceedingly, and are glad when they can find the grave. There is little or no obſcurity in theſe words, only conſider the emphaſis of this expreſſion; the word which we tranſlate rejoyce, or rejoyce exceedingly, noteth ſuch a rejoycing as breaks forth in ſome outward geſture, as when a man doth leap for ioy: And Mr. Broughton tranſlates it thus, Which joy till they skip again; noting an extraordinary joy, and gladneſs, when they can find the grave; that is, when they dye. Yet ſome joyn the ſence of this verſe with the former, to carry on, or lengthen out the ſimilitude thus; Which long for death, and dig for it as for hid treaſures: And finding death, they are affected as they who (ſeeking for treaſures) find a grave: For if in digging, they did but hit upon a grave, then they thought themſelves ſure of treaſure and great riches; becauſe treaſure and riches was uſed to be put into graves, as was ſhewed in opening the fifteenth verſe of this Chapter. The ſence is fair, and comes up to the ſame point, from either of theſe expoſitions.

גיל יש ישו Summo gaudio & incredibili lætitia etiam ſignis exterioribus prodita geſtiunt, vel præ lætitia exultant, vel lætantur ad exultationem. Druſ.

Obſerve hence, firſt, That, What at one time we fear moſt, in that, at another time, we may exceedingly rejoyce.

Death is dreadful, and the grave is a place of darkneſs, yet here is joy and rejoycing, yea exceeding joy, and rejoycing, when they find the grave.

Secondly, They rejoyce in it, but why? It was that which they had longed for, that which they had long ſought for: if at another time they had been ſhewed the grave, or commanded into the grave, they would have taken little pleaſure in it. The ſame thing inflicted or threatned by another is dreadful to us, which deſired by our ſelves is pleaſant and delightful: It pleaſeth us to have our deſire ſatisfied, though the thing deſired be never ſo unpleaſant: And to be eaſed of preſent evil, makes a future evil appear in the likeneſs of a preſent good. For Joy is an affection of the mind, ariſing from the apprehenſion of ſome preſent good, even as hope ſprings from the apprehenſion of ſome good that is to come.

Further, We may conſider the iſſue of all theſe acts. After they had longed for death, and digged for death, and found death; preſently upon the finding of it, they rejoyce, and rejoyce exceedingly.

Hence obſerve, That which any one truly deſireth and endeavoureth to find, cauſeth him to rejoyce, when he hath found it.

If you deſire death, and ſeek for the grave, the finding of theſe will be to you as life, and as a houſe of mirth: How much more then ſhall we rejoyce, having found good things, the beſt things, after earneſt longing and digging for them. When the wiſe Merchant had found the treaſure hid in the field, the next words inform us of his joy, Mat. 13. 44. When the man, after long ſeeking on the mountains, had found his loſt Sheep; and the woman, after lighting her candle, and ſweeping her houſe, and diligent ſearch, had found the loſt groat; they both rejoyced, and called in their neighbours and friends to rejoyce with them, (Luke 15.) It troubles a man to be found of that, or him, whom he hates, or fears; Haſt thou found me, O mine enemy? ſaith Ahab to Eliah, 1 Kings 21. 20. And it cannot but delight us, to find that, or him, whom we love and long for: Have I found thee, O my friend? will ſuch an one ſay. And if a miſerable man rejoyces exceedingly, when deſiring he finds death, and a grave; how will the ſoul leap for joy, when we ſhall find him, who is the longing and deſire of all Nations, Jeſus Chriſt! How exceeding exceedingly will the ſoul rejoyce, when we ſhall find what we have ſo much longed for; not death, but life; and life not only in Chriſt, but with Chriſt; when we ſhall find, not the houſe of the grave, but a houſe of glory, and glory in the height, an exceeding, excelling, ſuperexcellent weight of glory.

And by this effect, we may make proof of grace here. If thou haſt found Chriſt, in Ordinances, in Duties, in Meditation, in Prayer, in the Promiſes; for here, in theſe things, the longing ſoul digs after Chriſt: Joy will at one time or other fill thy heart, yea thy heart will leap for joy; thou wilt rejoyce in Spirit, as Chriſt did, in his Father, Luke 10. 21. For this joy is a fruit of the Spirit, (Gal. 5. 22.) and one of the firſt fruits. And God ſeldome miſſes to give the ſoul a taſt of this joy at the firſt, or preſently after converſion, though afterwards clouds may come over us, or at leaſt our light of joy be not ſo clear.

Further, If a man long after any truth, and digs it, how exceeding joyful will he be, when he can find that truth? When a Philoſopher had found out the reſolution of a Queſtion in the Mathematicks, he was ſo raviſhed with it, that he ran about crying, I have found it, I have found it: Surely the finding of one Divine truth (which is the mind of Chriſt) ſhould affect us more then the compleat knowledge of all that is knowable, or can be known in the whole courſe of Nature. Every truth is beautiful, but the Truths of God are beauty. Thus we may try our deſires in all their purſuits, by this iſſue of them, joy in finding the things which we purſue. Archimedes.

Laſtly obſerve, That as he doth rejoyce, ſo this joy anſwers to the deſire in the degree of it: Proportionable to our deſires and endeavours in ſeeking, are our joyes and comforts when we have found. There is not only a joy, but a proportionable joy; the deſire was very great, and the endeavour was very great, and now the joy comes up to both, that is very great too; not only do they rejoyce, but they rejoyce exceedingly; they rejoyce, ſo as they skip for joy: That is (I am ſure it ought to be) more apparent, in our regular deſires after things good for us, then in our irregular deſires, after things which are hurtful to us. If that exceeding deſire after death, will produce exceeding joy in death; then exceeding deſire after life, and ſpiritual good things, will work exceeding joy when we have found them; deſire is that which widens the veſſel to take in abundance of joy; large deſires after any thing open the heart, and inlarge the faculties to take in abundance of joy, when we have found the thing which we deſire.

VERS. 23, 24, 25, 26.

Why is light given to a man, whoſe way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in?
For my ſighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like the waters.
For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me; and that which I was afraid of, is come unto me.
I was not in ſafety, neither had I reſt, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came.

AT the twentieth verſe of this Chapter, Job begins to expoſtulate concerning the continuance of his life; and he caſts his complaint into an argument, which was formed to his purpoſe, thus. There is no reaſon; or if there be, ſhew me a reaſon why his life is continued, that liveth miſerably, and would dye willingly: But I am the man who live miſerably, and would dye willingly: Therefore why is light, or life, continued unto me? The former part of this argument is contained in verſ. 20, 21, 22, 23. In which Job demonſtrates, that there is no reaſon; or, at leaſt, if there be a reaſon, it is ſuch, as he could not make out, why that man ſhould have his life continued, who lives in miſery, and is willing to dye. Three of thoſe verſes we have already finiſhed; and there remaineth ver. 23. (which is a part of the same reason) to be yet opened.

In this ver. 23. he (as it were) repeats his argument: He had said before, Why is light given to him that is in misery? &c. and so he doth illustrate it in the two verses following: In this ver. 23. he re-inforceth what he had said in other words, Why is light given to a man, whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? He doubleth his call for a reason, or proof of this thing.

Why is light given?] Those words are not here expressly in the Hebrew, but they are supplied by our Translators, and by Translators in other Languages, from ver. 20. to make up the sence. The Original runs thus, To a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in: But the Question is implied as in the former, and here to be prefixed, Why is light given to a man, whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? Mr. Broughton readeth it without the Question, (Why is light given?) thus: The Wight, or man, whose way is hid, over whom the puissant casteth a covering.

To a man, whose way is hid.] Job speaks not here of a way in a proper sence, the way wherein men travel, and pass in their journeys, from place to place: but the way, is a way, in a Metaphor: And so in Scripture, the way of a man is taken: First, for the purpose or intention of a man: Secondly, for the course and conversation of a man: and that either for the course, wherein we walk toward others, or for the course wherein others walk towards us. When it is said here, Why is light given to a man, whose way is hid? the way, is either the course wherein Job walked, respecting God; or the course which God took, respecting Job; Why is light given to a man, whose way is hid?

The way of man, in his walking before God, is twofold.

Secondly, External.

There is an internal, and inward way, which the soul treads in converse with God; a secret path, a path which no eye hath seen. And then there is the outward way of walking. That speech of God to Abraham takes in both, Walk before me, and be perfect; that is, converse and carry thy self uprightly before me, in thy affections, and in thy actions. Now when Job saith, His way was hid, he means neither of these: for though the internal way, whether it be the way of sin, or the way of obedience, be a path so secret, as that it is alwayes hid from the eyes of men, yet Job knew well enough that God saw even that way, and therefore he could not complain, that his most secret way was hid from God. Yea, in another place, he comforts himself with this, that God knew the secret wayes of his heart: For when his friends accuse him, and charge him with hypocrisie, he supports himself with this, My witness is above, and my record is in Heaven; there is one there that knoweth the way, the secret way of my spirit with him, to be sincerity, though you charge the way of my spirit with hypocrisie. The soul hath many wayes of communion with God, which are altogether hidden from the eye of man: man cannot see, or discern, the private passages between God and the spirit; either when the soul approves it self to God, or rejoyceth and exults in God. And as concerning this way, this inward way, as Job knew that it was not hid from God; so (I conceive) it did not trouble him, that this way was hid from man: As there are in God certain (Arcana Consilii) secret mysteries, and hidden wayes of counsel, which he will not communicate to holy men; so there are in holy men (Arcana Pietatis) some secrets, some mysteries of godliness, which they do not communicate to the world; and therefore the complaint doth not lye in either of these respects.

The Church complained, but she was check'd for complaining, that her way was hid from God, Isa. 40. 27. Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel, My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God?

Yet that place is not to be understood of a hiding from the eye of Gods inspection, as if the Church had any suspition that the Lord did not know, or did not see how matters went with them, or in what condition they were; but it is to be understood of the eye of Gods compassion: There is a seeing eye, or contemplating eye, and a compassionating or succouring eye. So the meaning of that complaint is only this, Why sayest thou my way is hid from the Lord? that is, why doest thou speak, as if God did not regard thee in thy troubles; as if God had no pity nor compassion on thee, no bowels toward thee; Why sayest thou my way is hid from the Lord? In the third of Exodus, when God comes to help the people of Israel, he telleth Moses, I have seen, I have seen, or I have surely seen; namely, with an eye compassionating their condition, as the next words shew, For I know their sorrows. Now when the Church complained, that Her way was hid from God; her meaning was, that God did not take notice, so, as to pity and deliver her. Excepting in that sence, she could not conceive that her way was hidden from God: neither is the way of the Church, so hidden from God, but as to our sense; for the Lord pities his people when he corrects them; and therefore Jacob is chidden for saying so; Why sayest thou, O Jacob, my way is hidden from the Lord? Therefore this Text is not to be understood of Job's way, in respect of God, but of the hiding of Gods way, or the hidden dealings of God toward Job. My way is hid, saith Job, that, I cannot understand, nor interpret, nor expound the meaning of Gods dealing with me; I am not able to give an interpretation of it, I know not what this thing meaneth: My way is hid.

The way of Gods dealing with him, was a hidden way, in two respects.

First, In regard of the cause of his affliction: It was hidden from him, why God had laid so sore and so heavy a burthen upon him; and that is it which Elihu in Chap. 34. of this Book, ver. 31, 32. hints at, where he telleth Job, Surely (saith he) it is meet to be said unto God, that which I see not, teach thou me. He answers such a complaint as this. I (saith Job) cannot see the reason why God doth afflict me: Elihu tells him, It is meet to be said unto God, that which I see not, teach thou me; and if I have done iniquity, I will do so no more: Lord, if thou wilt shew me that my sin is the cause, and what sin is the cause, I do here promise, I will lay down my sin, and (through thy help) do so no more.

Or again, It was hidden in regard of the issue, or event. My way is hid; that is, I can see no passage out of this way; I cannot tell when these troubles will end; I see no help; I have no glimpse of light breaking out to me in this way; it is a dark, a hidden way unto me: This darkness troubles him, as much as all his troubles. And it is, as if he had said, I am so encompast with clouds, that I walk in darkness, and see no light: My life is so intangled, and wrapt up in troubles, that I see no way of deliverance, or escape. Sunt qui viam enarrat viam elabendi. Drus.

And this exposition seems most proper, if we take in the latter part of the verse, where he saith, And whom God hath hedged in: This explains the hiding of his way, to be the hedging of his way; such an encompassing of him about with sorrows, that he could not make his way out.

In the first Chapter, you may remember, that Satan was much troubled, that God had made a hedge about Job: And now Job himself is much troubled, that God had made a hedge about him: I am the man, saith he, [Whom God hath hedged in.] That which before was the object of Satans envy, is now become the object of Job's complaint, a hedge: Sure then it was not the same hedge. No; that which Satan complained of, and envied at, was a hedge of mercy, and a hedge of blessings, a hedge of favour, and of protection: But this which Job complaineth of, is a hedge of thorny troubles, and of pricking sorrows: The former was (as we may speak) a hedge of Roses; and this was a hedge of Bryars. That was a hedge so high, and strong, that no evil could come in, or break through, to annoy him: And this was a hedge so high, and strong, that no good could come, or be brought unto him.

So then, take the sence thus, Why is light given to a man, whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? That is, why doth God continue my life, when I am in such a condition, as that I can neither discover the reason why I came into it, nor am I able to discover any passage out of it.

And this is it which the Church complains of, (Lam. 3. 7.) He hath hedged me about, that I cannot get out; and ver. 9. He hath enclosed my wayes with hewen stones. God had built up a wall (as it were) by Art, with hewen stones; he had set them so close together, that there was no passing by, no getting through.

Ob-

Observe hence, First, That affliction is usually accompanied with much darkness.

Affliction is often called darkness in Scripture. And as it is darkness without, so it often causeth darkness within. An afflicted person hath such darkness upon his person, that he cannot discern, many times, either why God doth afflict him, or when God will make an end of his afflictions. That in the Prophet (Isa. 50. 10.) is true of outward afflictions, as well as inward, Who is there among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness? There's many an afflicted person walks in a way, hidden in a three-fold darkness. First, The way is hid in the darkness of the cause for which he came into it. Secondly, The way is hid in the darkness of the event, how to get out of it. Thirdly, The way is hid in the darkness of his present duty, what to do in it. The way of affliction is often wrapt up, and hidden, in this three-fold darkness,

Further, Seeing Job speaks of this as an addition to all his sorrows, and as the complement of them all, that he was thus shut up and hedged in, and that his way was thus dark, in regard of the cause of it,

Observe, That, It increaseth an affliction greatly, not to know the reason of an affliction; or to have the way of Gods dealings hidden from our eyes.

It is a trouble, not to see the reason of things: The mind is exceedingly eased, when the understanding hath light: This made Jeremy inquire, Why doth the way of the wicked prosper? As if he had said, If I could see the reason of it, it would satisfie me; but while thou keepest me in the dark, and I can give no account to my own soul, or those that ask me, of this thy dispensation to wicked men, This is the burthen of my soul. It is usually said, They are happy, who know the causes of things. And in regard of the diseases of the body, we say, That a disease is half cured, when the cause of it is discovered: But when a Physitian is in the dark, and cannot find out the cause of a disease, he must needs be in the dark for the remedy of it. So it is also with a man, in regard of any affliction, when he cannot find out the cause, he knoweth not what to pitch upon as a remedy. When Rebeckah (Gen. 25. 22.) had Twins in her womb, and they strugled together within her, she was much troubled, and nothing would satisfie her, until she went to God to know the reason of the thing; Lord (saith she) why am I thus? And when God had told her, that Two Nations were in her womb; and that two manner of people should be separated from her bowels; she made no more complaints. So when there are such strivings, such struglings, and contrary motions of trouble in us, or about us, the soul goes to God, and inquires why it is thus? Lord, I am more troubled with the ignorance of my troubles, then with the weight, or smart of them.

Fœlix qui potuit rerũ cognoscere causas.

Thirdly, Take the words as respecting the issue, or deliverance from trouble, and they afford us this Observation:

That, It is a great addition to an affliction, not to see, or discern, a way to escape, or get out of affliction.

To be in an affliction, out of which there appears no passage, (unless the soul be mightily supported by the hand and power of Christ) brings within a step of despair. The Apostle speaks as much when he saith, (1 Cor. 10. 13.) There is no temptation hath taken hold of you, but that which is common to man; (and then it follows,) but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able; but will, with the temptation, also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it. As if he should say, If God did not indeed discover, or make out to you some way of escaping, I must needs say, you were never able to bear it; but (saith he) God will make a way for you to escape, that ye may be able to bear it: Meaning, that the opening of this way, would revive their spirits, and then they would be able (through the strength of Christ) to bear it.

If so, then how shall the soul bear an affliction, when God instead of making a way to escape, doth as it were make a hedge to stop all escape? Therefore when the Lord would support his people in their troubles, he promised that they should have a door of hope opened to them, I will give her the valley of Achor for a door of hope, Hos. 2. 15. He would give her some appearance, some glimpses and openings of deliverance, in and from their present dangers. It is threatned, (Deut. 28. 25.) thou shalt come out one way against thine enemies, and flie seven wayes before them: they should flie many wayes, but they should escape no way. Thou shalt come out one way, and flie seven wayes, that is, thou shalt trie this, and that, and every way to escape, but thou shalt find a hedge at every wayes end, to stop and hinder thy escape. We use to say of a man in a distressed condition, He's in a wood, or in a wilderness. And when God entangles men in their own devises, it is said, He poureth contempt upon Princes, and causeth them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way, Psal. 107. 40. So Pharaoh said of the children of Israel, They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in, Exod. 14. 3. And when a people are as the children of Israel were, having a Sea before them, an Army behind them, and Mountains on either hand, then they may say (as Job did) Their way is hid, and God hath hedged them in.

Tentabis semper & diversis viis effugere, sed frustra: nusquam tibi patebit effugium.

For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like water.

Here Job takes up the former Proposition, and applyes it particularly to his own person. Before, he said only in the general, Why is light given to him that is in misery? and why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? Now he saith in effect, it is thus with me, I am a man in misery, and I am a man, whose way God hath hid and hedged in, wherefore then is my life continued? And he proves that he was in such a condition, by the effects of it, sighs and roarings. So that this verse holds forth two things about Job's sorrow. First, The continuance of it, in those words, My sighing comes before I eat. Secondly, The extremity of it, in those, My roarings are poured out, &c. The Argument may be thus framed: That man is in extream and continual misery, who doth not so much breath, as sigh, who, when he would speak, is forced to roar: But thus it is with me, My sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like water, therefore my misery is extream and continual.

My sighing cometh before I eat.] In the Hebrew it is word for word thus, Before the face of my bread my sighings come. Which Hebraism, (Before the face of my bread) hath a great emphasis in it: It notes the continuance of his sorrows without any intermission. When a thing is said to be before the face of another, it notes an equal continuance with that, before the face of which it is said to be. As in the negative, (Exod. 20. 3.) Thou shalt have no other gods before me, so we translate it: The Hebrew is, Thou shalt have no other gods before my face; that is, so long as I continue to be thy God, thou shalt have no other god; but I shall be thy God to all eternity, therefore thou shalt have no other gods but me, for ever. So in the affirmative, Psal. 72. 5. where, under the type of Solomon's Kingdom, the continuance of the Kingdom of Christ is prophesied, the Holy Ghost saith, It shall continue so long, as the Sun and Moon endureth: the Hebrew is, it shall continue before the face of the Sun and of the Moon; that is, there shall be an equal duration of the Kingdom of Christ, and of those lights of Heaven, the Sun and the Moon: The Kingdom of Christ shall last as long as the world shall last.

לפני לחמי εἰς πρόσωπον ἄρτυμά Aquila.

So then (according to this sence) Before the face of my bread my sighings come, is, as if he had said, look how long I have my bread before me, look how much time I spend in eating, so much time I spend in sighing, my sorrowings are of the same continuance with my refreshings. The phrase imports the un-intermittedness (as we may so speak) of his sorrows; that he had no stop, no breathing time, which was not a sighing time, no not for a meal time; while he was eating, with every bit of meat, he had a morsel of sorrows: He might say as the Psalmist, (Psal. 102. 9.) I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping; when I drink, my tears flow into my cup; When I take in a few drops of comfort, I weep out streams of sorrow: Or my sighings come and return so fast upon me, that I have no time to eat my bread: I am so plyed and followed with these afflictions, that I have no leisure to be comforted.

A Deo perpetua est hæc calamitas, ut ne cibi quidem aut ullius necessitas causa dolores possim fallere & uno momento à gemitibus aberrare. Vel tam frequentes mihi sunt gemitus ut vix mihi tempus supersit ad capiendũ cibum.

If at any time a man gets respite from his grief, it is when when he eats; how reſpiteleſs then was Job's grief, before whom ſorrow and ſighings ſate (as gueſts) continually at his table.

My roarings are powred out like water.

As the former words ſhewed the continuance, ſo this the extremity of Job's ſorrows. It is a great affliction that makes a man of ſpirit ſpeak, or complain: It is a great affliction that makes a man of ſpirit weep or mourn. How great an affliction then is it, which makes a man of ſpirit cry out and roar? When a man of courage roars, he is pained to purpoſe. Job, a man of ſpirit and courage, doth not only ſigh, but roar; ſighings are more ſecret ſorrows, but roarings muſt be heard; eſpecially, his roarings, which were powred out like water.

Roaring is the Lions voice, and here is an alluſion to the hungry Lion, roaring on his prey: Or to the troubled waves of the ſea, which alſo are ſaid to roar. Exceſſive ſorrow is often ſet forth by roaring. Pſal. 22. 1. Why art thou ſo far from the voyce of my roaring? ſaith David, typing the ſorrows of Chriſt: I do not only cry, but I roar out unto thee. Lord, why doſt thou not hear my ſtrong cries, cries like the roaring of the Lion, or the noiſe of troubled waters? So, Pſal. 32. 3. David, to ſhew his extremity of pain and trouble, while he kept in, and did not confeſs his ſin, ſpeaks thus, while I kept ſilence (while I ſmothered my ſin in ſecret) I roared for the very diſquietneſs of my ſoul. Silence in not confeſſing ſin, cauſes roaring under the guilt of ſin. Thoſe are great burdens of ſin, and great burdens of ſorrow, that cauſe roaring. My roarings are powred out like water.

This notes further yet, the abundance and the ſtrength of his ſorrows. I am powred out like water (I am, as it were, all melted into ſorrows) is ſaid of Chriſt, in that Pſalm of his paſſion (Pſal. 22. 14.) I am powred out like water, my heart in the midſt of my bowels is like melted wax. When the Prophet Ezekiel would ſhew how that people ſhould be affected with the tidings of their afflictions, he ſaith, Every heart ſhall melt, and all hands ſhall be feeble, and every ſpirit ſhall faint, and all knees ſhall be weak as water, (chap. 21. 7.) The hebrew is, all knees ſhall go into water. The ſorrows of repentance are expreſt by the powring out of water, to note, both the abundance of them, and the intenſiveneſs of them, in that known place, 1 Sam. 7. 9. They gathered together to Mizpeh, and drew water, and powred it out before the Lord, that is, they mourned abundantly, and they mourned with all their ſtrength.

How ſtrong and abundant the ſorrows of Job were, hath been often ſhewed before, and Obſervations drawn down from them; and therefore I ſhall need do no more then clear the words, and give the ſence. It followeth,

For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me; and that which I was afraid of, is come unto me.

For the thing which I greatly feared.] The cauſal particle in the beginning, doth not alwayes infer a cauſe. This verſe is not a reaſon of what he ſpake before; but this particle is often uſed, in Scripture, for affirmation or illuſtration, and not as cauſal, or by way of demonſtration; as, John 4. 17. Chriſt tells the woman of Samaria, Thou ſpeakeſt well, I have no husband; the Greek is, for I have no husband. We tranſlate it only by way of aſſertion. So, Mat. 7. 23. Then will I profeſs unto them, I never knew you; the Greek is, Then I will profeſs unto them, for I never knew you; we render it only as an aſſeveration: So very frequent in the Hebrew, the particle [Chi] which is here uſed, hath in it only the force of an affirmation; For the thing I greatly feared, is come upon me, that is, certainly, or aſſuredly, the thing which I greatly feared, is come upon me; as if Job ſhould make this as the concluſion and the ſum of all his complainings; this is it which now I muſt conclude, that the thing which I greatly feared, is come upon me; and that which I was afraid of, is come unto me.

The thing which I greatly feared.] The Hebrew word is, I feared a fear, and it is come upon me. And ſo fear is in the Scripture, frequently put for the thing feared, by a Metonymie of the effect for the cauſe, the abſtract being put for the concrete; as, Prov. 1. 26. I will mock when your fear cometh; that is, when the trouble which you feared, ſhall come upon you: As if Job ſhould have ſaid, this evil is that which I have fore-ſeen and fore-thought; I had ſuch miſgrievings in my ſpirit long before this, that ſuch a black day might come upon me, and I might be thus hedged in: now I ſee my thoughts are come to paſs, and my conjectures prove true; the thing which I feared, and greatly feared, is come upon me. We tranſlate well, I greatly feared; the Hebrew is, I feared a fear: Such expreſſions raiſe the ſence; as when we are ſaid to be bought with a price, it notes, that there was a great price paid for our redemption: To rejoyce with joy, ſhews the greatneſs of joy. So here, to fear a fear, ſhews that he was in a great fear; as we tranſlate, I feared a fear, I greatly feared.

Here it may be queſtioned, whether theſe fears of Job were lawful? doth it become us to have ſuch miſgrievings of heart, in reſpect of our outward condition? The Apoſtle biddeth us, be careful in nothing (Phil. 4. 6.) and was it a virtue or a grace, was it commendable, or ſo much as approveable in Job to be fearful in all things? Chriſt rebukes his Diſciples, becauſe they were afraid in a ſtorm; and was ir well in Job, that he was fearful in a Sun-ſhine, when he had the faireſt weather, and proſpered in all things? Doth it become a godly man, to be alwayes ſolicitous about his eſtate, and doubting that troubles will come? One would think there is trouble enough in troubles, when they come; a man ſhould not trouble himſelf with them before they come. Beſides, it is ſaid, Prov. 10. 24. reſpecting wicked men, that God will bring that which they fear upon them; ſo it ſeemeth, God is angry with thoſe, who are alwayes fearing, or ſtand poring upon ſuch and ſuch evils as they fear may come upon them: To theſe, God ſaith (Iſa. 66. 3.) I alſo will chooſe their deluſions, and will bring their fear upon them; becauſe you feared theſe things, you ſhall have your fear. As God gives ſome their prayers in anger, ſo he gives many their fears in anger; and it is as great a ſin, inordinately to fear, that God will take away the meat of our neceſſity or convenience, as it is to pray that God would give us meat to ſatisfie our luſts or wantonneſs.

To clear this, we muſt diſtinguiſh of fear, as to the purpoſe we have in hand. There are divers ſorts of fear.

Firſt, There is a fear of wiſdom and caution, and there is a fear of torment and vexation. That which the Apoſtle John ſpeaks (1 John 4. 18.) Fear hath torment, is not meant of all fear: there is a fear that is a tormenting paſſion, a fear which diſtracts and divides the thoughts about troubles which may come; and there is a fear, which only directs us to avoid or prevent the coming of trouble.

Secondly, There is a fear, which is oppoſed to comfort. It was David's ſin, that he wanted the fear oppoſed to ſecurity; when he ſaid, In my proſperity I ſhall never be moved: Lord, by thy favour, thou haſt made my mountain to ſtand ſtrong, Pſal. 30. 6, 7. The fear of Job, in his proſperity, was oppoſed to this ſecurity; he did not ſay, I ſhall never be moved; he thought he might be moved: The favour of God had made his mountain ſtrong, yet he knew it had but the ſtrength of clay, and therefore might be caſt down. This was his fear; he looked upon creatures, as they are, mutable and moveable. Chriſt ſpeaks of a faith of miracles, which will remove mountains; and that fear is not contrary to ſaving faith, which cauſeth us to think, that our mountains may be removed. Job's fear was grounded on the uncertainty of creature-comforts; he knew wealth was brittle ware, and might quickly receive a crack. This fear we ought to carry about us, in regard of our ſpiritual eſtates; though grace be everlaſting ware, though we are high-built, and full-grown in grace; though through the favour of God, our mountain of holineſs and comforts be very ſtrong, yet we muſt not be ſecure; though we are high-built, we muſt not be high-minded. Hence the Apoſtle Paul warns the believing Gentiles, that they ſhould fear: I grant, ye are in a good eſtate, in compariſon of the Jews; they are caſt off, ye are graffed in; yet let me give you this caution, Be not high-minded, but fear. That fear which is oppoſed to preſumption and ſecurity, is a good and neceſſary fear, in the beſt of our eſtate, whether in grace or nature, whether in worldly or heavenly riches. And ſuch was the fear of Job. Rom. 11. 20

Thirdly, There is a fear which makes us provide for an evil day, and there is a fear which hindreth us from enjoying the comforts of a good day. The former was in Job; doubtleſs less his fear in good dayes, made him diligent to provide for the evil day. As it is said of Noah (Heb. 11. 7.) That Noah being warned of God, of things not seen as yet, through faith, moved with fear, prepared an Ark, for the saving of his house. Noah knew the flood would come, this holy fear set him awork to provide an Ark. It is an argument both of wisdom and of grace, in a calm, to provide for a storm; in peace, to consider what to do in a time of war; in health, to lay up thoughts about our sickness; & in a day when the light of Gods countenance shines into our hearts, and we walk in the comforts of the holy Ghost, then to think, a night of desertion may come; and what shall I do, if I should walk in darkness, and see no light? Such as this, was the fear which Job feared.

Fourthly, There is a fear which makes us distrust God, that he will afflict us; and there is a fear, which keepeth us from doing that, which may provoke God to afflict us: This was Job's fear, as was shewed (chap. 1. 1.) He feared God, and eschewed evil. He was loth to grieve and offend God, or give him any occasion to be angry.

Lastly, There is a fear, which is opposed to hardness of heart; and a fear, that is opposed to courage of heart. Job's fear was opposed to hardness of heart; of this, Solomon speaks (Prov. 28. 14.) Blessed is the man that feareth always. And to clear what fear he means, he adds in the next words; But he that hardneth his heart, shall fall into mischief. Where we see, First, That there is a fear opposed to hardness of heart. And, Secondly, That to fear that fear always, even in our greatest prosperity, is not only our duty, but our happiness; that fear will not interrupt our comforts, but comfort us. Yea, this fear doth not only consist with comfort, but with courage; and though we may fall into the troubles which we thus fear, yet we shall not fall under them: Such as this was Job's fear.

So then, to take up all; Job's fear was a fear of wisdom and caution, not of torment and vexation; a fear opposed to security and presumption, not to joy and consolation; a fear that made him diligent to prepare against an evil day, not a fear that did eat out all the comforts of a good day; a fear which kept him from doing that, which might move God to afflict him; not a fear which made him distrust, that God would afflict him; a fear opposed to hardness of heart, not a fear opposed to courage and strength of heart. Such a fear as this, is a holy fear; such a fear as this, is a good companion in our best estate: this fear, and our comforts may well joyn together; this fear will not trouble, but regulate our lives; not break, but sweeten our sleep. Hence observe,

That, Holy wisdom, sanctified prudence, biddeth us fear, and prepare for evil, in our good dayes.

Sapienti meliora sunt in votis, deteriora verò in expectatione. Plut. in Tranquil.

I was afraid of these things, saith Job: We must not suspect, but we ought often to think of evils, before they come. A wise moral man, much more, a wise Christian, while he is earnestly praying for good, is also carefully providing for evil. Lest the Disciples should forget trouble in times of peace, Christ saith to them, Behold (Mat. 24. 25.) I have told you before; now you are at pretty good ease, it may be, you think, it will be thus with you always; but take heed of such thoughts, I have told you what will be hereafter; Behold, I have told you before. And again (John 16. 33.) These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace; in the world ye shall have tribulation. In the peace we have with Christ, we should expect tribulation from the world. The Spirit of God often hints such things aforehand, to the spirits of his people, that they may not be surprized. Paul testifies (Acts 20. 23.) that the holy Ghost every where witnessed that bonds and afflictions did abide him; he lookt for trouble in all places, this made him both patient under, and victorious over all his troubles. Ungodly men feel trouble, before they see it; and are often past all hope, before they have had any fear; when they have a good day, they think their day will be an eternity, and last for ever. Those in Amos (chap. 6. 3.) were merry, they were singing and feasting, eating the fat, and drinking the sweet; and what do they in these their good, their only good dayes? The Prophet shews us in the next words; They put the evil day far from them: they would have no thought that their estate might change, when they had a mind their estate should continue. Hence the Prophet Isaiah (chap. 28. 15. describes them, making a covenant with death, and coming to an agreement with hell; and then they supposed themselves safe and under covert, come what would. The Prophets indeed have been talking of judgments and scourges; but what of that? we have got a protection, we have covenants in our pockets, will be our security; so they were promised, and so they believed, as their words witness; If the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come near us. These are the thoughts of foolish and ungodly men, they make bargains and agreements, as it were, with all troubles, that they shall not be touched; others may smart, but they have taken order for their own indemnity: They have made lies their refuge, and under falshood have they hid themselves. And so they call chearfully for their wine; come fetch wine, and we will fill our selves with strong drink; and then conclude confidently (as if all the world, and time were at their command) To morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant, Isa. 56. 12. When a wise man falleth into trouble, he falleth forward, that is, he falleth into those troubles which he did foresee; but when an ungodly man, a wicked man falleth into trouble, he falleth backward; he falleth into those evils, which he never thought of, much less, feared. Many of the people of God, at this day, do, and may say of the evils which are now upon us, the things which we feared are come; these storms were seen long ago in the clouds; yea, in the Sun-shine, in fair dayes; these foul rainie dayes were foreseen: and they who have foreseen them, and foreseen them with such an eye of faith and holy fear, as we have described, are in best case to grapple with them, and will be gainers by them. It is well for us, when we can say, the things we feared, are come upon us. They are in a sad condition, upon whom those evils fall, which they never feared; when troubles come, they go neerest their hearts, who have put them fartherest off, before they came. Hence observe,

Secondly, That, The more preparing fears we have before troubles come, the less we are prest with fears, when trouble comes.

If we consider Job, how unmoveable he stood the charge and assault of these afflictions, how he wrestled with all the distresses, which at once took hold of him, we are to look (next to the support he had immediately from Christ) to this wise caution of his, that he feared such a storm might overtake him, before he got to his journeyes end: He thought these things might come, and therefore laid in provision for them, against they came. Those blows wound deepest, which we expect not. Dangers unknown, do easily surprize us and oppress us; whereas those which we fear and think of, may either be prevented in their coming, or we may be provided against they come. That which the Naturalists say of the Cockatriee, that if the Cockatrice see a man first, the man dieth; but if the man seeth the Cockatrice first, the Cockatrice dies; is an experienced truth, respecting the point we have in hand; that if troubles see us first, we die; but if we see them first, they die; that is, their sting and strength (as to us) is much abated. Dangers are most felt, where they are not foreseen; and sometime, being foreseen, they are not felt at all; for a prepared expectation doth either weaken them, or strengthen us, make us more able to sustain them, or them less able to hurt us; whereas indeed every cross, which findeth us secure, hath an advantage to leave us desperate. When Nabal heard of danger past, which he never dreamt might come, his heart died in him like a stone (1 Sam. 25.) How then had he been astonished into a stone, if he had seen the evil falling upon him? Such can ill bear trouble, who look for nothing but comfort. It was an addition to the affliction of that afflicted people (Jer. 8. 15.) When they looked for peace, but no good came; and for a time of health, and behold trouble; If they who are in trouble, are more troubled, when they cannot have the peace they looked for, then surely they must be more perplexed with trouble (when it comes) who enjoying peace, never had a thought, that trouble would come. When a people are so far from looking for evil, that they look for nothing but good, and build upon it, that they shall never see sorrow; then to see sorrow, is a killing sight, The sorrows of Babylon shall be mightily mightily increas'd and augmented, doubled and trebled upon her, because when they are coming upon her, she shall be saying, I sit as a Queen, and shall see no sorrow; she was fearless, and she shall be comfortless: Trouble will lie heavy enough upon us, when we look and prepare for it; but it will be intolerable to those, who never look'd for, nor laid in one thought of preparation against its coming. The fool in the Gospel, said to his soul, take thine ease, thou hast goods laid up for many years: But it is best for us, when we have abundance of outward goods, to say to our souls, these may be lost in a few hours: Therefore say to thy self, in the time of thy fulness, what if a day of emptying should come? say, when you are rich, it may be, before I die, I may be poor; what shall I do then? Now I have a house, it may be, before I die, or within a few dayes, I shall be turned out of doors; in what posture do I find my self for such a condition? Now I am at liberty, and enjoy my friends; it may be, shortly I may be cast into a prison, and come into the hand of enemies; now I have my wife and children about me, my vine and my olive-plants, at, and roun d about my table; I may shortly be deprived of them; and, O my soul, how canst thou bear these changes? It is good to put these cases to our selves now; surely Job often tutor'd his spirit with such questions as these, and catechized his heart in them from day to day; hence he saith, The things I feared, are come upon me. To proceed;

Gravius est vulnus quod non expectatur, & illa agrius tolerantur, quibus homo se non prius affuefacit.

I was not in safety, neither had I rest, nor was I quiet; yet trouble came.

This is both an addition to, and an exposition of the former verse. These words explain what he meant by saying, I feared a fear; even this, I was not in safety, neither had I rest, &c.

I was not in safety.] No? was not Job in safety in the dayes of his prosperity? Is it not said, that he had a hedge about him, and such a hedge as the Devil could not break through, to hurt him? and was not Job in safety then?

לא שלותי

The hebrew word, from the root [Shalah] doth also signifie, I was not secure, I was not in security; or, I did not sit safe in my own thoughts, in my own opinion; I did not live securely or without fear in my most flourishing dayes. And from this root, Christ is called Shiloh, Gen. 49. 10. The Scepter shall not depart from Judah till Shiloh come. Christ is Shiloh, that is, he, in whom all persons may securely trust; you may sit down in safety in Christ, and rest your souls for ever; he is Shilah, our preserver; and the Hebrews use that word to signifie the fleshy mantle in which the infant is wrapped in the mothers belly, because the infant lieth there quietly and securely; it is out of fear, and hath no thought of any danger, but lieth securely, out of harms way. So that when Job saith, I was not in safety, he means, I did not think my self safe, or beyond the reach of danger, I was not taken up in outward contentments; I did not look upon my possessions as perpetualties, or upon my house, as that which should endure for ever, or my dwelling-place to all generations. Job was not like the great Monarch of Babylon, (Dan. 4. 4.) who said, I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in my house (it is the same word which is used in the Text) I, saith Nebuchadnezzar, counted my self the greatest man in the world, and I thought none could touch or molest me; I was at rest and safe: We have such a description made by the Prophet, of a whole Nation, as this King makes of his own person, Jer. 49. 3. Arise, get ye up unto the wealthy Nation that dwelleth at ease; or (it is the same word) to a Nation without either fear or care, a secure Nation; as it is explained by the words following, which have neither gates nor bars, which dwell alone. If you come to a mans house that hath neither lock nor key, nor door, nor bar, you may well resolve, that he dwelleth securely, and is in safety. And if you come to a City that hath neither gates nor bars, you will say, either this City hath no enemies, or else it fears none. A City without gates and bars, is the embleme of security. Job's temper was directly opposed to this; I was not in safety.

Neither had I rest, nor was I quiet.

These two latter expressions are of the same importance with the former: Both these words have been opened at the thirteenth verse of this Chapter, both being there applied to rest and quietness in the grave. There he said, if he had died, he had been at rest and quiet; but all his lifetime, he had no rest, neither was he quiet. But is this agreeable to the duty or character of a godly man, to say he hath no rest, he is not quiet? Surely a godly man ought to be quiet, when all the world is hudled together in confusion; when the mountains skip like lambs, and the little hills like young sheep, then, even then, he ought to stand like mount Sion, that cannot be moved: And did it become Job, or is it any part of his commendation, that in the times of his peace, he had no rest? When the Prophet shews the temper of wicked men, he compares them to the troubled Sea, when it cannot rest, Isa. 57. 20. It should seem that Job was like a troubled sea; for himself saith, he could not rest. I answer, by distinguishing, first, of a twofold rest; there is a rest of contentation, and a rest of confidence. Job had not a rest of confidence, he trusted not in his outward peace; but he had the rest of contentation, even in his outward troubles. A wicked mans conscience is like a troubled sea, when he enjoyes outward peace; but Job enjoyed peace of conscience while his outward estate was like a troubled sea: He was fully setled in his mind, when he had no rest; and was satisfied in spirit, when he had not this quietness: so that when he saith, I had no rest, neither was I quiet; his meaning is only this, I never placed my happiness in these things, I never built my hopes upon creatures, I never trusted upon them, nor expected much from them. Or, if you will more clearly apprehend the sence of this last verse, you may read it in that contrary practice of the rich man, Luke 12. 19. His house was full, but his heart was fuller of the creature; and he made the creature both his rock to build upon, and his pillow to sleep upon; when his ground brought forth plentifully, and he had built new barns to lay up his fruits, then he layes himself down to sleep; and that he might sleep quickly and quietly, he sings a requiem to his soul; Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry; no face can be more unanswerable to a face; heaven and hell, light and darkness, are not more unlike, then these words of the rich man are unanswerable in likeness, to those words of Job. That rich mans words are the affirmatives of all Job's negatives; and may be thus rendred in full sence: I was (and I resolved I should so continue) in safety, at rest and quiet. Job's estate was as full as his, but his heart was emptied of all creature-confidence and complacence; I (said he) never thought my self the safer for these, and therefore I said to my soul, soul, take not thy rest, quiet not thy self in these: this is his intent in saying, I was not in safety, neither had I rest, nor was I quiet. It follows,

Yet (though it was thus with me) trouble came; though my heart was loose from the creature, yet I lost all I had in the creature: though I made not the world my comfort, yet I found sorrow in the world; I never expected much peace in it, none at all from it; yet trouble came: such trouble came, as might move and shake me to pieces. Job, you see, when he had abundance of all outward things, yet saith, he was not in safety, and at quiet; he did not rest in or upon them. Hence observe,

A godly man never setteth up his rest in Creatures.

Though he have never so much riches in possession, yet he doth not make riches his portion. He lives by that caution (Psal. 62. 10) If riches flow in or encrease, yet set not thine heart upon them. In the highest flood and spring-tide of worldly prosperity, we should keep our hearts within the channel: When riches are increased into a mountain, and (to the eye of nature) into a mountain of rocks, yet then do not set thy heart upon them, as upon a foundation, (so the Hebrew word imports) to settle thy contentments. All the creatures in heaven and earth, are not strong enough to bear the weight of a mans heart (God only can do that) who is the rock of ages, or an everlasting strength, Isa. 26. 3. All, besides him, is a foundation of sand, and so a godly man takes them. What nature looks at as a foundation of rocks, that grace sees to be a foundation of sand, and therefore will not rest upon it; neither indeed can it. A godly man, in his afflictions, is, as having nothing, and yet possessing all things (2 Cor. 6. 10.) and in his abundance, he hath all things, but possesseth nothing; for he so possesses things, as if he did not possess them; as the Apostles counsel is (1 Cor. 7. 31.) He marries as if he married not; he weeps, as if he wept not; he rejoyces, as if he rejoyced not; he buyes, as if he possessed not; because the fashion of this world passeth away. It was an excellent speech of Luther, concerning worldly things, I have professed, that I will never be satisfied with the creature (this is to be a Protestant in deed, as well as in truth.) A godly man is an Epicure in Christ, he would never play the Epicure, but in Christ, and in God: In them, and towards them, he gives his affections their full swing, and as a wicked man is said to enlarge his desires (after the Earth) as Hell (Hab. 2. 5.) So he enlarges his desires (after Heaven) as Heaven, and complains his desires are no larger. In the thoughts of Christ he sits down, and would take his fill; he saith, I am safe in him, I am quiet and at rest; He saith to his soul, soul, dost thou see that Christ, and dost thou take notice of those promises? Thou hast goods laid up in him, in them for many years, yea, for eternity; soul, take thine ease, take it fully, thou hast riches, thou hast an estate that can never be spent; soul, eat, drink and be merry; his blood is drink indeed, and his flesh is meat indeed; joy in Christ is joy indeed, unspeakable joy here, and fulness of joy hereafter: In his presence there is fulness of joy, and at his right hand there are pleasures for evermore. Until the soul pitches thus on Christ, it is not in safety, much less in rest or quiet. As the Needle in the Compass is in continual motion till it points towards the North, where (as it is conceived) there are Rocks of Loadstone, with which it sympathizeth; so the soul is in continual motion, until it points to Christ, who (we are sure) is that living Rock, with whom all Believers sympathize; and the true Loadstone which attracts all Believers to him. A Believer, like Noah's Dove, finds no rest (all the world over) for the feet of his soul, until he returns to this Ark of safety and salvation: And therefore after all his flights and flutterings among the Creatures, he saith (with the Psalmist) Return unto thy rest (thy Christ) O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee, Psal. 116. 7. Thou hast been abroad in the world, and that (like a narrow-hearted Master) deals niggardly with thee: If thou shouldest stay long, either in the service of, or dependance upon the world, the world would starve thee: Therefore return unto thy rest in the Lord; for the Lord hath dealt (and will yet deal more) bountifully with thee, O my soul.

Lastly, In that Job saith, I was not in safety, neither had I rest, &c. yet trouble came; we may observe,

> That, The more our hearts are loosened from the creatures, the more assurance we may have of enjoying the Creatures.

It is as if Job had said, I was not fastened to the world, my heart was not engaged to any thing on this side Christ; and this was the fairest, the most probable way for the continuance of my outward comforts; yet trouble came. The Redditive Particle, yet, supposes somewhat in reason or probability at least, that might have carried it another way. As when the Prophet Amos, reckoning up the judgments of God upon his people, speaks to them thus in his name (chap. 4. 6, 8, 9.) I have sent you cleanness of teeth, yet you have not returned unto me; I have sent you the pestilence, the sword, yet have you not returned unto me. The yet, shews there was great reason God should expect their return, or that he had done that, which, in all probability, might have caused them to return, when he sent those judgments. So here, when Job saith, I was not in safety, &c. yet trouble came; the yet, implies that there was somewhat even in that unquietness, which gave him hopes of settlement in his outward comforts: It seems to carry such a sence in it, as if he had in more words explained himself thus; Had I dwelt securely, and given my self up to the contentments of my flesh, or trusted in an arm of flesh for safety, I should not have wondred at my calamity, or thought strange of my trouble; but this is a riddle which I cannot yet expound, that when my heart was no way set upon my estate, my estate should fall: That when I rested not in the creature, I should meet with such troubles in the creature. This is not the manner of God, it is not usual for God to do thus in his dispensations toward his people and servants. It is very rare that he takes their outward comforts from them, when they are not taken with their comforts. Hence it is (as I apprehend) that Job putteth it in with a yet trouble came. This way of God with me, is out of the ordinary course of Providence. I confess, Mercer, a very learned Commentator, doth not favour this exposition of laying such a weight upon the particle yet, and therefore renders the Original (Vau) as a bare Copulative. I was not in safety, &c. And trouble came. Yet having the authority of our Translation, and the frequent use of the word to that sence in other places, we may venture upon it; yea, I think it no venture, but a certain advantage both to the Text and to our selves. And I am certain the position is true, though the exposition should not prove so: For the truth is, troubles are never so near, as when we put them furthest off; nor is the world ever so unsure to us, as when we make surest of it. God often pulls their comforts from them, whose hearts are glued to their comforts; As it is said of those in 1 Thes. 5. 3. When they shall say, peace and safety, then sudden destruction shall come upon them, as pain upon a woman in travail, and they shall not escape; Mark, when they shall say, that is, conclude all's their own, when out of the abundance of their hearts, their mouths speak of nothing but of peace and safety, all is well, and all will be well, then sudden destruction cometh: When a man saith, I have riches, I have a full estate, I have honour, I am a happy man, I may take my rest; then poverty, want, disgrace, misery, vexations and troubles, fall upon him as an armed man. Thus for the most part, God wrests the creatures soonest out of their hands, who hold them fastest. In Luke 17. Christ instanceth in the dayes of Noah, and in the dayes of Lot, when they were secure, buying and selling, building and planting, marrying and giving in marriage, as if the world had been their own; and as if they meant to take the heart of it out, and leave a poor world for the next age, then the flood came, and then fire came, and they, with theirs, were swept away and consumed, as in a moment. The Master of the servant in the Gospel, shall come in a day. In what day? First, In a day when he looked not for him. Secondly, In a day when his heart was let out upon the creature; When he shall be eating and drinking with the drunken, when he shall be smiting his fellow-servants; when he shall think all sure, and the day his own; in that day shall his Master come, even in the day that he looketh not for him, and in an hour when he is not aware, Luke 12. 45, 46. To have the spirit steept and drencht in worldly pleasures or profits, endangers us to some sudden sweeping judgment: And when we value the enjoyment of the creature more then we ought, we shall not long enjoy it so much as we might. Earthly things fail us soonest, when we trust in them, or think our selves safe by them.

Non placet quod quidam putant Jobum velle hoc loco, quod non intumuerit, neque insolentior fuit rebus affluentibus, & tamen in hac mala inciderit, Mercer.

From this observe (in passage) a vast difference between God and the world, between earthly things and spiritual; the way to hold spiritual things fast, is to take fast hold of them, to cleave to them with a full purpose of heart never to let them go. If you carry loose affections towards Christ, you may quickly lose the comforts of his presence: The more we rest upon Christ, the more we trust on God, and make him our safety, the more safe we are. Him doth God establish in peace, in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed upon him, even because he trusts upon him, Isa. 26. 3. We have most peace from God, when we expect most; and may look for more rest and quiet, when we rest quietly in him, and say, In God I have enough; yea, as Jacob (Gen. 33. 11.) I have all. But if you would have rest in the world, say as the Prophet Micah directs (chap. 2. 10.) This is not our rest. Keep your hearts at a due distance from the world, and you shall (most probably) keep the world. What Christ speaks of this life, is true of the things of this life; he that will lose (that is, he who is ready) to lose the things of this life, shall save them; and he that will save, that is, he who is resolved to save the things of this life, shall lose them; put them out of your hearts, and you may hold them in your hands: you stand firmest upon the earth, when you do but touch it, and touch it (as a round body doth a plain) only in a point. You are freest from danger, when you say, we are not in safety; freest from motion, when you say, we are not in rest: And when in Job's sense) you are not quiet, then (according to the ordinary dealings of God, with his people) you are furthest from trouble.

So much concerning this Chapter, containing Job's bitter curſe upon the day of his birth, and his vehement expoſtulation about the continuance of his life.

His Three Friends ſtood ſilent all this while, much divided between compaſſion and indignation; they pitied his ſad afflictions, but they were angry (and they thought they had reaſon to be angry, in the behalf of God) with his impatience and complaint. Their zeal kindled, and their hearts waxed hot within them; while they were thus mute and muſing, the fire burned and brake forth; at laſt they ſpake (every man in his order) with their tongues: A hot diſpute enſues; Eliphaz begins, the reſt follow: After a long ventilation and debate, God himſelf (appearing as Moderator) ſtates the queſtion between them, determines and concludes for Job againſt thoſe three; Ye have not ſpoken of me the thing that is right, as my ſervant Job hath, chap. 42. 7. To this God the moſt wiſe, the only wiſe God, the infallible moderator of all perſons, actions, things and queſtions, both in Heaven and upon the Earth, be glory and praiſe for ever, Amen.

WITH Practical Observations
UPON
JOB.

TO THE CHRISTIAN READER:

To those chiefly of this CITY, who have been the MOVERS, and are the PROMOTERS of this WORK.

SIRS,

Our continued Care and labour of Love, engages a like degree of both, for the growth of this Infant-work. And therefore (though in the midst of manifold diversions) these pieces are ventured out. We live in an Age (O that we could live it) wherein the hand of Providence works gloriously, yea, terribly: Having then got three or four steps further into this Book of Providence, it will not be unseasonable to shew you the Prints of them: Especially seeing this History of Job's Affliction, looks so like a Prophesie of ours; and (almost in every Line) gives us some Lineament of our present troubles and distempers, of our hopes and fears.

In the three former Chapters we had a Narrative of the Case, and of those occurrences out of which the Question here debated receives its state; as also the bringing together of the Interlocutors or persons maintaining this Discourse; as we may alwayes observe in the writings of the Ancients, whether Natural, Moral or Divine, which are composed into Dialogues or Disputes.

This great Divinity-act (one of the greatest surely and most solemn, I think the first that ever was held out in such a formality, in the world) is principally spent upon that Noble probleme, How the Justice and Goodness of God can be salved, while his Providence distributes good to the evil, and evil to the good? A Question started and toucht in many Books of the Holy Scriptures; but is here (ex professo) purposely handled; First, In a very long Disputation between Job the Respondent, and his three Friends Opponents; Then in a full Determination, First, By Elihu, an acute and wise; then by God himself, the most wise, and infallible Moderator.

The Method here observed is after the manner of the Schools (pro and contra) every one of the four Disputants having his several Opinion, and each one his arguments in favour of his own. Which, yet, are not presented in that affected plainness of the Schoolmen, with their down-right (videtur quod sic, probatur quod non) This I affirm, this I approve; this I deny, this disprove. The Pen-men of the Holy Ghost never discuss Questions so; no, nor any of the old Philosophers. This covert carriage of their Opinions, and close contexture of their Arguments, Answers and Replies about them, render the Book somewhat dark and obscure to the Readers meditation. And therefore it will be a Design not unprofitable (if that end offered at, may be attained) briefly to draw them forth, and set them before you in a more open light. And doubtless, what they hold, and by what Mediums they mannage their proofs, may (by the blessing of God, upon serious thoughts, and frequent reviews) be made out to a very great plainness.

Towards which, it is observable, that there are many threds of the same colour and substance, mixt and inter-woven by the Disputants throughout this whole Discourse. And that, though the three Opponents, with one consent, set up Job, as their common Mark to shoot at; yet they take up very different standings, if not different levels, varying each from other in some things, as well as all (upon the main) from him.

The reason of the former is this, because there are some common Principles, wherein they all agree; which, if we abstract, with what is spoken in the illustration of them, taking in also those Conclusions which spring from them, as their first-born: Then the remainder will shew us that proper and distinctive Opinion which each of them holds about this grand Question of Providence; the events and distribution whereof, seem so cross-handed in giving trouble and sorrow to godly men, joy and prosperity to the wicked.

There

There are three Principles wherein Job concurs with his three friends; and a fourth, wherein they three concur against him.

The three, wherein all four agree, are these;

First, That all the afflictions and calamities which befal man, fall within the eye and certain knowledge of God.

Secondly, That, God is the author and efficient Cause, the orderer and disposer of all those afflictions and calamities.

Thirdly, That, In regard of his most holy Majesty, and unquestionable Soveraignty, he neither doth, nor can do any wrong or injury to any of his creatures, whatsoever affliction he layes, or how long soever he is pleased to continue it upon them.

These three Principles and such Conclusions as are immediately deducible from them, are copiously handled and insisted upon by them all. In pursuance whereof, they all speak very glorious things of the Power, Wisdom, Justice, Holiness and Soveraignty of the Lord. In proclaiming every of which Attributes, the tongue of Job, like a silver Trumpet, lifts up the name of God so high, that he seems to drown the sound of the other three, and makes their praise almost silent.

But Job's three Friends proceed to a fourth Principle; which he utterly denies; about which, so much of his answer, as is contradictory to their objections and rejoynders, wholly consists. That, their fourth Principle seems to be bottom'd upon two grounds.

First, That, whosoever is good, and doth good, shall receive a present good reward, according to the measure of the good he hath done; and, That whosoever is wicked, and doth wickedly, shall be paid with present punishments, according to the measure of his Demerits.

Secondly, That if (at any time) a wicked man flourish in outward prosperity, yet his flourishing is very momentany, and suddenly (in this life) turns to, or ends in visible judgments: And, that (if at any time) a godly man be withered with adversity, yet his withering is very short, and suddenly (in this life) turns to, or ends in visible Blessings.

Upon these two Grounds or Suppositions, they raise and build their fourth Principle, from which, they three make continual Batteries upon the Innocency of Job. We may conceive the Position in this frame;

That, Whosoever is greatly afflicted, and is held long under the pressure of his affliction, that man is to be numbred with the wicked, though no other evidence or witness appear or speak a word against him. Hence,

The peculiar Opinion of Eliphaz rises thus; That, All the outward evils which overtake man in the course of this life, are the proceeds of his own sin, and so from the process of Gods Justice. He gives us this sence, for his, in express terms, chap. 4. 8. They that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same: Which he applies personally to Job (chap. 22. 5, 6.) Is not thy wickedness great, and thine iniquities infinite? Thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, and stripped the naked of their cloathing, &c. The whole scope of his speech bends the same way, and is, as if he had said to Job, Though thy carriage hath been so plausible among us, that we are not able to accuse thee of sin; yet these judgments accuse thee, and are sufficient witnesses against thee: These cry out with a loud voyce, That thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, &c. Though we have not seen thee act these sins, yet, in these effects we see thou hast acted them: The snares which are round about thee, tell us, thou hast laid snares for others; and he that runs may read how terrible, how troublesome thou hast been to the poor, in the terrors which have seiz'd thy spirit, and in the troubles which have spoiled thee of thy riches.

Bildad the Shuhite speaks second; His Opinion is not so rigid as that of Eliphaz: He grants that afflictions may fall upon a righteous person; yet so, that if God send not deliverance speedily, if he restore him not quickly to his former estate and honour, then (upon the second ground of the Fourth Principle) such a man may be censured, cast and condemned as unrighteous. That such was Bildad's judgment in this case, is clear, chap. 8. 5, 6. If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous; though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end shall greatly encrease. And, vers. 20. 21. Behold God will not cast away a perfect man,

&c. till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoycing. As if he had said I cannot assent to my Brother Eliphaz, affirming, That every man afflicted, is afflicted for his wickedness; I (for my part) believe, and am perswaded, that a godly man may be afflicted for the trial and exercise of his Graces, &c. But, then I am assured, that God never lets him lie in his afflictions; for as soon as he cries and calls, the Lord awakes presently, makes his habitation prosperous again, and encreases him more then ever. I grant, the Lord may cast down a perfect man, but he will not (in this life) cast him away; no, he will speedily fill his mouth with laughing, and his lips with rejoycing.

Zophar, The third Deponent, differs from the two former, in this great controversie, affirming, That the reason of all those afflictions which press the children of men, is to be resolved into the absolute will and pleasure of God; that we are not further to enquire about his Wisdom, Justice or Mercy in dispensing them, his counsels being unsearchable, and his wayes past finding out. Thus he delivers his mind (chap. 11.7, 8.) Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou by searching find him out to perfection? It is as high as heaven, what canst thou do? Deeper then hell, what canst thou know? Verse 12. Vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild Asses colt. In the rest of his speech he comes neerest the opinion of Bildad, vers. 14, 15, 16. And gives out as hard thoughts of Job as either of his brethren, numbring him among the wicked, and assigning him the reward of an hypocrite (chap. 20.29.) This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed to him by God.

These (I conceive) are the Characteristical opinions of Job's three friends about his Case. All consistent with those four Principles which they hold in common, all equally closing in the censure and condemnation of Job, though in some things dissenting and falling off from one another.

But what thinks Job? or how doth he acquit or extricate himself from these difficulties? Very well; His sentence is plainly this:

That the Providence of God dispences outward prosperity and affliction so indifferently to good and bad, to the righteous and the wicked, that no un-erring judgment can possibly be made up of any mans spiritual estate by the face, and upon the view of his temporal. He declares this as his opinion, in clear, resolute and Categorical terms (chap. 9.22, 23) This is one thing, therefore I said it. He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked; if the scourge slay suddenly, he will laugh at the trial of the innocent. Which opinion hath no quarrel at all with any of those three Principles held by Job joyntly, and in consort with his three Friends, but only with their fourth: which he throughout refutes as heterodox and unsound in it self, as uncomfortable to the spirits, and inconsistent with experiences of the Saints.

In the Strong-hold and Fort-Royal of this holy Truth, Job secures himself against all the Assaults, and scatters all the Objections of his Opponents; resolving to maintain it to the very death; he will lay his bones by this Position, say his unkind friends what they can against him, and let the most wise God do what he pleases with him.

That he was a sinner, he readily grants; that he was an hypocrite, he flatly denies.

That the Lord was righteous in all his dealings with him, he readily grants. That himself was unrighteous, because the Lord had dealt so with him, he flatly denies.

How perfect soever he was, he confesses, that he needed the Free Grace and Mercies of the Lord to justifie him; but withal, asserts, that he was perfect enough to justifie himself against all the challenges of man.

In these acknowledgments of his sinfulness and denials of insincerity; in these humblings of himself before God, and acquittings of himself before men; in these implorings of mercy from the Lord, and complainings of the unkindness of his brethren, the strength of Job's Answer consists, and the specialties of it may be summed up.

'Tis true, that through the extremity of his pain, the anguish of his spirit, and the provocation of his Friends, some unwary speeches slipt from him; for which Elihu reproved him gravely and sharply; of which himself repented sorrowfully and heartily, all which the most gracious God passed by and pardoned freely, not imputing sin unto him.

Thus (Christian Reader) I have endeavoured (as heretofore of the whole Book, so now) to give a brief account concerning the Argumentative part of it; and to represent how far in this great Controversie, the Answerer and his Objectors agree in judgment, and where they part.

If this Discovery administer any help, as a Thred to lead your meditations through the many secret turnings and intricacies of this Dispute, the labour in drawing it out, is abundantly satisfied. And if any further light subservient to this end, shall be given in from the Father of Lights, that also in its season may be held forth, and set upon a Candlestick.

What is now received, together with the Textual Expositions upon this first undertaking between Eliphaz and Job, I leave in your hands; praying for a blessing from on high, to convey Truth home to every heart; desiring earnest prayers for the Spirit of Grace and Illumination to be powred out, according to the measure of the gift of Christ, upon

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Obſervations UPON THE FOURTH, FIFTH, SIXTH AND SEVENTH CHAPTERS Of the Book of JOB.

CHAP. 4. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Then Eliphaz the Temanite anſwered, and ſaid,

If we aſſay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? But who can withhold himſelf from ſpeaking?

Behold, thou haſt inſtructed many, and thou haſt ſtrengthened the weak hands.

Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou haſt ſtrengthened the feeble knees.

But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled.

Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightneſs of thy wayes, and thy hope?

JOB's complaint ended in the former Chapter; in this, a hot diſpute begins. Job having curſed his day, is now chid himſelf; and he had ſuch a chiding, as was indeed a wounding, ſuch, as almoſt at every word, drew blood; and was not only a rod upon his back, but a ſword at his heart. Job was wounded firſt by Satan, he was wounded a ſecond time by his Wife, a third time he was wounded (not as it is ſpoken in the Prophet, in the houſe of his friends, but) in his own houſe, by his friends; theſe laſt wounds are judged (by good Phyſitians in ſoul-afflictions) his deepeſt and foreſt wounds.

Then Eliphaz the Temanite anſwered, and ſaid,

Eliphaz being (as is ſuppoſed) the elder and chief of the three, firſt enters the liſt of this debate with Job; concerning whoſe name, perſon and pedigree, we have ſpoken before at the eleventh verſe of the ſecond Chapter; and therefore referring the Reader thither, for thoſe circumſtantials of the ſpeaker, I ſhall immediately deſcend unto the matter here ſpoken.

If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? &c.

The whole discourse of Eliphaz may be divided into three general parts.

1. The Preface
2. The Body
3. The Conclusion

} of his Speech.

The Preface of his speech is contained in the second verse, If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? &c.

The body of his Speech is extended through this fourth, and to the last verse of the fifth Chapter: It consisteth especially of two members, or two sorts of matter, in which Eliphaz deals with Job.

The first is reprehensory, by way of conviction and reproof.

The second is exhortatory, by way of counsel and advice.

First, Eliphaz reprehends Job. This work of reprehension begins at the third verse of this Chapter, and is continued to the end of the fourth verse of the fifth Chapter. And to shew that he did not reprehend him upon passion, he grounds his reprehension upon reason, and strengthens his reproof with arguments. And there are four Reasons or special Arguments, which Eliphaz takes up to make this reprehension convincing; the naming of them will give light to the whole, before we come to the particulars.

The first Argument is contained in the words I have read, to the end of the sixth verse: And it is taken from the unsuitableness of his present practice, to his former precepts.

Or from the unequality of the course he now took under affliction, to the counsel he had given others under affliction.

His second Argument beginning at the seventh verse, and carried on to the twelfth, is grounded upon a supposed inequality of Gods present dealing with him, in reference to his former dealings with godly men.

Eliphaz thought thus, surely Job is an hypocrite, otherwise God would have dealt with him, as with an innocent; Remember (saith he) I pray thee, who ever perished being innocent? I will convince thee by all examples, by whatsoever is upon record in the history of all ages, that thou art a hypocrite, a wicked person; for see, if thou canst find an instance in any Story, of an innocent person perishing. That is his second Argument.

His third Argument is continued from the twelfth verse, to the end of this fourth Chapter; and that he might make the deeper impression upon Job's spirit, he brings it in with a dreadful preamble: A vision from God at once terrifying and instructing him, thus to reason down the pride of man. The Argument it self is coucht in the seventeenth verse. It is drawn from an evidence of presumption in all such as shall dare to implead Gods justice, or plead their own: as if Eliphaz had said, surely thou art a proud and a wicked person; for there was never any godly man upon the face of the earth, no nor any Angel in heaven, that durst be so bold with God as thou hast been: Shall mortal man (saith he) be more just then God? shall a man be more pure then his maker? Behold, he put no trust in his servants, and his Angels he charged with folly.

His fourth Argument begins at the fifth Chapter, and ends with the fourth verse; and it is taken from the unlikeness of Job's carriage under his afflictions, to that which any of the Saints in any age of the world, did ever shew forth under their afflictions. He carries himself so as none of the Saints ever carried themselves, gives an evidence against his Saintship. Call now to the Saints, either those now living upon the earth, or search the records concerning all the Saints that ever lived; consider, and see whether thou canst observe or read any parallel of thy complaints and unreasonable expostulations. So much for the sum of his convictions.

Then Eliphaz turns himself to admonition and exhortation in the following part of that fifth Chapter; and there are two heads of his admonitory exhortation.

First, He admonishes him to seek unto God, and to call upon him, ver. 8. I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause. I give thee no other counsel then I would take my self. If I were in thy case, I would not stand thus complaining and cursing my day, but this I would do, I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause. This admonition is enforced by divers Arguments, to ver. 17.

The second head of his exhortation beginneth at ver. 17. and it is to prevail with him, patiently to bear, and quietly to accept his affliction or the punishment of his iniquity; in pursuance of this, he shews him many benefits and blessings, attending those who graciously comply with the correcting hand of God upon them. Behold (saith he, ver. 17.) happy is the man whom God correcteth; therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty; he concludeth all from his certain knowledge, and infallible experience of what he had said (ver. 27.) Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; back'd with a warranty, that if he obey, his own experience shall quickly teach him this truth; Hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

So much concerning the Division or Parts of this first Speech or Dispute made by Eliphaz, in answer to the former complaint, poured out by Job against the day of his birth, and the night of his conception, in chap. 3.

The six verses (lately read) contain (as I said before) the first Argument, we have the Preface in the second verse, and the Argument it self in the four following. The point which Eliphaz desires to prove and clear is this; that Job was guilty of hypocrisie, of close hypocrisie at the least, if not of gross hypocrisie. The Medium or reason by which he would prove it, is the unsuitableness of his present practice, to his former Doctrine. His actions under sufferings contradict what himself had taught other sufferers: And this speaks him guilty. The Argument may be thus formed.

That mans Religion is but vain, and his profession hypocritical, who having comforted others in, and taught them patience under affliction, is himself (being afflicted) comfortless and impatient.

But Job, thus it is with thee; thou hast been a man very forward to comfort others, and teach them patience, yet now thou art comfortless and impatient:

Therefore thy Religion is vain, and thy Profession hypocritical.

Is not this thy fear? Here is a goodly Religion indeed, a proper piece of profession; and such is thine, this is all thou art able to make out. Thus you have the Logical strength of the Argument contained in the words. We shall now examine them in the Grammatical sence of every part, as they lie here in order. And first, for the Preface.

If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? but who can withhold himself from speaking?

The words import, as if Eliphaz had said thus unto Job; we thy friends have all this while stood silent, we have given thee full liberty and scope to speak out all that was in thy heart; let it not grieve thee, if we now take liberty to speak our selves: and indeed a necessity lies upon us to speak. Two things Eliphaz puts into this Preface, whereby he labours to prepare the mind of Job, readily to hear and receive what he had to say unto him.

First, He tells him that he speaks out of good-will, and as a friend to him. If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? Pray do not take it ill, we mean you no harm, we would but give you faithful counsel, we speak from our hearts, not from our spleen, we speak from love to thee, let it not be thy grief.

Secondly, He shews that he was necessitated to speak; as love provokes, so necessity constrains; Who can withhold himself from speaking? Either of these considerations is enough to unlock both ear and heart to take in wholesom counsel. What ear, what heart will not the golden key of love, or the iron key of necessity open to instruction? When a friend speakes, and he speaks as bound, when kindness and duty mix in conference, how powerful!

If we assay,] or try. The word signifies properly to tempt, either for good or evil; and because in temptation, an assay or experiment is made of man, how bad or how good he is; therefore the word is applied to any assaying or experimenting of things or persons. This very word is winning winning and gaining upon Job. We will but try a little if we can do thee any good, or bring lenitives to thy ſorrows, we will not be burthenſom or tedious; we will but aſſay to commune with thee. The word notes ſerious ſpeaking. The place where God communed with his people, in giving anſwers from Heaven, is expreſſed by this word, 1 King. 6. 19. The Oracle he prepared in the houſe within, &c. or the communing-place where God ſpake.

לאה Feſſus corpore vel animo, inſanivit, furiit.

Wilt thou be grieved?] The word ſignifies to be extreamly wearied even unto rage or fainting. Here Eliphaz ſeems to hint at Job's former diſtempered ſpeeches. If we ſpeak, wilt thou promiſe us not to fall into ſuch a fit of paſſion as even now thou waſt in. And yet whatſoever comes of it, or howſoever thou takeſt it, I muſt diſcharge my duty and my conſcience: Therefore he adds,

Who can withhold himſelf from ſpeaking?] That is, no man can withhold himſelf from ſpeaking in ſuch a caſe as this: To hear thee ſpeak thus, would even make a dumb man ſpeak. Chriſt ſaith in the Goſpel, If theſe ſhould hold their peace, the ſtones would cry; there is ſuch a ſence in theſe words: If we thy friends ſhould hold our peace, when thou ſpeakeſt thus, the very ſtones would cry out againſt thee for ſpeaking, and againſt us for holding our peace. The Hebrew word tranſlated withhold, ſignifies to ſhut up a thing ſo as that it cannot come out: It is applyed to the locking up of the Clouds that they rain not; to the holding in of fire that it cannot break forth, Jer. 20. 9. where the Prophet very elegantly fits it to the reſtraining of ſpeech, which is the very point in hand. His word was in my heart as a burning fire was ſhut up in my bones, I was weary with forbearing. So it implies, that the friends of Job had as it were a fire in their boſoms, which they could no longer reſtrain, they were as clouds full of water, full of dew and rain, they were not able to ſuſpend themſelves from diſſolving and ſhowring upon Job, both reproof and counſel, adviſes and exhortations. We may Obſerve from this Preamble,

עצר Clauſit, coercuit. 1 King. 8. 35

That, it is wiſdom to ſweeten reproof with friendly inſinuation.

Reproof is a bitter Pill; it is a wholſom yet a bitter Pill, and there is need to wrap it up in Gold and Suger, that pleaſing both eye and palat it may be taken down the better. It is the Apoſtles counſel to his Galathians, Brethren, if a man be overtaken with a fault, ye that are ſpiritual reſtore ſuch an one in the ſpirit of meekneſs. The word reſtore, is an alluſion to the Art of Chyrurgery, in ſetting a bone out of joynt; ſoft words and a ſoft hand fit the Patients mind to endure that painful operation. By falls into ſin, the ſoul breaks or diſjoynts a bone; he that will ſet ſuch a mind muſt handle it gently. We may obſerve the holy skill of ſome of the Saints in prayer, preparing God for receiving of Petitions, by Prefaces and humble Inſinuations (as it were) getting within him. Thus did Abraham, Gen. 18. when he prayed for Sodom, Let not my Lord be angry, if I, who am but duſt and aſhes, ſpeak unto thee. There is ſuch a ſpiritual art in winding a reproof into the boſom and ſpirit of a man, Let it not trouble thee that I thus ſpeak, take my words in good part, If we aſſay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved?

Gal. 6. 1.

Secondly Obſerve, That, it is no eaſie thing to bear reproof.

To take a reproof well, is as high a point of ſpiritual wiſdom, as to give it well. When we reprove the ſin, we ſhould love the man; but there are few men who can love their reprovers. You know what is ſaid in the Prophet, They hate him that reproveth in the gate. Reproofs are uſually entertained with hatred, and ill taken by evil perſons; reproof is not alwayes taken in good part, by thoſe who are good. It is but need to have ſome way made for its due entertainment, by the beſt tempered ſpirits. Wilt thou be grieved? it may be wearisom and troubleſom unto thee, but I pray let it not.

Thirdly Obſerve from the Preface, That, in ſome caſes it is our duty to ſpeak and reprove, whether men are troubled or no.

How ſhould I be pleaſed, if thou wouldeſt receive my ſpeech in good part? but I cannot withhold my ſelf from ſpeaking, though thou art diſpleaſed; take it how you will, I muſt ſpeak, theſe reproofs muſt out. When we ſee plainly, that God is diſhonoured, and that the ſoul of our brother is greatly endangered, we muſt then ſpeak (as God chargeth the Prophet) whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear. In ſuch caſes we muſt adventure to ſave men by fear, plucking them out of the fire. Jude 23.

Laſtly Obſerve, That, when the heart is full, it is a very hard thing, not to give it vent at the lips by ſpeaking.

When the heart is full of matter, the tongue will be full of words; the tongue muſt bring forth the treaſures that are laid up in the heart: Who (ſaith Eliphaz) can withhold himſelf from ſpeaking? The Prophet Jeremiah, Chap. 20. 9. thought to ſtifle the meſſage of God in his heart, I ſaid I will not make mention of him, nor ſpeak any more in his name: he began to take up a reſolution to withhold himſelf from ſpeaking; but (ſaith he) his word was in mine heart as a burning fire ſhut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could not ſtay, I could not hold it any longer. So the Apoſtles, Act. 4. 19. We cannot but ſpeak that which we have heard and ſeen, it is impoſſible for us, the Lord hath ſpoken, who can but propheſie? that is, who can withhold himſelf from propheſying when once the Lord bids him ſpeak. Words are the conceptions of our minds; and when our thoughts are form'd and organized, as it were, and grown to perfection, when thoſe children come to the birth, a little ſtrength will bring them forth: Or rather, great ſtrength cannot keep them from being brought forth. It is as poſſible for her that is with child to withhold the birth, as it is for thoſe that have pregnant conceptions, or an errand from God, to withhold themſelves from ſpeaking. When David kept ſilence (it is a ſtrange connexion) he roared, Pſal. 32. 3. When he held his peace from good, his ſorrow was ſtirred, Pſal. 39. 2. Pangs took hold on him as upon a woman in travel, which made him roar. His heart waxt hot, and the fire burned, till he ſpake with his tongue. He was then delivered. Our Engliſh phraſe of Delivering a mans mind, may hit this ſenſe well. Their hearts are barren, whoſe mouths are always ſhut. Who can withhold himſelf from ſpeaking? Amos 3. 8

But what is it that he could not forbear? He could not forbear to tell him, that (as he ſuppoſed) he acted againſt his own principles.

Behold thou haſt inſtructed many, and thou haſt ſtrengthened the weak hands, &c.

Behold,] This word is ſometime uſed in a way of deriſion, as Gen. 3. 22. where God ſaith concerning Adam, Behold the man is become as one of us, do you not ſee what a God he is? how like a God he looks? ſo, Behold thou haſt inſtructed many, (ſome make that the ſenſe) ſee now your great Teacher, your learned Doctor; he that hath been ſo forward and buſie in teaching others, ſee in what diſorder, how uncompoſed he is himſelf: he would needs Phyſick his neighbours, but knows not how to cure his own diſtempers. Ecce doctor rē egregiū Ecce medici aliorum qui ſeipſo curare nejciat.

But rather take it by way of aſſeveration, Behold, as if he ſhould ſay, This is a thing clear and certain, all that are about thee, can witneſs it; that thou haſt inſtructed many, and that thou haſt ſtrengthened the weak hands. But how art thou changed? thou art not like the man thou waſt.

Here are four ſpecial acts of ſpiritual Charity, ſo we may call and diſtinguiſh them. Firſt, inſtructing of the ignorant; ſecondly, encouraging of the weak and ſlothful; thirdly, ſupporting of thoſe that are ready to fall; and fourthly, comforting thoſe that are ready to faint. In theſe four duties Job had been very converſant. 1. Inſtruction of the ignorant, Behold thou haſt inſtructed many. 2. Encouragement of the weak and ſloathful, Thou haſt ſtrengthened the weak hands. 3. Supportation of the weak, Thy words have upholden him that was falling. 4. Conſolation of thoſe who were ready to faint, Thou haſt ſtrengthened the feeble knees.

2 Torpentes excitare.
3 Labentes erigere.
4 Mæſtos conſolari.
2 Tim. 3. 16

Here you ſee the four uſes which Job made in his counſels; Firſt, of Inſtruction; Secondly, of Exhortation; Thirdly, of Admonition; Fourthly, of Conſolation: Job was a perfect Preacher, he applies the word to all the ſervices and ends of it, reſpecting the ſeveral conditions, tempers or diſtempers of thoſe with whom he had to do.

Further, ſome take the three latter to be but as explications or branches of the firſt; Behold thou haſt inſtructed many, namely, concerning the nature of afflictions, and their duty in the bearing affliction; yea, thou haſt inſtructed them ſo far, that thou haſt ſtrengthned the weak hands, upholden thoſe that were falling, and ſtrengthned the feeble knees.

I come now to the opening of the ſeveral expreſſions.

Thou haſt inſtructed many.] The word which we tranſlate inſtructed, ſignifieth both to correct and to teach; and the Hebrews give the reaſon of it, becauſe uſually with inſtruction correction is joyned; and ſo the ſame Greek word ſignifies both to teach and to chaſten: As there is a voyce of the Rod, inſtruction in correction; ſo a Rod ſometimes goes with the voyce, correction is helpful to inſtruction: In either or both the ſences we may underſtand it here, thou haſt inſtructed many, thou haſt taught and directed, thou haſt (where need was) chaſtned and corrected many.

Many.] We have heard in the firſt Chapter, that Job prayed for his children, for his Sons and Daughters; but now we ſee Job's piety extended further then his own children. Yea, the word may well be carried out beyond his own Family. He prayed for his children, and not only did he pray for them, but alſo teach and inſtruct them; and not only them but others, he inlarges his School, he inſtructs many; it is an indefinite word, a word of number without a number. Job's School of holy diſcipline was a large one, he ſet up his School where ever he came; he was an univerſal Teacher, an Apoſtle of the holy World; thou haſt inſtructed many.

And thou haſt ſtrengthned the weak hands.

The word ſignifies, Remiſs hands, or the hands that hang down, looſe and lax. Hence by a Metaphor it notes one, that is negligent or idle; a man with his hands hanging down and his arms looſe, is the emblem of idleneſs or of ſadneſs. Thou haſt ſtrengthned the weak hands, that is, thoſe that were idle or grieved, negligent or dejected. Hence the word (Rephaim) is uſed, to ſignifie thoſe that are dead; and the reaſon is, becauſe all ſtrength, natural vigour and activity depart when life departeth: Giants alſo are expreſſed in the Hebrew by this word, becauſe they are ſuch dreadful perſons, that their very aſpect or ſight terrifies the ſpirit, makes the hands hang down, and the knees of beholders feeble; they called thoſe mighty men, weak, from that effect wrought upon others, becauſe they made others weak and terrible at their approaches. Hence, when Goliah the Giant challenged and defied the Hoſt of Iſrael, it is ſaid, that all the men of Iſrael, when they ſaw the man, fled from him, or fled from his face, (he overcame them with his looks) and were ſore afraid, 1 Sam. 17. 24.

This weakneſs of hands (as we find inſtanc'd in Scripture) ariſes four wayes. Firſt, from ſloath and idleneſs (as we noted before) ſome have ſtrong heads, but they have weak hands; they are ſufficiently inſtructed, but they cannot act, or they are unactive, and an unactive man is a weak-handed man.

Secondly, Weakneſs of the hands cometh from fear; and ſo that phraſe, to ſtrengthen the hands, notes incouraging of a perſon, as Zech. 8. 9, 13. Fear not, let thy hand be ſtrong, that is, let not fear weaken thy hands: and Jer. 38. 4. the Princes came to the King and beg'd of him that Jeremiah might be put to death; and they give the reaſon from this, For (ſay they) he weakens the hands of the men of war that remaine in the City, and the hands of all the people; that is, he diſcourages them, makes them believe they ſhall never be able to ſtand out againſt the King of Babylon, but that he ſhall certainly take the City; this is called weakning of the hands: So Iſa. 35. 3. Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees; ſay to them that are of a fearful heart, be ſtrong, fear not. So ye ſee weakneſs of the hands is cauſed by fear; when the bands of the heart are diſſolved (as it were) and looſened by fear, the hand muſt needs be diſſolved and looſened from labour; the hand is not able to work at all when fear works much upon the heart.

Thirdly, Weakneſs of the hands ariſeth from irreſolution, when a man is not reſolved what to do, not ſetled upon a buſineſs, then his hands are weak. Hence it was the counſel of Achitophel to Abſalom, that he ſhould go up upon the houſe top, in the ſight of all Iſrael, and abuſe his Fathers Concubines; and he gives the reaſon of it, then (ſaith he) ſhall the hands of all that are with thee be ſtrong; his meaning is, then they will be ſo reſolved to ſtick to thee, that they will do their utmoſt; he grounds his counſel upon the preſent irreſolution of the people, he doubted whether Abſaloms party would adhere cordially to him or no, therefore (ſaith he) do an act which may render thy ſelf and all that are with thee irreconcileable to the King; this will unite them to thee, and their hands will be ſtrong. If once they be out of hope to be receiv'd into the Kings favour, thou mayſt be out of fear that they will return to the Kings obedience. In any lawful and good deſign it is beſt to raiſe up reſolution, and ingage it to the higheſt. Where the heart is ſtrongly reſolved, the hands will act ſtrongly. The reaſon why men are ſlow and dull in great undertakings, is, becauſe they are off and on, full of neutrality and indifferency, in what they undertake. Unſettled ſpirits can never ſettle actions. A double minded man is unſtable (and weak-handed) in all his wayes. 2 Sam. 16. 21. James 1. 8.

Laſtly, There is a weakneſs of the hands (which is I conceive moſt proper to this place) ariſing from ſorrow and grief; from the weight and burthen of affliction, or from a ſudden ſurpriſe of trouble. As it is ſaid of Balteſhazzar (Dan. 5. 6.) who ſeeing the hand-writing upon the plaiſter of the wall, preſently changed countenance, and his thoughts troubled him, ſo that the joynts of his loyns were looſed, and his knees ſmote one againſt another.

Thou haſt ſtrengthned the weak hands.] That is, thoſe, whoſe hands are weak by reaſon of manifold tryals and tribulations: thou haſt ſpoken words to them, which have been as ſinews to their hands, and ſtrength unto their joynts. In this ſence the Apoſtle uſes both the expreſſions of the Text, Heb. 12. 6. where having treated about the nature of afflictions, together with the fruit and benefit of them, he concludes thus, wherefore lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees; as if he ſhould ſay, it is probable that affliction hath made your hands hang down, that ſorrow and grief have looſened your ſpirits and your loyns too, therefore now be of good cheer, lift up your hands that hang down, and the feeble knees. This Symptom or effect of ſorrow is elegantly deſcribed, Ezek. 7. 17. where the Prophet having ſhewed that many ſhould mourn, as Doves of the Valleys, adds, all hands ſhall be feeble, and all knees ſhall be weak as water.

Columbis pro cantu gemitus eſt & in amœnum murmur. Sanct. in Ezek. cap. 7.

Thy words have upheld him that was falling.] Some afflictions lie ſo hard and heavy upon us, that they do not only weaken, but caſt down: Job ſtood ready to uphold ſuch as was ready to fall. Timely advice may catch a man before he is quite down, and prevent his fall.

The word which we tranſlate falling, ſignifies in its firſt ſence, to ſtumble or ſtrike the foot againſt a thing, and ſo it is put for that which is the conſequent of ſtumbling, falling: he that ſtrikes his foot, or ſtumbles at a thing, is in danger of a fall. So Iſa. 40. 30. The young men ſhall utterly fall, it is this word, but doubled, falling they ſhall fall, that is, they ſhall utterly fall. There is a threefold falling mentioned in Scripture.

from כושל כשל Impingere, & quod ſæpe conſequitur, ruere cadere.

1. There is a falling into ſin, Gal. 6. 1. If a man be overtaken in a fault: that word (like this Hebrew in the Text) ſignifies, a fall taken by ſtumbling or by tripping upon any thing that lies in the way. In this ſence we underſtand the fall of Adam, the fall of Angels, and the falls of the Saints.

εἰ τινι καὶ παράπτωμα Præcipuè ſignificat peccata actualia, à παρὰ & πίπτω, ad verbum præter cadere, cum ſcil. ultra rectam juſtitiæ lineam cadimus, ac erratis etiam levioribus uſurpatur, παρὰ in compoſitione minuit ſenſum.

2. There is a falling into affliction, a falling into trouble: So Prov. 24. 16. The juſt man falleth ſeven times a day, that is, he meets affliction at every turn, he falls into trouble almoſt at every ſtep. Seven times a day is very often in the day, or often every day.

3. There is a falling under trouble. And of perſons falling ſo, we are chiefly to underſtand this Text. Many fall into trouble, who yet (through the ſtrength of Chriſt) ſtand firmly under trouble. Others no ſooner fall in, but they fall under it. The ſhoulders of ſome are not able to bear a light affliction, and the afflictions of others are ſo heavy that no ſhoulders are able to bear them; the back breaks, the ſpirit ſinks under the load.

To ſuch as theſe Job lent his hand, his ſhoulders: his counſel

counsel was as a staff in their hands, as ligaments to their loyns and knees. Job was well skil'd in setting props and buttresses of holy advice to such tottering souls. Thou hast upheld him that was falling. We may take the words in all or either of these three interpretations, yet most properly of the latter.

ברך Genu quod flecti solet in Benedictionibus & salutationibus.

Thou hast strengthned the feeble knees.] The Hebrew word for a knee, signifieth (in the root) to bless or to pray, because in blessing and praying for one, or in saluting, we use to bow the knee. And here, what we translate the feeble knees, is word for word, the bowing knees; because when knees bow and buckle, or double under us, it proceeds from weakness and feebleness: hence the bowing knee is called the feeble knee, Dan. 6. 5. it is said of Belshazzar, his knees smote one against another; he fainted, his spirits sank within him, when his knees (as a Symptom of his fear) beat one against another. The hanging down of hands, notes a kind of despair in regard of present evils: and feeble quaking knees, seem to refer to some expected evil. Taking the words with that difference, Job's work of love appears more full; he not only upheld in present troubles, but labour'd to strengthen against such as were to come. Thou hast instructed many, and instructed them many, even all these wayes. We may Note,

First, That, to teach, instruct and comfort others, is not only a mans duty, but his praise.

For here Eliphaz speaks it in a way of commendation, though with an intent to ground a reproof upon it. Job himself speaks of what he had done in that kind, as a defence of his own innocence, Chap. 29. Vers. 21, &c. Unto me men gave ear and waited, and kept silence at my counsel: after my words they spake not again, and my speech dropped upon them, and they waited for me as for the rain, and they opened their mouth wide, as for the latter rain. This was his practise, and this was the praise of Job. That which the Apostle speaks as a special qualification or gift of a Bishop, 1 Tim. 3. 2. is an excellent, a noble qualification in any person, of what rank or degree soever, to be apt to teach.

Secondly, Consider who Job was; he was a holy man, one that had much acquaintance and communion with God. Now though his friends mistook what was in his heart, yet they hit right upon his practise; and we knowing both what his heart was, by the testimony of God: and what his practise was, from the testimony of men, may ground a second point upon it.

That, such as know God in truth and holiness, are very ready to communicate the knowledge of God unto others.

Quæ autem est certior eleemosyna, quod majus opus misericordiæ, quã docere rudes segnes ad bene agendũ extimulare, labentem erigere, mœstos consolori.

They who know God themselves, are desirous that others should know God too. David (Psal. 51. 13.) promiseth and professeth, that he would communicate his experiences of Gods love, in pardoning his sin, when he had tasted the sweetness of a pardon. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee: when my heart hath learned more of God, others shall learn more of God from my mouth. This is spiritual charity, and it is the most excellent and noblest charity of all. Charity to the soul is the soul of charity; charity to the better part, is the best charity. In this sence also, Job was eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, by guiding them to see, and by directing their feet to walk, in the wayes of God. To give knowledge is better then to give gold. Instruction is the highest alms.

Job 29. 15.

Thirdly, If we consider Job (of whom all this is affirmed) as he was a great rich man, we may Note thus much.

That, honourable and great men, lose nothing of their honour and greatness by descending to the instruction of others, though their inferiors.

Some think it belongs only unto Ministers to instruct: What wee instruct? They resent it as a disparagement: they trust out that work wholly into the hands of others. Where shall we find an Abraham (a great Prince in his time) of whom God gave this Testimony, I know him that he will command his children, &c. and they shall keep the way of the Lord: and because he was willing to teach others, God condescends to teach him: Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do. They receive most knowledge, who are most ready to impart it. And we find before this, Abraham so successful in teaching, that he had an Army of Scholars in his house. The Text saith, when he prepar'd for that expedition to rescue his Nephew Lot, that he armed three hundred and eighteen of his trained, catechized, or instructed servants. The word signifies to train in the principles of Religion, as well as in the postures of war: being the same word used in the Book of Proverbs, for teaching a child the first elements of holy knowledge. And that place of Genesis may very well comprehend both.

חניכיו Gen. 14. Prov. 22.

Gen. 18. 17, 18, 19.

Fourthly Observe, That, charity, especially spiritual charity, is very liberal and open-hearted.

Job instructed not only his own, but he instructed others, he instructed many; he did not confine his doctrine and his advice to his own walls, but the sound thereof went whersoever he went: he instructed many. And if Job who had no special, no direct calling to it, were a teacher of many: what shall we think of those, whose calling and business it is to teach, and yet teach not any at all? their trade, their profession is to teach, yet they are so far from teaching that they teach none, and which is worse, they hinder teaching: they stop the mouth of the teacher, and (if they can) the ear of the learner, they take away the key of knowledge. They neither open the door themselves, nor suffer those that would. This is the very spirit of wickedness.

Further, Taking those other parts of his instruction, as they respect persons afflicted, who are here described by weak hands and feeble knees, ready to fall, unable to stand.

Observe first, That, sore afflictions do exceedingly indispose for duty.

Sore afflictions make weak hands and feeble knees: the weak hand and the feeble knee, are (as I said before) emblems of one unfit for any business; unfit to work, unfit to walk: when the hand is weak and the knee is feeble, what is a man fit for? Great sufferings unfit us for action. Hence it is that the Lord moderates the afflictions of his people, sweetens the bitterness, and takes off the oppressing weight of them. God promiseth to come with reviving, and that he will not contend for ever with his people. Why? A principal reason is, Lest their spirits should fail before me, and the souls which I have made. Lest the spirit should fail; that is, lest they should fail in their duties: the spirit cannot fail in the essence of it, the spirit is of an eternal constitution; but it faileth in the duty often. And if afflictions lie too hard and too long upon a people, their spirits fail, their faith fails, their courage fails, their labors cannot be laborious, to carry on and carry out their work. Therefore when Job saw any under afflictions, he endeavour'd to put courage into their hearts, and so strength into their hands.

Isa. 57. 16.

Secondly, In the general we may Note further,

That, the words of the wise have a mighty power, strength, and prevalency in them.

You see how efficacious the words of Job were. Job's instructions were strengthnings: thou hast strengthned the weak hands and feeble knees; his words were as stays to hold them up that were ready to fall: Eliphaz doth not only say, thou didst instruct many, and in instructing thou didst intend, it was thy design and aim to strengthen the weak hands, but he speaks of what Job had effected and wrought; thy words put sinews into the hands and knees of men that were weak and ready to fall, thy words were as props to hold and bear up the spirits of those that were sinking. Words wisely dispensed and followed, with the blessing of God, what can they not do? God doth the greatest things in the world by a word speaking. As at the first he made the World it self by a word speaking: so he hath done the greatest things, and wrought the greatest changes in the world, by a word speaking. When a word goes forth clothed with the authority and power of God, it works wonders. How hath it raised up sinking spirits? How hath it made the fearful, undaunted; and the weak-hearted, couragious? God by his Word in the mouth of a weak man overthrows the strong holds of sin, and by a word brings every thought of man into subjection to Jesus Christ. By a word he stops the mouth of blasphemy and evil speaking; by a word speaking, he makes a man deny himself; by a word he opens the eyes of the blind, and makes the lame to run and leap like a Hart, in the way of holiness.

2 Cor. 10. 4. 5.

And I could wish that the word which I now speak, might (through the blessing of God) have such an effect upon your spirits. O that it might strengthen all weak hands and feeble knees! O that it might uphold all who are ready to fall! we are cast upon knee-feebling, hand-weakning, yea, heart-weakning times: The sight of those things which our eyes do see, and the hearing of those things which our ears do hear, cause many to fear, and the spirits of some to fall. Now a word invested with commission from God, to go and comfort, will master all our sorrows, and dispel all these fears. If the Lord breath upon a word, that word will breath lively activity into a very carkass. Look to those many and gracious promises made to those that mourn, and comfort will flow in. Promises are the treasures of comfort; promises hold the Churches stock, they are the patrimony of believers; it is their priviledge and their honour, to be called heirs of the promise. While Christ and the promise lives, how can faith die or languish, eying a promise?

Heb. 6. 17.

So much of the first branch of the minor proposition, in the third and fourth verses.

The second branch lies in the fifth verse.

Now it is come upon thée, and thou faintest; it toucheth thée, and thou art troubled.

Thou hast instructed many, thou hast strengthened the weak hands, &c. But now it is come upon thée, &c. That is, trouble and affliction are come upon thee.

להרי Lassus fuit corpore vel animo, præ lassitudine nescivit quod ageret.

And thou faintest.] The word signifies an extraordinary fainting; when a man is so wearied and spent, that he knows not what he doth, when his reason seems tired, as much as his strength. So that the words, Now it is come upon thee, thou faintest, may import thus much; thou art in such a case, that thou seemest to be besides thy self, thou knowest not what thou dost, thou speakest thou knowest not what. The word is translated in the first verse, by grieved; in other Scriptures, by mad and furious (Prov. 26. 18.) As a mad man who casteth firebrands, &c. And whereas we say (Gen. 47. 13.) The Land of Egypt fainted by reason of the famine, many render it, The Land of Egypt was enraged or mad, because of the famine. Want of bread turns to want of reason; famine distracts. The Egyptians were so extreamly pinched with hunger, that it did even take away their wits from them; and scarcity of food for their bodies, made a dearth in their understandings. So there is this force in the word, Thou who hast given such grave and wise instruction unto others, from those higher principles of grace, now it is come upon thee, thou art even as a mad man, as a man distracted, not able to act by the common principles of reason.

Insanivit terra Ægypti, nam propter famem inimiam insanit homo. Furebat terra, i.e. tumultuabantur anno quinto famis mentem illis dimente fuit. Jun. in loc.

It toucheth thee.] It is the same word which we opened before; the Devil desired that he might but touch Job; now his friend telleth him he is touched.

נכל

And thou art troubled.] That word also hath a great emphasis in it. It signifies a vehement amazed trouble; as in that place (1 Sam. 28. 21.) where, when the woman, the witch of Endor, had raised up Samuel (in appearance) as Saul desired, the Text saith, that when all was ended, she came unto Saul, and she saw he was sore troubled: think what trouble might fall upon a man in such a condition as Saul was in, after this acquaintance with the visions of hell; think what a deep astonishment of spirit seized upon him, such disorder of mind this word layes upon Job: Now it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled. Hence observe,

First, To commend a man with a But, is a wound instead of a commendation.

Thou hast instructed many, But, &c How many are there who salute their friends very fair to their faces, or speak them very fair behind their backs, yet suddenly (as Joab to Amasa) draw out this secret dagger, and stab their honour and honesty to the heart. As it is said of Naaman, 2 Kings 5. 1. He was an honourable man, and a mighty man of valour, but he was a Leper, &c. So, &c.

Secondly, Observe, Great afflictions may disturb the very seat of reason, and leave a Saint, in some acts, below a man.

Some acts of holiness represent the Saints as mad-men to carnal men. So Paul appeared to Festus, and so to many of his Corinthians, 2 Cor. 5. 13. For whether we be besides our selves, it is to God. Workings of Grace are sometimes so far above reason, that they seem to be without reason. So some acts of infirmity represent the Saints, to carnal men, as mad-men. A gracious man works so much below reason sometimes, that he seems to be without reason.

Thirdly, Note, That, When we see any doing ill, it is good to mind him of the good which he hath done.

Eliphaz saw Job fainting, enraged as a mad-man, or as a man astonished; he tells him of the wise and grave counsel and instruction he had given before: consider what thou hast done. As in the Revelation, Christ speaks to the Church of Ephesus, (Rev. 2. 5.) Remember from whence thou art fallen, and do thy first works; when the Church did ill, then he tells her what she had formerly done well. So the Apostle, Ye did run well; having begun in the spirit, will ye end in the flesh? When he saw them run upon fleshly Ceremonies and Ordinances, ye began in the spirit (saith he) consider that, and end as ye began. As in dispute and reasoning, a false conclusion cannot be derived from true premises, so neither can it in practice, or in living. Holy premises conclude in holiness. He never began well, that ends ill.

Fourthly, Observe, That, The good we have done, is a kind of reproach to us, when we do the contrary evil.

When a mans latter actions contradict his former, or when his actions contradict his professions, the former good is a stain or blemish to him. It had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, then after they have known it, to turn from the holy Commandment given unto them. 2 Pet. 2. 21.

Further, take this likewise, It is an easier matter to instruct others in trouble, then to be instructed, or take instruction our selves in our own troubles.

Even Job, holy Job could give those counsels of patience, and meekness, and quietness under the hand of God, which he could not follow to the full, when it fell upon himself. For though he did not fail to that height, which Eliphaz implieth in this reproof, yet fail he did. He had set others a Copie, which he could not write by, or imitate, when his own turn came. A good man may quickly give counsel, above his own strength to practise.

Lastly, Observe, It is a shame for us to teach others the right way, and to go in the wrong our selves.

Eliphaz seeks to shame and convince Job upon this very ground; thou hast done thus and thus, thou hast taught others patience, and thou art mad thy self: art thou not ashamed to complain and cry out of thy afflictions, when thou hast bid others be quiet and chearful under them? It is an excellent thing, when our words are made visible by our actions; as he said in the Church story, The faith which is seen, is a great deal better then the faith which is heard; so we may say in another kind, the wisdom which is seen in bearing of affliction, is far better then the wisdom which is heard. Physitian, heal thy self. He saved others, himself he cannot save, say the Jews to Christ. Man may justly be reproved with, thou teacheſt others, thy self thou canst not teach. When the same fault which we reprehend in others, may be reprehended in our selves, our fault is doubled, and the act is not only sinful, but shameful. The Apostle convinces the Jews mightily by this argument, Rom. 2. 19. Thou art confident that thou thy self art a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness, an instructer of the fooliſh, &c. Thou takest upon thee all this; thou therefore (saith he) that teachest another, teachest thou thy self? Thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? He goes on pressing it upon them, as matter of shame and blushing, that their actions ran so cross and contradictory to their own professions.

Thus we have opened the minor proposition or assumption

tion of the firſt argument, couched in theſe two verſes; thou haſt comforted, inſtructed, and taught many, yet when trouble cometh upon thee, thou knoweſt not how to order thy ſelf. Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightneſs of thy wayes, and thy hope? Thus he gathers the concluſion, and from hence infers Job a hypocrite in Religion, or irreligious.

Is not this thy fear? &c.] As if he had ſaid, thy fear, thy confidence, thy uprightneſs, thy hope, thy religion, call it what thou wilt, is but thus much, or is but this.

Is not this thy fear?] In the firſt verſe of the firſt chapter, it was ſhewed what the fear of God is; part of Job's character being thus given, A man fearing God. Now Eliphaz, by this firſt point of his Interrogatories, taxes Job, in the firſt Part of his character or commendation; thou art reported to be a man fearing God; Is not this thy fear?

Fear is taken either for the whole compaſs of Gods worſhip, or for that awfulneſs of affection with which we worſhip God; which we ought to mingle and mix in all our actions and duties. Therefore (ſaith the Apoſtle, Heb. 12.) Let us have grace to ſerve him with reverence and godly fear. And, Pſal. 2. Serve the Lord with fear. God is to be ſerved in love, and yet God loves no ſervice which hath not this ingredient, holy fear.

Fear is the moſt proper affection, which, we creatures, duſt and aſhes, who are at ſuch an infinite diſtance from God, can put forth in his worſhip. God condeſcends ſo far as to be loved by us; yea, he calleth for our love as a friend, or as a father, as a familiar, as one in near relation; but conſidered in his Majeſty, Glory and greatneſs, fear is the moſt ſutable affection in our approaches unto God. The name of God, in ſome languages, is derived from fear; and God is expreſly called Fear by Jacob, Gen. 31. in that diſpute with Laban; where he telleth him, Except the fear of his father Iſaac had been with him, &c. ver. 42. And Jacob ſware by the fear of his father Iſaac, ver. 53. that is, by that God whom his father Iſaac feared: Jacob was a man ſo holy, that he would take nothing into his mouth to ſwear by, but only the holy Name of God. Religious ſwearing is one of the higheſt acts of worſhipping, as vain ſwearing is one of the higheſt acts of prophaning the name of God.

Thy confidence.] The word which we tranſlate confidence, ſignifies alſo, and that moſt properly, folly, inconſtancy, levity; when the Prophet Jeremy reproveth the idolatry of thoſe times, and ſpeaks to worſhippers of Idols, he expreſſes it by this word; they are altogether brutiſh and fooliſh, Jer. 10. 8. And holy David, (Pſal. 49. 13.) ſpeaking of wicked men, who make riches their portion, and who lay out all their endeavours in the raiſing of an outward eſtate, gives this account of their practice in ver. 13. This their way is their folly: this is the courſe that worldly men take, and they think it is a very wiſe courſe; but indeed their way is their folly. Some Tranſlators read that Text, This their way is their confidence; as here in Job: and ſo ſo they make the ſence out thus; this way of worldly men, in gathering riches, in heaping up abundance of theſe outward things, is their confidence, that is, they have nothing elſe to truſt unto; they have nothing beyond the world to truſt unto, this their way is their confidence. So again, Prov. כסל אדם 15. 26. A fooliſh man, or, a man of folly, deſpiſeth his mother. And once more, Pſal. 85. 8. Where the Pſalmiſt goeth up, like Habakkuk, to his Watch-tower, to hearken for an anſwer of his Prayer; I will hearken what the Lord will ſay, for he will ſpeak peace unto his people; but let them not return again to folly. So ſome read it in this Text of Job; Is not this thy fear, thy folly? that is, was it not meer folly for thee to brag and boaſt of thy fear? ſc. that thou didſt fear God, &c.

But the word is often taken in a contrary ſence, as we tranſlate, for conſtancy or confidence, and ſometimes for hope; and thus Job 31. 24. If I have ſaid to gold, thou art my hope, or my confidence; and, chap. 8. 14. ſpeaking of the hypocrite, whoſe hope ſhall be cut off; the ſame word is uſed: and, Prov. 3. 26. The Lord ſhall be thy confidence, and he ſhall keep thy foot from being taken; and (not to heap many places) Pſal. 78. 7. That they may ſet their hope in God. In this ſence it is generally underſtood here, Is not this thy fear and thy confidence? ſc. all the truſt thou haſt placed in thy God?

Fear and confidence are acts of natural worſhip. Confidence or truſt is the reſting of the ſoul upon another; here the reſting of the ſoul upon the word or promiſes of God, upon the power, faithfulneſs and truth of God, an act thus put forth by the ſoul, is confidence. Now, ſaith Eliphaz, Is not this thy confidence? Thou haſt ſpoken much of reſting and truſting upon God and his word, upon his power and faithfulneſs; is not this that which thou haſt all this while talked of? See what a godly confidence it is! Doth it look like a proper piece of grace?

Confidence is an act beyond faith; a ſoul confiding walks in a higher region of grace and comfort, then a ſoul only believing; there may be believing, where there is not this confiding. As patience is hope lengthned, ſo confidence is hope ſtrengthned. Aſſurance is the higheſt degree of faith, and confidence is the higheſt degree of aſſurance. It carries with it, firſt, Chearfulneſs, oppoſite to ſorrow: ſecondly, Courage, oppoſite to fear and deſpondency of ſpirit: thirdly, Boldneſs and adventurouſneſs, oppoſite to cowardice. Confidence, having a good cauſe, and a good call, will take a Bear by the tooth, or a Lion by the beard: fourthly, It notes boaſting, or a kind of ſpiritual wiſe bragging, oppoſite to ſinful modeſty and concealment of what God hathdone for us. Or take it thus; Confidence is the nobleſt exerciſe of Faith, which looking ſteadily upon God in himſelf, and in Chriſt, through the promiſes, raiſes the ſoul above all fears and diſcouragements, above all doubts and diſquietments, either about the removing of evil, or the obtaining of good.

Hence confidence is well called the reſt of the ſoul; therefore ſuch as attain to confidence, are ſaid to be in peace, in perfect peace. Him wilt thou eſtabliſh in perfect peace, whoſe heart doth truſt upon thee. And this act of confidence or truſt, is proper and peculiar to God, no creature muſt ſhare in it. This is worſhip commanded in the firſt Precept; Thou ſhalt have no other gods before me. Whatſoever we confide in, unleſs it be in ſubordination unto God, we make it our god. And it is one of the higheſt acts of the ſoul, not only as we reſpect the taking in, our own comforts, but alſo, the giving out, glory unto God. This confidence is well coupled with holy fear; the more we fear God ſo, the more we truſt him; ſuch fear is the mother and nurſe of confidence: But confidence is directly contrary, yea, and contradictory to carnal fear; he that truſts God indeed, leaves both ſoul and body, temporal and eternal eſtate with him, without ever ſending a fearful thought, or a jealous look after either. It follows,

Iſa. 26. 3.

And the uprightneſs of thy heart.] It is the word uſed in the deſcription of Job, chap. 1. 1. There it is in the concrete, perfect; here in the abſtract, uprightneſs; We may read it, Is not this the perfection of thy wayes? Uprightneſs is the Saints perfection in this life. Uprightneſs may have a double notion; Firſt, as it reſpects the ſincerity of our hearts towards God. Secondly, as it reſpects the juſtice and equity of our actions towards man. In both ſences we may extend it here; Thou haſt been reported for a perfect man, now if thou art perfect in thy being, thou wouldeſt be perfect in thy working; if thou wert upright in thy nature, thou wouldſt be upright in thy actions. Now conſider thy uprightneſs or perfection, is not this the uprightneſs of thy wayes? Is not this all, even lately diſcovered in thy impatient complainings?

And thy hope.] That word is derived two wayes. Firſt, From a root that ſignifieth a line, rule or meaſure; ſo in Gen. 1. 9. Let the waters under the heavens be gathered together into one place; the word ſignifies a gathering together by rule, as if God by that act had meaſured out the water (that unruly, turbulent, wandring element) and had brought it into compaſs, by a rule or line, which it could not exceed or go beyond, without permiſſion or commiſſion from himſelf; thereby giving us a mighty proof of his almighty power and infinite wiſdom. So ſome tranſlate the word here, taking it to be derived from that root, Is not this thy rule? Is not this the rule that thou haſt heretofore walked by, whatſoever thou haſt pretended? Is not this the righteouſneſs of thy wayes, the courſe or meaſure, by which thou haſt directed, ſquared thy actions?

But

קוה Expectavit. Significat magna intentione & corporis erectione expectare, atque id est quod Paulus Graco verbo dicit, ἀποκαραδοκεῖν. ἀποκαραδοκία.

But secondly, rather the word is derived from (Kavah) which signifieth to expect, hope or wait: and it notes a very vehement intention both of body and of mind, in waiting, expecting, or hoping; when a man waits (as it were) stretching forth his spirit or his mind, putting himself out exceedingly to hope or wait for a thing. Psalm 37. 9. & Isa. 8. 17. the same word is used with the same emphasis. And that Greek word which the Apostle Paul hath (Rom. 8. 19.) comes up fully to it, The earnest expectation of the creature, &c. So the meaning here may be thus conceived, Is not this thy hope, or thy earnest expectation? Is it not come to this now? Thou hast boasted much of thy hope, what treasures thou hadst laid up in that, beyond all thy present possessions; is not all shrunk up to this, yea, changed into despair? Thy desperate speeches give me ground to think so. Is not this thy hope? So much for the words.

There are four interpretations given of this verse. First, Some make out the sence, by a different construction of the first particle in the Hebrew, which, they translate, not (as we) Is not? but where is? So the vulgar and divers others, reading it thus, where is thy fear and thy confidence, thy patience, and the perfection of thy wayes? As if he had said; What's become of all those graces, of which thou hast spoken, and with which thou hast been reported to be most richly endowed? where are they at this time? in this day of thy trouble, in this day of thy trial? Taking the words in that sence, they yield us these Observations.

First, That, times of trouble are special times for the use of our graces.

It is as if Eliphaz had said, Thou thy self, and all that knew thee, have spoken much of thy grace, but now is the time to use it, where is it? Shew it me now, where is thy fear, and thy confidence? If a man have been reported very skilful at his weapon, when he comes into danger, then is the time to shew his skill: and we may say to him, Where is thy skill now? Where is thy art now? So here, Now, that thou hast most need of thy graces, Where are they? Bring them forth, are they to seek now? Is thy righteousness as the morning dew, and as a cloud vanished away? Times of trouble will put every grace to a stress; and we had need look to it, that we have not our graces to seek, when we have most need to use them; that when it shall be said unto us, Where is your faith? Where is your hope? we may be able to hold them forth, and answer the question in our actions, here they are, here is my fear, here is my confidence, here is my hope, here is my uprightness; I can make proof of them, and render them visible in my life: I can (through the strength of Christ) act them, and walk according to the rule of every one of these graces.

Secondly, From the ground of this argument, which is, that true grace holds out and perseveres unto the end: For hereby (saith Eliphaz) I will convince thee for an Hypocrite, and that thy grace is but a shadow of grace, because it is decayed and gone. This being the ground of conviction by these words, Where is thy fear? Observe,

That, false grace, or a shew of grace, fails us when we have most need of it.

A Hypocrite seems to stand in grace, till he falls into trouble. When good is in sight, he supposes he hath a great stock of faith; he is joyful in believing any thing, when nothing pinches him: And when he enjoyeth what he desired, he hopes as much as is promised: But when outward comforts are withdrawn and eclipsed, when he must live upon a word, and relieve himself upon invisibles, when he hath nothing in the creature to support him, and must trust what he cannot see: then this phancy of faith, this vain hope, and pretended confidence disappear, and where are they? how much charity will some make profession of, until a real object of charity present it self? Then excuses are made, they have but little for themselves, times are hard, they may be suddenly cast into streights, they know not what a day may bring forth. False charity, and false hope vanish when they should act their parts, and make good what they have professed. As Christ speaks of the two houses, Matth. 7. One built upon the rock, the other upon the sand: these two houses were alike skilfully and strongly built in all appearance; while the Sun shone, and the weather was fair, none could discern but that the house upon the sand, was built as well, and might have stood as long, as the other upon the rock; but when the rain fell, and the floods came, when the winds blew and beat upon the house, then it fell, the foundation failed, and all the fair superstructions came down into the dust. Where is the Hypocrite with all his faith and fear in a wet windy day? Is he not like a house founded on the sand? Or is not he and his goodly outside of holy fear and hope like the Apples of Sodom (reported in History) which are fair to the eye, but touch them, and they crumble to ashes in your hand; so is the faith and the fear, the hope and confidence of hypocrites: Where are these? they are no where, for they never were.

Take the words in a second construction, and so they are thus rendred, Is not thy fear thy confidence? and the uprightness of thy ways thy hope? So Mr. Broughton, Is not thy Religion thy hope? and thy right wayes thy confidence? and then the sence is, as if Eliphaz had thus spoken unto Job, Doth it not now plainly appear, that Satan charged thee rightly, that thou serv'st God for ends of profit and outward comforts, seeing thou art thus impatient and unquiet, when the hand of God takes away thy profit and outward comforts? Is it not a clear argument, that thou heretofore didst obey God, only to gain by him, or because thou wast confident he would protect and save thee harmless, he would bless and prosper thee with encrease? Was not the uprightness of thy wayes thy hope? that is, didst thou not look to thrive by upright dealing with men, and fair carriage in all thy actions? thou hadst no love to Religion, none to Justice, thy love was to thy purse, thy profit; and thou didst believe, at least hope, that profit would come in at the door of the Sanctuary, or else thou hadst never gone so often thither. This is the second sence, predicating the first term of the second, Is not thy fear thy confidence? and is not thy uprightness thy hope? surely 'tis. This is a fair exposition of the words, and from it we may Observe,

That, A Hypocrites profession of Religion is grounded on his confidence to gain by it.

Is not thy fear thy confidence? thy Religion was nothing else but a hope to be rich. It was Satans objection, and now Eliphaz (resuming and managing Satans argument) makes it his conviction. And it is a truth in the general thesis, that the Religion or the fear of Hypocrites, is nothing but their confidence; they consider the word of promise, which God hath given to those that serve him; they in their thoughts survey the land of promise, and taste the milk and honey of it: they read that God will give both grace and glory, and no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly; therefore that they may be under the influence of these promises, or upon a confidence that they shall receive golden showers out of these precious promises, and dig aboundant treasure out of these heavenly mines, they fear and worship God, they are upright in their wayes, and honest in their dealings among men: Christ found it was love to the loaves, not to his doctrine, which brought so many after him, Joh. 6. They liked a miracle to feed them, more then a Sermon to instruct them: And were affected with the meat which endures to everlasting life, onely in subordination to the meat which perisheth. How many say, at least in their hearts, at this day, if I cast my self into such and such courses of holiness, shall I not have credit and custom, good acquaintance and profitable correspondence? In many men their wickedness is their confidence, that is, the very reason why they are so wicked, is, because they are confident they shall get by their wickedness; so those entisers said to the young man (Prov. 1. 11.) Come let us lay wait for blood, there was their wickedness; now at the twelfth verse, you shall find, that the rise of their wickedness was this confidence; we shall find all precious treasure, we shall fill our houses with spoil. Some (I confess) have such a spirit of wickedness, that they are wicked for wickedness sake: and they love the very sin it self, more then the ends of profit or pleasure, which may possibly poſſibly follow the ſin; but others act the ſin, out of confidence they ſhall advance themſelves by it: And ſo there are many, ſo refined in their aims, and heightned in the wayes of holineſs, that they are holy for holineſs ſake, and religious for religions ſake; yet there is a generation, whoſe Religion is nothing but this confidence; I will caſt in my lot with the godly, I will take their way, ſhall I not fill my houſe with treaſure, and raiſe an eſtate by it? The Apoſtle ſpeaks of ſuch (1 Tim. 6. 5.) Men ſuppoſing that gain is godlineſs, and they are godly only that they may gain by it. Whereas they whoſe hearts are perfect with God, love godlineſs for Gods ſake; and they are holy, not out of confidence of gaining by it, but out of a delight in acting of it; there is a beauty, an excellency in holineſs which takes their hearts: And they are above, not only this poor confidence, to be enriched by it; but alſo above that rich, that heavenly confidence, to be ſaved by it, to get Heaven by it. The fear of ſome, who are above the former, is yet but equal to this confidence; they ſee there is no other way to be ſaved, to go to Heaven, but this. Now I ſay, holineſs in the height and purity of it, keeps under the reſpect of Heaven it ſelf; it is ſo much above theſe things below, that it is above thoſe things above: That is a ſecond ſenſe.

Thirdly, The words are underſtood by divers of the Hebrew writers, for a direct and ſimple aſſertion, and they give it thus. Will not, or would not thy fear be thy confidence? and the uprightneſs of thy wayes thy hope? As if Eliphaz had thus ſaid unto him; Job thou haſt pretended much holineſs and Religion, fear and uprightneſs: why art thou ſo diſquieted, now, that the hand of God is upon thee? why art thou ſo amazed under theſe ſufferings? would not that fear be thy confidence? and would not that uprightneſs of thy wayes be thy hope? ſurely it would, if thou hadſt any ſuch fear as thou pretendeſt: this fear would be thy confidence, and this uprightneſs thy hope; thou wouldeſt be very bold, and by hope caſt Anchor upon the goodneſs and faithfulneſs of God, in the midſt of all this ſtorm: thy heart would be poiſed, ſettled and eſtabliſhed, notwithſtanding all theſe ſhakings. Would not thy fear be thy confidence? It would. Hence Obſerve;

> Firſt, That, they who fear moſt in times of peace, have moſt reaſon to be confident in times of trouble.

Timidum eſſe ad mala patranda genus eſt fortitudinis & fiducia.

They who fear moſt (in one ſence) fear leaſt; they who fear God moſt, fear creatures leaſt, and creature-troubles leaſt. We have this point in ſo many words, Prov. 14. 26. In the fear of the Lord is ſtrong confidence. The fear of the Lord is the cure of all other fears. They who are moſt fearful of the evil of ſin, are moſt couragious among the evils of ſuffering. To be fearful thus, raiſeth the higheſt acts of confidence, Pſal. 112. 7, 8. We read of one that will not be afraid for any evil tidings, his heart is fixed; Who is this confident man? this fearleſs man? It is this divine coward (as we may call him,) you ſhall find him ſo expreſs'd, ver. 1. Bleſſed is the man that feareth God, he ſhall not be afraid for any evil tidings, Exod. 20. 20. When the people of Iſrael were much amazed and aſtoniſhed at the giving of the Law, Moſes comes to cure them of that fear; but what is the medicine? Fear not, for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye ſin not. As if he had ſaid, when God hath put his fear into your hearts, ſuch fears as theſe will be removed and vaniſh: when your hearts are filled with this fear of God, you will have confidence to hear, and ſee the thunder and lightening of Mount Sinai; you ſhall not fear, no not this terrible tempeſt, in which the Law it ſelf is given. So when the people were in a fear, another time, Samuel thus beſpeaks them in that ſhaking fit, 1 Sam. 12. 20. Fear not, only fear the Lord. If you will be confident in ſuch a time as this (for by prayer he procured thunder and rain in that time of wheat-harveſt) fear the Lord. The fear of the Lord will be our confidence in the wetteſt day, in the moſt tempeſtuous and ſtormy night that ever fell upon the ſecure, ſinful world. A man fearing God is the only dreadnought.

Secondly, We may obſerve from the other branch, (for the ſence is the ſame) And would not thy uprightneſs be thy hope?

> The uprightneſs of a mans wayes in good times, doth mightily ſtrengthen his hope in evil times.

When a man can look back, and approve his heart to God, that he hath been upright in peace and plenty, how full of hope will he be in trouble and in wants? It was that which Hezekiah pleaded before God, in the day of his trouble and trial, 2 King. 20. 3. I beſeech thee, O Lord, remember how I have walked before thee in truth and with an upright and perfect heart. This was it, when he lay upon his ſick-bed, and as he thought upon his death-bed, that put life into him, and bare up his ſpirit.

A fourth interpretation is taken from our reading: Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightneſs of thy wayes, and thy hope? So the words contain four diſtinct affirming queſtions, Is not this thy fear? Is not this thy confidence? Is not this the uprightneſs of thy wayes? and is not this thy hope? This is thy fear, &c. As if Eliphaz had ſaid, Job, without doubt thou haſt ſhewed all thy goodneſs at once; or, Is not this all that thou art able to make out and ſhew; Is not this all that thou canſt ſay for, all the teſtimony thou canſt give of, thy religion and holineſs? Haſt thou not ſhewed all? Surely thy great boaſt of Religion is nothing but this. Eliphaz ſeems to call Job to make a further or clearer proof of his grace; Is not this thy fear? or if this be not, ſhew me ſomewhat elſe: Thou art a man very famous in the world, much talked of, and highly commended, for fear and for confidence, for uprightneſs and for hope; what haſt thou more to anſwer that report, and ſave thy own credit, with the credit of thy friends, who have been ſo large in their commendations of, and teſtimonies concerning thee? Note hence;

> Firſt, Afflictions diſcover that unto us, which before we knew not.

Is not this thy fear? thou didſt not know of what make or conſtitution thy fear was, untill now: That's Eliphaz his ſuppoſition; and it is a truth, That ſome hypocrites know not, that their graces are falſe, till they are brought to ſuch tryals. They carry falſe, counterfeit coin about them, and ſuppoſe it currant money, till they come to the ballance, or a touch-ſtone. Some are active hypocrites, who go about intentionally to deceive and put a fair mask over a filthy face. Others are paſſive hypocrites, who are miſerably deceived by the colluſions of Satan, and the baſe treachery of their own ſpirits. Many a man is brought to ſee (which before he could not, by reaſon of thoſe miſts of hypocriſie) what his fear is, what his faith, by thoſe changes which affliction works in him.

> Secondly thus, We ought to make our graces viſible in our actions.

Is not this thy fear? Shew me what thy fear is; if this be not, make proof of it. The Apoſtle bids Timothy, 2 Tim. 4. 5. Make full proof of his miniſtry. It may be ſaid to ſome Miniſters, is not this your miniſtery; if it be not, make full proof of it: or as the Apoſtle James, in a caſe near this, James 2. 14, 18. Shew me thy faith by thy works; ſo we may ſay, Shew me thy fear by thy works: Is not this it? if it be not, make it appear what it is: The tree is known by the fruits; do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thiſtles? or, do men gather crabs from vines, or ſloes from fig-trees? As an evil tree cannot bring forth good fruit, ſo neither doth a good tree bring forth evil fruit. If thou ſayeſt thou art a vine, make proof of it, by the fruit thou beareſt, or elſe I muſt conclude, thou art but a thorn or a thiſtle. We may queſtion many for this grace, and for the other grace they pretend unto: For their actions have not the leaſt print or impreſſion of ſuch graces upon them. If any one ſhould hold forth much faith and confidence in God, and this man ſhould run or take unlawful courſes to help himſelf, might we not ſay, Is this thy confidence? Or if one ſpeaking much of confidence in God, for the accompliſhing of a buſineſs, ſhould ſit ſtill, and do nothing himſelf, might we not ſay, Is this thy confidence? This is to tempt God, not to truſt in him. Once more, If a man ſhould profeſs much confidence in God, and yet be taken up altogether about the creature, ſwallowed up with creature thoughts, or ſwallowing in creature delights, ſeeking to, and engaging this creature, and that creature, with neglect of God, may we not

Heb. 6. 19. not say, Is thy confidence? Hope is an anchor of the soul; but thou art driven with every blast; is this thy hope? Hope makes not ashamed; but thou, either art, or oughtest to be ashamed, Is this thy hope? The fear of the Lord is clean, but thou art defiled, Is this thy fear?

Rom. 5. 5.

Then again consider this, When Job carries himself thus in his trouble, Eliphaz telleth him, what is not this thy fear? Thou art surely but an hypocrite, for if thy fear were true, it would have preserved thee from these impatient complainings and distempers. Hence Observe;

That, true fear, holy fear, preserve the soul, and keeps it holy.

Holy fear is as a golden bridle to the soul, when it would run out to any evil: It is like the banks to the Sea, which keeps in the raging waves of corruption, when they would overflow all. If thou hadst fear indeed, thou wouldst never thus break the bounds of patience. The fear of the Lord is to depart from evil, that's the definition of it; therefore if thou hadst any fear of God indeed, thou wouldest never have done this evil, curse thy day, Prov. 14. 27. The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death; that is, either from sin, which is spiritual death, or from damnation, which is perpetual death; the fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, to depart from both these snares of death; where this fear is not, we are ready to joyn with every evil, and so to fall into the jaws of every death. Abraham (Gen. 20. 11.) argues so, The fear of the Lord is not in this place, therefore they will kill me; when we perceive a bent of spirit, to devise evil, and a readiness of the hand to practise it, (we may conclude) the fear of the Lord is not lodged in that heart.

Fourthly Observe, That, trust, or confidence in God, settles the heart in all conditions.

Is not this thy confidence? Thy confidence certainly is but a shadow, for if it had been real, thou hadst been established and upheld, notwithstanding all that weight of affliction that lies upon thee. When there was an unquietness upon the soul of David, he first questions his soul about it, Why art thou disquieted O my soul? and then directs, trust in God, Psal. 42. 11. So the Prophet promiseth, (Isa. 26. 3.) Him wilt thou establish in perfect peace, whose heart doth trust upon thee. They that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Zion, Psal. 125. 1. He that is carried and tossed thus about, with every wind of trouble and gust of sorrow, shews he hath not cast out this anchor of hope, upon the Rock Jesus Christ.

But here a question must be answered, for the clearing of all, and likewise for discovering the strength or weakness of this argument brought by Eliphaz, in this particular case of Job. Eliphaz taxed Job with hypocrisie, because his graces did not act, or they did not act like themselves, like graces; he gave not proof of them at that time. Hence the doubt is, Do a mans failings or declinings from what he was before, or what he did before, argue him insincere? Is their sufficient strength in this Argument for Eliphaz to say, Job thou hast been a comforter of others, thou hast profest much holiness heretofore, and now thou art come to the trial, thou canst not make it out thy self; therefore thou hast no grace, therefore all thy religion is vain.

For the resolving of that, I answer first, that the proposition is not simply true, that every one who faileth or declineth or falleth off from what formerly he was, or held forth, is therefore an Hypocrite, or that his graces are false, and but pretences; there may be many declinings and failings, many breaches and backslidings, and yet the spirit upright. Indeed falling away and quite falling off, are an argument of insincerity and hypocrisie; for true grace is everlasting grace, true holiness endures for ever. Therefore we are here to consider, whence these failings were occasioned in Job, and how a failing may be expresst, and continue, so, as to conclude insincerity or hypocrisie.

First, It was from a sudden perturbation, not from a setled resolution. Job was not resolvedly thus impatient and unruly: an unexpected storm hurried his spirit so violently, that he was not master of his own actions; Job had not his affections at command, they got the bridle (as it were) on their necks, and away they carried him with such force, that he was not able to stop or stay them.

Secondly, It came from the smart and sence of pain in his flesh, not from the perverseness of his spirit. If the taint had been in his spirit, then Eliphaz had a ground, a certain ground to have argued thus against him.

Thirdly, Job's graces were hid and obscured, they were not lost or dead; the acts were suspended, the habits were not removed; when the grace which hath been shewed, is quite lost, that grace was nothing but a shew of grace, painted fear, and painted confidence: but in Job's case there was only a hiding of his graces, or a vail cast over them.

Lastly, We must not say, he falls from grace who falleth into sin; nor must it be concluded that he hath no grace who falls into a great sin: It follows not, that grace is false, or none, because it doth not work like it self, or because it doth not sometimes work at all. True grace works not alwayes uniformly; though it be alwayes the same in it self, yet it is not alwayes the same in its effects; true grace is alwayes alive, yet it doth not alwayes act; it retains life, when motion is undiscern'd. Wherefore they who do not work like themselves, or do not work at all (for a time) in gracious wayes, are not to be concluded as having no grace, or nothing but a shew of grace.

And so much be spoken concerning this first Argument contained in these six Verses, the conviction of Job, from his failing in the actings of his grace, the putting forth of that fruit which formerly he had born and shewed to the world.

VERS. 7, 8.

Remember I pray thee, who ever perished being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off?
Even as I have seen, they that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same.

IN these two Verses and the three following, Eliphaz coucheth and confirmeth his second Argument, wherein he further bespatters the innocency of Job, and hopes to convince him of hypocrisie. The Argument is taken from the constant experience of Gods dealings in the world. Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished being innocent? We may give it in this form.

Innocent persons perish not, righteous men are not cut off.

But Job, thou perishest, and thou art cut off. Therefore thou art no innocent nor righteous person.

The major proposition is plain in the seventh Verse; for that question, Who ever perished being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off? is to be resolved into this Negation, No innocent person ever perished, nor were the righteous ever cut off. And Eliphaz conceiveth this to be so clear a truth, that he challengeth Job to give one instance to the contrary, out of his own experience; he appeals to experience (which is a strong way of arguing) Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished being innocent? shew me the man: and withal he professeth, that he could give many instances or examples out of his own experience, that wicked men have perished and were cut off, this he doth in the eighth Verse, Even as I have seen, they that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same; which he enlarges in the three following Verses, by the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed, &c. This in general for the sum and substance of the Argument.

We will now consider the words, and examine the strength of it in particulars.

Remember I pray thee.] He handleth Job tenderly in words, he speaks gently and winningly to him, Remember I pray thee. To remember, noteth often in Scripture a serious consideration of things present, and before us, Eccles. 12. 1. Remember now thy Creator in the dayes of thy youth; that is, seriously bethink thy self at the present, of God and his wayes, and how thou oughtest to walk holily before him. But properly, to remember, is the calling to mind of things which are past: And so Eliphaz, in this place, directs Job to search the Records; go and inquire into all the Monuments of Antiquity, look the Registers and Histories of the Ages past, and see if thou canst find any such thing as this, A righteous man perishing.

Memory

Memory is the Souls store-house; there we lay up observations, and from thence fetch them out, as occasion invites. Hence Christ, Mat. 12. 57. compareth every Scribe which is instructed for the Kingdom of Heaven, to a housholder, which bringeth forth out of his treasury things both new and old. This treasury is the memory; there holy truths and profitable examples are stored and reserved; Remember, I pray thee.

In that Eliphaz sendeth Job back to former experiences, we may note,

That, It is our duty to lay up and record the dealings of God, whether publick or personal, whether with the godly or with the wicked.

It is our duty to observe what God doth, Psal. 111. 4. He hath made his wonderful works to be remembred; as if the Psalmist had said, God hath not wrought such great things in the world, whether respecting persons or nations, that we should write them upon the water, or in the sand, which the next puff of wind defaces and blows out; but he hath made his wonderful works to be remembred; he will have them written in brass with a pen of Iron, and with the point of a Diamond, that all ages may hear the loving kindnesses of the Lord; he hath made his wonderful works to be remembred, or he hath made them so, as that they are most worthy to be remembred. David was a great observer of experiences (Psal. 37. 25.) he telleth us, that he had (as it were) collected notes concerning Gods dealings all his dayes; and it is to the very point in hand, I have been young, and now am old, yet never saw I the righteous forsaken; himself carefully observed the dealings of God, in this Psalm; and in the next (Psal. 37. 35, 36.) he gives the like direction to others; thus I have done, do you take the same course too, I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green Bay-tree; then he goes on, Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright. I have considered the state of wicked men; let all observe the state of the godly; mark the perfect man, & behold the upright. The works of God expound his word; in his works his word is often made visible. That's an excellent expression, Psal. 111. 7. The works of his hands are verity and judgment: The acts of God are verity, that is, God acts his own truths. As the works of our hands ought to be the verity and judgments of God (every action of a Christian should be one of Christs truths) so it is exactly with God himself; the works of his hands are his own verity and judgments. When we cannot find the meaning of God in his word, we may find it out in his works; his works are a comment, an infallible comment upon his word.

Yet we must take this Caution. The dealings of God in the surface and outward part of them, appear sometimes contrary to his word, contrary unto his promise; but they only appear so, they are never so. When a man reads a promise, and finds much good stored up in it for the righteous, and then looks upon the state of the righteous, and seeth it full of evil; here is a seeming contrariety between the word and the works of God; but it is only a seeming contrariety, as we shall see somewhat further anon. Therefore in that Psal. 111. 2. where he saith, The works of God are verity and judgment, he adds, The works of God are sought out. If you will have the verity or judgment that is in the works of God, you must not only look upon the outside of them, but you must seek them out, study them, study them as you study the Scriptures; and then you will find out the meaning of them, and see how exactly they square with every part of the word. Why doth Eliphaz send Job to experience? The ground is this, the works of God are like the word of God; therefore if thou canst not make it out by experience from his works, thou canst hardly make it out, as a position, from his word, that righteous persons are cut off.

Remember now, I pray thee, who ever perished being innocent? Or where were the righteous cut off?

Here are four terms to be opened, perished, cut off, innocent, righteous. We will consider, First, What we are to understand by perishing, and by cutting off. Secondly, Whom we are to understand by innocent and righteous persons: And then apply the whole sentence, by shewing wherein the truth of this proposition stands, that a righteous man, or an innocent person, cannot perish or be cut off.

The word which we translate perished, hath divers significations.

First, A returning to nothing, an utter consumption, which is to perish as a beast, Psal. 49. 20. The holy Ghost describing a man who is not acquainted with God in his great estate, compares him thus; Man being in honour and not understanding (sc. the things of God) becometh like the beasts that perish; not that he perisheth as a beast doth, but he is like a perishing beast; the similitude is not in perishing, but in his qualities who perisheth; he hath but such qualities, he is (upon the matter) even of as gross a temper as a perishing beast. אבר

Secondly, To perish, signifies to die. The dissolution of man, or the dis-union of soul and body, Isa. 57. 1. is thus expresst; the righteous perish, that is, they die; as it is explained afterward, they are taken away from the evil to come, they rest in their beds, sc. in their graves: So, Mat. 8. 25. Master, save us, we perish, say the Disciples, when they thought they should all be drowned. Lord, help us, or else we all die presently: and so we translate Job 34. 15. where Elihu speaking of the power of God, thus describes it, If he should but shew himself, all flesh (saith he) shall perish together, that is, all flesh shall die; they are not able to stand before Gods power and greatness: the word which he useth there, strictly taken, signifies to expire or give up the ghost; yet we translate it, all flesh shall perish together; that is, they shall all give up the ghost and die, if God should appear in his power and greatness. גוע

Thirdly, By perishing, we may understand outward afflictions and troubles falling upon, either godly or wicked men; these are called a perishing (Josh. 23. 13.) Joshua tells the people, If you will not obey and walk according to the Commandments of God, ye shall quickly perish from off this good land, that is, ye shall be removed by outward afflictions from your land, you shall go into captivity. And so, If I perish, I perish, saith Esther, chap. 4. 17. that is, if I bring trouble and affliction upon my self, let it be so, I will venture it; A Syrian ready to perish was my Father, Deut. 26. It is meant of Jacob, a man much verst in trouble, as he himself acknowledgeth; Few and evil are the dayes of my pilgrimage.

Fourthly, To perish, notes eternal misery; as it is put for the miseries of this life, so for the life of misery; for that life which is an everlasting death, John 3. 16. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have everlasting life. Perishing is opposed to everlasting life, and therefore implies everlasting death. Omnimodam rei perditionem significat, opponitur enim generationi.

Fifthly, To perish, notes utter desolation and total ruine. A cutting off, or a destroying the very name and remembrance of a person or of a people. He that speaks lies, shall perish, Psal. 19, 9. that is, he shall be utterly destroyed. In this sence the word is used for the Devil, because he is a destroyer to the utmost, as Christ is a Saviour to the utmost. He is called Abaddon, from Abad (the word here used) Rev. 9. 12. and Apollyon; his business is to destroy totally and eternally. Thus also Antichrist, The first-born of the Devil (2 Thes. 2. 3.) is called the son of perdition: take it actively, he is a destroying son, one that destroyeth bodies and souls; as in Scripture, a bloody man is called Ish dummim, a man of blood; and passively, he is a son of perdition, that is, a man to be destroyed both body and soul.

These two latter sences, namely, eternal destruction in Hell, and utter destruction in this life, are joyned together, Prov. 15. 11. Hell and destruction (or hell and perishing) are before the Lord; and chap. 27. 20. we have the same words again, hell and perdition, or hell and destruction are never full. So that to perish (in a strict sence) notes, even in this life, an utter extirpation; so some render it here who ever saw the righteous plucked up by the roots, so as there should be no remembrance, no remainder of them? The other word which is joyned in the Text, cut off, carries the same sence; though it signifies properly, to hide a thing, yet it is so to hide it, as it appeareth no more; or so to hide it, that it can neither be heard of, nor seen no more. Hence by a Metonymie, it signifies, to take away, or to cut off, because things that are taken away and cut off, are as things hidden and seen no more. Here then is the height of the sence, either to take it for perishing in hell, or for such a perishing בהר Absconsit, ut amplius audiatur, vel videatur, per metonymia sublatus, deletus, succisus; sublata enim è medio non apparent amplius, sed absconduntur.

perishing in this life, as is joyned with total desolation and desertion.

נקי Then for the terms, innocent and righteous. The word we translate innocent, signifieth empty: And it is therefore applied to an innocent person, because innocent persons are emptied of malice and wickedness, their hearts are swept and cleansed, purged and washed; there is in some sense a vacuum, a holy vacuum in the hearts of holy persons; they are freed from that fulness of evil which lies in their hearts by nature, that filth is cast out. Every mans heart, by nature, is brim-full, top-full of wickedness, as the Apostle describes the Gentiles, Rom. 1.29. Being filled with all unrighteousness; and it is a truth of every mans heart, it is a Cage full of unclean birds; a Stable full of filthy dung, he hath in him a throng of filthy thoughts, a multitude of prophane guests lodging in him. Now a person converted, is emptied of these; these guests are turned out of their lodgings, the rooms are swept and emptied, therefore an holy person is called an empty person; emptied, not absolutely emptied of all sin, but comparatively; there is abundance cast out; so that considering how full of sin he was, he may be said to be emptied of sin, and that his malice is cast out.

נקיון שנים In Amos 4. the Prophet threatens cleanness of teeth (it is a suitable judgment, that unclean hearts and lives should be punished with clean teeth) or innocency of teeth; for it is the word of the Text: Famine is elegantly so called. Want of bread makes empty or clean teeth.

And where were the righteous (that's the other text) cut off? One may put the question, where were the righteous? Surely Job had very good eyes, if he could find any righteous man upon the earth, he might seem to have clearer eyes then the Lord himself, if he could find any righteous; God looked down from heaven, and he saw none righteous, no, not one, Psal. 53. 3, 4. Yet here Eliphaz bids Job enquire about the righteous, where they were cut off. To clear that;

By righteous here, we are to understand, not righteous persons in a strict and legal sence, but in a Gospel-mollified sence; righteous with an allay, righteous by way of interpretation, and not in the strictness of the letter. And so men are called righteous, first, in reference to the work of regeneration. There are none righteous in the root or original, in their first setting and plantation in the soil of the world; but there are righteous persons as regenerate, and transplanted into the body of Christ, as wrought and fashioned by the Spirit of Christ.

Secondly, There are none righteous, that is, none exactly, perfectly, compleatly righteous, but inchoately and intentionally; so many men are righteous, and are called righteous in the language of the Scripture.

Thirdly, There are none righteous, that is, none righteous by way of merit or desert; none are so righteous, as that they can challenge any thing at Gods hand, of right; the most righteous person is an unprofitable servant; he hath nothing to plead before God but free grace, nothing to shew unto God, but Christs fulness, and his own emptiness, the riches of Christ, and his own poverty. Yet there are righteous in Gods acceptance, he accounteth and accepteth them for righteous, and honours them to be called righteous.

Lastly, We may answer it thus, there are none righteous in themselves, or from themselves, none have any righteousness of their own making; but the Scripture shews us those who have righteousness, and are righteous in another, and from another; we have the righteousness of justification in Christ, and the righteousness of sanctification from Christ: Righteousness is both imputed to, and floweth into the soul by virtue of the union which is promised in the Covenant of Grace, with Christ the righteous, with the Lord our righteousness. In these respects there are righteous persons, and of such we may understand this enquiry, where were ever the righteous cut off? The righteous by regeneration, the righteous by inchoation, the righteous by acceptation, or the righteous by imputation; where were any such righteous in all the world, of whom thou canst say, they have ever perished, or have been cut off?

Having opened the sence of the single terms, we will look to the sence of the proposition, and consider wherein we may clear the truth of it, That innocent persons do not perish, or, that the righteous are not cut off.

Take perishing or cutting off in the first sense, namely, for annihilation and returning to nothing, and so neither righteous nor unrighteous, guilty nor innocent can perish; no man shall perish so, man is of an everlasting make.

Then take perishing in the second sence, as it is put for dying and going out of the land of the living; thus all righteous and innocent persons perish and are cut off, namely, by the sword and sythe of death: we may say all. God indeed hath made some few exceptions out of the general rule; but the statute is plain, It is appointed unto all men once to die: Enoch was translated, and so was Elijah, and many shall be found alive when Christ cometh to judgment, who shall not die; they shall be but changed, and have a metaphorical, not a proper death; this makes some small abatement from, but doth not cross the general rule, that all must die.

Take perishing in the third sence, for some temporal outward suffering in the world, either from the hand of God immediately, or mediately from the hand of man. Thus righteous and innocent persons may perish too, that is, they may fall under sore and great afflictions; thus righteous Abel perished, and thus Jacob was a Syrian ready to perish; and thus the godly party among the Jews, in the time of their captivity, perished (they perished from off the Land, as it was threatned, Josh. 23.) with the rest of the wicked; of which the two baskets of figs, one bad, and the other good, were a famous type, Jer. 24. 3.

And in regard of this outward, present, temporal perishing, we find it often, that the righteous perish, while the unrighteous flourish. Psal. 73.12. Behold (saith David) these are the ungodly that prosper in the world; and at the fourth verse, All the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning. As sure, or as soon as I rise, I have a whipping, and my breakfast is bread of sorrow, and the water of adversity; these prosper, and I perish. And the Prophet (Jer. 12.1,2.) expostulates with holy submission, about this flourishing estate of the wicked, and perishing estate of the godly: Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper? &c. And in the next verse, Thou hast planted them, yea, they have taken root, they grow, yea, they bring forth fruit. What a gradation is here of the flourishing prosperity of wicked men, while the righteous seem to wither? Thou hast planted them. Every tree that is planted, doth not take root; but these take root. Every tree that taketh root, doth not grow up to any strength; but these take root, and they grow. There are trees that grow, yet they bring not forth fruit; but these bring forth fruit also; yea (saith he) they bring forth fruit; these were flourishing trees indeed, yet in the mean time, thousands of righteous persons perished in, and by, outward troubles.

Sometime (we find on the other hand) that the wicked perish in outward troubles, while the righteous are delivered, and have Arks provided to save them in a common deluge. God makes that difference sometime, even in this life; he pulled Lot out of Sodom, while Sodom perished by fire; and righteous Noah was saved in the Ark, while the world of the ungodly perished by water.

And lastly, Both the righteous and the wicked may be wrapped up in the very same outward perishing condition, yet alwayes with a difference; though both alike perish, yet their perishing is not alike. As it is with the righteous and wicked in regard of sin, so of sufferings: They may both commit the same sin for the matter, as it is a transgression of the Law; but a righteous man can never sin as the wicked: he sins not, with such formalities of sinning, he hath not such a heart, such a temper and bent of spirit, as a wicked man hath in sinning; to sin so, is utterly inconsistent with the new nature. Thus also it is with the perishings, afflictions and troubles which they fall into; God sometimes sends the very same affliction for the matter, as suppose poverty, want, imprisonment, captivity and the like, upon the one, as upon the other: But are the righteous smitten, as God smites those that smite them? Surely no; in measure he debateth with them, Isa. 27. 7, 8. They sin not against God with the same heart, or at the same rate as wicked men do: and God never strikes them with the same heart, and at the same rate, as he doth the wicked; he cannot do it, the strength of his love to them, makes this impossible for him: Therefore, though, as the Preacher resolves the case, Eccles. 9. 1. No man knoweth either love or hatred, hatred, by all that is before him. In the matter of events, love or hatred are not visible; yet in the manner of events, there is much love and hatred visible; and the spirits of such as are under those events, may discern love or hatred, when no eye can: One seeth hatred, and another seeth love, abundance of love mixed in his cup of sorrow. God never gives his own a cup of pure wrath to drink; there are alwayes some ingredients of comfort and sweetness put into it. This is the third sence, how righteous ones may, or may not perish.

Take perishing in the fourth sence, as perishing is an eternal destruction; and so the proposition of Eliphaz is true throughout, strictly true; that no righteous ever perished, or were cut off: an innocent person is, in that sence, past perishing; a righteous man is past cutting off, John 10. 28. I do give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish. Rejoyce in this, ye righteous, ye are beyond perishing, ye are past perishing, while ye live in a perishing world.

Lastly, Take it in the fifth sence, and you may have a further truth, which I conceive, is that which Eliphaz purposely aims at; take perishing, for outward destruction, joyned with a total desertion, and in that sence, the proposition of Eliphaz is true also; No righteous man, no innocent man ever perished, or was so cut off with any temporal judgment: The Apostle is direct for it (2 Cor. 4. 8, 9.) We are in trouble on every side (we see trouble which way soever we turn) but we are not distressed; we are perplexed (we are in the briars as well as ungodly men) but not in despair (we are in hope still, and if there be hope for us, God is for us:) we are persecuted, but not forsaken (God is near us, though all the world stand aloof) we are cast down, but not destroyed; we shall up again. So that, while he admits of perishing, in the former sence, respecting outward affliction; yet he denies it constantly in this latter sence, so as to be cut off quite from the comforts and supports of God. That observation of David, may be thus understood (Psal. 37. 25.) I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken (he doth not say, in my experience I never saw the righteous afflicted; but, I never saw him left or forsaken in his afflictions) and I never saw his seed begging their bread: he puts in that, because begging of bread, especially in the Common-wealth of Israel, and in the state of the Jews, was a note of utter dereliction; for though God had told them, that they should have the poor alwayes with them, yet he had given an expresse law, that there should be no beggar among them; therefore, saith he, I have not seen the righteous so forsaken, that they should be forced to live by begging.

Casus transitorii non reddunt mēdicum.

If any say, that David himself begged, he asked bread of Abimelech and Nabal. I answer, It is a good rule, and it resolves the case; transitory cases, and sudden accidents, make no beggars: we must not say, David was a beggar, or begged his bread, because once he was in a straight, and asked bread of Abimelech; and in a second straight, sent to Nabal: In such sudden cases, the richest man in the world, may be put to ask a piece of bread. A good man may fall into such wants; but good men are rarely, if ever, or at all, left in them.

Now to apply it particularly to the intent of Eliphaz in this place. We have given three interpretations, in which we have shewed, how righteous men may perish; and two, wherein the righteous cannot possibly perish; in both which, the words here spoken by Eliphaz, are a truth. And concerning the fifth and last, I conceive, Eliphaz is particularly to be understood; for he speaks not here of the eternal estate of Job (though that be involved) when he concludeth him a wicked man; but he speaks of the dealings of God in temporals: he look'd upon Job as a lost man, a man utterly forsaken of his God; as a man of a forlorn hope, cut down, and pluckt up root and branch; when he saw his stock consumed, his children slain, his body diseased, and his spirit so distempered. And so the Minor, or the Assumption only is false, the Proposition true: Righteous men do not perish thus, innocent persons are not thus cut off; but thou Job perishest, and art cut off: hold there, that's false; Job, in the sence Eliphaz intended, perished not, was not cut off; for in the sequel, God gave him both comfort and deliverance; Love was mingled with the affliction, strength was ministred to bear the affliction; and at last a gracious way was made out of the affliction. The blessing of God caused him to spring out again; though his goodly branches were broken, and his fruit pluckt off, yet his roots were not pluckt up.

It will not be unnecessary, for the clearing of this Scripture, to subjoyn a reason, why in the Old Testament, or under the old Covenant, there was so much stumbling at the afflictions and troubles of the righteous; for it put even a David, a Jeremiah, and a Habakkuk hard to it, for an answer, when they saw such under sufferings; the reason was this, because God, in those times, made more special temporal promises to his people, in case of obedience, then he hath done in the times of the Gospel. Read Deut. 28. Lev. 27. and other places; where you shall find, how all the promises run upon things that concern the outward man; they shall be blessed in their basket and in their store, they shall have this and that, and all outward things abundantly; and the curse threatned, was the loss and deprivation of these outward blessings, in case of disobedience: For God did win and carry them on in that non-age of the Church, by outward and temporal promises; hence they were much troubled and offended, when they saw righteous men under heavy pressures and breaking afflictions. Now since the coming of Christ in the flesh, and the powring out of those special spiritual blessings upon his people, by the holy Ghost, he doth not feed us so much with these outward hopes or enjoyments. Therefore in the Gospel, we read what hard meat he giveth his people; foretelling them plainly, If any will follow me, let him deny himself, and take up his Cross; there is scarce such a word in all the Old Testament as that, he which will follow me, shall find a Cross, and be sure of persecution; they were but children, such words and sights might terrifie them; therefore they were (as it were) dandled on the knee, and allured by sensible comforts, a land flowing with milk and honey, if they did obey; and they heard of rods and stripes in case of stubbornness and disobedience: Say to the righteous, it shall be well with them, for they shall eat the fruit of their doings; wo the wicked, it shall be ill with him, &c. Isa. 3. 10, 11. David saith (indeed) many are the troubles of the righteous, but (it is not put among the terms of their state or service) it is not said, if ye will be righteous, ye shall have trouble. Moses never told them, If any will be my Disciple, let him take up his Cross, &c. So then, Gods dealings and dispensations being most in outward things at that time, they were very apt to stumble at the Cross. And there is greater reason why they should stumble at a mole-hill, then we at a mountain of trouble; God having told us, that seeing he had given us such excellent things in Christ, such glorious mercies, and transcendent priviledges in the Gospel, we may well take afflictions and troubles into the bargain, and never shrink or strain at them, but rather take them well. So much for that verse; The righteous are not cut off, neither do innocent persons perish.

Eliphaz having given Job his turn to search his experiences, brings forth his own, in the next words: Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same: As if he should say, Job, I know you are not able to give me one instance of a righteous mans perishing, but I could give you many and many instances, I could write whole books concerning wicked men perishing, and of the ungodly cut off. This he carries under a Metaphor, and by continued Metaphors, makes up an elegant Allegory, in those terms of plowing, sowing, reaping. Ver. 8.

Even as I have seen.] That word notes a curious observation, not a light, transitory glance of the eye, but a critical consideration of any thing. As it is said, Gen. 1. 4. God saw the light that he had made, God saw it discerningly; for he found it was very good: and so it is said, Gen. 34. 1, 2. that Dinah went forth to see the Daughters of the land, that is, curiously (though vainly) to observe the manners and fashions of the people; and in the same verse, Hamor the son of Sechem saw her; he saw her so exactly, as to be taken with her beauty, his eye entangling his heart, and both entangling his life. So here, Even as I have seen, that is, by a diligent inspection, and judicious consideration of what I saw. And what was that? Mystical Husbandry.

Significat non simpliciter videre, sed curiosè inspicere.

They that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same.

חרש Fodit sulcum, aravit per metaphoram fodit cogitatione, vel intentus fuit rei alicui conficiendæ, sicut arator præparat terrã ante seminatorem.

They that plow iniquity.] The word which we translate, to plow, signifies the use of any kind of art or manufacture; as the work of a Smith, or of a Carpenter, in Iron, Wood, or Timber; and as the Art, so the Artist or handicrafts-man (Isa. 44. 12.) is expresst by this word: The Smith with his tongs, worketh in the coals. And, Zech. 1. 20. it is put for a Carpenter; The Lord shewed me four Carpenters: Now here it is applied to the Plowman, and to his plowing. So, Hos. 10. 13. Ye have plowed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity, ye have eaten the fruit of lies.

And this plowing of iniquity, or plowing of wickedness, takes in both the outward act of sin (to plow iniquity, is to commit and practise iniquity) and the inward act of sin; to plow iniquity, is as much as to devise and meditate iniquity, Prov. 3. 29. Devise not (Heb. Plow not) evil against thy neighbour. So, Prov. 6. 18. A heart that deviseth, or ploweth, wicked imaginations. And, Prov. 21. 4. The plowing of the wicked is sin; that is, whatsoever they devise, or whatsoever they do, inside and outside, the cloth and linings of their garments are all sin.

Likewise this word denotes, not only speculative evils, but also secresie of practice, or a plot carried and acted secretly. Thus (1 Sam. 23. 9.) it is said, David knew that Saul secretly practised evil against him; the hebrew is, he knew that Saul plowed evil against him. So that it may be taken, either for the meditating of evil, or for a politick close way of effecting any evil or wicked design.

And the Scripture elegantly calls the musing or meditating of sin, plowing, because a man in meditation (when he would accomplish any wickedness) turns up (as it were) all the corruptions that are in his heart, and all the conveniences that are in the world, to attain his end. As a man that meditates upon any holy thing, upon Christ, or Free-grace, &c. turns up all the graces and abilities that are in his spirit, he plows up his heart, that he may fetch up the strength, and enjoy the sweetness of them.

So then this plowing noteth two things chiefly; first, the pains and labour which wicked men take in sinful courses; every one that sins, doth not plow sin, or is not a worker (which is an equivalent phrase) of iniquity. Secondly, It implies the black art and hellish skill of wicked men in sinning. To plow, is a skill, and so is some kind of sinning (though to sin in general, be as natural, as to see, and needs as little teaching as the ear to hear) some men (as we may say) are bunglers in sinning, others are their crafts-masters at this plough, and can lay a furrow of iniquity so strait, do an act of filthiness so cleanly, that you can hardly see any thing amiss in it: Those words in the New Testament, to commit sin, to work iniquity, an abomination, or a lie, Rev. 21. 27, &c. are answerable to this in the old Testament, a plougher of iniquity.

Qui operantur iniquitatem.

And some translate this Text so: the vulgar reads it thus, They who work iniquity: All which expressions set forth, and elegantly describe such, who sin resolvedly, industriously, cunningly, curiously, such as have the art (and will spare no pains) to do wickedly. These have served an apprentiship to their lusts, and are now as Free-men of hell, yet still Satans drudges, and active engineers to plot and execute what God abhors.

Note this further, that plowing in Scripture, refers both to good actions and to bad; there is a plowing for good, the Metaphor is so applied, Prov. 4. 27. Do not they err that devise evil? (that plow evil) but mercy and truth shall be to them that devise good (to them that plow good;) the same word is used in both; and it intimates (as before) both the pains and the skill which a godly man bestows and shews about holy things. The great work of repentance is often Allegorized by plowing, break up the fallow ground. And our obedience to the Gospel, whether in the profession or preaching of it, is called plowing, Luke 9. 62. He that putteth his hand to the plough, and looks back, is not fit for the Kingdom of God. Grace is as active and as accurate as lust can be.

It follows, And sow iniquity, reap the same. Eliphaz goes on with the Metaphor; after plowing, comes sowing, and after seed-time, reaping-time or harvest. Sowing in Scripture is divers wayes applied unto the actions of men.

First, There is a sowing, which is the work of charity, when we dispense and distribute to the help of the poor, especially to the Saints; so, 2 Cor. 9, 6. He that soweth sparingly, that is, he that giveth to the poor sparingly.

Secondly, Sowing is applied to the preaching of the Gospel, to the scattering of the word in at the ears, and into the hearts of men; Luke 8. 5. A sower went out to sow.

Thirdly, Sowing is applied unto the burial of the dead, 1 Cor. 15. 42. That which is sown in weakness; the bodies of men are as seed in the earth, they shall spring up again.

Fourthly, Sowing is applied to repenting tears, Psal. 126. 5. They that sow in tears, that is, they that go on repenting and mourning, shall reap in joy, they shall have sheaves of comfort.

And Fifthly, It is applied generally unto any action good or bad, Gal. 6. 8. He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; and he that soweth to the spirit, &c. Sowing (as plowing) is used in regard of doing good and evil: Sow to your selves in righteousness, saith the Prophet; and here on the other side, They that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness. Here is the progress of sin; sin goeth on gradually, there is not only a plowing, but a sowing; sin is the seed, and there is a seminal virtue in every sin; it will spring up again, and bring forth an hundred fold more in misery to the whole man, flesh and spirit, then ever it gave in delights unto the flesh.

The word which we translate [wickedness] signifies weariness, labour, perverseness; because wicked persons weary and toil themselves in serving and satisfying their lusts, Numb. 23. 21. I have seen no perverseness in Israel. God did not find them laboriously and industriously wicked at that time. To do wickedly, is a wearisom employment, a hard labour. The vulgar Latine renders it by sorrow; and sow sorrows.

עמל Seminant dolores. Vulg.

Reap the same.] The Apostle, 1 Cor. 15. 37. telleth us, That the Husbandman soweth not the same body that shall be; how then is it said, they sow wickedness, and reap the same? When they come to the harvest, what shall they have? The same, saith Eliphaz. It is true; A man that soweth, doth not reap the same individually or numerically, that is, the very same particular seed; but he reaps the same specifically, the same in kind: that's the meaning here; their crop or harvest shall be like their seed-time, Gal. 6. 7. Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap, the same in kind, not the same in number, Prov. 22. 8. He that soweth iniquity, shall reap vanity. It is not the sin it self which is reaped, but the fruit, the product of that sin, that they shall reap; the punishment of sin is the fruit of sin, and it is called the same: Punishment is a visible sin. Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee, this is thy wickedness, Jer. 4. 18. The bitter things procured by wickedness, are called wickedness; as the sweet fruits of our good works, are called our works, Rev. 14. 13. Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, for they rest from their labours, and their works follow them: their works follow them, how? Not their works in kind; the very same individual works which they have done here, follow them not (for they are transient acts, and have no subsistency) but the fruits of those works, and the blessings which lie in the promise for such as do those works; these fruits, these blessings follow them: the blessings annexed to faith, obedience and holiness, these follow them. So now, when it is said of a wicked man, what a man ploweth and soweth, he reapeth the same, it is to be understood of the same thing in the issue and consequents of it, those curses, those treasures, that harvest of wrath, which lie in the threatnings against him, these are rained down upon him, and are made the portion of his cup.

Again [the same] that is, the same in degree; if he have sown much, he shall reap much; if he have sown but little, he shall reap but little, he shall have his due proportion. The justice of God doth neither commute nor compound penalties with wicked men; as it will not wrong or over-charge, so neither will it favour or spare them in their sins. God spared not his Son, when he was in the place of sinners, Rom. 8. 32. much less will he spare any sinner, who is not in his Son. So much for the opening of these words. We shall now observe some things from them.

Even

Even as I have seen, they that plough iniquity.

Hence we learn, First, That to be a wicked man is no easie task; he must go to plough for it.

It is plowing, and you know plowing is laborious, yea it is hard labour. Wicked men in Scripture are called Sons of Belial, that is, such as will not endure the yoke; they will not endure Gods yoke, or the yoke of Christ, though it be an easie yoke: but they are content slavishly to yield their (otherwise) proud and delicate necks to Satans yoke, to tug and sweat at his plough all their days. There is a promise, in the Prophet, of a time, when swords shall be turned into plough-shares, and spears into pruning-hooks; that is, men shall leave fighting and go to working, they shall have peace: and there are many in the World, who would break their swords into these mystical plough-shares, and their spears into sinning hooks; they would have peace, why? that they might leave fighting and go to sinning, that they might work wickedness more quickly, and keep close to their Trade, the ploughing of iniquity without disturbance.

Belial, deduci potest à בלי q. e. Non & עול q.e. Jugum, ut significetur impatientia Jugi. Hieron.

Secondly, Observe, That, there is an art in wickedness.

It is ploughing, or, as the word imports, an artificial working. Some are curious and exact in shaping, polishing and setting off their sin: so the Holy Ghost intimates, Rev. 21.27. Whosoever worketh abomination, and maketh a lye: There is but one Verb in the Greek, and so we may read it full enough in our language, whosoever worketh an abomination and a lye; to work an abomination or a lye, is more then to do an abomination, or tell a lye. As when we say, such a man is a Clockmaker, it notes Art, as well as action. So to say, such a man is an Abomination-worker, or a Lye-maker, notes him not only industrious, but crafty, or (as the Prophet speaks) wise to do evil.

ποιῶν βδ. ἀσυμια καὶ ψεῦδος.

Thirdly, Note from these Metaphors, of ploughing and sowing,

That, wicked men expect benefit in wayes of sin, and look to be gainers being by evil doers.

They make iniquity their plough; and a mans plough is so much his profit, that it is grown into a Proverb, to call that (whatsoever it is) by which a man makes his living or his profit, His plough. And when we say, there are many candles burning, and never a plough going: It is to tax unthriftiness or careless spending, without honest care of getting. Every man tills in expectation of a crop; who would put his plough into the ground to receive nothing? The Apostle argues from this, as a dictate of nature, (1 Cor. 9.10.) He that ploweth, ploweth in hope. And James 5.7. The husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth; having bestowed his labour, he doth not count it labour lost. It is even so with wicked men, when they are sinning, they think themselves thriving, or laying up that in the earth a while, which will grow and increase to a plentiful harvest. What strange fancies have many to be rich, to be great, by wayes of wickedness? Thus they plow in hope, but they shall never be partakers of their hope: yea, they shall be ashamed of their hope, their sin will deceive them. And that which will make their poverty most burthensom, is their hope of riches; the expectation they had to gain, will make their loss, their breaking, and their undoing, intollerable

Fourthly, Observe from these Metaphors,

That, every sinful act persisted in, shall have a certain sorrowful reward.

It shall assuredly be answered with judgment, tribulation, and anguish: Assuredly it shall. Are not plowing and seed-time an assurance of the harvest? They that go forth vainly rejoycing, bearing that poysonous seed, shall doubtless come again, and bring their sheaves of sorrow with them. That which God promised (*Gen.*8.22.) in regard of natural husbandry, he hath threatned in regard of this mystical husbandry: after the Flood he promised, that while the Earth remained, Summer and Winter, Seed time and Harvest should not cease. So it is here, only with this difference, the Lord useth all means to dissuade and prevent the seed-time of sin. But when notwithstanding all those threatnings, men will be sowing iniquity, he hath made an everlasting Decree (as firm in its kind, as that about the waters of Noah) that Harvest shall follow, and every such soul shall both reap and eat, the fruit of his sinful plowing and sowings.

Fifthly Observe, That, the punishment of sin may come long after the committing of sin.

The one is the seed-time, and the other a reaping-time; there is a great distance of time between sowing and reaping. The seeds of sin may lie many years under the furrowes. A man may commit a sin in his youth, and not find the harvest of it till his old age. How many (as Job complains, but in a worse sence then he) in their old age, are made to possess the sins of their youth, and feel that which they have forgot? The Husbandman (in that place before mentioned, James 5.7.) waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it: and through the long patience of God, some wicked men (though they thought their sins not sowed, but buried for ever, and never desire to see or hear of them; yet (in a sence) some wicked men, I say) wait long for the noxious fruit of their own hearts.

Sometimes indeed the seed-time and harvest of sin, are found in the same hour; and while a man hath scarce ended his sin, his punishment begins. The Prophet describing the plenty and prosperity of the Church in the latter dayes, tells us, that the plough-man shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes, him that soweth the seed. The returns of sin are to some as quick and plentiful, judgment rides post after them, the reaper overtakes the sower, or the man reaps as soon as he hath sowed; wrath arrests him in the very act of sinning. And we may say, as Elisha in another case, Is not the sound of his masters feet behind him? The sound of punishment is at the very heels of sin. That black Oxe comes as swift as a Leopard, treading upon his heels: And though sometimes it comes slowly as an Oxe, yet alwayes it treads hardest, when it comes slowest. A wicked man may commit evil an hundred times, and his dayes (of peace) be prolonged, for his harvest of wrath (like Habbakkuks vision of mercy) is for an appointed time, but in the end it will not lye, (though he would tarry for it) it will not tarry. The natural harvest belies (sc. failes) some mens hopes; but this my stical harvest shall not bely his fears (if he have any) it shall bely his presumption, how much soever he hath.

2 King. 6. 32.

Eccles. 8.

Spem mentita seges.

Sixthly Observe, That, the punishment of sin shall be proportionable to the degrees of sin.

He shall reap, the same, saith the Text, the same in degree. So the Scripture speaks, and so experience teacheth concerning natural sowing; a mans harvest is gradually such, as is his seed-time, if he have sowen much (as an ordinary course) he shall reap much: The Apostle alludes to this, where he speaks of the seed of charity, If ye sow sparingly, ye shall reap sparingly; on the other side, if ye sow plentifully, ye shall reap plentifully. Sometimes through the judgment of God, (which can easily break thorow the principles of nature) it cometh to pass, as it is Hag. 1.6. Ye sow much, and reap little: God makes the Harvest thin and lean, when the seed-time was thick and plentiful; but in regard of sinning (I speak of such as go on impenitently in their sins, and have not Christ to take off their sin from them) such persons as sow much, shall be sure to reap much: They shall be beaten with many stripes, who impenitently multiply their transgressions.

2 Cor. 9.6

Seventhly Observe, Punishment shall not exceed the desert of sin.

They reap the same; The same, equal in degree or quantity, not beyond the degree of sinning. In nature, the corn reap't is more then the corn sown; sometimes an hundred fold, sometimes sixty, sometimes thirty; as Christ speaks, in the Parable of the Sower, Matth. 13. But the punishment of sin reaped, is not a grain more then the sin committed. All the punishments of this life, are less then sin, as Ezra confesseth, After all that is come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, seeing that thou our God hast punished us less then our iniquity, &c. Chap. 9.13.

9. 13. And in the life to come, the damned shall not be punished more then sin deserveth; yea, I may say (with reverence to his Almighty power) God cannot punish a sin, beyond that proportion which it deserveth; and the reason is this, Infinite power, cannot inflict a punishment, beyond that which infinite justice doth require: Infinite justice is offended, and must be satisfied (if not satisfied by Christ) then by the person himself offending; therefore, infinite power cannot lay upon a man, more then his sin doth deserve, though it may easily lay more upon him then his nature can endure. So then, all that wicked men bear in this life, is less, and all they shall bear in Hell, will not be more then the deserts of sin, or the demands of Justice.

An objection may seem to lye against this, from that
Rev. 18. 6. award of judgment against Babylon: Double to her double, according to her works; It may seem that her harvest of punishment must exceed in double proportion, her seed
Psal. 79. 12. time of sinning: The Psalmist speaks yet higher, Render unto your neighbours sevenfold into their bosom, their reproach, wherewith they have reproached thee O Lord. Render sevenfold, that is, manifold: That number in Scripture, multiplies the sence into any number; To render sevenfold, may be rendred the greatest number.

I answer, Babylons punishment shall be double, respecting what Babylon shall have acted; but not double, respecting what Babylon shall have deserved: Give to her double; if it be possible, let her have as much blood more to drink as she hath spilt, for she deserveth to drink an hundred times more. The blood of Saints is precious blood; one drop of the blood of Sion, is more worth then a whole ocean of the blood of Babylon, therefore give her double; though it be more in quantity, it is not so much in value. And so reward our neighbours that have reproached thee, sevenfold, it is not sevenfold beyond their deserts; for one scorn that a wicked man poureth upon a Child of God (and so upon God, for that's the meaning of the Psalm) cannot be recompensed with ten thousand reproaches poured upon wicked men. Reproach is the due of ungodly men here, and everlasting reproach shall be their portion hereafter. But the least reproach cast upon God is an infinite wrong; and the reproach of his people is so much his, that he reckons it as his own: And will therefore take away all reproach from his people, and render to their unkind neighbours, their reproach sevenfold (and that's but equal) into their bosoms.

Lastly, When it is said, They shall reap the same: We are taught,

That, the punishment of sin, shall be like the sin in kind.

It shall be the same, not only in degree, but also in likeness. Punishment often bears the image and superscription of sin upon it. You may see the fathers face and feature in the child. Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap, saith the Apostle, Gal. 6. 7. If a man sow wheat, he shall reap wheat; the harvest tells you what kind of grain was sowed in every field: If a man sows wheat, he shall not reap tares; and if a man sow tares, he shall not reap wheat. Thus God often returns the sin of man upon him: sin comes to him in his own likeness, and he may read the name of it stampt upon the affliction; or by the judgment inflicted, interpret the wickedness committed: This was openly confessed by Adonibezek, (Judg. 1. 7.) As I have done, so God hath requited me, just so; and what was that? He speaks out in the former words: Threescore and ten Kings, having their thumbs and their great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table: There was his sowing, his reaping was the same; they caught him (saith the Text) and cut off his thumbs, and his great toes. The very first Law that was formally made and published after the fall, was a Law of Retaliation, or of Counterpassion, Gen. 6. 9. Whosoever sheddeth mans blood, (what shall he reap?) By man shall his blood be shed, he must reap the same: The Judicials of Moses are plain for this, Exod. 21. 24. Eye for Deut 32. 21. eye, and tooth for tooth, &c. They have moved me to jealousie, saith the Lord, by that which is not God; and I will move them to jealousie, by those who are not a people. Like as ye have forsaken me, and served strange Gods in your Land, so shall ye serve strangers in a Land which is not yours, Jerem. 5. 19. God payeth them in their own coin. Who so stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard, Prov. 21. 13. And so concerning the preaching of the word, contemned, (Zach. 7. 13.) Therefore it is come to pass, that as he cryed, and they would not hear; so they cryed, and I would not hear, saith the Lord of hosts: They reap as they sowed: they would not hear, that was their sin; they shall not be heard, that's the punishment; they shall see how good it is to be wilfully deaf, when God commands, by his being judicially deaf, when they complain. The Sodomites had a fire, of unnatural lust among them, and God sent a shower of fire unnaturally from Heaven (fire descending crosseth the course of nature) to destroy them. The Egyptians killed the Israelitish Children, that was the seed they sowed, they reap the same; God slew their Children, even all their first-born in one night. Nadab and Abihu offered strange fire, there was their wickedness; they reaped the same; God by fire from Heaven, in a strange manner, slew them in a moment.

Yea, we find the Lord sometimes dealing thus with his own dear servants, he will cause them to reap that which they have sown in kind; David had defiled his neighbours wife, Therefore, saith the Lord, I will take thy wives from 2 Sam. 12. 11. before thine eyes, and give them to thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy wives, in the sight of this Sun. Again, the Lord tells him, Thou hast slain Uriah with the sword of the Children of Ammon, therefore the sword shall never depart from thine house. You see, here was sword for sword, and defilement for defilement, even holy David reaped the same which he had sowed. It is very remarkable, which is reported in the History of the Church, by Socrates, concerning Valens the Emperor, who was a great persecuter of the orthodox Christians, and a maintainer of Arrianism: The story tells us, that in his wars against the Gothes, he was overthrown, and hiding himself in a little cottage, the enemy came by, burnt it, and him together: Now see, how God in this, gave him to reap what he had sown: for when fourscore of the orthodox sayled from Constantinople to Nicomedia, to treat with him, about the points of Arrianism, and to settle the matter by way of dispute: The Emperor hearing of their approach, while they were in the haven, and before they could come on shore, caused the Ships to be fired wherein they were, and so consumed them all. Here was burning for burning. And it is observed (in the French History) that Charles the ninth of France, who Anno 1572. was the contriver of that great Massacre in Paris, wherein so many thousand Protestants were forced through a Red Sea, a Sea of blood, to their rest in Canaan: This bloody King, at last dyed himself, by a strange eruption of blood from all the passages of his body; thus he had also reaped what he had sown; he had poured out blood, and his blood was poured out. It were easie to give you plenty of instances, bearing witness of this accurate justice of God. Examples were frequent in Job's time, you see Eliphaz had store of these in his note-book, Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same. Socrat. Hist. Eccl. l. 4. c. 3.

VERS. 9, 10, 11.

By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed.
The roaring of the Lion, and the voice of the fierce Lion, and the teeth of the young Lions are broken.
The old Lion perisheth for lack of prey, and the stout Lions whelps are scattered abroad.

ELiphaz having given an account of his observation, in general, that he had often seen wicked men perish, vers. 8. In these three verses, he illustrates his observation, by an elegant description of the manner how, or the power by which wicked men perish and are cut off; namely, by the blast of God, ver. 9. By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed: and lest any should think, that this blast of God carries away only straws and feathers, light and weak persons into perdition, he adds the weightiest and the strongest: The roaring of the Lion, and the teeth of the young Lions are broken. God by his blast can take away, or break, the strongest, the mightiest, Lion-like men, men fierce like Lions, and stout like the Lions whelp. Under the shadow of which allusions, he closely strikes at Job, who was once a great

a great man, the greatest of all the men in the East; a fierce spoiling Lion (in the apprehension of his friends) and yet God brought him down. This in brief, is the illustration of the argument, in these three verses, By the blast of God they perish, &c.

Eliphaz (having in the former verse, by the metaphor of plowing, sowing and reaping, set forth the actings and expectations, the issues and successes of wicked men) here (as some conceive) continues the metaphor or the Allegory, by this expression of blasting, which (we know) is often used in reference to the seed sown: As if Eliphaz had said, when these men have plowed and sowed, when they are in expectation of a fruitful and plentiful harvest, then God blasteth the seed, and the seeds-man too; he sendeth forth his rough wind, which dryeth up and withereth stalk and ear, the Counsel and the Counsellors: And though blasting spoil or prevent reaping in an ordinary sence, yet blasting may be reaping (as here) in a figurative sence: They who sow iniquity, are often punished by reaping disappointments, which is the blasting of their hopes, and the consumption of their confidences.

Blasting of corn and fruits, is often spoken of in the Old Testament (as 1 Kings 8. 37.) If there be in the Land blasting and mildew. Amos 4. 9. I have smitten you with blasting and mildew; And a people spoiled by the sword, and consumed by war, are compared to corn blasted before it be grown up, Isa. 37. 27. But the word in the Original, for blasting corn, is different from this in the Text: The root of that, signifies to dry up, or cause to wither; this to breath, as a man breaths with his nostrils; By the breath of his nostrils, or (as we translate) by the blast of his nostrils: So in the description of mans Creation, Gen. 2. 7. Moses saith, God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, or the blast of life.

This blasting or blast of God, is sometime put for a storm or mighty tempest suddenly raised up by the Power of God. Thus (Exod. 15. 8.) Moses relating the sudden destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, saith, with the blast of thy nostrils, the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, &c. that is, with the wind which God sent out, as his instrument, he gathered the waters to swallow up the Egyptians, and save his own people. And we find the word (Isa. 25. 4.) used to denote the furious blasting violence of wicked men, in the day of their rage and madness against the Church. When the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall, thou shalt bring down the noise of strangers, as the heat in a dry place, &c.

נשמה from נשם Anhelavit.

By the blast of God.] God in this act of vengeance against the powers of wickedness, is presented to us in his Name, Eloah, which signifies, the mighty or puissant God: So Mr. Broughton translates it, By the breath of the puissant they perish. The strong God, or God in his strength, comes armed against strong transgressors. The effect shews the strength of this blast; For,

By his blast they perish, saith the Text; it is the word used before: they are not only a little withered or scorched, but they are utterly consumed, they are destroyed, root and branch, head and tail, as in one day.

רוח אפו

The next words in the Text, by the breath of his nostrils they are consumed, are but the repeating of the same thing; yet there is a considerable difference in the expressions. By the breath of his nostrils.] The word (Ruach) which we there translate breath, signifies generally, spirit, ghost, breath or wind; sometime the Holy Ghost, who is breathed from the Father and Son: The breath of God put alone, notes the wrath of God, Isa, 30. 33. Tophet is prepared of old, &c. the breath of the Lord, (sc. the wrath of the Lord) like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it. This phrase also, The breath of Gods nostrils, signifies the anger and wrath of God. And the anger of God, is called the breath of his nostrils, after the manner of men and other creatures; because anger breaths out at their nostrils: The Naturalists observe, that anger inflaming the spirit, and heating the heart, frequent breathing follows (as it were) to cool the fire, and to ease that inflammation; an angry man breaths quick and short: When Saul was enraged and mad with malice against the Saints, he is said, To breath out threatnings and slaughter, Acts 9. 1. therefore also, anger is called, the breath of Gods nostrils.

Animalia commota, spirant vehementius, & narium flatu iram indicant.

Further it is considerable, that the word nostril, is put alone for the wrath of God: Psal. 95. 11. He sware in his nostril, that is (as we translate it) he sware in his wrath, that they should not enter into his rest. Likewise Psal. 2. 12. If his wrath be kindled but a little: The Hebrew is, if his nose or nostril be kindled but a little; the nostril, being an Organ of the body, in which wrath shews it self, is put for wrath it self. Paleness and snuffing of the nose, are symptomes of anger. In our proverbials, to take a thing in snuff, is to take it in anger. Again, in Scripture we find that slowness to anger, and hastiness to be angry, are expresst by the different frame of the nostrils; as namely, when the Lord is said to be slow in anger; the Hebrew is, long of nostrils: (Psal. 103. 8.) The Lord is slow to anger, or, (Exod. 34. 6.) long-suffering. In both places, the Original is, long of nostrils; that is, of anger, or long ere he be angry. On the other side, a passionate, cholerick man, a man ready to conceive anger, is said to have a strait or short nostril; He that is soon angry dealeth foolishly, Prov. 14. 17. the Hebrew is, he that hath a short or a narrow nostril, dealeth foolishly; because such men are most apt to conceive anger: So then, while Eliphaz saith, By the breath of his nostrils they are consumed, it is, as if he had said, by the wrath and displeasure of God they are consumed; and the Septuagint translate it, directly by anger; They are consumed by the breath, or spirit of his anger; So others in the Latine, They are consumed by the spirit of his fury. And both these words, breath and blast, are found together in one place, 2 Sam. 22. 16. At the blast of the breath of his nostrils; the whole verse runneth thus, The channels of the Sea appeared, the foundations of the earth were discovered, at the rebuking of the Lord, at the blast of the breath of his nostrils, that is, at the great displeasure of the Lord.

So, we see, what we are here to understand, by the breath and by the blast of the Lord. And in this passage, Eliphaz seems to hint at the manner of the death of Job's children, who were destroyed by the strength of a mighty wind, smiting the four corners of the house so, that it fell upon them: that wind may well be called the breath and the blast of God, both in regard of the wonder and strangeness of it, as also because (though Satan was the instrument) he had the ordering and disposing of it. Satans breath, all the wind he can raise, cannot blow away a feather, unless the Lord give and continue leave and strength to do it.

Observe First, God can easily destroy wicked men.

He doth it by a blast, or by a breath. Though, to themselves and others, they appear as great Mountains, yet before God they are but as dust, or chaff of the Mountains; by a blast or by a breath, he scatters and consums them: So David compares them (Psal. 1. 4.) The ungodly are not so, (not so? how? they are not as a tree planted by the waters side, that is the portion of the righteous; how are the ungodly then?) they are as the chaff, that the wind scattereth or driveth away; the best of them, the most solid of them are no better. And (Isa. 17. 13.) The Nations shall be chased, as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and as a rolling thing before the whirl-wind. Though Nations, mighty, strong, powerful Nations come out against God, and his people, fear them not. For if God set himself against them, they are no more before him, then a little chaff, he scatters them by the breath of his displeasure.

You know it is no trouble, for a man to breathe, or to make a blast with his mouth; and this phrase is used, to shew with what ease and facility God destroyes all the plots and counsels of wicked men; it putteth him to no pain, no sweating, no travel or labor, to do it; men are put to much expence of pains, and run many hazzards, to oppose the wickedness of men: but God doth it with a breath, (2 King. 19. 7.) When God sent to Hezekiah, to assure him that he would deliver him from Sennacherib, he not only promiseth to do it, but shews him how he will do it, even as in this Text, Behold, I will send a blast upon him: that's all I will do, I will not trouble my self much about the business; you must gather armies and make great preparations against the enemy, but I will do it with a blast.

And which is yet more speedy; Some understand this blast to note only the will and pleasure, the intent or purpose of God, by the blast of God they perish, that is, if he do but will it, it is done; it is no more for him to act it, then intend it. The Septuagint translate near this sence, by the command of God they perish; as if Eliphaz had said, it is as easie for God to do it, as to say it shall, or to command it to be done. Men can command great things, and talk much what they will do; and all proves but talking and commanding: One man may command more in an hour, then a million can do in a year; but with God, it is all one, to command and accomplish. It is noted for a high speech, that of Cæsar to Metellus, who opposing him, when he came into the Roman Treasury, to take the money there heaped together; Cæsar (whose great spirit could not bear opposition) saith to him, Let me alone, or I will lay thee dead upon the ground; and presently, at once to qualifie that threat, and magnifie his own power, adds, Young man, it is harder for me to speak this, then to do it. It is most certainly so with God, he can as easily do any thing, as speak it. Yet further, we find the easiness of Gods destroying his enemies set forth, a degree higher, he doth it by a look; as by a blast of his nostrils, so by a cast of his eye; that's a small trouble, and that's all that it needs cost God to destroy the strongest, the vilest and violentest foe in the world: Thus he consumed the host of Pharoah, even with a look, (Exod. 14. 24.) It came to pass that in the morning-watch, the Lord looked upon the host of the Egyptians, through the pillar of fire and of the cloud, and troubled the host of the Egyptians. If God hide his face from his people, they are troubled; and if he look upon his enemies, they are troubled. He darts out both beams of life, and beams of death from his eyes. When a godly man is afflicted, if he can but get the Lord to look upon his trouble, he is delivered. And when wicked men prosper, if God do but look upon their glory, they are withered. With such ease doth the Scripture express the destruction of wicked ones, it is by a breath, by a word, by a command, by a look: An intimation from the eye of God is execution.

Secondly note, God can suddenly destroy the counsels, and the plottings, the ploughings, and the sowings of wicked men.

In proverbial speaking, to do a thing suddenly, and to do a thing with a breath, are the same: God can as soon destroy his enemies, as a man can breath, Psal. 73. 10. How are they brought into desolation in a moment! A blast, you know, is gone in a moment, Isa. 42. 9. These two things shall come upon thee in a moment, loss of Children, and widowhood. God can with one breath, blow away both the husband and the children. So (Jer. 4. 20.) The Church of the Jews speaks thus, Destruction upon destruction is cried, for the whole Land is spoiled, suddenly are my tents spoiled, and my curtains in a moment: God doth but blow upon the tents, and presently the cords break, and the stakes thereof are loosned. If man be angry, he must sit down and consult, he must lay his plot and contrive a way of revenge: But no sooner is God angry, but he can revenge. That wrath cannot want an instrument, which can make one. Infinite wisdom sees all means at once, and infinite power can use them at once. As the grace of God knows not long delayes, it comes swiftly, as a sweet blast or holy breath; Grace is speedy, and upon the wing; so likewise the wrath of God knows no tedious long delayes: They who do wickedly, and stand out impenitently, shall perish suddenly. And though the Lord be slow to anger before he strikes, yet when he strikes, he can do it at once; it is but a blast of his wrath, and a breath of his displeasure, and the stoutest of the sons of men are dried like a leaf.

Thirdly note, That, God destroyeth wicked men secretly and invisibly.

To destroy by a breath, is a close way of destroying. So, (Hag. 1. 9.) his anger is expresst against his own people, for neglecting his Ordinances and Temple; Ye looked for much, but lo, it came to little; and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it, that is, I sent an invisible and secret curse upon it.

Lastly, We may observe from the manner of this destruction,

That, The destruction of wicked men, the plowers of iniquity, is unavoidable.

It is done by a breath; now the wind bloweth where it listeth, no man can countermand or stop the wind. The wind is swift, as well as strong; no man can out-run the storm of Gods displeasure. He that fleeth of them, shall not flee away (for it is a wind that followeth them) and he that escapeth of them, shall not be delivered; it is a blast that is gone out after them: they cannot deliver themselves by art or cunning, by wit or policy; they cannot deceive or cozen the wind; they cannot deliver themselves by power or strength; they cannot conquer or overcome this wind: it comes suddenly, invisibly, irresistably; who can stand before God when he is angry? yea, who knoweth the power of his wrath or blast? Am. 9. 1,2.

This Eliphaz goes on to shew, in vers. 10, 11. and therefore takes his instance from those creatures which are mightiest, which are strongest. The roaring of the Lion, and the voice of the fierce Lion, and the teeth of the young Lion are broken; the old Lion perisheth for lack of prey, and the stout Lions whelps are scattered abroad.

The expressions are very various. Here are five words in these two verses, signifying the Lion, yet with a difference and special reference to the several ages and conditions of the Lion. 1. The Lion. 2. The fierce Lion. 3. The young Lion. 4. The old Lion. 5. And the stout Lion. We have these five several words in our translation, and we give epithites to four of them; whereas in the hebrew they are all single terms, as we shall see in a brief touch upon them.

Leonum nomina plura sunt, & secundum ætatis gradus distinguuntur. Buxtor. lex. 1. Arieh. 2. Shacal. 3. Cephir. 4. Laish. 5. Laby.

First, The Lion (Arieh) which name is given the Lion, to note his power in renting and tearing; and Mr. Broughton renders it so, the roaring of the renting Lion, putting the etymologie or notation of the word into the translation. Others derive it from Arie, a Lion, and Raah, which signifieth to see, and then it is as much as the Lion-seer; and the reason of this derivation is given from the Lions watchfulness, he is ever intent upon his prey; and, as some Naturalists observe, sleeps with his eyes open. So that this word entitles him, either from his watchfulness, the Lion-seer; or from his strength, the Lion-renter.

אריה from ארה carpsit, decerpsit; alii deducunt ab ארי Leo & ראה vidit, quasi leo videns, quia semper est oculis intentus ad prædam.

The second is a primitive, signifying, sometimes a Leopard, and sometimes a Lioness, or she-Lion. We render it a fierce Lion, which may well refer to the former, because a she-Lion, especially when she hath young ones, is exceeding fierce.

לביא Leo ferox vel immanis, mediæ ætatis.

The third word it is (Cephir) a young Lion, and it is sometimes used as an epithete (Cephir Arieh) a young Lion roared on Samson, Judg. 14. 5.

The fourth word is (Laish) signifying a Lion, that is grown in years, which perishes for hunger, not being able to hunt and get prey. So the Text, The old Lion perishes for lack of prey.

And the fifth word is (Laby) which signifies a Lion in greatest strength and fierceness. And the Criticks tell us, it is derived from (Leb) which signifieth the heart, as noting a strong-hearted and a couragious Lion; and so Mr. Broughton translates, for stout Lion, the heart-strong Laby. Judah being compared to this Lion, by dying Jacob, is set forth by his majestick stoutness: Judah is a Lions whelp, &c. And as an old Lion, who shall rouze him up? Gen. 49. 9.

Quasi leonē cordatum & animosū dicas. Buxt.

These several sorts of Lions shadow out unto us, mighty, strong and powerful wicked men, or plowers of wickedness, with all related to them, they and their families, they and their wives, they and their children; all theirs are usually full of Lion-like qualities, and all these shall be destroyed and perish, by the blast, by the breath of God.

For, as the Apostle puts the question in another case, about Oxen, Doth God take care for Oxen? So if any should question here, is God angry with Lions? Doth he oppose himself against Lions, that he saith here, The Lion shall perish, the young and the old Lions shall be destroyed?

No, There is a further meaning in it, somewhat else is shadowed under the name or notion of Lions. First, In Scripture, the Lion signifies any one in authority, especially in Kingly authority (Gen. 49. 10.) The Tribe of Judah (which was to have the Scepter and the Rule, the Magistracy or Government being setled in that Tribe) is compared to a Lion; Judah is a Lions whelp, from the prey my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a Lion, and as an old Lion, who shall rouze him up? As Lions are chief, the most eminent among the beasts of the field, so

Kings

Kings and Magiſtrates are chief, the moſt eminent among the ſons of men. Chriſt is called the Lion of the Tribe of Judah, from the prerogative of his power, and the excellency of his Kingly condition above all others, his name being King of Kings, and Lord of Lords. Secondly, The Devil is compared to a Lion, he is called a roaring Lion, becauſe of his cruelty and devouring nature; He goeth about like a roaring Lion ſeeking whom he may devour. And the Lions here in the text (how old ſoever they be) are whelps of this old Lion, the Devil: not great men in general, but wicked great men, men mighty in power, and mighty in ſin, mighty ſinners. It is frequent in Scripture, to ſhadow out powerful, wicked, tyrannical men by the name of Lions; and the reaſon is, becauſe they imitate the qualities and conditions of the Lion. A man acts by reaſon, and a beaſt acts by ſenſe and paſſion: Reaſon is the difference between a man and a beaſt; therefore when a man acts againſt reaſon, or without reaſon, the name of a beaſt is juſtly put upon him; and the name of that beaſt moſt fitly, whoſe qualities and paſſions he moſt reſembles. Man in regard of his headſtrong unrulineſs, is compared to a horſe and to a mule, Pſal. 32. 9. Be not as the Horſe or as the Mule which have no underſtanding, whoſe mouth muſt be held in with bit and bridle: Be not unruly. For ſubtilty, man is called a Fox; for flattery or filthineſs, a Dog or a Swine; and here, for rapine and cruelty, a Lion. Thus the Prophet Nahum elegantly, chap. 2. 11, 12. Where is the dwelling place of the Lions, and the feeding place of the young Lions? that is, where is the dwelling place of oppreſſors and cruel tyrants? And, Ezek. 19. 1, 2. Take up a lamentation for the Princes of Iſrael, and ſay, what is thy Mother? a Lioneſs, ſhe lay down among Lions, ſhe nouriſhed her whelps among young Lions: the tyrannical Princes in Iſrael, were thus deſcribed: And ſo is tyrannical Pharaoh, (Ezek. 32. 2.) Take up a lamentation for Pharaoh King of Egypt, and ſay unto him, Thou art like a young Lion of the Nations. In general, Solomon (Prov. 28. 15.) telleth us, That as a roaring Lion, and a ranging Bear, ſo is a wicked Ruler over the poor people. And the Apoſtle Paul, ſpeaking of his eſcape from the jaws of that perſecuting Emperor, ſaith, (2 Tim. 4. 17.) I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion, that is, out of the mouth of Nero, who was ready with open mouth to devour and deſtroy me; or as ſome, (taking it for a proverbial ſpeech, noting any eminent danger) I was delivered from the extreameſt hazard of death; even as a man reſcued out of a Lions mouth, and pulled from between his teeth.

And it will not be amiſs, for the clearing of this a little further, to give you ſome ſpecial things, wherein the reſemblance may be taken between the Tyrant, the oppreſſing Ruler, or any oppreſſing great one, and the Lion: we may draw the picture of a Tyrant by a Lions face, in theſe reſpects.

Firſt, In regard of his pride, ſtatelineſs, and diſtance which he affects to hold towards others. The Lion is a proud and ſtately creature.

Secondly, Tyrants reſemble Lions in regard of courage and animoſity. Couragiouſneſs in any noble or good way, (in which ſence, Prov. 28. 1. (the righteous are bold as a Lion) is the courage of Saints: But to be valiant and couragious in doing miſchief, in wronging and oppreſſing the weak or innocent, is the courage of a beaſt. Courage out of the way of truth and juſtice, is Lion-like cruelty.

Thirdly, They are Lions in regard of their ſtrength. Lions are the ſtrongeſt of creatures: What is ſtronger then a Lion? ſay they, in reſolving Samſons Riddle. And Prov. 30. 30. A Lion which is ſtrongeſt among beaſts. Tyranny muſt have ſtrength to back it. Hence they who mean to oppreſs, fortifie themſelves with titles and priviledges, with honours and relations. Solomon conſidering the oppreſſions that were under the Sun, obſerves tears on the one ſide, and ſtrength on the other; On the one ſide of the oppreſſors there was power, Eccleſ. 4. 1.

Fourthly, They are Lions in regard of their ſubtilty: The Lion is a ſubtil creature, as well as a ſtrong creature; he hath a great ſtock of policy, as well as power: though we uſually oppoſe the Lions skin and the Foxes skin, yet many times they both meet in one: Some are double-skinn'd, as well as double-cloath'd: Hence we have that phraſe, Pſal. 10. 9. (comparing a wicked man to a Lion) He lieth in wait ſecretly, as a Lion in his den; which teacheth us, that the Lion waits and watches for his prey; and ſo do theſe wicked men (Pſal. 17. 12.) Like as a Lion that is greedy of his prey, and as it were a young Lion, lurking in ſecret places.

Fifthly, They are Lions, eſpecially in their cruelty, in their blood-ſucking cruelty. The Lion is a devouring beaſt, therefore when the Devil is called a Lion, it is ſaid he goeth about to devour. And God himſelf (when he would be expreſt in his reſolutions of judgment, ſo as he will not have mercy upon a man, or upon a nation) is pleaſed to take upon him this name too, Hoſ. 5. 14. I will be unto Ephraim as a Lion, and as a young Lion to the houſe of Judah; I, even I, will tear and go away, and none ſhall reſcue him; that is, I am reſolved to execute judgment to the uttermoſt upon him: So, chap. 6. 1. The Lord hath torn, which is (properly) the act of a Lion. And, Job (chap. 10. 16.) complains thus to God, Thou hunteſt me like a fierce Lion. And (Iſa. 38. 13.) Hezekiah fearing, that God would not ſhew him that mercy, to raiſe him from ſickneſs, cries out, as a Lion, ſo will he break all my bones. So that when the Lord would expreſs himſelf in wayes of judgment, and reſolvedneſs to go on in judgment, he takes upon him the name of a Lion. But ſuch is the very nature of wicked men: Such as the Prophet Micah beſpeaks (chap. 3. 2.) Hear this, O ſons of Jacob, and ye Princes of the houſe of Iſrael, is it not for you to know judgment? who hate the good, and love the evil; who pluck off their skins from off them, and their fleſh from off their bones: noting Lion-like cruelty in thoſe, who ſhould have been as ſhepherds, to feed and protect the people.

6. They are compared to Lions, in regard of their terrible roaring; the Lion roareth terribly, ſo terribly, that when the Lion roareth, the beaſts of the forreſt tremble. The Naturaliſts obſerve, that though many creatures are ſwifter of foot then the Lion, yet when he roareth, they fall down, and he overtakes them with his aſtoniſhing voice: ſo tyrannical men, with their roaring words, their loud threatnings, often affright and daunt the poor.

Animalia fortia vocē edunt gravē ut Leo & Taurus. Ar. Tanta illi vocis inendæ natura præſtitit inſtrumenta, ut animalia longè ipſo celeriora ſolo ſæpe rugitu capiantur. Baſil. Hexam. Hom. 9. Leo aliquid nubis habet circa ſupercilia, ſc. aſpectum minimè ſereni. Ariſt.

7. They reſemble Lions, in the ſowrneſs and ſternneſs of their countenance, and clowdineſs of their brows. Much of mans heart is ſeen in his face: Frowns are as blows; hence we call it brow-beating. The Love of God is expreſſed by the pleaſantneſs of his face, and the light of his countenance: ſo alſo is the love of man; and we may ſee what the intent of another is, in his very looks. Many are, in this reſpect, Lion-like men; they have (as Ariſtotle ſaith of the natural Lion) clouds and ſtorms hanging about their eye-brows. It was a threatning againſt the Jews, in caſe of diſobedience, that God would ſend againſt them, a nation of a fierce countenance, which ſhould not regard the perſon of the old, &c. Deut. 28. 50.

Laſtly, They are like Lions, in regard of their greedineſs after prey. They have ſet their eyes bowing down to the earth, like as a Lion that is greedy of his prey, Pſal. 17. 11, 12.

Thus you ſee, both who are here meant by Lions, and likewiſe, how the reſemblance or picture of a wicked man may be taken from a Lion.

Now when it is ſaid, that, the teeth of the Lions are broken, that the old Lions periſh, and the young Lions are ſcattered abroad; by theſe expreſſions of ſcattering, periſhing, and being broken to pieces, the Holy Ghoſt ſhews us, the utter, full, and final conſumption of wicked men; they are not only touched, troubled, and rouzed up out of their dens, but theſe Lions, old and young, are ſcattered and conſumed. They periſh.

There is an opinion currant among the Jewiſh Writers, that this Verſe is to be underſtood, as a deſcription of the means or inſtruments by which God deſtroyes wicked men, and not (as we) of wicked men themſelves, whom God will deſtroy: Junius agrees with this interpretation of the Jews, tranſlating the two verſes, in this ſence; By the blaſt of God they periſh, and by the breath of his noſtrils they are conſumed; by the roaring of the Lion, and by the voyce of the fierce Lion, and by the teeth of young Lions they are conſumed: As if, when wicked men (ſo he giveth the gloſs) are not deſtroyed immediately by the breath, and by the blaſt of God, then God ſtirs up the creatures againſt them, and will deſtroy them by Lions. We know it was a ſpecial judgment judgment threatned in the Law against the disobedient, (Levit. 26. 22.) that God would send evil beasts among them: The Prophet numbers this, among Gods sore judgments: Sword, famine, pestilence, and evil beasts, are put together. In the history of the Kings, we have a famous Record, how the Lord sent Lions, who slew some of those Idolaters, whom the King of Babylon had transplanted into the Cities of Samaria.

ng. 27.

But I rather conceive the former exposition of the words, to be the truth, and most sutable to the context; and there is this reason to be given, because it agrees best with the purpose of Eliphaz, whose work was, so to describe the destruction of wicked men in general, that he might particularly intimate the destruction fallen upon Job and his family, with the reason of it: Job was a great man in his time; he was among men as the Lion among beasts, a chief: His friends thought him a cruel Lion too, and so he is told to his face afterward, by one of them, that he (like a greedy Lion) had taken away the pledge and the garment from the poor: This Eliphaz would hint, at least, to Job, and that God had found him out in his Lion-like qualities; that he being a Magistrate, and a man in authority, having dealt hardly and cruelly with others, now the Lord had measured to him, the same measure he had given others: He, the Lion; and she, the fierce Lion or Lioness his wife; they the young Lions, his children, were all broken, and either perished or perishing. So much for the clearing of the words; I shall now add some Observations from them.

First, Wicked men, how powerful, how strong soever, shall fall before the wrath and indignation of God.

The day of the Lord shall be against every one that is high, and that is lifted up. God desires in a special manner to be dealing with these, for they, in the pride of their spirits, think themselves a match for God: though indeed, their strength be but weakness, and their wisdom foolishness; yet in their own conceits they are stronger, and wiser then God himself. Hence (like Pharaoh) they send defiance to Heaven, and say, who is the Lord? Exod. 5. 1. When God sees the hearts of men swoln to this height of insolent madness, he delights to shew himself, and grapple with them, that the pride of man may be abased, and every one that is exalted may be laid low: that he only may be exalted, and his Name set up in that day. David was much troubled, at that murther of Abner, yet he could not take vengeance presently upon the fierce Lion that had suckt his blood. Why? his power did not reach it; Te sons of Zeruiah (saith he) are too hard for me, (2 Sam. 3. 39.) but there are no sons of Zeruiah too hard for God, no Lions so strong, but he can tear them, with infinitely more ease, then a Lion can the tender kid.

This should comfort us, when we see great and potent enemies rising up against the Church; what are these before the great Lion, the Lion of the Tribe of Judah. If the Lord do but roar, if the Lion of the Tribe of Judah come against these Lions, they will run like a herd of fearful Deer: The Kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief Captains, and the mighty men, are described, trembling at the presence of Christ, when he appeared but as a lamb, Rev. 6. 15, 19. They cry to the mountains and the rocks to fall upon them, and to hide them from his face. If when Christ appears like an angry Lamb, the greatest in the world fall before him, what then will these do when Christ shall appear as a roaring Lion?

Secondly observe, how gradually the Holy Ghost expresses the destruction of wicked Tyrants: All is not done at once; First the roaring of the Lions doth perish, then their voice, then their teeth are pulled out, next their prey is taken away, lastly their whelps are scattered.

Note hence, That, usually God destroyes wicked men by degrees.

Here are five steps or degrees of Gods justice, against these Lions. First, He stops the roaring of the Lions, they shall not be able to make such a dreadful noise as heretofore; their roaring may be stopt, when their voice is not; though they can speak, yet they shall not yell.

In the second place, He breaks the very voice of the Lions; they shall not only not roar, but they shall not so much as speak, either against the lambs, or against the sheep; or for themselves; the voice of the fierce Lion shall be taken away. God is able to silence Lions, and stop their mouths, not only from devouring and roaring, but from speaking.

Thirdly, When their voice is taken away and their roaring, yet their teeth may remain: and there will be biting and tearing still, though they have done roaring and yelling, therefore with a third stroak God breaks out their teeth; the teeth of the young Lions are broken. So the Psalmist prayes, Psal. 58. 6. Break their teeth in their mouths, break out the great teeth of the young Lions, O Lord: that is, take away the instruments, by which they oppress, the means by which they tear and rend, as Lions with their cruel teeth.

Fourthly, Christ deals further with these Lions, he not only breaks their teeth, by which they used to hurt others; but he takes away their prey and their meat, they shall not have wherewith to live themselves; they were wont to suck the blood of the slain, and to eat the flesh of the poor; but now the Lord will pluck away their prey, they themselves shall be starved or pincht with hunger.

Lastly, Nor only shall their meat be taken away, but they themselves shall be scattered and dispersed; that is the last step of their calamity. Their dens shall be broken up, and their lurking places shall be opened; they shall run from place to place, from Nation to Nation. This is the Judgment of the Lord upon Lions, and the portion of cruel enemies from our God.

Further, It is here said in the Text, That the old Lion shall perish for want of prey: It is a strange expression, Lions have the greatest power to get provision, to satisfie their hunger, yea their appetites and humour, yet these shall want; these Lions, who have all their life time, preyed upon the estates of other men, even these shall want.

Note hence the justice of God, Such as have made others want, shall at last come to want themselves, they shall perish for want of prey.

They shall have nothing to eat: when thou ceasest to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled, saith the Prophet; and when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee. We must not understand it, as if wicked men do ever give over sinning; sin and their desire of sinning is in a kind infinite; they never say, now we have done, and will sin no more; but the meaning is, when thou canst sin no more, nor deal treacherously any more; when thou hast done thy utmost, and spent thy strength in spoiling others, or taken all their spoil; so that thou hast done spoiling, because there is no more to spoil: then others shall spoil thee; and thou Lion who hast preyed upon others a long time, shalt not have a bit thy self, but shalt perish for want of prey.

It is the promise of God unto his own people (Psal. 34. 10.) That the Lions shall lack and suffer hunger, but they that fear the Lord, shall not want any good thing: He expresses it by Lions, to note, that certainly they that fear him shall not want; for if any creatures in the world can preserve themselves from hunger, Lions can; if they do but roar, the very beasts will fall down as a prey before them: but yet (saith God) these, even these shall rather perish for hunger, then any one that feareth me shall want. God provides for his lambs, for innocent persons, for those who fear him, though they have no strength to provide for themselves; but the wicked who have greatest power, and have been most active to provide for themselves, shall pine with want; they who have caused so many to be bitten with hunger, shall at last be hunger-bitten, and for want of meat gnaw their tongues.

Lastly, Where it is said, that the Lions whelps are scattered abroad.

Observe, God will not only destroy the persons of wicked men, but their families and posterities.

They and their whelps shall all be scattered; he will not leave them so much as a name or remembrance, (Psal. 36. 6.) I sought his place (saith the Prophet) and he could not be found; there was no print of him, no man could remember, that there was such a man in the world, unless to curse his memory.

I shall only give one caution respecting this, and so conclude the point. That which is here affirmed in the general by Eliphaz, concerning the destruction of wicked men, Lions and fierce Lions, is not to be taken as a truth in the universal experience of it; we are not to understand it thus, as if all persons, all Lion-like persons at all times perish, and are destroyed, and scattered abroad: But Eliphaz speaks of what is usually done, or he speaks of what God can easily do at any time, and of what God may justly do at all times. Lions, fierce Lions, Tyrants, Oppressors, he both may and can scatter when he pleaseth. Yet we find, that God hath permitted some Lions to live fully, and to die quietly; they spend all their dayes in roaring and rending, in tearing and devouring, and yet themselves are not devoured: God often suspends this justice, but it is for weighty reasons; for, in a word,

First, If God should destroy all Lion-like men, the joynts of the world would be unlooosed, and the bands of humane society broken asunder. God forbad the children of Israel to destroy all the Canaanites, least the beasts of the field should multiply, &c.

Secondly, If God should hunt all these Lions out of the world, his own people would live by sense, rather then by faith; and seem to be terrified by the visible actings of wrath, rather then allured by the promises of mercy, or tenders of free-grace.

Thirdly, He defers them untill they have sucked blood enough, rent enough, and done evil enough, even fill'd up the measure of their sin, and fulfill'd his righteous purpose, by their unrighteousness. As these Lions fill their own bellies, so they fulfil Gods counsells; therefore he lets them alone, that they may do his work, though they little think of it, and less intend it.

Lastly, Eliphaz speaks of what God did frequently, in those times of the world, wherein he lived; for then God dealt more by outward judgments, then in these Gospel-times. As his mercies are now more spiritual, so usually are his judgments.

VERS. 12, 13.

Now a thing was secretly brought unto me, and mine ear received a little thereof.
In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men.

THis part of the Chapter, from the twelfth Verse unto the end, containeth the third Argument, by which Eliphaz labours to convince and reprove Job of his impatient complainings. In the whole context we may observe two general parts.

1. The Argument it self by which he reproves him.
2. The confirmation or the proof of that Argument.

The matter of the Argument is contained in the seventeenth Verse. Shall mortal man be more just then God? shall a man be more pure then his Maker? The Argument may be formed thus.

That man carrieth himself rashly and sinfully, who would seem more just and pure then God his Maker.
But thou Job carriest thy self as if thou wert more just then God thy Maker.
Therefore thou carriest thy self very sinfully and rashly.

He confirms this Argument two wayes.

First, By an Argument taken from divine authority.

Secondly, By an Argument taken from reason.

His Argument taken from Divine authority lies in the former five Verses of this context, (sc. 12, 13, 14, 15, & 16.) I may give it thus.

That is to be received as a truth, which God from heaven immediately declareth to his servant in a vision.
But God hath declared and revealed this to me in a vision, that he who contends with God carries himself very sinfully.
Therefore it is to be received as a truth.

The first part of the Argument is unquestionable; that it is a truth which God revealeth from Heaven in a Vision. And that God had revealed this unto Eliphaz from Heaven in a Vision, he himself at large declareth in those five Verses, describing both the manner how, and the time when this truth was revealed to him.

His second Argument from reason is grounded upon the common logical rule, of arguing from the greater to the less, (Vers. 18, 19, 20, 21.) The sum of it may be thus conceived.

That which would be folly and sinful boldneß in Angels, if they should aspire and take upon them to do, is much more sinful in a mortal man.
But if Angels should go about to justifie themselves, or stand upon termes with God, it would be sin and folly in them.
Therefore it is much more sin and folly in mortal man, to justifie himself before God, &c.

The Major, or the first proposition, is undeniable. The second proposition is proved and illustrated to the end of the Chapter. Wherein is shewed in what condition man now standeth: how weak and how poor a thing a man is, compared unto an Angel; therefore if it would be sin and folly in Angels to compare with God, it must much more be sin and folly in man. So we see how Eliphaz confirms the major proposition of the first Syllogism.

The second proposition or assumption which he infers upon Job, But thou Job carriest thy self so as if thou wert more just then God: he proves by that sad expostulation Chap. 3. And takes that for granted. We may form it thus,

He that complaineth of God, as if he had done him wrong, makes himself more just then God.
But thou Job, hast made such a complaint, Chap. 3. as if God had done thee wrong in afflicting thee, or in giving and in continuing thy life under such afflictions.
Therefore, thou seemest to make thy self more just then God, or to say that God hath dealt unjustly or injuriously with thee.

This I take to be the Logick of the remaining part of this Chapter.

And having cleared his manner of reasoning in general, I shall descend to open particulars.

Now a thing was secretly brought unto me, and mine ear received a little thereof.

I must yet resolve a question before I explain the tearms; the question is this. Whether this were a true vision sent from God, or whether it were only feigned by Eliphaz, thereby to gain authority to what he spake?

There are many Expositors of great name, who are very confident that this vision was a fiction or holy fraud; a vision of Eliphaz his own brain, not a vision from Heaven. Some have gone further, maintaining that it was a vision sent from Hell, an illusion of the Devil, thereby to strengthen the hands of Eliphaz, in vexing and troubling Job.

It cannot be denied, but that many have pretended visions from God, when they have received none; they have belyed the Almighty with their Dreams and Revelations, when they have seen nothing. Thus (1 Kings 22. 11.) Zedekiah the false Prophet takes upon him to have had a vision from God, by which he would confirm Ahab in his counsel to go up to Ramoth Gilead. And Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah made him horns of iron, and he said, thus saith the Lord, with these shalt thou push the Syrians till thou hast consumed them. And in the Prophesie of Jeremiah you have Hananiah the false Prophet, not only speaking the language, but dressing himself in all the formalities of a vision; he comes forth with a yoke upon his neck, and breaks it before the people, and telleth them, thus will God break the yoke of your captivity, and at such a time.

The true Prophets complain often of the false, for crying up their deceivings under the warrant of visions and dreams, when all was but a dream indeed, a meer phancy or studied imposture to mislead the people, and gain credit to their lies. While a man hath nothing but ordinary humane authority for things extraordinary, he is easily rejected.

Man is subject to error, he may deceive, and be deceived; therefore when they would put a new nothing upon the world, as an infallible truth, and have it swallowed without chewing, received without disputing, then usually they pretended that it was (quid Divinum) a doctrine or message received immediately from God. And it is well observed, that this course of pretending to Divine revelation, was very frequent amongst the Heathen; when their Wise men had a mind to fasten some unwonted opinion upon the vulgar. Among the Romans, Numa (to the intent they might be received with greater authority) stampt his laws laws with a kind of divinity, and told the people that he had received them from the goddess Ægeria: As if he had said, these laws are not such as I have coyned and fashioned by my own policy, drawn up or enacted by my own power, I had them from the goddess. So Plato informs us of another law-maker (Minos the Cretian) that he used to enter into Caves and solitary places, where (he told the people) he received laws and immediate dictates from Jupiter their god, to govern them by. This drew a great estimation and reverence upon him. Valerius Maximus, and Herodotus tell us of those other law-makers, Licurgus and Zaleucus, using the like State-stratagems to over-rule the people. Licurgus said, he received his laws from Apollo: Zaleucus and Pisistratus avouch Minerva for the Directress or Doctress of Theirs. So that both among the people of God, and among Heathens, it hath been very frequent to pretend Divine authority; that they might with the more estimation put off either such points of doctrine or such rules of policy, as themselves had invented.

Valer. lib. 1.
Herod. lib. 1.

Rem in dubio relinquimus; videtur tamen potius vera fuisse visio, etsi ea abutatur. Merc.

For this of Eliphaz, howsoever some charge him directly, and others leave the matter in doubt, only turning the scale with a probability [it seemeth rather that it was a true vision.] Yet I shall adventure to resolve directly, that his was a true vision, as well as a vision of truth sent from God. And the reasons which sway with me, are these three.

First, If we consider the manner of this vision. The description here made, holds exact proportion with those, of which there is no question but they were the Oracles of Heaven. When a thing is done as God doth it, it is some argument that God hath done it. I grant, this reason is not demonstrative or infallible, because Satan and our own hearts are very apt to make imitations of holy things, for sinful ends. Satan can transform himself into an Angel of light, and the heart can disguise or shape its own dark conceptions, by the light of divine revelations.

Take then a second reason, Eliphaz was a godly man. 'Tis granted on all hands, that Eliphaz and his friends were right in their affections, though they failed in this action. God was angry with them indeed, and told them in the close of this dispute (Chap. 42. 7.) That they had not spoken of him the thing that was right, as Job his servant had; yet he bids Job pray and offer sacrifice for them; which he would not have done, unless they had been upon good terms with him in general, and in a present capacity for mercy and acceptance. Now it being supposed that Eliphaz was a godly man, it is a sin not to be supposed of him, that he would make boast of a false revelation, and with such deliberate gravity put a lye upon God.

Thirdly, The matter which he professes to have received in this vision, is a great and a holy truth of God. Man never belyes God to confirm the truth of God. When any boast vainly of revelations, it is to confirm their own phancies and delusions. 'Tis rare when men are so zealous for truth, as to improve all that God hath spoken, in the maintenance of it: I have not read of any that have fained a word from God, to maintain that which is really the Word of God. We find all along in Scripture, that when visions from God were falsly pretended, they ever tended to secure the heart in false opinions, or unwarrantable practises.

The Apostle Paul found many who falsified the stamp of the Spirit, and forged his hand and seal to establish error, (2 Thes. 2. 2.) I beseech you brethren that you be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled either by spirit, or by word, or by letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. That gross error was scattered in the Church of Thessalonica, that the day of Christ was at hand, that in those beginnings of the Gospel, there should be an end of all things. To confirm this, false teachers boasted the spirit, an immediate revelation from God: or a word immediately from the mouth, or a letter under the hand of Paul. How active is error to find patronage? It cares not whom it belyes, so it self may pass for truth. Thousands love errors, but none will own them by that name: and therefore (because children bear their fathers name) they would father them upon the God of truth. Montanus the Heretick, said he had the Holy Ghost his Paraclete, dictating those erroneous doctrines to him, beside his Propheteses, Prisca and Maximilla. Mahomet, that Grand hellish Impostor, often pretended visions from Heaven. And the story assures us that he cunningly made use of the disease of his body, to perswade his disciples of the soundness of his doctrine. For being afflicted with the falling sickness, when at any time a fit was upon him, he made the people believe that he was in an extasie or ravishment of spirit, at the appearance of the Angel Gabriel, who revealed many mysteries to him. And having by long use and familiarity taught a Pigeon to feed at his ear, he by art prevailed with the people, to feed at his poysonous mouth: as if his words had been the inspirations of the Holy Ghost, who (as he affirmed) came then to him, in the form of a Dove, and taught him those secrets.

Ifs. Eccles. 5. c. 14. 16.

So then, this of Eliphaz was a true vision, because it was the confirmation of a truth. Invented visions are in use only to gain credit to the inventions of man, or the visions of the Devil. Now for the matter and words themselves.

Now a thing was secretly brought unto me.

We translate [thing,] the Hebrew is [word,] A word was secretly brought unto me; but it is usual both in Hebrew and Greek to call A thing, A word. Luke 2. 15. The Shepherds said, Let us go to Bethlem to see this thing, the Greek is, To see this word which is done. Though here, it is proper enough, to say, A word was brought unto me.

Now a thing, or a word, was brought unto me, it was brought unto me secretly. The language of the Prophets was, The word of the Lord came unto me. There are two words in our translation, (secretly brought) but the Hebrew is one; and that word signifies to steal, or to do a thing by stealth; so it may be translated, A thing was brought unto me by stealth, or was stole into me: Mr. Broughton near this, A speech came by stealth upon me: We translate fully to the sence, A thing was secretly brought to me, as if it were whispered into the ear, and sent in closely to the spirit. And it is thus expressed, by way of opposition to another way, in which God reveals his mind unto his people. He sometimes comes openly and speaks aloud, that all may take notice, or because all ought, Isa. 58. 1. Cry aloud, lift up thy voice like a trumpet. Things are brought openly to the people, secretly to the Prophets: what the Lord speaks in the ear, or to the heart of a Prophet, that he by the Prophet speaks on the house top to all his people. A thing was secretly brought, or a thing was whispered unto Eliphaz. But he speaks it aloud to Job. This word, or this thing, is said to be stoln into him, or to be brought unto him by stealth, for three reasons, which I shall but name and proceed.

First, A thing done by stealth, is done suddenly. The theif hastens to do mischief, he makes no delayes. Then secondly, a thing done by stealth, is done secretly; a thief comes closely in the dark; stealth is committed with greatest privacie; and to say, a thing is brought by stealth, is as much as to say, a thing is brought privately. Thirdly, A thing done by stealth, is done unexpectedly. A man seldom looks for the thief, he is upon him in the way, upon him in his house, before he is aware. A thief is usually as unexpected, as he is an unwelcome guest. So this word came, or was brought in by stealth, because it came suddenly, it came silently, and it came unexpectedly to Eliphaz. And in these three respects, Christ himself is said to come as a thief; Behold, I come as thief in the night. As the word of Christ comes to many of his people now, so the person of Christ will come at last unto all, he will come by stealth, or as a thief, suddenly, secretly, unexpectedly, when the world shall little dream of him, and his Church scarce be awake for him. Hence note,

Rev. 16. 15.

First, That, Divine Truths are infused into us, not born in us, or born with us.

Every thing which is of heaven, cometh unto us from heaven; it is either stoln in secretly, or thundred in loudly. Sometimes the Prophets and Ministers of Christ, speaking aloud, carry truth into the soul; sometimes God whispers it into the Soul; one way or other, truth must be brought in, for it grows not in us. Our hearts by nature are not only like white paper, having no inscription, not a letter of Gods will written in them, but they are like paper blotted and blurred, written all over with the corrupt principles and positions of our own wills. God by his Spirit firſt croſſes or wipes out thoſe, and then writes down his own golden rules of holy truth and heavenly wiſdom. This he doth, firſt, in converſion from ſin to grace and holineſs, and afterward in all the increaſes of grace, and growths of holineſs. There is not a ſyllable of the Law of God in any mans heart, till the finger of God writes it there; I will put my law in their mind, and write it in their hearts, which is an alluſion unto the two Tables of the Law. They were firſt written by the finger of God, and then put into the Ark: So God firſt writes the Law in our hearts, and then puts it into our minds; he layes it up in the Ark of our underſtanding and memory.

Secondly, Obſerve, That, God ſteals truths into the hearts of his people unawares.

As they often expect and wait long for knowledge, ſo they ſometime know before they expect. A truth either in whole or part, in the matter or clearer light of it, comes like a thief into the heart, ſuddenly, ſecretly, unlooked for; in which caſe it is ever true, that truth unexpected, is doubly welcomed. The way of the Spirit of God is alwayes undiſcernable to fleſh and blood. The ſoul receives a thing, and the man knows not how; he can ſcarce (poſſibly not at all) tell where, by whom, or which way it came to him; it was brought, ſecretly brought; and with a moſt bleſſed, gracious ſlight of hand, conveyed into his heart. Yet ſometime truth enters in State, and may be ſaid to make its paſſage viſibly into the heart of a man. The Word comes, not as a company of thieves, but as a band of Souldiers, with weapons drawn, and terrible ſhouts, tearing open the ſoul, and breaking open the iron gate of the heart, locked and barred with unbelief, to ſecure that curſed crew of luſts garriſon'd within it. The weapons of our warfare (ſaith the Apoſtle) are mighty through God, 2 Cor. 10. 4. The word is mighty, wonderful in ſtrength, it comes upon the ſoul as an armed man, to ſpoil it of all ſinful pleaſures, yea, of the very life of ſin. Sometimes the Lord proclaims war, as by a Herald of Arms, againſt a man, and openly prepares for his ſiege and battery. He ſurprizes another, and ſteals him into a happy captivity to himſelf. A thing was ſecretly brought unto me.

And mine ear received a little thereof.

Mine ear caught ſomewhat of it; ſo Mr. Broughton. The word ſignifies a part or a portion. Mine ear received a little; yet we are not to underſtand this, as if Eliphaz had taken in only ſome fragments or imperfect notes of what God delivered, or had heard to the halves. For doubtleſs Eliphaz received all that was brought, he turned nothing back; he ſaid not, a little is enough, I need not the reſt: that he received but a little, was not from neglect of the reſt, but from inability to receive more, or to receive it more perfectly. And though he had not all of every part, yet he had a part of all; it was not a little of this, and none of that: little reſpects ſomewhat of every truth, not ſome one truth. He received, though not all, yet a perfect model of all that was brought.

Further, This ſpeech may have reference unto our preſent condition; concerning which the Apoſtle ſaith (1 Cor. 13.) We know but in part; Now when he ſaith, we know but in part. it is not as if we had but a part of Gods will made known unto us. The word of God and the works of God are perfect. And the Apoſtle aſſures the Church of Epheſus, that he had not ſhunned to declare unto them the whole counſel of God, Acts 20. 27. The whole (which concerns man) is declared, but we know that whole but in part. Such is our weakneſs and infirmity, that we cannot take in All of All; no, nor any part of all, in the full latitude and extent of it: Thus we know but in part. So ſaith Eliphaz, when this was brought to me, mine ear received but little of it; my narrow ear could drink in but ſome drops of that Ocean, which was poured out upon me. All that man apprehends, is but little, in reſpect of what God offers now, or of what hereafter he ſhall apprehend. Eliphaz ſpeaks modeſtly and humbly of himſelf; God brought a thing unto me, and I am ſuch a poor ſtreightned veſſel, that I could receive but a little of it; yet ſomewhat I caught hold of, which I am about to make known unto thee. We may note from this, Modeſtè loquitur, quaſi non plenè acceperit, quod ſciendum eſſet de hâc re. Quod optimum eſt & eximium comprehendere non poteſt mortalis homo. Merc.

First, Holy truths are very pleaſant to the ear of a holy perſon.

A thing was brought unto me, and mine ear caught a little of it. As when meats pleaſant to the taſte, are brought to a man, he puts forth his hand, and takes them; or when pleaſant muſick ſounds, the ear catches it, or we drink it in greedily at the ear; ſo when holy truths are revealed, a holy heart catches them: The ear is not more affected with pleaſant muſick, or the palat with pleaſant meats, then the underſtanding ſpiritualized, is affected with ſpiritual truths. The ear of a holy man takes in holy things with pleaſure, and therefore he is ſaid to catch them, or drink them in, as with much deſire and raviſhing delight: David found more ſweetneſs in the truths of God, then in the honey or honey-comb. The ſpirit of a regenerate man doth ſo much catch heavenly doctrine, that in the hebrew, the word which ſignifies ſuch doctrine, ſignifies alſo catching or receiving; and a word from the ſame root, ſignifies the palat of the mouth; which may hint us thus much, That heavenly doctrine pleaſes the palat or taſte of a heavenly mind: And the reaſon of it, is, becauſe there is a ſuitableneſs in the heart of every godly man, with every truth of God. All delight ariſes from proportion and ſuitableneſs between the object and the organ, in ſenſitives; between the object and the underſtanding, will, affections, in ſpirituals: That which makes delight to the eye, is the ſuitableneſs of viſibles to the eye; and that which makes delight to the taſte, is the ſuitableneſs of edibles to the palat; and ſo that which makes delight to the ſoul, is the ſuitableneſs of intelligibles to the underſtanding. Hence the reaſon is clear, why wicked men will not receive the things of God, but inſtead of catching them, catch at them, ſnarl and murmure at them, ſpeak, yea, rail and fight againſt them; their hearts are unſuitable to thoſe truths, therefore they diſtaſte them, therefore they reliſh them no more then the white of an egg, or a dry ſtick: nay, not only have they no pleaſant taſte, but they have a bitter taſte in their mouths; they are as gall and wormwood to them, they are a vexation and torment to them. The truth which the two Witneſſes publiſh, torments them that dwell on the earth; and then no marvel, if inſtead of catching thoſe truths to embrace them, they catch the witneſſes and kill them.

Rev. 11.

Secondly, obſerve, That, The ear and heart of man in this ſtate of corruption, are veſſels too narrow, to take in, or hold all the truths of God.

I have many things to ſay (ſaith Chriſt to his Diſciples) but ye cannot bear them now, John 16. 12. Nor could they ever fully bear ſo much as Chriſt had to ſay. We have line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little, and there a little, Iſa. 28. 10. becauſe it is but here and there a little, ſome few lines or precepts which we are able to learn and digeſt into our ſpirits. Whole ſhowers of divine truths are often rained upon us (Heb. 6.) yet we drink in but a drop or two; we ſwim, as it were, in a whole ocean, a ſea of holy revelations, but we are narrow-neck'd bottles, and how little is it which bubbleth in! Mine ear received a little thereof. The truth of God is like God himſelf, infinite: Truth is nothing elſe but the mind of God, and that is infinite; therefore we, who are not only finite, but ſtreightned, cannot poſſibly comprehend it.

Thirdly, Mine ear received a little thereof: It was but a little he received, yet he received a little; all did not fall beſide his ear, all did not ſlip away, he caught ſomewhat: Hence note,

That, The ear and heart of a godly man ever receive ſomewhat, when the truths of God are revealed.

I cannot get in all, my heart will not receive all, my memory will not retain all; but a little it will hold, ſomewhat it takes in at every Sermon, and from every viſion of God. (Sermons are the viſions of God, and ſomewhat of Gods mind is brought to you in every holy Sermon.) Natural men are like ſieves, like veſſels without a bottom, or full of holes, into which theſe truths being put run out every drop: the beſt in this life, are leaking veſſels, much drops out: Eliphaz received a little; how many hear much, and receive nothing! they come empty to the Ordinances, and they return empty; their ears have been filled with a ſound, but their hearts have not caught a syllable, not a word of truth is written in their hearts, not a letter laid up in their minds, and that's the reason, why not a word is to be seen in their lives: How can they hold out the word in a pure conversation, who have not received it into a pure conscience?

but

In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men.

The former verse shewed us the manner how that thing was brought to Eliphaz; a thing was secretly brought to me: this shews the time when it was brought; it was (saith he) in thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men.

In thoughts from the visions of the night.] Some read it, in the thoughts which I had, after the visions of the night; so, Hos. 6. 2. From two nights. Heb. After two dayes; or, in thoughts which I had in the visions of the night; or, in thoughts of the visions of the night: the Original bears any of these readings.

Vel post visiones nostis, sicut dicimus à cœna, à prandio; sic Hos. 6.2. vel in cogitationibus visionum noctis, ut Mem Genitivum indicet. מחשבות לילה שעפים

In thoughts.] The Hebrew word signifies properly the boughs of a tree; and so some translate, In the boughs, sprigs or branches of the visions of the night; but we render it well, in the thought: And thoughts are called boughs or branches; First, Because thoughts grow from the mind, sprout and shoot up from the mind, as branches from the stock of a tree: From the root and stock of a mans understanding, a branch of thoughts grows up, sometimes like a tall Cedar of Libanus, as high as heaven. Secondly, The boughs and branches of a tree are many, thick, interwoven, and crossing one another; such are the thoughts of a man; he hath many, even multitudes of them: In the multitude of my thoughts, saith David. The mind puts forth many branches and twigs, they sprout and shoot forth every way; thousands of various thoughts are moving, upon various objects, and to various ends; some are earthly, some heavenly. The branches of some minds are but briars and thorns, others bear the Lilie and the Rose, their root is in heaven, and they grow heaven-ward. Thirdly, Thoughts are called branches, because the branch or the bough brings forth and bears the fruit; the stock or the body of a tree brings forth fruit at the branches; so all the fruit of our souls is born upon, or from our thoughts: our actions are the fruits of our thinkings. Thoughts are possible actions; look what a man thinketh, that he doth, or would do: And such as our thoughts are, such our actions are, or would be. Thoughts are the first-born, the blossoms and blooms of the soul, the beginnings of our strength, whether for good or evil; therefore the Hebrew word is elegantly translated from a bough or a branch, to a thought.

שיח Strips, frutex, quia sermo è corde, ut arbor è terra nascitur. Shin. Elegans metaphora sumpta à supereminentibus arborum ramusculis (& est primigenia hujus vocis significatio) ad phantasmatum extremitates, ac velut tenuias cogitationum summitates notionem suam extendit. Bold.

The Hebrew word for speech, prayer and meditation, springs from a root of the same signification; because speech, prayer and meditation spring up from the spirit, as a stalk or branches from the stock of a tree.

There is one thing further to be observed from this word, (for it is a very elegant word, and therefore I spend a little the more time upon it) In thoughts from the visions of the night: The word signifies, not only a bough, but the highest bough, the top bough of a tree. A tree hath some under-boughs, and some top-boughs, as the Prophet speaks, (Isa. 17. 6.) Two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough: it is the same word, which here in the text, we translate thoughts; as if Eliphaz should say, In my very uppermost or highest thoughts, in those very top-branches of my highest fancy, which I had from the visions of the night. The highest, the top branches which grow from the soul of a godly man, are for, or about the highest mercies, top-mercies, for heaven and heavenly things. A wicked mans highest and uppermost thoughts are for the earth; his thoughts for the earth out-grow all his other thoughts: but a godly mans thoughts for heaven and spirituals, out-grow all his other thoughts; his thoughts for heaven, are the highest and uppermost branches of his soul. We have this word used in 1 Kings 18. 21. How long (saith Elijah) will you halt between two opinions? That word which we there translate opinions, is here translated thoughts; hence some render that in the Kings thus, How long do ye halt between two top-thoughts, or high thoughts? As if this were the thing which Elijah reproved in that people, that they had high thoughts both of God and of Baal, top-thoughts of both; and they (as it were) set Baal, a dumb Idol, as high in their thoughts, estimations and opinions, as the living God. Why do ye halt between two uppermost opinions, highest thoughts, or thoughts of equal height concerning God and Baal? Your thoughts of your Idol are as high as of God himself. What! will you make an Idol equal with God? An Idol is a base thing, a low thing, a thing below upon the dunghil (therefore called a dunghil-god.) The true God is on high, he is in the highest heavens, he is higher then the heaven of heavens; and do you debase him thus by halting between two thoughts of equal height, concerning him and Baal? They who set up an Idol, make it equal unto God. All false worship is a setting of our posts by Gods posts, and of our threshold by his threshold; a making both of equal height and worth.

populum, quod duas eminentias sibi constituerent; Deũ & Baalem quasi æquales, inter quas nulla est comparatio. 2 Cor. 6. 15. Bol.

And to clear it yet further (Psal. 119. 113.) the same word is used by David, when he professes, I hate vain thoughts; or as some read it, I hate vain things. He calls Idolatrous thoughts vain thoughts, because they are wavering, inconstant or unsetled thoughts, in further allusion to the boughs of a tree: As the topmost and highest boughs of a tree are shaken with every puff of wind, and waver to and fro with every blast, so are the thoughts of Idolaters: or because (as before) Idolatry sets up too high thoughts, adoring an Idol as much, or in competition and rivality with the ever-living God. The higher our thoughts are of God, the more excellent they are; and to have as high thoughts of an Idol, as of the living and true God, are the vainest thoughts of all; those high thoughts are low thoughts, the lowest thoughts, thoughts most hateful. I hate vain thoughts.

Quasi dicat Idololatriã odio habui, quæ plura eminentia supremo cultu reveretur, cum sit unum.

From the visions of the night.] As I have opened that word about the thoughts somewhat largely, so this of the visions, requires more enlargement; yet I shall do it as briefly as I may.

Visions were a special way of Divine Revelation: Heb. 1. 1. God, who at sundry times, and in divers manners spake to our Fathers by the Prophets, saith the Apostle. God spake at sundry times, and he spake in divers manners. Now amongst those divers manners of speaking, speaking by or in visions was one. The Jewish Doctors observe four degrees of divine revelation. The first they called Prophecy, which included vision, and any apparition whereby the will of God was made known. They had a second way of divine revelation, which they called, The inspiration of the Holy Ghost, whereby the party was inabled without vision or apparition to prophesie: either as prophecying is taken for the foretelling of things to come, or for the resolving of things in doubt: The Rabbins give us the difference between these two, prophecy and inspiration: In prophecy (though it was from the Holy Ghost) a man was cast into a trance, or brought into an extasie, his senses being taken away; but speaking by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, was without any such change in, or impressions upon the body: So David, and other Pen-men of the Scriptures, wrote by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, yet without visible apparitions to them, or visible change upon them. Thirdly, God revealed himself by Urim and Thummim, which was an answer given by the Ephod, or by the stones that were on the brest-plate of the High Priest. These three wayes of divine revelation (as they observe) ceased in the second Temple. The Jewish Writers having this tradition, that after the latter Prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachy, the Holy Ghost departed from Israel; meaning, the Holy Ghost (not in the ordinary work of sanctification, but) in those extraordinary wayes of Prophesie, Inspiration, and of Urim and Thummim, went up and departed from them. There was yet a fourth way of divine revelation, which they call Bathcol, the daughter of a voice, or eccho, declaring the will of God immediately from heaven; such some conceive to be, the voice heard from heaven, Mat. 3. 17. proclaiming the testimony of God concerning Christ; A voice was heard from heaven, saying, this is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased.

πολυμέρως καὶ πολυτρόπως.

Paulus Fagius, in Ex. 28. Goodw. Heb. Antiq.

But to pass from these traditions of the Jews, we shall give you the doctrine of divine revelation more distinctly from the Scriptures. We find (Numb. 12. 6, 7, 8.) three distinct wayes, in which the Lord revealed himself of old unto his people: If there be a Prophet among you, I the Lord

Quousque è judicatis inter duas prominentias. Merc. Quasi Elias vel jungeret

Lord will make my self known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream; my servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house, with him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold. This is an illustrious Text, describing three distinct wayes or degrees of holy revelation. First, By Vision, which we have here in Job. Secondly, By a Dream, which was, when God presented somewhat to them sleeping: This kind of revelation God vouchsafed, not only to his own people and Prophets, but to Heathens also, and strangers from his Covenant. Pharaoh had a revelation by a dream (Gen. 41.) concerning the seven years of famine; and Nebuchadnezzar had a wonderful revelation by a dream (Dan. 2.) concerning the state of the four Monarchies. The wise men of the East were warned in a dream, to return into their Countrey another way, Mat. 2. But with the Saints, these revelations by dreams, were very frequent; Jacob (Gen. 28.) in a dream, as he slept upon a stone, saw a ladder, &c. Joseph, Jacob's son, had so many dreams, that his brethren jeered him with it, and called him the Captain-dreamer, the dreamer, a master of dreams, Gen. 37. 19. Joseph the husband of Mary, was twice warned in a dream; first, that he should not forsake his wife, Mat. 1. and then, that he should go into Egypt, Mat. 3. Many other the like revelations by dreams, might be instanced in; but I forbear. There is a third way spoken of in this Text, and that is, speaking mouth to mouth; my servant Moses is not so, with him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently. This is a more eminent way of heavenly manifestations then the former: Moses had a priviledge above the ordinary Prophets. For, to speak mouth to mouth, is expounded by (apparently) I will speak plainly, or apparently, not in a vision or in a dream. When a man speaks mouth to mouth to his friend, or (as the Scripture phrases our communion with God in heaven) face to face; this is opposed to a more remote or obscure communion. As our seeing God face to face in heaven, so his speaking to us mouth to mouth on earth, notes the cleerest and fullest revelation; it is to give us his mind nakedly, without any figure or shadow; or (as Christ is said once in the Gospel) to speak plainly, and not in parables. And these speakings mouth to mouth, were of two sorts; either immediate, as himself did unto Moses, or as to others, by the ministry of Angels: God often employed Angels in this service, to declare his mind, and bring messages to his people: This was a kind of speaking mouth to mouth; but Moses had an honour beyond this, with him will I speak mouth to mouth, I by my self, not I by a created Angel.

בעל חזון רמות

Visions (to keep the term in hand) were (you see) a principal means, by which God broke his mind, and unlock'd the secrets of his counsels. If there be a Prophet among you, I the Lord will make my self known unto him in a vision. And to clear this point about visions, yet more fully; we may distinguish of divers sorts of visions. First, A vision is sometime put for an ordinary dispensation of the will of God to his Prophets or Ministers, who as from God, dispense it to his people; (Prov. 29. 18.) Where vision faileth, the people perish, that is, where there are none to publish and declare the mind of God (no, not in an ordinary way) to a people, that people are in a ready way to perdition. Without the visions of Grace there is no ordinary way to the visions of Glory. Secondly, By a vision, we understand an extraordinary work of God, manifesting his mind to his Prophets, either to assure future successes, or to resolve future Queries. And these were called visions, because by them, things were made so manifest, as if they had been seen before their eyes; and in some of these revelations, a visible representation was made to the eye: visions were often attended with apparitions. In reference to both these sorts of visions, that is appliable, 1 Sam. 9. 9. Before-time in Israel, when a man went to enquire of God, thus he spake; Come let us go to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was before time called a Seer. Prophets were called Seers, because in visions, they had either an ocular, or an intellectual sight of the mind of God.

Visio est omnis doctrina divinitùs revelata; quia Deus quibuscunq; visum est revelare, res ipsas quodammodo videndas & spectandas oculis servorum suorum exhibet ad obsignandum earum certitudinem. Jun. in Isa. cap. 1.

Secondly, Visions may undergo this division: There was an open vision, and there was a private vision. In 1 Sam. 3. 1. we have the ground of the distinction; In those dayes there was no open vision: Open is opposed to private or secret; the word imports a vision appearing in publick; and the meaning of the text is this; there were no Prophets sent openly, and (as it were) in State, invested with commission, and furnished with messages from heaven unto the people; there was no open vision: yet at that time there were private visions, as to Manoah, Judg. 13. God revealed himself in those dark times to some of his special servants; and so he hath and will at all times. While he hath a Church upon the earth, he never shuts himself quite in heaven. Open vision may fail, but all visions shall not fail. So open profession may fail in the reign of Antichrist, in his hour, and in the power of darkness; as it did in the time of Elijah; yet all profession of the truth shall never fail: The Lord hath alwayes his thousands in secret, who never bowed their knee to Baal. In many places, since Christ came in the flesh, there hath been no open vision, no holding forth of the truth of Christ, and yet even in those places there have been private visions; and a remnant reserved, to whom God hath made known the mysteries of the Kingdom of Christ. When darkness covers all in appearance, there may be light which appears not; and candles under a bushel, when there are none in the candlesticks. A Goshen hath light, while Egypt is plagued with darkness; and when the Prophets are benighted, it may be day with many of the people.

Fuerùt quidem singulares & privatæ visiones cum piis communicatæ, ut cum Manoah, Jud. 13. Sed publicè Prophetarum omne munus jacebat. Jun. in loc.

Thirdly, Some visions were without any trance or ravishment (Gen. 15. 1.) The word of God came in a vision to Abraham, speaking to his ear, and bidding him look up to heaven with his eyes, ver. 5. But often we find, that visions were accompanied with trances: 'Twas so with Balaam the false Prophet (Numb. 24. 16.) He hath said, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open: And it was so with some of the true Prophets; Daniel saw a vision, and when he heard the voice, Then (saith he) was I in a deep sleep upon my face, (Dan. 10. 9.) Peter was in a trance, when he had the vision of a sheet let down from heaven, Acts 10. And the Apostle saith (2 Cor. 12. 1.) I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord, whether in the body, I cannot tell, or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth. His soul had so much acquaintance with God, that he became a stranger to his own body; his soul was so busied in receiving knowledge from God, that he was fain to put off the knowledge and care of his body wholly to God: What the state of my body was, I know not, God knoweth.

Fourthly, Some visions were presented only in bare naked words, others were cloathed in types and figures, in the shapes of beasts of the earth, and fowls of the ayr, of trees and stones, &c. As to Ezekiel and Daniel in their Prophesies, and to John, in the book of Revelations. These figures were as an Alphabet of sacred Letters, which put together and spell'd, made the mind of God legible to his servants.

Lastly, The Scripture in hand hints us a fifth difference about visions. In thoughts from the visions of the night; that's considerable. There were visions of the day, and visions of the night; thus it is said (Dan. 2. 19.) when Daniel expounded Nebuchadnezzar's dream, that God made it known to him in visions of the night, opposing it to visions of the day. Usually the night was the time for visions; hence (Numb. 22. 18, 19.) Balaam the false Prophet (when the messengers of Balak came to him) saith, tarry this night, and I will shew you in the morning; he thought to have a vision in the night: So it is observable, that when Saul and his servant came to Samuel (1 Sam. 9. 19.) to enquire about the stray'd Asses, he tells him, Ye shall eat bread with me to day, and to morrow I will let thee go, and will tell thee all that is in thine heart: he desired a night, intimating, that God used to reveal secrets unto him in the night.

So much concerning visions, with the kinds and differences of them.

From this Doctrine of visions, we may take notice of our priviledge under the Gospel. The Apostle saith, at sundry times, and in divers manners, God spake unto our Fathers by the Prophets; but he hath spoken unto us one way, which exceeds them all, even by his Son, who is the brightness of his Glory, and the express image of his person, Heb. 1. 2, 3. We have a vision which out-shines all the visions which ever the Prophets or Patriarchs had from the beginning of the world. Their light was darkness, at most, but a shadow; their visions were obscurities, and their revelations, concealments, compared with ours. Our vision is Christ, God manifested in the flesh: Mine eyes have seen thy salvation, saith old Simeon; he had a vision of Christ in person. The Land of Judah was called the valley of vision, because God revealed himself to that people more frequently and clearly then all the world beside. Where-ever the Gospel is preached, that Land is a valley of vision, a valley of vision far more lightsom and glorious then the Land of Judah was; the very darkness of the Gospel is clearer then the lightness of the Law. That which was more glorious, had no glory, by reason of that glory which excelleth, 1 Cor. 3. 10. Only remember, that as our priviledge is greater then theirs, so is our duty; A clearer light should be answered with a holier life: And we who have more evidence of what God would have done, should make more conscience to do it. Now we are not taught by dreams and visions of the night; we ought to walk as children of the day. Not only is darkness gone, but the shadows are fled away. The true light now shines, even he who enlightens every one that comes into the world. We need not dreams or visions now. Why should we call for Candles when the Sun is up? We need not Star-light, when we have Day-light, or when the promised Day-star is risen in our hearts, 2 Pet. 1. 19.

Sopor est somnus profundior, somnium est plus quam dormitatio, & inpor plus quã somnus.

Here is one circumstance more in the Text about this vision, very remarkable; it was not only in the night, but in the night when deep sleep falleth on men; or, on sorrowful man, man wearied with labour and travel. This is a more distinct description of the time then the former. It was in the night, and in that part of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men; that is, in the former part or beginning of the night; for the first sleep is the deep sleep: and we use to say, that a man, especially a weary hard-wrought man, is in a dead sleep, when he is in his first sleep. The word signifies an extraordinary sleep. It is used (Gen. 2. 21.) where it is said, that God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, when he took out his rib, and formed the woman. The Seventy translate it, Extasie. Some compare it to a Lethargy; a man in a Lethargie can hardly be awakened. Such a sleep as Saul was in, 1 Sam. 26. 12. when David came into the Trench, and took away the Spear. and the Cruse of water from his bolster. Such a one as Jonas was in, while the Ship was almost sunk with the tempest, Jonah 1. 5. In both places we have this original word. At the time when such sleep falls on wearied man, Eliphaz had this vision. And he speaks very elegantly, that this deep sleep falleth on men; because such sleep seems to oppress the spirits, as a heavy weight the body; it falls as heavy as Lead upon all a mans senses, and overcomes them: we say ordinarily, a man falls asleep; and it is true of sleep, that it falls upon man, and falls with such a weight, that a man is not able to stand under it. We say also, a man is heavy to sleep; for sleep, like a heavy thing, comes down upon him, and then down comes he. Heathen Poets tell us, that at this time they had visions, or delusions rather. Satan imitates God in what he can, that he may deceive with better success.

תּוּרְדֵמָה Significat gravem somnum, imo plus quam somnum profundum, somnum & quasi lethargum. ἔκστασιν. Tempus erat quo prima quies mortalibus ægris incipit, & dono Divum gratissima serpit. In somno ecce ante oculos mœstissimus Hector visus adesse mihi. Virg. 2 Æneid.

We may observe from hence, Seeing Eliphaz had this vision when deep sleep falleth upon men;

First, That, The power of Gods Spirit works through all natural impediments.

When tired Nature is willing to fall, or cannot stay it self from falling into a deep sleep, then God can awaken us with his visions, and make us see, when we cannot hold open our eyes. When God will reveal his mind to the soul, he overcomes the imperfections of the body. Sleepiness is an imperfection; if a man be sleepy, he is unfit to hear: While the eye is thus shut, the ear cannot be open. That sleeper in the Acts, fell down dead while Paul was preaching. Yet when God comes by his mighty power and Spirit, though a mans ear be shut, he can break through and get into his heart. The Word hath taken some napping and nodding. Yea, God breaks in by his almighty power in revelations of his will, not only when men are in a dead natural sleep, but when they are in a sleep of spiritual death. The Word breaks open the bars of the grave, and looses the bands of death. Joh. 5. 25.

Secondly, Forasmuch as Eliphaz had this vision when deep sleep falleth on men, himself being kept awake, or waking. Observe,

That, When we are most retired from the world, then we are most fit to have, and usually have most communion with God.

If a man would abridge himself of sleep, and wake with holy thoughts, when deep sleep falleth upon sorrowful labouring men, he might be entertained with visions from God, though not such visions as Eliphaz and other Saints have had, yet visions he might have. Every time God communicates himself to the soul, there is a vision of love, or mercy, or power, somewhat of God in his nature, or in his will, is shewed unto us. David shews us divine work when we go to rest. The bed is not all for sleep; Commune with your own heart upon your own bed, and be still, Psal. 4, Be still or quiet, and then commune with your hearts; and if you will commune with your hearts, God will come and commune with your hearts too; his Spirit will give you a loving visit, and visions of his love. When Jacob fearing the rage of his brother, had put himself into the best posture of defence he could, and had sent his wives and children, his servants and his flocks over the River, the text saith, (Gen. 32. 24.) that Jacob was left alone; which is not to be understood, as if his company had left or deserted him: Jacob's solitariness was not passive, but elective. He having disposed of all his family, withdrew himself, and stayed alone; and what then? then he had a vision indeed, then there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day; he spent not the night in carking and caring what should become of him the morrow; no, he retires to pray for a blessing upon his former cares, and a blessing he obtains. It is observable also concerning Isaac (Gen. 24. 36.) that he went out into the fields to meditate (or as others read it) to pray. Some foolishly gloss upon it, that Isaac being delighted in Astronomy, went out to contemplate on the stars. But I believe the walk of Isaac's spirit was above the stars. It is a sweet expression of Bernard, If thou wouldst meet Christ in special communion, do thou oftentimes retire thy self; O chast and lovely soul, dost thou not know thou hast a modest spouse, that will not come to thee in the throng of worldly company and employment. Come my beloved (saith the Spouse, Cant. 7. 11.) let us go forth into the fields, and lodge in the villages; let us get from the tumult of the creature. He loves to find his Spouse alone, retired into a Chamber, or into a Closet, or in the Fields and Groves, in the Gardens and shadie Walks, or in thoughts upon thy Bed, having the Curtains drawn, and all the world shut out. Some have visions in the night when deep sleep falleth upon men; but what are their visions? surely they are visions of darkness, not of light, visions of hell, rather then visions of heaven. The Prophet complains of such, who devise evil upon their beds; they plot and contrive evil upon their beds, or they have visions of uncleanness, visions of covetousness, visions of oppression, black infernal visions. How much better is it to be blind, then to have such visions? to be asleep, then have such waking thoughts? But to be awake in our beds with thoughts of Christ, is far more sweet then the sweetest sleep. And in the day, could we make more vacations from the world, we should have more business in heaven. Most men are mudding in the earth all day, aud if they wake in the night, earthly care keeps them awake. There are many thousands whom love unto the world keeps awake; but how few are there, whom love to Christ keeps awake?

O sancta anima sola esto, ut soli omnium servet tesipsam, quem ex omnibus tibi eligisti. An nescis te verecundum habere sponsum? &c. Bern.

It was an harsh, and (in one sence) an ignorant speech of a wise man amongst the Heathen, who said, There is no man who may not more holily be in company, then with himself alone; and yet there is a truth in it: for if a man be by himself alone, and deal only with his own heart, probably, he might be as profitably with any company, as with himself; one mans heart in it self, is as bad as anothers, and usually it is worst, when it is by it self: Some, like Nebuchadnezzar, being secluded from men, converse only with beasts, these most beastly beasts, lusts in their own bosoms. But to be alone from men, to converse with God; to be alone from men, to converse with Christ, is infinitely better then the society of men. The reason why many receive but little of Christ, little of heaven, is, because they are so much in the crowd of the world, so long upon the wrack of earthly care, they seldom let their hearts settle. The ballances must stand at an even poize, before you can weigh aright. If you desire to know which bears most weight in your your hearts, Earth or Heaven, Chriſt or the Creature, let your hearts ſtand ſtill. That in the Pſalm 4. v. 4. reaches this ſence fully; Commune with your own hearts upon your bed, and be ſtill. Our hearts will not be ſpoken with, unleſs we be quiet. VERS. 14, 15, 16.

Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to ſhake.
Then a Spirit paſſed before my face, the hair of my fleſh ſtood up.
It ſtood ſtill, but I could not diſcern the form thereof; an Image was before mine eyes, there was ſilence, and I heard a voice, ſaying.

WE have already given the Logical dependance of this whole Context, from Verſe 12. unto the end of the Chapter, and therein ſhewed how Eliphaz confirms the principal Propoſition (lying in Verſe 17.) by Divine Authority, A viſion received from Heaven. A thing (ſaith he) was ſecretly brought to me, and my ear received a little thereof, in thoughts from the viſions of the night, when deep ſleep falleth on men. Thus, the manner of the viſion is deſcribed in general. The effects of the viſion upon Eliphaz, and the particular manner how the viſion appeared, are now further deſcribed and ſet forth. This Verſe 14. contains one eminent effect of the viſion, with the conſequents of it; as ſoon (ſaith he) as I was in that heavenly rapture and extaſie, Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to ſhake.

It was very uſual, for Prophets and holy men, to be ſurprized with fear, at the appearance of Jehovah in his meſſages by Angels, or other Viſions. It is natural unto man to fear at the ſight of an Angel: and it is a received opinion among the Jews, that whether God or an Angel did appear, it was preſent death; which they collect from divers Scriptures (Exod. 33.20.) When Moſes deſired to ſee the face of God, the Lord anſwered, there is no man can ſee my face and live. Thoſe words of Gideon import as much (Judges 6.22.) When Gideon perceived that he was an Angel of the Lord, he ſaid, Alas, O Lord God, for becauſe I have ſeen an Angel of the Lord, face to face; as if he had ſaid, alas, wo is me, I ſhall certainly dye: and Judges 13. 21. Manoah concludes it, we ſhall ſurely dye, becauſe we have ſeen God, when an Angel appeared to them. Hence alſo Jacob (Gen. 32. 30.) after his wraſtling with the Angel (which was Chriſt) called the name of the place Penuel, which is, The face of God, for ſaith he, I have ſeen God face to face, and my life is preſerved; as noting, that it was a wonderful priviledge not to dye at ſuch a ſight; the very appearance of God, is death to the creature. And that which Hagar ſpake (Gen. 16. 13.) may well be interpreted to this ſence; when flying from her Miſtris, God came to her in the wilderneſs, ſhe called the name of the Lord that ſpake unto her, Thou God ſeeſt me; the reaſon is added, by way of admiration, for ſhe ſaid, have I alſo here looked after him that ſeeth me? Which words may be well tranſlated thus, Do I live after him (ſc. God) that ſeeth me? for here one act of life is put for the whole, looking or ſeeing, for living; Have I ſeen, or have I beheld the light, after God hath ſeen me? that is, am I alive after God hath ſeen me? How wonderful!

The effect of this viſion upon Eliphaz, was not death, but fear, yet no ordinary fear, but fear which looked almoſt as pale as death; it was fear joyned with trembling, and no ordinary trembling, but ſuch a fit of trembling as ſhook his very bones. We have often ſpoken of fear, both in this and in the former Chapters; but ſuch a fear as met Eliphaz, we have not met with before.

Eſt homini naturale conſpecto angelo etiam bono timere. Bold. ex Beda, Origin, & Chryſoſtō.

That before was the grace of fear, ſpiritual fear, but this is the paſſion of fear, natural fear. And it is natural to man (as ſome of the Ancients have obſerved) to fear thus at the appearance of God by Angels. Fear is cauſed by the apprehenſion of ſome evil imminent or at hand; that's the definition of natural fear. Now when God manifeſts himſelf, though the greateſt good be at hand, yet the ſoul hath ſome miſgivings and apprehenſions of evil; and hence comes fear: the foundation of this fear is laid in guilt, ſin is in the ſoul, and guilt may be upon the ſoul; thence natural fear works, when God, who is all holy, manifeſts himſelf. And in ſpecial, there is much unbelief remaining in the heart, this fear is ſtrengthened by unbelief, Wherefore do ye fear, ſaith Chriſt, O ye of little faith? Where there is little faith, there is much fear; and as unbelief prevails, ſo fear prevails too. Thirdly, this fear ariſes from the ſuddenneſs and unexpectedneſs of the thing. God (as you may obſerve in all thoſe revelations of himſelf) comes ſuddenly: that which comes before we ſee it, cauſeth fear when we ſee it: ſudden motions without us, work ſtrange commotions within. And fourthly, the over-powering Majeſty and ſuper-excelling Excellency of God, in any ſuch revelation, cauſeth aſtoniſhment of ſpirit: a little appearance of God, makes the creature diſappear. One drop of the Divine Ocean, ſwallows up all man; and one ray of the Eternal Light, dazles him. From any or all theſe conſiderations, it may be, that fear and trembling took hold upon Eliphaz like an armed man, as ſoon as the viſion appeared, fear met him (ſaith the Original) or (as the Septuagint) fear came out and (as it were) ſtood in the way to ſurprize and apprehend him.

Neither was this bare fear, but fear heightened, fear accompanyed with trembling. Trembling of the body is a ſymptom or ſign of great fear; when fear works outwardly, manifeſting it ſelf by ſad effects upon the body, then fear is in its reign and greatneſs. There are four ſpecial effects which fear works upon the body, and we have three of them here in this Text. The firſt is, The quaking or the ſhaking of the members of the body; the ſecond is, The ſhaking of the bones; the third is, The ſtanding up of the hair; and the fourth is, the paleneſs and wanneſs of the countenance. All except the laſt appeared upon Eliphaz, at the appearance of this viſion.

Firſt, He trembled in this Verſe 14. Fear came upon me and trembling: theſe two go often together in Scripture; you ſhall find trembling coupled with godly fear, as well as with natural fear, Pſal. 2. 11. Serve the Lord with fear (with reverential, filial fear) and rejoyce before him with trembling; that is, let your fear be an exceeding great fear, even ſuch, as fills you with an awful trembling at the preſence of the Lord. The Apoſtle Paul (Phil. 2. 12.) puts them together again; work out your ſalvation with fear and trembling.

The ſecond effect is ſhaking of the bones, It made all my bones to ſhake; as if he had ſaid, this fear ſtayed not in my fleſh, but deſcended, and entred into my bones, I was deeply affected with it. We tranſlate, Which made all my bones to ſhake; the word in the Hebrew is, it made the multitude of my bones, or, my bones, how many ſoever they are, to ſhake. The Hebrews have this rule, that the major part is uſually taken for the whole, therefore the multitude of his bones, or many of his bones, is well tranſlated, all his bones. And the Verb which we render ſhake, is of the ſame root with fear, fear came upon me; ſo that according to the letter we may read it thus, Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to fear. A bone is in it ſelf ſenſeleſs, and therefore fearleſs; but to ſhew how extream and deep this fear was, he ſaith, it made fear enter into that which is without fear, and hath of it ſelf no feeling; it made my very bones to fear, as well as my heart to fear, or my fleſh to tremble. Habakkuk in the third of his Propheſie, being before God in his prayer-viſions, deſcribes the rapture of his ſpirit, by this and other ſymptoms upon his body, When I heard, my belly trembled, my lips quivered at the voice, rottenneſs entred into my bones, v. 16.

Quaſi dicat tremor non fuit ſuperficialis, ſed vehemens & intimus, qui etiam oſſa concuterit. Aquin. Gelidus[que] per ima cucurrit Oſſa tremor. Virg. 2. Æneid.

The third effect follows; Then a ſpirit paſs'd before my face, and the hair of my head ſtood up. A Spirit ruſh'd upon me, ſo the Seventy. Some tranſlate it, a wind paſs'd before me; a gale or breath of wind, as (1 Kings 19. 11.) when God appeared to Elijah, it is ſaid, firſt there came a mighty wind, which rent the mountains, and brake the rocks; and ſome conceive that a wind paſſed before Eliphaz; but the context will not bear it; thoſe words which follow, are not compatible with a wind; v. 16. it ſtood before me, it ſtood ſtill; this cannot be underſtood of the wind, for wind is alwayes in motion: and then it is ſaid, I had an Image before my face; now there is no form or image of the wind; the wind hath no shape or likeness, therefore it was a Spirit or Angel, not an Aerial wind. And if you say, how hath a Spirit a form or an image, or how can that be seen? I answer, it was not a Spirit abstracted and naked in it self, but a Spirit joyned with a form and shape, as is generally agreed: so Angels or Spirits did usually appear to the Ancients, taking a body or some form upon them: and those apparitions, when a body was assumed, were called Spirits (Luke 24. 37.) it is said, that the Disciples were afraid at the appearing of Christ, thinking they had seen a spirit: the Apostles were not so absurd, as to believe, that a Spirit in it self, a Spirit abstracted, could be seen; but they call'd it a Spirit, because they thought it only the representation of Christs body, and not the true body: and therefore though an outward shape appeared, they call'd it a Spirit. So here, a spirit pass'd before me, which yet might have some outward shape, in which it was clothed to the eye.

Æneiad. de Venere.*

A spirit pass'd before me] forward, backward, up and down, which is opposed to the words in the 16 Verse, it stood still: here it was transient or in motion. The word used for passing, signifies rather such a motion as is of the Heavens, or of the winds, then that which is properly progressive, or the motion of the living creatures. And thence some observe, that the motion of Spirits clothed with bodies in their apparitions, is not like the motion of men, who move, lifting up their feet one after another; but it is a passing as a ship moveth with a gale of wind, rather a gliding, then a going: Among the Heathen, this was made the chief difference, to distinguish a Numen, or Spirit coming in any shape, from a natural body: The steadiness of their eyes was one, the not transposing their feet was another, and a clearer evidence.

This Spirit passing thus before him, produces the third effect;

The hair of my head stood up.] Shaking of the bones went before, and now standing up of the hair. A spirit pass'd before me, and the hair of my head stood up. The Original is, the hair of my flesh, or the hair of my body; flesh is put for the body, as in Gen. 2. 24. They two shall be one flesh, that is (as it were) one body, speaking of man and wife. And Psal. 119. 120. My flesh trembleth for fear of thee, saith David, it is the same word. As if Eliphaz had said, I am so much affected with thoughts of God, that the very hair of my flesh (as in extraordinary fear it useth to do) stood up. The natural reason, why the hair stands up in time of fear, is this; when sudden fear falleth upon us, the blood goes, or hastens rather to the heart, and so the outward members wax cold: and the skin, in which the hair is rooted, is prest more together, which causeth the hair to stand up, though of it self it be a weak and unstable excrement.

So we see the general effect of the vision, which was fear, and those three concomitants or symptoms of fear, The trembling of his flesh, The shaking of his bones, And the standing up of the hair of his flesh. From all, take these Observations.

First, Forasmuch as Eliphaz falleth into such a fit of fear and amazement, at this manifestation of God to him; we learn,

That, man is not able to bear the presence of God.

Weak and frail man falls before the greatness, power and majesty of God: Dust and ashes crumbleth away, if the glory of the great God do but shine forth, even in those lesser manifestations of himself. Hence it was, that Job seems to capitulate with God, that he would speak with him, upon two Articles or conditions granted, Chap. 13. 21, 22. First, Withdraw thy hand far from me: Secondly, Let not thy dread make me afraid: Then call thou, and I will answer; or let me speak, and answer thou me. As if he had said, so dreadful is thy presence, that unless thou be pleased to sweeten it to me, fear will presently seize upon me, and disable me to speak. Moses who was a favorite of Heaven, and one who shortly after had communion with God, above all that ever lived: yet when Jehovah appeared in that flaming Bush, the Text saith, Exod. 3. 6. That Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God; holy Moses could not bear that glory. Daniel a man greatly beloved of God, and honoured with glorious visions, was yet greatly astonished at those visions, Chap. 10. 8. There remained no strength in me, for my comeliness was turned into corruption, and I retained no strength: and vers. 16. O my Lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength: Vers. 17. Neither is there any breath left in me, I am ready to dye, I am not able to bear thy majesty, in these mysteries of thy will, made known to me. How doth Habakkuk cry out in the place afore-quoted, of his trembling belly, quivering lips, and of rottenness entring into his bones. We find in the New Testament, the Saints swallowed up with the like amazements. Zechariah, of whom the Holy Ghost had given such an excellent testimony a little before, for a man that had walked blameless in all the ordinances of God; yet as soon as the Angel appeared, the Text saith, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him, Luke 1. 12. Yea the blessed Virgin (ver. 29. of that Chap.) when she saw him (that is the Angel) she was troubled in her mind. Lastly, John the beloved Disciple, seeing Christ walking in the midst of the seven golden Candlesticks, &c. Fell at his feet as dead, Rev. 1. 17.

How should this humble and abase us in our selves! we that are not able to stand before the gracious manifestations of God, when he comes to reveal himself to us in mercy; how shall we be able to stand before the wrathful manifestations of God? The Apostle tells us, (1 Cor. 15. 50.) Flesh and blood cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; by flesh and blood, we are not to understand, the sinful nature of man (as flesh and blood often signifie in Scripture, being opposed to spirit) but the constitution of nature, or that estate wherein we stand, as men; this flesh and blood is not able to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, that is, it cannot bear the majesty, glory and excellency of Heaven, where God clearly manifests himself unto his Saints; and where we shall see God face to face; and therefore the Apostle argueth all along, as by divers other arguments, so by this; to prove the necessity of a resurrection, a raising and a new-moulding of the body into a spiritual condition: Why? because our natural bodies are not able to stand under such a weight of glory, as is prepared for the Saints in that Kingdom: Corruption (nature subject to corruption) cannot inherit incorruption; hence it was, that when but a little of God broke forth, the holiest and best of men in the world, fell a shaking and trembling, as not being able to bear that transcendent Majesty shining out in those weaker refracted beams of glory.

Secondly, Seeing God coming at this time to instruct Eliphaz, and reveal a great truth to him, was pleased to deal thus with him, to make him shake and tremble; we may Note,

That, God usually humbles a man, and layes him very low, before he exalts him in the manifestations of his truth or power. Humiliations prepare and posture the heart for revelation.

The reason is, because God delights to have a man humbled, before he be instructed. Paul (though as humble a soul as lived (was in danger to be exalted above measure, through the abundance of revelation, (2 Cor. 12.) even divine knowledge (through our corruption) is apt to puff up, and therefore we had need to have the bladder prickt, and our spirits laid flat, for the receiving of knowledge: Only humble ones are fit to be Gods Schollars; he will teach none else, he refisteth a proud man, then surely he will never teach a proud man; The meek he will teach his way; He breaks our will, before he trusts us with the secrets of his will: When the spirits of men lie in the dust, when they tremble and shake, when all their bones are afraid, and rottenness enters into them, then they are prepared vessels, to receive and take in the dew and influences of divine revelation. When God made that most memorable manifestation of himself, to the ancient Church, in giving the Law, we read how he terrified them, how he humbled and abased them: How dreadful was the preparation to the giving of the Law? The Apostle describes it, (Heb. 12. 18, 20, 21.) by blackness, and darkness, and tempest, so that they could not endure that which was commanded; and so terrible was the sight, that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake. I confess the Law in it self, was a terrible, a killing letter, and that which might well make the world shake, and men to tremble: If (as Luther saith) but one precept or sentence of the Law should be left in its full power and strength (mans sin) it would destroy mankind, and make all the world (because guilty) tremble and fall before it: yet it was not barely the matter of the Law revealed, which caused this trembling; that was written in the heart of man before, and was published to the Jews, with gracious, with Gospel-intentions; but it was the manner and circumstances wherein the Law was revealed, which were so terrible. And this terror had this great use, even the humbling of their souls to a willing subjection and obedience to the will of God. When God revealed the Gospel to Paul (as well as when he revealed the Law to Moses) he made Paul tremble (Acts 9.) Paul was smitten down to the ground; God laid him along, unhors'd him, when he came to manifest his Christ to, or (as himself speaks, Gal. 1. 16.) to reveal his Son in him. And this was to abase him, to break his heart, that he might be made up a chosen vessel, to carry the Name of God unto the Gentiles. And howsoever such humiliations are not of absolute necessity, yet they have been very usual, and are very useful. When the Lord hath laid the will and wisdom of man in the dust, when he hath made the strongest and stoutest to become as a child or a babe, to quake before him; then he takes him into his School of Instruction, and shews him such things, as none of the wise men, or Princes of this world ever knew; even such things as eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither have they entred into the heart of man. This made our Lord Jesus break out into that mixt rapture of gratulation and admiration, Mat. 11. 25. I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them to babes. Be as babes before God, and he will give you the wisdom of men; yea, of Angels. They who are high-built, and pinacl'd in their own conceits, seldom have the foundation or first principles of saving knowledge laid in them savingly.

Acts 9. 15.

Thirdly, From this effect of the vision, observe,

That, Fear is a strong and powerful passion.

Fear comes upon a man like a Giant: Fear (saith Eliphaz) came upon me, it came upon me violently. A man were as good meet a Bear robb'd of her whelps, as this Fear: The strongest man in the world cannot shake your bones as fear alone will, if that take hold of you. Some of the Greeks had such amazing thoughts of fear, it was so terrible to them, that to appease it, they worshipped it for a god; as some worshipped Sorrow among the Romans for a Goddess, under the name of Dea Angerona. The true God is called Fear in Scripture. And Fear was made an Idol-god among the Heathens: And if we consider these effects in the Text, trembling of the flesh, shaking of the bones, standing up of the hair, all which this sudden surprize of fear wrought upon Eliphaz, we must needs acknowledge and conclude it to be a very potent passion. In Prov. 1. the Lord threatens those who would not fear him, thus; I will laugh when your fear cometh: Then he shews how such fear cometh, when your fear cometh as desolation, Prov. 1. 27. We cannot well take fear in this place, for the object of fear, for that is desolation it self, and therefore cannot be said to come as desolation. Then, taking it properly, for the passion of fear, we see, that the fear of trouble is like the trouble we fear. Fear is even as bad as desolation: Fear pulls all down within, and makes a man like a desolate place, before his place is made desolate. And therefore in times of trouble, we had need take care that we add not strength to our fear. We should pray much that the power of natural fear may be subdued; especially, that our natural fear may be turned into godly fear: godly fear is the proper cure of natural fear. Sanctifie the Lord God in your hearts, and make him your fear, or else the fear of man will quickly Lord it over your hearts. Such a fear is more dangerous then all our dangers. Trembling joynts, and shaking bones, will make small resistance; and while natural fear is strong, natural strength is but weak or useless. When from the onset or assault of this fear, a mans hair stands, himself will run.

Aug. de civ. Dei. l. 4. c. 8.

Fourthly, Consider this by way of consequence, That if a time when God cometh to reveal his will to man, be so dreadful, what will that time be (and that time is coming) when God cometh to reckon with man for the disobeying of that will? Here a truth was but shewed Eliphaz in an extraordinary manner, and behold him shaking, fearing and trembling: Now when God shall come to require an account of man, for resisting or imprisoning the truth; when he shall come (2 Thes. 1. 8.) to take vengeance on all those that have not obeyed the Gospel of truth, what terror, fear and trembling will fall upon the stoutest of sinful men! There must be an appearing of all, but there can be no standing for such before the dreadful Throne of Christ. The ungodly (of what sort or size soever) shall not stand in judgment, Psal. 1. 5. Impenitent unbelievers shall not be able to hold up their heads in that day. Captains and mighty men, who have often convers'd with dangers, and knew not what it was to be afraid; men who (like the horse, described, Job 39. 72.) used to mock at fear, and would not turn back for drawn swords, or the glittering of shield or spear, shall at that day shake with fear, and hide themselves like little children. So much for the effects of the vision. Now follows a further description of the vision.

Verse 16. It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof, an Image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voyce, saying.

This verse containeth a second gesture of this Spirits appearing in the Vision to Eliphaz. The Spirit was passing before, here standing, as if he would present himself more fully to his view and observation. It stood still, an Image was before mine eyes; but though the Spirit gave Eliphaz this fair advantage, yet he made little use of it; for he saith, I could not discern the form of it, that is, I could make nothing of it distinctly; but when his eye gave him no help, his ear did; though he could not discern or distinguish the form of the Spirit appearing, yet he could distinguish the voyce of the Spirit speaking; there was silence, and I heard a voyce, saying.

It stood still.] To stand, in Scripture, imports, not alwayes a setled posture of the body; but it is taken sometime in a larger sence, to note our presence in any place, whether it be sitting, standing, or walking; as, Mat. 16. 26. Christ saith, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his Kingdom. Yet here the posture is conceived to be, an erect, setled, fixed posture; to the intent Eliphaz might have his eye more setled and fixed upon it, and likewise that his heart might be better prepared and fitted for the receiving of that message, which should be delivered unto him by it. When a man speaks, he usually makes a stand: An ambulatory speech, a speech in motion, is not so audible, nor so comly. In apparitions, this posture is frequently mentioned. When our Lord appeared to the Disciples after the Resurrection, Luke saith, he stood amongst them, chap. 24. 36. Zachary saw the Angel standing on the right side of the Altar, Luke 1. 11. And while the Apostles were looking up stedfastly to heaven, at the Ascension of Christ, Behold two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, &c. Acts 1. 10. Therefore also this Spirit being to speak, stood still.

I could not discern the form of it.] The face of it, so some read; the countenance or aspect of it, so others. They who rise from the dead, are not easily known by them that knew them living. When Christ arose (John 20.) it is said, that Mary, who was very well acquainted with him in his life, (though he stood by her) knew not that it was Jesus, but thought it had been the Gardner. When Christ walked with the Disciples to Emmaus, they knew him not; and there is a reason given, their eyes were held that they should not know him; a special act of Gods providence suspended their eye-sight, and took away (though not the power of seeing, yet) the power of discerning. God hath every sense so exactly in his own hand, that he can let it out, or call it back in any degree, as himself pleaseth; he can give a man so much power, as to see another, and not so much power as to discern him; which, by the way, is an argument of the wonderful exactness of Gods providence over us; he holds our senses in his hand, as well as our reason or our wills; and saith, thus far you shall see or hear, and no further; therefore it is said, ver. 31. that their eyes were opened; they were opened before to see him, but now they were opened to know him. And at other times when Christ appeared after his resurrection, his Disciples were at a stand whether it was he or no: Thomas, though he saw Christ before him, yet he would not believe it was he, until he had put his finger into the hole which the Spear made in his side; until he had assurance from another sense, he would not believe his eyes. If then a body arising from the grave, though it be seen, yet can hardly be distinguished by mortal eyes; how much less is the eye of man able to discern Angels and Spirits, cloathed in humane forms? The impressions of glory and immortality, which appear upon bodies assumed by Spirits, especially in sudden apparitions, do exceedingly master, if not astonish sense. The Heathens thought it absurd to say, that their gods could be known by face: for though they were so gross, as to satisfie themselves with bodily gods, yet they believed those bodies were so refined, had such a kind of Majestick Divinity stampt upon them, that a meer mortal could not comprehend them. Their doctrine shines a little into this text. A Spirit passed before Eliphaz, he had a sight of it, for it stood still, yet he could not make out what it was, or who it was; he could not discern the form thereof.

Ethnicis semper absurdum fuit, ut faciem deorum agnoscerent homines quam Deorum ἀοεγσίαν; Posteriores poetæ ab Homero, Homerus ab Ægyptiis, vel potius ex sacris sancti Moysis libris sumpsit. Bold.

An Image was before mine eyes.] The word Themounah, which we translate Image, is taken either for a visible or intellectual Image. Sometime it is taken for the form of a thing, which is apprehended visibly by the eye; so in Deut. 4. 15, 16. Take ye therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no manner of similitude, in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire) lest ye corrupt your selves, and make the similitude of any figure, that is, lest you make a visible image of the invisible God.

Secondly, The same word signifies an image in the mind. Thus God himself, who said in Deuteronomie, that they saw no similitude, and thereupon bade them take heed of making any similitude, saith of Moses, that the similitude of the Lord he shall behold, Numb. 21. 8. The word similitude in Numbers, is the same for Image in the text, an intellectual Image, a representation to the understanding. Moses had this priviledge, the similitude of God revealed to his understanding; but when he saith in Deut. ye had no similitude, the meaning is, no corporal, no visible similitude, no object of sense. This Image in the text, was not intellectual, for it was before his eyes: Nor was it the image of a Spirit gross'd into a body; but it was a Spirit in or with the imaginary form of a body.

Spectrum & visum vocant Latini quicquid corporea apparet forma licet corpus non sit.

There was silence, and I heard a voice, saying,] That is the last thing which the Text holds forth about this Vision.

There was silence.] The Hebrew thus, Silence, and I heard a voyce; we supply, there was. The readings are various, yet the sence one. I heard the voyce, as it were, of a gentle gale; I heard a gale, and a voyce, I heard a silent murmur. Our Translators put in the margin, I heard a still voyce; which comes near to that, I heard a silent voyce (by a usual figure) silence and a voyce, for a voyce of silence. If any should say, these two are so opposite, that they cannot be predicated or affirmed one of another. Silence is the direct contrary to a voyce, therefore to say there was a silent voyce, seemeth to be a contradiction in the adjunct: I answer, it is frequent to affirm contraries one of another, in an inferiour and remiss degree. Though we cannot say light is dark, yet we may say, this is a dark light; that is, a glimmering, imperfect, obscure light (Zech. 14. 6.) The day shall be neither clear nor dark; it shall be, as it were, a dark light. So a low voyce may well be called a silent voyce; I heard a silent voyce, that is, I heard a low or a still voyce speaking to me. Thus it suits well with what he said at ver. 12. Now a thing was secretly brought unto me. And we may further clear it by that, 1 Kings 19. 12. where the expression is of the same importance; here we have silence and a voyce; there, after the noise of a great wind, and an earthquake, it is said, that Elijah heard (as some render it) the voyce of a subtil, fine, slender, attenuated silence; or as we translate, a still small voyce, a sweet ravishing whisper, a voyce without a sound. Hence we have a kind of musick, which in our common language we call still musick.

A twofold reason may be given why the Lord spake (as it were) in silence. First, That the secret manner of speaking might be an argument, that the matter spoken was a secret, a mystery, not common or ordinary. Secondly, To dispose the hearer to receive it with more care, reverence, and attention. A man must set himself to hear with diligence, while another speaks with silence. A loud voyce finds us out, comes to us; but we must come to a low voyce, and find that out. When the Speaker takes least pains with his tongue, the Hearer must take most pains with his ear.

And this manner of speaking was used by the ancient heathen in their mysterious Oracles and Revelations. As when God revealed a secret, he spake secretly, and as it were, whispered those truths in the ear (whispering is speaking within one degree of silence;) so the Devil (who imitates God in what he can, that he may draw credit unto his own deceivings) is described in his instruments, to speak thus, Isa. 8. 19. When they shall say unto you, seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto Wizards that peep, and that mutter: They speak, as it were silently, they only whisper their diabolical incantations, and lying impostures. And, Isa. 29. Thou shalt be brought down, and shalt speak out of the ground, and thy speech shall be low out of the dust, and thy voyce shall be as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper out of the dust. The Prophet in this alludes to the manner of Witches and Enchanters, who had familiar spirits; which he here applies in a threat unto the people: The time shall come, that you shall be brought down by your enemies, that you shall speak out of the ground, you shall lie at their feet like poor captives, that cry submissively and pitifully for quarter, Oh mercy mercy, spare my life: That is the the thing aimed at by the Prophet, that God would abase them so before their enemies, that they should whisper out of the ground to their enemies for pity, as a Witch whispers from the ground to her miserable Clients who come for counsel. Tertullian in his Apologetick, describes the heathen Magicians thus, they speak belching and gasping, humming and hawing, rather then speaking. The old Poet calls this Poppysm; by which word he shews how their Idol-Prophets answered the deluded people, their miserable Clients, when they came for counsel. To which the Hebrew word Tsiphtsaph, used by Isaiah, chap. 8. before-cited, is very like, both in sound and sence.

—Sortes ducent, frōtemque, manumque. Præbebit vati crebrū poppysma petenti. Juvenal. Auruspices צפצף de circo ex oris pressi sono, quod Poppysmà dicitur, futura colligebant.

There is yet another interpretation of these words, more proper and answerable to our translation. There was silence, and I heard a voyce, saying.] This refers the silence to Eliphaz, as a preparation to his hearing the voyce; there was silence, that is, I stood still, and spake never a word, but waited to hear what should be spoken; I was silent, and all things about me were husht and silent too: Then I heard a voyce; & so Junius glosses, because (saith he) compos'd and strengthened a little, after my former fear, I attended silently to the Spirit, that I might hear what should be spoken unto me.

Me continebam tacitus expectans revelationē.

We read, Rev. 8. 1. that there was silence in heaven for half an hour; and ver. 5. we read of voyces and thundrings; before those great voyces, there was great silence: Usually before great speaking, there is great silence; I was silent, and all were husht; then I heard a voyce: silence prepares for audience. In Congregations, before the Preacher begins, all hold their peace: In Courts of Justice, when the Judge is to speak, the Crier calls for silence. It was an usual word amongst the Rites of the Heathen, Favour your tongues, or spare your speech, when the mysteries of their superstitions were revealed: We may take the present Text in this sence; that Eliphaz set himself in a silent posture, to attend the message which was to be revealed unto him: There was silence, and I heard a voyce, saying.

Favete linguis.

If we take the former interpretation, then, forasmuch as Eliphaz after those terrors and tremblings, the shaking of his bones, and standing up of his hair, the confused form of a Spirit, and an amazing image before his eyes; forasmuch (I say) as after all these, he hears a still silent voyce, we may observe,

That, God, after terrors, usually sends in comforts and refreshings.

God, having terrified Elijah, by a mighty rushing wind, (in the vision before-noted) by an earthquake which brake the Rocks, and by a fire; then comes (as here in the text) a still small voyce, a voyce of silence, and God was in that voyce. It is put as a principal distinction amongst the Ancients, cients, to know, whether a revelation were from a good Angel, or from a bad Angel. When a revelation was made by a good Angel, though he fill'd the heart with fear, at the beginning of his ſpeech, yet he gave comfort in the end, and cloſed with conſolation. We may obſerve in thoſe revelations, ſuch heartning, cheering language as this, Be not afraid, be of good cheer; ſo to Daniel, ſo to John, ſo to Zachariah, ſo to Mary, ſo to Gideon. But when a revelation was made by an evil Angel, or by a Witch, as it filled the hearers with fear, ſo it left them full of fear; it wounded them with terrors, and it applied no cure, no plaiſter, nothing medicinable to heal thoſe terrors. We find indeed (1 Sam. 28.) that when Saul conſulted the Witch of Endor, as ſoon as the Spirit appeared, it is ſaid, that the Witch her ſelf was afraid, and there is no mention made of Saul's being afraid at the firſt; ſo that Saul falls a comforting the Witch, and ſaid to her, Be not afraid: She was afraid, not of the Spirit that appeared, but of Saul, becauſe he had made a Law againſt Witches; and hence Saul comforts her, in aſſurance of impunity, notwithſtanding that ſin, both againſt the Law of God, and his own. But you ſhall find in how ſad a condition Saul himſelf was, before the Devil had done with him; for, as ſoon as Saul heard the tidings delivered by that perſonated Samuel, he fell into a ſhaking fit, and was as one aſtoniſhed and dead; hanging upon the rack of theſe torments, the Devil left him; there was no word of comfort, no ſweet ſtill muſical voyce to revive and fetch him again, but away packs the wicked Spirit, and leaves him overwhelmed with ſorrow. And then (in ſtead of a better, ſurely he could not have a worſe) the poor Witch comes to comfort and counſel him. They who refuſe counſel from the Prophets of God, may at laſt be forced to receive all their comfort from a Witch, a Prophet or Propheteſs of the Devil. But to the point in hand; we ſee, when the Devil and wicked Angels ſpeak terror, they leave terror; whereas, if God, by good Angels, ſpeaks terror, or affrights his people with the tokens of his preſence, he with a ſweet and ſtill voice refreſhes and comforts them before he departs.

And we may in that general apply it to our ſelves: That when God aſtoniſhes and terrifies us, when he makes our bones to ſhake, and rottenneſs to enter into them, we may expect comfort and refreſhing are at hand; and we may build upon it, that the more we tremble, the more we ſhall be refreſhed: Habakkuk in the place before-cited, is expreſs in this faith, I trembled, that I might have reſt in the day of trouble: to which he adds, when he cometh up to the people (he will invade or cut them in pieces) with his troops. As intimating, that they who will not tremble, ſhall be made to tremble; but when we actively labour to make our hearts tremble, or when God makes us tremble in ſuch a way as this, we may build upon it, that we ſhall reſt in the day of trouble, at leaſt we ſhall reſt in the end of that day: God never leaves his people under a cloud; he takes off trouble, and brings in a ſucceſſion of comfort, or conquers the trouble by mingling a prevailing portion of comfort with it.

If we take the Text in the latter ſence, we may note,

That, Silence becomes man, when God ſpeaks.

Speak Lord (ſaith Samuel) for thy ſervant heareth. Hear, O ſervant, for thy Lord ſpeaketh.

Silence prepares the heart to learn: Pythagoras commanded his Scholars to keep ſilence five years. And the Papiſts impoſe ſilence, as a part of Diſcipline, upon their Novices. Let Superſtition be avoided, and then ſilence is fitteſt for learners, unleſs their voyce be an enquiry after learning. That which the Apoſtle ſpeaks, reſpecting women in the Church, is true of all in the ſence I now ſpeak of, 1 Tim. 2. 12. Let the woman learn in ſilence; ſo let the man learn in ſilence. Silence is good as a preparative to learning, but wo to that which is an hinderance to inſtructing.

VERS. 17.

Shall mortal man be more juſt then God? ſhall a man be more pure then his maker?

IN this Verſe we have the Argument it ſelf, or the matter revealed in the former Viſion: There was ſilence, and I heard a voyce, ſaying: What that voice ſaid, we have in theſe words, Shall mortal man be more juſt then God? This is the Theme or Subject, upon which Eliphaz argued; and it is the main Propoſition of the whole Context. The proof of this Propoſition was given from divine authority, in the foregoing words; and we have a proof from reaſon, in the following part of this Chapter.

Shall mortal man be more juſt then God? Or, Shall man be juſtified in compariſon of God? Or, Shall man be juſt before God? The Chaldee Paraphraſe is yet more quick; the Spirit cried out, and ſaid, Can it poſſibly be, that man ſhould be more pure then God?

Numquid homo Dei comparatione juſtificabitur? Vulg.

ἐβόα τὸ πνεῦμα καὶ ἔλεγεν τίς; Sept. Clamabat & dicebat, fierine poteſt ut homo quam Deus purior ſit? Chald.

The words are propounded by way of queſtion; we may reſolve them into this negative propoſition, Mortal man is not more juſt then God, man is not more pure then his Maker.

We tranſlate Mortal man, the Hebrew is but one word; yet in the propriety of that Language, it contains both, noting man with an addition (ſuch as it is) of weakneſs & frailty, the meaneſt & loweſt eſtate of man; Enoſh, a poor, ſick, weak, dying creature, a creature of ſo little hope, that ſome derive this name, in the Hebrew, from deſperation; a creature ſo unworthy to be remembred by God, or ſo ready to forget God, that others derive it from a word which ſignifies forgetfulneſs, or to forget.

אֱנוֹשׁ Miſer ærumnis & peccatis obnoxius.

אֱנוֹשׁ quaſi נִיאֵשׁ in qua ſenſu deſperandi Euſebius a נָשָׁה deducit, quod oblivioſi ſignificat, & interpretetur, quaſi animal oblivioſum dicas. Druſ.

Shall man, this mortal man, this weak creature, be more juſt, or, be juſtified rather then God? Such a ſence the words carry. When man and God are compared together, ſhall God be eſteemed leſs juſt, or leſs pure then man? (Luke 68. 18.) it is ſaid of the Publican, that he went down juſtified rather then the other; put the Phariſee and the Publican in the ballance together, and the Publican was the weightier in righteouſneſs, or the more juſt of the two. That in Luke, is an Hebraiſm, and it is the ſame with this. Put weak man and the mighty God (the word Eloah) which is here uſed for God, noteth the ſtrong God, or the mighty God) put him in the ballance of conſideration with weak man, will he not be infinitely more weighty in juſtice, more ſhining in purity, more glorious in holineſs.

Min eſt cõparandi particula; comparatio exprimitur per præpoſitionem ultimi caſus, juſtificatus ab illo, i. e. præ illo. Luk. 18.14.

Yea, not only if you take man in his obſcureſt notion, or in this term of extenuation, Enoſh, for a weak man, a poor cripled creeping creature; but take him in his beſt eſtate, as he is (Geber) a ſtrong man, a powerful man, a holy man; yet as it follows in the Text, Shall man be more pure then his Maker? that is, ſhall ſuch a mighty man, a wiſe man, a learned man, a gracious man, a man accompliſhed in all natural, in all acquired endowments, the chiefeſt and choiceſt, the cream and flower of all the men upon the face of the earth, a Worthy of the firſt three, the firſt of all the Worthies, a man of the firſt magnitude, of the higheſt elevation, both in parts, gifts and graces, ſhall he be more pure then his Maker? Chriſt (as incarnate or made man) is called the Mighty God (Iſa 9. 6.) God made a mighty man, or man becoming the mighty God. The Chaldee calls all Giants, Gibbaraja; and Nimrod, the firſt of the Giants, was called by this name, a mighty hunter before the Lord, Gen. 10. 8. So then, let man be never ſo excellent, his excellency is baſeneſs; let him be never ſo ſtrong, ſo wiſe, ſo holy, he is but weak, fooliſh, filthy, compared with him who made him. Leave your Enoſh, your weakling, your poor ſick creatures; bring forth your Gebers, your beſt, they are as nothing, yea, leſs then nothing before the Lord. Shall mortal man be more juſt then God? Shall man (the beſt of men) be more pure then his Maker?

We are to mark the double oppoſition of the Text. Here is, firſt, mortal, weak, ſick man, ſet in oppoſition to the ſtrong, the mighty, the all-powerful God. And then in the ſecond place, the oppoſition is between the ſtrongeſt, the beſt, the holieſt, the wiſeſt of men, and the maker of all men. Shall mortal man, or ſhall the beſt of men be more juſt, more pure then God their Maker? There is a threefold ſence, which we may give of the words joyntly.

Firſt, They are a denial of all compariſon between God and man. No man may compare himſelf with God. Shall mortal

mortal man? that is, mortal man ought not to be so bold and daring as to venture upon such a thing as this, to stand upon terms of equality with the mighty, the great, the glorious God, the Maker of all, as the Apostle resolves in his own case, (1 Cor. 4. 4.) Though I know nothing by my self, yet am I not hereby justified at all; much less, though a man know nothing by himself, will this justifie him in this comparison, that he is just, as God is just.

But secondly, Shall mortal man be more just then God? It is as if he had said, God who is infinite in justice, would never do that which a just man will not do; God who is infinite in power, would never do that which a weak man would not do, shall weak man be more just then God? And so we may form the Argument, thus:

No man, no Judge is more just or incorrupt then God, who is the supream and Lord chief Justice of all men. But there is no just Judge amongst men who will punish an innocent man; therefore God doth not punish any one that is innocent. The consequence or inference is plain and clear, for God himself should either be unjust, or he should be less just then man is, if he should do that which a just man upon true grounds would refuse to do. Therefore in Gen. 18. Abraham pleads with God under that title of a just Judge, Shall not the Judge of all the world do right? As if he should say, faithful Judges upon the earth will do right, therefore surely he that is the Judge of all the earth will do right. So Eliphaz here to Job, never complain as if God had done thee wrong, for certainly the just God will not do that which a just man would not do: The word, whereby God is expresst (Eloah) doth well comply with, and answer this sence, it being properly attributed to God as a judge, the great Arbitrator and Determiner of all the causes and cases of all men in the world. Shall mortal man be more just then God?

Eloah derotat judicem, & æquissimum verum arbitrum.

Thirdly, The sence may be taken thus, If any man should come to implead God, or to plead with God, if any should dare to tax the Justice of God, or be so hardy to put in a bill of complaint against him; shall this man, this weak man be found more just in his complaining, then God hath been in sentencing? Shall his bill of complaint be better grounded then the Lords award of Judgment? It is an allusion to those, who supposing they have wrong, complain against the Judge, and say, that he hath erred in, or perverted judgment; That word (Justified) here used, shall man be justified before God? Is a Judiciary word, a Court or Law term; The same word, which the Holy Ghost uses, in that great work of Free Grace, the justification of a sinner before God; and that imports the declaring and setting forth of a man to be righteous, and his cause good in Jesus Christ, whereupon he is cleared and acquitted. When Satan accuses or pleads against us, laying such and such sins to our charge; thus and thus this man hath offended: then God is said to justifie a man, that is, to declare him to be just, his sins being covered, and himself accepted in Jesus Christ. Hence that divine challenge to all accusers, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods elect, it is God that justifieth, Rom. 8. 33.

So now, if man should accuse and complain against God, he hath done thus and thus in the world, afflicted a Job, troubled a righteous person; shall mortal man be more just then God? Shall this man in his complaint be justified? Shall not God rather be justified, against whom he complains? Certainly he shall. God shall be declared just, yea, he shall be declared just by man. A man un-ingaged and rightly principled, Such a man shall say, verily there is a God that judgeth the earth. In the judgment of man, that judgment shall speak a God; and all shall be forced to Daniels mourning acknowledgment, O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of face, Dan. 9. 7, 9. We may enlighten it further by that of David, (Psal. 51. 4.) where he professes thus, I will confess my sins, &c. that thou mayest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest: As if he should say, if hereafter thou shalt afflict me, and lay thy rod upon me, I know many will be ready to complain, and say, why doth God thus, why doth he afflict David, David a holy man, a man after his own heart; a man of whom he hath given such a large testimony, of whom he hath said, I have found a man after my own heart? Now to the intent all these may be cast in their suits, and answered in their complainings, I here acknowledge before all the world, that I have sinned greatly; and therefore, though thou hast pardoned my sin, and so wilt never charge it upon me to condemnation, nor punish me for it in a way of satisfaction; yet hereafter thou mayst in thy fatherly wisdom, see it needful to chastise me, to prevent and purge out sin, or to help me against the weakness of my nature, and the strength of temptation for the time to come. So here in the Text, Shall man be justified before God? If Job, or any of his friends for him, should complain against God, why he being one commended and approved from the mouth of God, for a man perfect and upright, should be thus afflicted; what? Shall weak Job be justified before God? Yea, though Job be considered in his greatest flourishings of grace, and highest pitch of his prosperity, as he was Geber indeed, the greatest, the mightiest man in the Eastern world, yet shall he be more pure then his Maker? No, cease your complainings, God is just, and his honour must be vindicated, in what he doth, or in what he shall do against the weakest, or against the mightiest, against the meanest or against the best of men. God will be found just, and man a lyar.

Either of these three sences are fair from the construction of the Text, and may be profitable for us; I shall therefore draw them down into five or six conclusions, which will be at least a portion of that marrow and fatness, which this Scripture yields us to feed upon.

First, We may Observe, That, man naturally preferreth himself not only above other men, but even before God himself.

A principle of pride dwels in our hearts by nature, which at some times, and in some cases, breeds better thoughts in us of our selves, then of God himself. And it is this height of spirit, which the heavenly vision here would level to the ground. We know it was the first sin of man, that man desired to be like God, Gen. 3. The first temptation was baited with a parity to Divine powers, Ye shall be as Gods knowing good and evil. This also was the language of Lucifers heart; Thou hast said in thy heart, I will ascend into Heaven, I will exalt my throne above the Stars of God, I will ascend above the heights of the Clouds, I will be like the most high, Isa. 14. 13, 14. And the practise of the man of sin, is thus propheſied, That he shall exalt himself above all that is called God, 2 Thes. 2. 4. But the heart of man is yet more mad, and hath out-grown those sinful principles. For in troubles and temptations, when things go not according to his mind, he sometimes hath thoughts, not only that he is like God, but that he is more just then God; and if he had the ordering of things, he would order them better then God: he sometime thinks himself juster then God, and if he had the punishing of offenders, justice should proceed more freely and impartially then it doth: which is upon the matter, not only to exalt himself (as the Man of Sin doth) above Nuncupative Gods, or all that is called God, but to exalt himself above him who is God by nature, above the only one-most God: Even to speak in this Dialect of highest blasphemy, that he is more just then God, more pure then his Maker.

Secondly, Take this Conclusion, That, it is a most high presumption, not only for low weak man, but for the best, the highest of men, to compare themselves with God, or to have any thoughts concerning his wayes, as if they could mend them.

When God calls us to amend our wayes, for us to presume we could amend Gods wayes, is the very top branch, the highest tower, yea, the most towring Pinnacle of presumption. We say amongst men, that comparisons are odious; but this is the most odious comparison of all, for a man to compare himself with God, his thoughts with Gods thoughts, what he hath done or would do, with what God doth.

If you consider the terms of opposition that are in the Text, this conclusion will be more clear unto you. Consider how Enosh, weak mortal man is opposite to Eloah, the mighty, the strong God: it is presumption for a weak man to compare with a strong man; what presumption is it then, for a weak man to compare with the mighty God? For a Reed to compare in strength with a Rock? For darkness to compare with light? For a Cloud to compare with the the Sun? For death to compare with life? For folly to compare with wisdom? For uncleanness to compare with holiness? For nothing to compare with all, how presumptuous? Will ye provoke the Lord? (saith the Apostle, 1 Cor. 10.) are ye stronger then he? It implies, that some such thoughts lodge in man, as if he could make his party good with God, or might be stronger then he. And it is equal folly in us, and provocation against the Lord, to think our selves juster, as to think our selves stronger then he.

And then mark the other terms of opposition; Man and his Maker: Shall the great man, compare with, or be more pure then his Maker? As if he should say, How great and excellent soever this man is, he was made, and made by God, with whom he thus compares, then whom he thinks himself more pure. And shall the thing formed stand upon terms with him that formed it? Shall the potsheard or the pot contend with the Potter? What though it be an excellent vessel, a vessel determined for the most excellent ends and uses? Yet whatsoever it is, it was made to be, and made to be by God, both in its constitution and uses: Shall it then boast it self against its maker? The Lord made Geber as well as Enosh, the strong man, as well as the weak: the wise and learned man as well as the foolish and ignorant, the Noble as well as the base, the holy and righteous, as well as the wicked and prophane: In a word, the vessels of honour are as much, yea more of his making then the vessels of dishonour; shall they then be more pure then their maker? Hath the Lord given more to others then he hath in himself? Hath he made a creature his Superiour, or his Peer? Hath his bounty impaired his own stock, or hath he made man more then God? That God hath made the best out of the dust, is enough to lay all our pride and boasting as low as the dust. That, what we are, we are from another, should ever keep us humble in our selves.

Thirdly, Take this Conclusion, That, God in himself is most just and pure.

Shall mortal man be more just then God? The question hath this position in it, that God is infinitely just, infinitely pure, therefore he is perfectly pure, perfectly just. God is essential Justice, essential purity; Justice and purity are not qualities in God, but they are his very nature: A man may be a man, and yet be unjust; but God cannot be God and be unjust: A man may be a man, and yet impure; but God cannot be God, and be impure; so that Justice and purity are not qualities or accidents in God, but his very essence and being; destroy or deny the purity and justice of God, and you put God out of the world, as much as in you lies: for he cannot be God, unless he be both just to others, and pure in himself.

Fourthly, Take this Conclusion, The best men compared with God are evil, and the holiest are impure.

Not only is it presumption, but a lie, for men to compare with God; shall mortal man be more just then God? It is as if he should say, man hath no justice at all compared with God, shall man be more pure then his Maker? Man compared with his Maker, hath no purity at all, not so much as a name or a shadow of justice and purity, compared with God: though it be somewhat in it self, yet it is nothing before him: In thy sight, or before thee, shall no flesh living be justified, or be just. All that righteousness and purity which God hath put into the creature, is but as the light of a candle, to the light of the Sun: the candle hath no light in it, compared to the Sun; the candle enlightens the night, but a thousand candles cannot a day, or make the day lighter then it is; Sun-light overcomes and swallows up candle-light: The Stars help us to see in the dark, but in the bright day time the Stars themselves cannot be seen: so all creature purity disappears and vanisheth, when once we look upon the purity of God, who is light, and in whom there is no darkness at all. The Apostle Paul hath a parallel expression (2 Cor. 3. 10.) speaking of the administration of the Jewish, ceremonial, earthly shadows, and the administration of light in Gospel heavenly ordinances; Even that which was made glorious, had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth: I do not deny (saith he) but there was great glory in the Jewish Church; Gods institution stampt excellency upon the worship of the Jewes; their Ceremonies were made glorious; but if you will compare Jewish worship to Christian worship, it hath no glory in it all; that which was made glorious, had no glory, by reason of the glory that excelleth, this is Gospel glory. So we may say, man who was made glorious, man who was made gracious and just, hath no grace, no justice, no glory in him, in comparison of that glory which doth excel; namely that justice and purity which is in God. God is so true, that all men are liars, Rom. 3. 4. So righteous, that all mens righteousnesse are a filthy rag, Isa. 64. 6. Man, who is just by participation from God, is not just in comparison of God.

Humana justitia divinæ comparata injustitia est; quia & lucerna in tenebris fulgere cernitur, sed in solis radio posita tenebratur. Greg.

Cujus participatione justi sunt, ejus comparatione nec justi sunt. Aug. lib. ad Orosium. c. 10.

The fifth Conclusion is this, and it is the principal point, which we are to receive and attend from this Text.

God is so just, so pure in himself, that he neither doth nor can do wrong to any creature.

In this truth, Eliphaz aimes to instruct Job chiefly; for he supposed, that Job had complained of God, as if he had done him wrong, wherefore he speaks reprovingly and chidingly, shall mortal man be more just then God? as if he should say, art thou so gross as to charge God with doing thee an injury? It is impossible that God should do any man wrong; (de Facto) he doth no man wrong, and (de Posse) he cannot wrong any man. The power of God is seen most in this, that he cannot do any evil; This impotency (if we may so call it) is the strength of God; yea the omnipotency of God consists in this, that he can do no wrong. We have a Maxime of State amongst us, (and it is the glory of the Kings of this Nation) we say, The King can do no wrong; but it is not to be understood as this, God can do no wrong; we know Kings are men, and that's enough to prove they may do wrong: As to say, the Lord is God, is enough to prove, that he cannot. Princes have a natural power to do evil; but which is his glory, God hath not. The meaning then is, the King hath not any civil power to do wrong; the Law hath so bounded, ordered, and directed him; the constitution of the Kingdom hath given him the advice of Parliaments and Counsellours, the assistance of Judges and Officers, he acts all by others: so that the failings of his Ministers do the Subject wrong, the regal power doth it not. But when we speak thus of God, we mean it of his natural power, which being essentially and infinitely just and good, as well as soveraign and supreme; there is not the least imaginable seed in him, which would be procreative of the least injustice: Therefore the Scripture describes the Lord, just and holy, not only in his nature, but in all his works and wayes, Psal. 145. 17. The Lord is righteous in all his wayes, and holy in all his workes. And this implies, not only that all the wayes wherein the Lord walks, are righteous; and the works he doth, holy: but that he can go in no way but a righteous way, nor do any work in the creature, but a work of holiness. Not only is that just and holy, which the Lord doth, but let the Lord do what he will, that will be just and holy.

And here give me leave, somewhat to enlarge this, and plead for God against some objections, which are made by the men of the world, and some temptations which Satan will urge strongly upon the hearts of those, who fear God; by which (possibly) they may be so entangled and gravel'd, that they know not how to extricate themselves, or make out the Justice of God in his administrations towards men.

For first it will be objected, Is God so just, that he neither doth nor can do injustice to the creature? How comes it to pass, that both the righteous and the wicked fall under the same judgment: if the judgment be right upon a wicked man, surely it cannot be right upon the righteous man: Is God righteous and just, when they who differ as much as Heaven and Hell, as light and darkness, do yet meet (as it were) under the same act of God, and are wrapt together in the same sentence? If it be Justice upon the wicked, if it be their portion, how can it be the portion of the righteous, or an award of Justice upon them? As Abraham pleaded with God (Gen. 18. 25.) Shall the righteous be slain or perish, with the wicked? that be far from thee to do in this manner; shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? as if he should say, if thou doest involve a just man and a wicked man in one and the same judgment, this is not to do as a righteous Judge, far be it from thee to do such such a thing. Yet we see in frequent experiences, that the same judgment falleth upon the righteous and the wicked; By Sword, Famine, Pestilence, by Storms at Sea, and Enemies at Land, both are overtaken and fall together. Is this unerring Justice?

Justitia est suum cuique tribuere.

Justice is to give every one his portion, his due: And God hath given this exact distribution in charge to the Prophet, he must say so, and will not the Lord do so? (Isa. 3. 10, 11.) Say ye to the righteous, it shall be well with them, for they shall eat the fruit of their doings; woe unto the wicked, it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given him: But how do the dispensations of God answer this direction to man, when his providence seems to huddle up all together, to make the same portion serve, both to the righteous and the wicked?

I Answer it first in the general, and then in some particulars. In the general, the troubles of the righteous are good for them, and therefore they have that which is promised; God saith, say to the righteous it shall be well with him: when a righteous man is troubled, it is well with him; therefore he hath that which God promised him: and when a wicked man prospereth, it is ill with him; therefore he hath that which God threatneth against him. Outward mercy is judgment to wicked men, and their prosperity is their undoing: therefore, do not think that God varies a tittle from the tenour of his word, when he saith, it shall be ill with wicked men, and yet you see them prosper; for it is never worse with them, then when they prosper, then when they think it is best, and when the world thinks so too; the prosperity of fools shall destroy them; and what prosperity is there in destruction? The meat in their mouthes is as a sword in their bowels. If you saw the Lord formally sending a Sword to devour wicked men, you would think it justice: the prosperity of wicked men is as sharp as a Sword; that can but destroy, and so doth this; It is their judgment that they are without judgments, and not to be smitten, is their scourge.

Prov. 1.

Now more particularly to answer this objection about the justice of God; and it will be but needful, considering the times we live in, threaten us with a common deluge, or an overflowing scourge, which may sweep away both good and bad together.

First, In reference to the godly. Are they in a sad estate outwardly? are they in great afflictions? I answer, though they are afflicted, yet they prosper. When they are impoverished, they are enriched; when they are as having nothing, they possess all things. What is there? what can there be, even in their saddest estate, which doth not conduce to their good, which will not be a benefit unto them?

For first, Their troubles are but trials; now is there any hurt in a trial, or perturbation in a probation? Troubles try their graces, and their corruptions too. Trouble tries grace that it may be honour'd, and corruption that it may be mortified; there is no hurt in all this, rather it is a most happy condition, which makes grace conspicuous, whereby a mans best side, his inside (wherein his glory lies, The Kings Daughter is all glorious within) is turned outward. That Scripture (Dan. 11. 33, 34, 35.) is very pregnant to the point in hand; where the Prophet foretelling troublesome times, saith, They that understand amongst the people, shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, and captivity, and by spoil many dayes: They that understand, that is, godly men, shall fall by these judgments, some of them by the sword, they shall utterly be cut off; some by flame, they shall be burnt to ashes: others by captivity and by spoil, their estates shall be plundred, their persons imprisoned. How doth this answer the Justice of God (will carnal reason object) that it shall be thus ill with the righteous, to whom the Lord promiseth it shall be well? Yes, well enough. For it followeth, Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help, and some of them of understanding shall fall (that is by captivity, and by spoil) to try them, and to purge them, and to make them white. Here are two remarkable ends, why they of understanding fall into these evils. First for probation, to try them. Secondly, for cleansing and purgation, to purge them and make them white. Gold is never wrong'd by being tryed. A spotted garment, a distemper'd body are not damnified by washing or by purging. To be freed from filth without, and bad humours within the body, is more then a common favour. How high an act of favour then is it, to have ill humours and filthy spots washed, purged out of the soul? Such base humours a good man may have, as call for these strong working pils, Spoiling and Captivity, to cast them out. Now those men of understanding have no more hurt intended them by God, when they fall into spoilers hands, then when a diseased body falls into a Physitians hand, or when a defiled garment fals into a Fullers hand; sc. to purge and make them white. Affliction is a cleanser. Christ is the only Lavatory, and his blood the only Fountain to wash away the guilt of sin; yet God hath other Fountains and Lavatories, to wash away the pollution of sin: That blood cleanses in this sence also, principally; and all the waters or fires of affliction have no efficacy at all, to refine or cleanse, but in vertue of that blood. A Cross without a Christ, never made any man better: But with Christ, all are made better by the Cross. We may then say at least, that it is well with the righteous in affliction, forasmuch as (through the blessing of God) they are bettered by affliction. When you see a godly man cast out into the open air, and having the waters of sorrow powred continually upon him, know that he is only laid out a whitening, and will appear shortly more resplendent then ever.

Secondly, Afflictions are sent to humble. Pride is such a weed, as often grows in the best soyle: Now that which humbleth us, cannot hurt us; we lose nothing by the abatements of our Pride: no, the more pride loses, the more we gain. And we seldom or never lose any thing, but by pride. Now saith God, Deut. 8. 1. If you would have an account, why I brought my people about in the wilderness, through so many difficulties, know, this was my design, it was to humble them. God resists pride whersoever he finds it; (they in whom pride totally prevails, are Gods enemies, and he resists them) they in whom pride hath some, yea great prevalency, may be Gods friends, and God will resist pride in them; the difference is observable between resisting of pride, and resisting the proud; the resisting of the person, and the resisting of the sin. The great resistance which God makes against the pride of mans heart, is by the rods of affliction; he whips them into humility, and by taking away carnal comforts, takes them off from carnal confidence. And O blessed affliction which makes us less to our selves, and all creatures less to us. We are never so much in Gods eye, as when we are least in our own: nor have we ever so much of God, as when we expect little, or least from man; say therefore it is well with the righteous, when they are in the deeps of affliction; for it is but to bring them off their Mountains of pride, that they may be exalted in the strength and love of God, even upon the Mountain of his Holiness, and their glory for ever.

Thirdly, Afflictions bring the Saints nearer to God. Troubles abroad cause the soul to look inwards and homewards. Is there any hurt in being brought nearer to God? It is good for me to draw near unto God, says David; and it is good for us to be drawn near unto God, if we will not come of our selves: It is a desirable violence, which compels us heaven-ward. Heaven is but our nearest being unto God; and by how much we are nearer God on earth, so much the more we have of Heaven, upon earth. Afflictions (as in the prodigals example) put us upon thoughts of returning to God; and the more we return, the nearer we are unto him; returning thoughts will not rest, but under our fathers roof: yea, returning thoughts will not rest, till we are got into our fathers armes, or under the shadow of his wing, and this is a happy condition indeed; as it was with Noahs Dove (Gen. 8. 9.) when she was sent forth of the Ark, she could find no place for the soal of her foot to rest on; she knew not whither to go, for the waters were on the face of the whole earth; therefore she returneth back, and comes hovering about the Ark, as desiring to be taken in: but after the waters were asswaged, he sent out a Dove, which returned to him no more. So when it is fair weather in the world, calm and serene, even Doves keep off from God; and though they go not quite away from him, yet they are not so desirous of coming to him; but when we find a deluge in the world, such storms and tempests of trouble, that we know not where to fix our souls for a day, then we come as the Dove fluttering about the Ark, and cry to our Eternal Noah, that we may be near him, yea, within, with him. Wicked men (like the Raven, which Noah sent out first, ver. 7. and returned not again) care not for the Ark of Gods presence in the greatest troubles; to be near God, is more troublesom to them, then all their troubles. But Believers, like the Dove, will look home (at least) in foul weather: God is their chief friend at all times, and their only friend in sad times. Is there any harm in this? Christ sends a storm, but to draw his back to the Ark, that, at the last, where he is, there they may be also.

Lastly, We may say it is well with the righteous in their worst condition of outward trouble, because God is with them: It can never be ill with that man, with whom God is. It is infinitely more to say, I will be with thee, then to say, peace is with thee, health is with thee, credit is with thee, honour is with thee. To say, God is with thee, is all these, and infinitely more: for in these you have but a particular good, in God you have all good. When God sayes I will be with you, you may make what you will out of it; sit down and imagine with your selves whatsoever good you can desire, and it is all comprehended in this one word, I will be with thee. Now God who is with the righteous at all times, is most with them in worst times; then he saith in a special seuce, I will be with thee. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt, &c. Isa. 43. 2. When a mighty wind passed before Eliah, it is said, that God was not in the wind; and when the Earthquake shook the hills, and a consuming fire appeared, it is said, God was not in the earthquake, nor in the fire. God joynes not with outward troubles for the terror of his people, but he joynes with outward troubles for the comfort of his people. So he is in the fire, and in the wind and in the Earthquake, and his presence makes the fire but as a warm Sun; the stormy wind, a refreshing gale, and the earthquake, but a pleasant dance.

So much for the removing of this objection, and clearing up the justice of God, respecting the afflictions of the righteous.

If any shall look on the other hand, upon wicked men, as if God came not home in his justice, while he suffers them to prosper.

First, I answer, Their prosperity serves the providence of God, and therefore it doth not cross his justice. That was Nebuchadnezzar's case (Isa. 10. 6.) I will send him (saith God) against an hypocritical nation: so then he must prosper, while he goes upon Gods errand; but mark what follows (ver. 12.) It shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon Mount Zion, &c. by Nebuchadnezzar's power, (who was but doing the just work of God, while he thought ambitiously of doing his own) now it is no injustice for God, to give an instrument power to do his work (and when his bloody lust hath performed the holy work of God, you shall see the Lord will take an order with him speedily; for) then, saith the Lord, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the King of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks. God let him alone to do the work he had set him about; and it was a righteous work of God upon his people, though Nebuchadnezzar went about it with a proud and malicious spirit against his people.

Secondly, The prosperity of wicked men serveth them, to shew how wicked and vile they are, to act and publish the seven abominations of their own hearts. Now as it is one of the greatest mercies under heaven, for a man to have his lusts quite mortified, so it is a very great mercy, for a man to have his lusts but restrained. It is a mercy, for a man to have that fewel taken away from his corruptions, upon which they feed; therefore it must needs be wrath and judgment upon wicked men, when God, in stead of restraining their lusts, giveth them opportunity to enlarge their lusts, and layes the reins on their neck, to run whither and which way they please, without stop or control. This is wrath, and high wrath, a sore judgment, the sorest judgment that can fall upon them: Wherefore when we think they are in a most prosperous condition, they are in the most dreadful condition; they are but filling themselves with sin, and fitting themselves for destruction. Many Many a mans lusts are altogether unmortified, which yet are chill'd and over-awed by judgments. And there is more judgment in having liberty to commit one sin, then in being shut up under the iron bars and adamantine necessities of a thousand judgments. He that is Satans treasury for sin, shall be Gods treasury for wrath.

Thirdly, Their prosperity is the judiciary hardning of their hearts: and a hard heart is the greatest judgment on this side hell: As there is a naturally inbred and sinfully acquired hard heart, so there is a judicially hardened, or a divinely inflicted hard heart. When to a natural hard heart, and an acquired hard heart, which men get by many repeated acts of sin, the Lord adds a judicially hardened, or inflicted hard heart, then wrath is heated to the hottest, and judgment is within one step of hell. Especially if we consider, that every hour of such prosperous impenitence, and hardness of heart increases punishment, and adds to the treasury of that wrath, which is stored up against the day of wrath, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. Who thinks that man happy, who is let alone only to gather a mighty pile of wood, and other fewel of flames, to burn himself? While ungodly men seem to the world to be gathering riches, honour and pleasure, they are but gathering a heap of wrath, and a pile of fire; which, at the last, will flame so bright, that it will make a revelation, of the (formerly secret, but) ever righteous judgment of God.

Lastly, To shew that God is just in all his dealings, both the righteous and the wicked learn from the end of both. That we may fully discover the justice of God, we must look upon all his works together; while we look only upon some particular piece of Gods dealings with a godly man, he may seem to deal very hardly with him: or if we look but upon some particular piece of his dealings with wicked man, God may seem very gentle and kind toward him; but take all together, and the result is exact justice. It was a good speech of a modern Writer, We must not judge of the works of God before the fifth Act, that is, the last Act or Conclusion of all. This, and that part may seem dissonant and confused; but lay them all together, and they are most harmonious and methodical: Hence David (Psal. 37.) after he had a great dispute with himself, about the troubles of the righteous, and the prosperity of the wicked, and was put hard to it, how to make out the justice of God, resolves all in the close with this advice (ver. 37.) Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace. Though a righteous man die in war, yet, his end is peace, whereas though a wicked man die in peace, yet his end is war. It is said (Deut. 8. 16.) that all which God did to his people in the wilderness, was, that he might do them good at the latter end. Come to the end therefore, and there you shall find justice visible. We often lose the sight of justice; in our travels and passage through the world, mountains and hils interpose, which we cannot see over or through; but when we come home, and arrive at the end of our travels, Justice will appear in all her state and glory, rendring to every man according to his deeds; to them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honour and immortality, eternal life; but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath.

Joshua concludes the story of the people of Israel, in their passage to Canaan, with the highest testimonies of Gods justice and faithfulness; though God dealt with them so variously in the wilderness, that they often murmured in their tents, as if he had done them wrong; yet in the close, you shall find, how exact and punctual the Lord was with them (Josh. 21. 45.) There failed not ought of any good thing which the Lord had spoken to the house of Israel, all came to pass: And in that other Text, Josh. 23. 14. Behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth, & you know in all your hearts & in all your souls, that not one thing hath faild of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof. How admirably just was God in his word? If a man promise many things, we take it well, if he perform some of the chief, and them in the chief, though somewhat may fail. God promised many things, and performed all; and which is more, all of every one of those many things promised. The texts compared, make this out; the one saying, That not one thing failed of all the good things which God spake concerning them, and the other, That not ought of any good thing failed. So then, they had every good thing in kind, with each particular part and degree of every good thing: And for the truth of all this, Joshua makes his appeal to themselves, and to that in themselves, which was best able to termine it, all their hearts, and all their souls; which words do not only refer to every person, as if the meaning were, the hearts and souls of you all; but rather to all that is in every person, all their hearts and all their souls, that is, understandings, memories, consciences, affections; yea, senses, their eyes and ears, their hands and mouths, could bring in witness from their several operations, to this great truth. And surely God in the end, will deal as well with every Israelite, as he did with all Israel: A time will come, it will come shortly, when every Saint shall say, in all their hearts and in all their souls, that not one thing, nor ought of any good thing, which the Lord hath said concerning them, hath failed. I shut up this in the words of Christ to his Disciples, when they were amused about that act of his, the washing of their feet (John 13. 7.) What I do, ye know not now, but ye shall know hereafter. Stay but a while, and all those mysteries and riddles of providence shall be unfolded. Though clouds and darkness are round about him, yet judgment and justice are the habitation of his Throne, Psal. 97. Mortal man never had, and at last shall see he had no reason to complain of God; mortal man shall not be more just then God, nor shall man be more pure then his Maker. And so much for the fifth Conclusion, That God neither doth, nor can do any injustice to the creature, he is just in nature, just and holy in all his wayes.

Just or fit oportet qui immerito affligitur, quia quis immerito affligit.

The sixth or last Conclusion is this, That to complain of Gods dealing with us, is to make our selves more just and pure then God; or, when any person or people complain of Gods dispensations toward them, they (though not formally, yet by way of interpretation) make themselves more just and pure then God. This was the point wherein Eliphaz labours much, to convince Job, supposing that he had thus exalted himself against God, by these grievous complainings of his present state, in the foregoing Chapter: There is a truth in the Proposition, though not in the Application, as hath often been hinted. Job's complaints were bitter, from the sence of his pains, not from any prejudice in his understanding: He ever preserved high and holy thoughts of God. The least suspition of whose righteous dealings, is to make our selves, by so much more righteous then he. The reason is clear; for, he that complains thus, thinks some wrong is done him; Now he that complains of wrong, would be thought more just, then he of whose wronging him he complains. Whosoever murmurs or repines at what God doth, secretly saith (this voyce is in it) that he could do better, or that God ought: He that speaks against the rod, speaks against him that smites with the rod; He that swears by heaven, swears by the Throne of God, and by him that sitteth thereon, saith Christ; and so he that accuses the rod of God, accuses the work God, and God that wrought it: He thinks himself more pure then his Maker, who is displeased with God as a corrector. To disapprove any thing which God doth, is to approve our selves before God. It is seasonable for us to look to our hearts in such a time as this; it is a time of temptation, let us not by our murmurings, make it a time of provocation. Possibly we may often see cause to complain of men, but we can never have cause to complain of God. There is but little good got by complaining of creatures; but how much guilt and misery gets he, who complains of his Creator? For a man to complain to man, is in some cases necessary; but it is best in all cases, to complain to God, and the worst of any case, to complain (though silently) of God. So then, complain of man to God, rather then of man, to men; complain often to God, but never of God; complain before God, and tell him, that such have dealt negligently, such falsly, such unjustly, such cruelly: But always say, Lord, thou hast done justly, even by those who are unjust; Lord, thou hast done graciously, even by those who are wicked; Lord, thou hast done holily, even by the hand of those who are unholy; and thou hast dealt faithfully, though these have been treacherous. Thus let us complain to God, but not of God. Every complaint of God will be interpreted, a secret justification of our selves, and a condemnation of the righteous God. Man is then worse then a Devil, when he would make himself better then God: Nothing pollutes man so much as his thought, that there is unrighteousness in God: Nothing debases the creature, so much as that thought, desire or act, wherein he prefers and exalts himself above the Creator.

Quisquis de persecutione murmurat, quid aliud quam judicium ferientis accusat, puriorem ergo se vir factore suo existimat, si contra flagellum querelam parat, eumque sibi proculdubio postponit, cujus judicium de sua afflictione redarguit. Greg.

Thus we have opened the general Proposition: The probation of it, from the vast difference between men and Angels, is prosecuted at large in the latter part of the Chapter.

VERS. 18.

Behold he put no trust in his servants, and his Angels he charged with folly.

ELiphaz having laid the dignity of man (comparing with God) in the dust, by those humbling questions, in the former verse; What is man that he should be just? and shall man be more pure then his Maker? He now strengthens it further, that there is no comparison between God and mortal man, by a direct assertion, that there is no comparison between God and immortal Angels. Behold he put no trust in his servants, and his Angels he charged with folly. As if he had said, If Angels are not able to stand before God, and justifie themselves upon his enquirie; then certainly man, the best of men, who dwell but in houses of clay, cannot: But Angels cannot justifie themselves before God, therefore much less can the best of men. That Angels are not able to justifie themselves before God, he proves in these words; Behold he put no trust in his servants, and his Angels he charged with folly: They that cannot be trusted by God, cannot be justified by God; and they that are chargeable with folly, are not able to stand in judgment before the most wise, the only wise and holy God. Angels are excellent creatures, yet because creatures, they are in and of themselves, frail and weak: they have no strength to stand longer then upheld; no stedfastness to obey, longer then confirmed; no faithfulness to be loyal, longer then over-ruled; no wisdom to discern, further then they are enlightned; what then will become of man, if he stand alone, or stand in competition with God his Maker? This is the sum and general sence of the words, as they are an argument. We will now consider them as they lie here in order.

Behold he put no trust in his servants.

The Particle [Behold] in the Original, as it often notes wonder in other texts, so it may much more in this; Behold a wonder! Angels are foolish, Angels are not to be trusted. Yet in this place, Behold, is put by way of affirmation, rather then of admiration. Behold he put no trust in his servants, is as much as verily and indeed, certainly and without controversie, he put no trust in his servants: So (Deut. 13. 14.) Thou shalt enquire and search, and ask diligently, and behold if it be true; in the Hebrew thus, and behold true, or behold truth; that is, if upon enquiry it appear, that such and such things are certainly so, then they must proceed according to the Law provided in that case. Again, (Deut. 19. 8.) The Judges shall make diligent inquisition, and behold, if the witness be a false witness, so we translate; but the Letter is, Behold the witness, a false witness, that is, if it be affirmed, and do appear that it is a false witness or testimony which is brought, then the Judges shall proceed so and so, &c. Thus here, Behold he put no trust in his servants, is a vehement affirmation, that God searching into those his servants, finds them such as are not to be trusted.

But who are these untrusty servants? First, The Chaldee Paraphrast understands by servants, the holy Prophets. Prophets (I grant) sometimes have, and ofter would have proved unfaithful; some of them discovered much, and others would have discovered more unfaithfulness, if God had not mightily supported them. Secondly, One of the Rabbins understands it in general of any, or of all the faithful; Behold he put no trust in his servants, that is, not in any of the holiest and faithfullest of the children of men.

But the connexion of the Text carries it clearly, that by servants, we are to understand the Angels, who are called ministring spirits, Heb. 1. 14. Are they not all ministring spirits (or servants) sent out for the good of those that are the heirs of salvation? And so the words in the close of this verse, are exegetical, expounding who are intended by those servants; Behold he put no trust in his servants, and his Angels he charged with folly; that is, he trusted not those servants, the Angels, but charged them with folly. But there is a further reason, more fully evidencing, that it must be understood of Angels, in ver. 19. where the persons standing in equal opposition to these servants and Angels, are men; How much less (saith he) on them that dwell in houses of clay? Now a dwelling in a house of clay, is a Periphrasis, or description of mankind in general, good or bad, one or other, high or low; all mankind dwells in a house of clay. Seeing then the term of opposition is mankind in general, we must take somewhat, which being a rational creature, is not man, for the other term, which cannot be any except Angels; we cannot set any sort of men in opposition to others upon this ground, because they dwell in houses of clay; for the Saints on earth, dwell in houses of clay, as well as men of the earth: therefore to make the opposition clear, it necessarily follows, that by Servants, in the first clause of the verse, Angels are implied, as well as in the latter, where Angels are expresst.

But if these servants be Angels, how is it, that he put no trust in, or that (as we may render it word for word out of the Hebrew) he did not believe in these his servants? I shall answer that, when I have a little opened the word here translated to put trust. We find it used two wayes in Scripture; sometime passively, and sometime actively. It is taken passively to be faithful, trusty and true, in word or promise. From this Root the Hebrew takes the name of a Guardian, or Foster-father, or Steward, because such, to whose care children or families are committed, ought to be most faithful in the discharge of so great a trust.

The Apostle (1 Cor. 4. 1, 2.) speaking of that heavenly Stewardship, the Ministry of the Gospel, expresseth it thus, Let a man so account of us as of the Ministers of Christ, and Stewards of the mysteries of God; moreover (saith he) it is required in a Steward, that a man may be found faithful. And (Num. 12. 7.) where Moses is spoken of as a servant, he is thus described, My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all my house; he is a man whom I may trust or give credit to; for he is trusty and faithful, (Heb. 3. 2, 5.) The Apostle comparing Christ and Moses, saith of Christ, That he was faithful to him that appointed him, as Moses was faithful in all his house. So that here is an elegant Antithesis; his servants, who according to their duty and office, ought to be constant, faithful, trusty; he found unconstant, unfaithful, not to be trusted.

A verbi proprietate non recedamus, qua significat eum ב credere & fidere alicui Merc. Verbum de verbo, in servos suos credidit.

Yet the word being in Hyphil, is of an active signification, and when it is construction with Beth (as Grammarians observe) it imports to give credit unto, or confide in a person; and so here, he put no trust, that is, he did not credit or confide in those servants, or he did not believe on them. He saw somewhat in them, which might betray them to disloyalty, if himself, withdrawing his assistance, should make an experiment, or try what was in their hearts. And this sence is most suitable to the state and office of a servant: trusting, or not trusting, faithfulness, or unfaithfulness, are acts proper to that relation, Lord and Servant. So then, the Lord put no trust, that is, he could not confide in his servants, they being such, as he found not perfectly sure and loyal unto him. We say commonly of a man whom we cannot trust, We will not give our word for him, and we will not take his. Our Lord Christ is therefore called a faithful High Priest, because his Father trusted him with the whole business of our salvation, without the least misgiving thought of his faithfulness, or the miscarriage of the work. Thus Solomon describes a faithful wife, and a confiding husband, Prov. 31. 10, 11. A rare couple indeed, and as rarely found: Therefore he makes proclamation for such a woman; Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above Rubies, the heart of her Husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil; there's confidence to the height; the heart of her husband doth safely trust in her. A husband that hath such a Jewel to his wife, knows, she will order the family with discretion at home, when he is abroad; he knows she is faithful to him body and goods: Her chastity or her frugality never came in question before his thoughts; therefore (saith he) I shall have no need of spoil; which some interpret thus; her care and wisdom in providing for the family, will make it like an Army which hath overcome the enemy in the field, or won a wealthy City, where the Soldiers have spoil and pillage enough, they need no spoil. Or as others, He shall have no need of spoil, that is, he shall have no need to spoil or oppress others, to help his family. All things shall be so ordered by his wives prudence, that he shall not need to take any unjust way, to provide for, or supply his household. Thus the heart of her husband doth safely trust in her. Such trust the heart of God could not put in those servants, his Angels, he knew they might come short in their accounts. Such trust Christ could not give some, who seemed to trust or believe on him (John 2. 23.) Many, seeing Christs miracles, believed on him, yet Christ would not believe on them; we translate, he would not commit himself to them: the Grek is, he did not believe or trust himself unto them; Christ believes in, or may trust them all the world over, who truly believe in him; but these believed so falsly upon him, that he could not believe fully upon them; and the Text gives the reason, for he himself knew all men; he knew, they were not metal of a due temper, and therefore not to be trusted. So God knew all Angels, the uttermost perfection, power and virtue that was in Angels, therefore he would not commit all to them, he would not believe upon them. We find the word belief thus used (Exod. 14. 31.) When the Children of Israel saw the great work that the Lord had done in destroying the Egyptians, it is said, The people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord, and his servant Moses; he puts God and Moses as the joynt object of their faith, as they had formerly been of their unbelief. Except the servants of the Lord be believed, the Lord himself is not: And when they are believed, the Lord is. Believe in the Lord your God, believe his Prophets; saith good Jehoshaphat to his people, 2 Chron. 20. 20. Moses had told them enough of the power of God before he had undertaken they should be delivered; but they would not trust Moses upon his word, nor would they trust the word of God; yet now when they saw this great deliverance, present sight wrought faith for the time to come: they perceived by this miracle, that the Lord and Moses were to be credited, and they doubted not to credit them another time. Though that faith which comes in at the eyes only, seldom goes down so low as the heart, or sees further and longer then the eye. Thus we may understand the first part of the Verse, He put no trust, no belief in his servants; he gave no credit to them, as knowing perfectly what their nature and power was, what both could do; that if left by God, they would quickly leave God, and prove unfaithful.

I shall observe one Point, before I come to the latter part of the Verse (for there the suspition of disloyalty upon the Angels, comes more fully to be considered) from the title here given to the Angels, his servants; he put no trust in his servants.

Angels are the servants of God.

They are his servants, as being altogether at his command; and they are his servants, as being fully conformable to his commands. These great and glorious Spirits come under the same denomination with men, who dwell in houses of clay, servants of God. To serve God, is not only the duty, but it is the honour of the highest creatures. It is more honour to serve God, then to rule the world. The stile of the good Angels, is, Ministring Spirits, Heb. 1. But the stile and title of the evil Angel, is, Prince of the power of the air, God of this world; you would think these were weighty titles, Prince of the air, God of the world; but the additions diminish their weight; yea, make them lighter then vanity, or rather, heavy only with misery: There is more glory in being a servant to God, then in being a god of the world, or a Prince of the power of the air.

I might here enlarge my enquiry into the services of Angels, in what they are servants, and what their offices and duties are; but I shall only touch. Their service may be considered, either in respect of the Church, or the enemies of the Church. Respecting the Church and people of God, they have such services as these:

1. They are as messengers to carry and reveal the mind of God; they are as Tutors and Instructors of the Churches, Dan. 8. 9. God sent his Angel to teach Daniel the mystery of those visions. And, Rev. 1. 11. an Angel was sent to instruct John, chap. 22. 16. I Jesus have sent mine Angel to testifie these things in the Churches.

Secondly, They are sent as Guardians and Protectors of the people of God, to take their part, and to be on their side, Psal. 34. 7. The Angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him. Psal. 91. 11. He giveth his Angels gels a charge over them, lest at any time they should dash their feet against a stone. Gen. 32.2. When Jacob journeyed, it is said, the Angels of God met him; an army of Angels was his convoy, Gods Host coming out for his protection and safeguard, and therefore he called the name of that place Mahanaim, that is, two Hosts or Camps; either because the Angels appeared in two bands, and so made, as it were, a guard for Jacob to pass between them; or because the great Angelical Royal Army quartered and marched with Jacob's little army; and so two confederate Armies appeared in the field together. Angels are called Chariots, Psal. 68.17. The Chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of Angels: that is, God useth Angels for defence of his people, as Chariots in war. The ancient Prophets were called the Chariots of Israel (2 Kings 3.13.) And the Angels are the Chariots of God. Our strongest Militia is of Spirits, or of men spiritualized.

Thirdly, Angels suggest good things, holy thoughts to us. If the Devil, who is an evil Angel, a wicked Spirit, can suggest evil, sinful, filthy thoughts, and help on the heart in wickedness; then doubtless a good Angel can help on the heart in holiness, in heavenly thoughts and meditations. Christ speaks of Judas, that Satan had put it into his heart to betray him, John 13. and Peter to Ananias (Acts 5.) Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost? The nature of a good Angel is as fit, his power given as great, to deal with our spirits, as either the nature or the power of an evil Angel. That of the Apostle (2 Cor. 11. 14.) gives a hint, if not a proof of it, where he tells the Corinthians, That deceitful workers transform themselves into the Apostles of Christ; and no marvel, for Satan himself is transformed into an Angel of light; and when is Satan in this change, from an Angel of darkness to an Angel of light? Even when he suggests good, for evil ends, or evil, for good ends. And if he is called an Angel of light for this reason, then Angels of light, good Angels, suggest good, for good ends; otherwise, Satan could not be said to imitate them, in suggesting good for ill ends, and under specious pretences of bringing glory to God, tempting to transgress the will of God.

Fourthly, Good Angels comfort, strengthen and support in times of distress, anguish and trouble. An Angel comforted Hagar Gen. 21. And (Mat. 4.10.) after Christ had finished his terrible combat with that wicked Angel, the good Angels came and ministred unto him. Again, when he was in that most bitter Agony in the garden (Luke 22. 43.) an Angel appeared to him from heaven, strengthening him. That which they do to Christ the Head, they do to his members in their proportion.

Their fifth service is to convey and carry the souls of departed Saints to heaven; they are Heavenly Porters (Luk. 16.22.) Lazarus died, and was carried by the Angels into Abraham's bosom.

Lastly, They shall convocate and gather all the elect together at the last day, Mat. 24. 21. Their services against the wicked, and all enemies of the Church, have been many and great. Angels assist Saints, and oppose the opposers of Sion. Two Angels were sent upon a message of destruction to Sodom; an Angel defeated the host of Senacherib; an Angel smote bloody persecuting Herod; Angels (by name, if not by nature) poure out the seven vials of Gods wrath in the Revelation. And at the last day Angels shall hurry the wicked to Christs Tribunal; they are heavenly Pursivants, and they shall bundle the Tares up together, as fewel to be thrown into everlasting burnings, Mat. 13.41,42.

And it may be a great comfort to us, that God hath such servants. When visible dangers are round about us, we should remember, God hath invisible servants round about us. There are more with us, then against us, as Elisha told his fearful servant, 2 Kings 6. And in that low estate of the Church, Zech. 1.8. the Prophet is shewed Christ in a vision, standing among the Myrtle trees in the bottom (the Myrtle trees in the bottom, noted the Church in a low estate) and behind him, there were red horses, speckled and white, that is, horsemen speckled and white. These diverse-coloured horses were Angels appointed for several offices, as the learned Junius (with others) interprets it: the red horses being appointed for judgment, the white for mercy, and the speckled (as he conjectures) for mixt actions, being sent out, at once, to protect and help the people of God, and to execute wrath and judgment upon the Adversary. Thus we see the services of the Angels; they are servants, yet such as the most wise God put no trust in; therefore we have an Angel better then Angels, even the Angel of the Covenant, the Lord Jesus, into whose hands our safety is committed, to whose care the Church is left, in whom God puts the whole trust, knowing that this great Angel is, and for ever will be faithful in and over his house, to his highest delight, and the Churches compleatest welfare.

And his Angels he charged with folly.

There are very different readings of this part of the Verse. Some (as Mr. Beza) read it thus, He trusted not his servants, though he had put light into those his messengers. Others read it with a negation in both parts, He put no trust in his servants, neither hath he put light in his Angels. Another thus, Neither hath he put perfect light in his Angels. Mr. Broughton differs from all these; Behold, he holdeth not perfection to be in his own servants, and in his Angels he judged no clear light to be. Another sort read it to these sences, He charged or put madness in or upon his Angels, he put or charged vain boasting in or upon his Angels, he found vanity in or amongst his Angels, he observed some evil amongst his Angels.

Nec in Angelis suis ponet lumen. Pagn. Nec in Angelis suis posuit lucem exactissimā. Vatabl. Angelis suis posuit vesaniam. Tyg. In Angelis suis ponet gloriationē. Bibl. Reg. In Angelis suis reperit vanitatem. Sym. κατὰ δὲ τοὺς Ἀγγέλων αὐτῆς σχολαστὰς τὴν ἀπώνοιαν. Sept. תהלה à radice הלל Splenduit, luxit, claruit, Metaphoricè in Piel, splendidum, illustrē, clarum reddidit, laudavit, prædicavit. Per Antiphrasin, inglorius, insanus, furore actus fuit, insanivit.

Now that which hath given occasion to this variety of translations, is, the different sences which the Original yields us. The Hebrew word is very fruitful of significations, and hath (as the Oracle told Rebekah concerning two contrary Nations) two contrary meanings in the womb of it, and that makes the strugling amongst interpreters. The word in its proper sence, signifies to shine forth with a resplendent brightness: so, chap. 29.3. Job wisheth, O that I were as in moneths past, when the Candle of God shined upon my head: It is a Verb, of which the word Folly in this text of Job is a derivative. And (Isa. 14.12.) Hielel signifies the Morning-star, whose shining brightness hath obtained the name Lucifer, Light-bringer, or Light-bearer. How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning? How art thou fallen from Heaven, Hielel, thou shining day-star? Thus the word properly signifies shining or brightness, or to shine and be bright; and hence by a Metaphor, to be famous or renowned, or to make one renowned or famous, or to paint out a man with praises; because a man is (as it were) decked with light, and hath rayes of brightness cast upon him, when he is honoured and adorned with praises. Due commendations are to a man as a robe or vesture of light, which makes him shine to all about him. And hence the word Halelujah is derived, praise ye Jah, or the Lord; used frequently both in the beginning and end of the Psalms: in the beginning of the Psalms, by way of exhortation; and in the end, by way of acclamation, crying up the honour and glory of God. And (to note that in passage) it is well observed, that this word Halelujah is first used in the Old Testament, Psal. 104.35. where the utter consumption of sinners is mentioned; and in the New Testament it is first used, Rev. 19.3,6. where the utter consumption of Antichrist is prophesied. Judgment on the wicked, is matter of high praise to God. Thirdly, The word signifies (by the figure Antiphrasis, or contrary speaking) to boast and brag vainly, foolishly, or vain foolish boasting. To commend or extol our selves, is pride running mad, and arrogance distracted. It is the highest dotage to be in love with our own wisdom, and folly to publish our own works. There may be wisdom (though oftentimes there is a great deal of folly) in commending others; but in commending our selves, there can be nothing but folly; therefore the very same word which signifies to boast and commend our selves, signifies both the concrete, to be mad, vain, or foolish; and the abstract, madness and folly: thus, in Eccles. 2.2,12. the word is used; I said of laughter, thou art mad. I turned my self to behold wisdom, and folly, and madness. And, Psal. 75.4. I said unto the fools, deal not foolishly, or to the mad-men, do not play the mad-men, that is, do not exalt your selves; for so he clears his meaning in the fifth verse, Lift not up your horns on high, speak not with a stiff neck, that is, a neck stiffened with pride, and a horn lifted up with vain-glory or self-confidence.

From this variety of significations, the variety of translations before-toucht, ariseth. First, They who read it,

He

He put light into those his messengers; Take the words in a proper strict sence, making out the meaning thus; That God, having put the light of excellent knowledge into the Angels, could not yet trust them: all their speculative knowledge, and high-raised illuminations, were not enough to make them steadily and stedfastly holy: That is the intent of Master Beza's interpretation, He trusted not to his servants, though he had put light into those his messengers. For those who retained the word, Light, translate negatively, neither hath he put light in his Angels, or, neither hath he put perfect light into his Angels; Or as Master Broughton, In his Angels he judgeth no clear light to be, putting a negative particle in both branches of the Verse, whereas in the Hebrew there is no expres negation in the latter. These, I say, are led by this reason or rule. It is frequent in Scripture, when there is a negative in the former clause of a Verse, then to understand a negative also in the latter clause, though none be expres't. For instance (Psalm 9. 18.) The needy shall not alway be forgotten, the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever; so we read: but in the Hebrew the latter clause is, the expectation of the poor shall perish for ever: There is no Negative in the Original; but our Translators, and not only they, but all that I have seen upon the place, render it so, supplying the negative particle of the former in the latter clause of that sentence. And without that negative, the sentence is not only imperfect, but untrue. Thus, The needy shall not alwayes be forgotten, the expectation of the poor shall perish for ever, this were a contradiction: but reading it, the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever, makes the whole a truth, and congruous in it self. Again (Prov. 17. 26.) To punish the just is not good, to strike Princes for equity, so the letter of the Hebrew; but we read it thus, To punish the just is not good, nor to strike Princes for equity. I might give you other examples, but a taste may suffice. Thus in the Text before us, when it is said in the first clause, he put no trust in his servants, we take up the negative, and say in the second, Neither hath he put light into his Angels, or he did not put light in his Angels, or he put no perfect light in his Angels, or he judged not clear light to be in his Angels.

Secondly, They, who (according to our Translation) render it madness or folly, vain boasting or vanity, these take the Original in that figurative sence before given. When a man from a reflection upon his own worth, boasts out his own praises, which, because it is a point of extream vanity and folly, therefore the word is elegantly applied to figuifie folly, &c. He charged his Angels with folly, He put or laid folly upon, or to his Angels; He put, for so the Hebrew word bears. Not, that the vanity which is in Angels is of Gods putting; but the folly that is in them, he puts to them, or chargeth it upon them, or layeth it to their charge. As we say, Such a one put it home upon him; that is, he charged him soundly, or fully, with such a crime or offence. To charge, is a judicial or Law-term, implying, that the Lord sitting in judgment to examine the estate of Angels, charged them by way of accusation, and upon trial found them (in a sence) guilty of that, which, though they had not formed into any one sin, yet might be formed and shap'd into any sin, Folly, or vain-glory.

Having given some account of those terms, Charging and Folly, He charged his Angels with folly, it grows to a great doubt what Angels we are here to understand: what Angels did God thus charge with folly? The quere or doubt lies, whether we shall lay this charge at the door of the good Angels, or of the bad, or of both?

Many of the ancients restrain it to the evil Angels, to the Apostate Angels; God put no trust in them, he saw folly in them; taking it for confessed, that the Angels which stood, the good Angels, are trusty servants, discreet and wise, far from either unfaithfulness or folly; such as God hath put trust in, and they never deceiv'd his trust; such whose obedience is made the pattern of ours, by Christ himself in his pattern of prayer, Thy will be done on Earth as it is in Heaven. And would the Lord regulate us by them who are themselves irregular? or make them our copy in doing his will, whose folly renders them unfit to be trusted with the doing of his will? Therefore (say these) such a charge suits not the state and condition of the good Angels.

Others call it upon the good Angels, that God put no trust, no, not in them. I conceive, from either, there may be a good sence, though I incline to the latter. For in the Apostate Angels (take it in the broadest sence) God saw no light, no goodness, no faithfulness at all; they have plainly discovered themselves, and shewed, not only weakness and unfaithfulness, but wickedness and utmost folly. But to confine it to the evil Angels, or to understand it chiefly of them, is too narrow for the Text; especially, seeing this is but a light, a too easie charge for those Apostate Spirits, to say only thus, that God found unfaithfulness in them, and charged them with folly: for in them rebellion was found, and they stand charged to this day with High Treason against the Crown and dignity of the King of Heaven: and are therefore committed to prison, and reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day. As for the good Angels, God may be said to charge them with folly without any wrong, either to the holiness of their nature, or the stedfastness of their obedience. For upon examination (or intimation rather) he finds they have no wisdom or stability, but by divine bounty and establishment. As the Apostate Angels were positively full of folly and unfaithfulness; so the good Angels might be charged with folly, negatively, namely, that they had no faithfulness, but as assisted and propt up.

Angeli boni ex se nihil habent nisi infirmitatem negativè, i. e. nullâ ex se sapientiam, nullam veritatem, bonitatem nullam.

But we may take the Angels in a third or middle consideration, neither for the fallen or Apostate Angels, nor for the good and confirmed Angels as distinct, or since this distinction: But by Angels we may understand the Angelical nature. The whole complex nature of Angels in their creation and constitution was such, as God could not trust fully unto, such as he saw folly in. We may demonstrate this plainly, because a great part of the Angels (and it is questioned whether or no the greater part, but it is clear, that a great part of the Angels) a whole Regiment at least, proved disloyal, and fell together: therefore the Angelical nature (in that abstracted notion) is subject to folly and unfaithfulness, as well as man, although they are of a more excellent make and constitution then man. God looking upon Angels in general, saw they were not to be trusted; the event also shewing many of them (who were as good by nature as they who stand) falling from him, discovering their folly and nakedness to all the world.

But it may be questioned yet, how there could be folly in the Angelical nature; for as much as God viewing and reviewing all the works which he had made, saw every thing which he had made, and behold it was very good?

I answer, first, God charged them with folly comparatively, respecting himself. As (1 Tim. 6. 16.) the Apostle saith of God, that he only hath immortality; that speech is exclusive, shutting out all other creatures from a participation of Gods immortality. Yet we know Angels are immortal, Angels dye not, therefore also they are opposed to men (in the next Verse to the Text) Who live in houses of clay, whose foundations are in the dust, and are crushed before the moth. Angels are not crushed, they dye not, yet God only is immortal; because the immortality of Angels compared with the immortality of God, is but mortality. And the Reason is this, because Angels are not immortal in themselves, or of themselves, they have not original or absolute immortality, their immortality is dependant and derivative; God only is independently and originally immortal, and hence he only is said to have immortality. As it is in the point of life, so also of righteousness, wisdom and faithfulness. God only is faithful, he only is wise, that's the Apostles phrase, To God only wise: Men, yea Angels are unfaithful, unwise, foolish, compared with God. He is wise of himself, and in himself, in his own compass: creatures have only what they borrow or receive from him. To this sence one of the Ancients speaks fully, In comparison of the Justice of God, if the holy Angels in Heaven be called unjust, I see no hurt in the assertion, not because they have faln from justice, but because they are creatures, and not God. All is resolved into this, they are creatures, that's enough to prove their folly and unfaithfulness. And if a man that hath not only some smattering of learning and knowledge, but is a professed Scholar, be looked upon as ignorant, compared with the Beu-clerks and great Scholars of the world; is it any wonder that Angels should be called fools, in reference to the infinite wisdom of God? The foolishness of God is wiser then men, and the weakness of God is stronger then men. And it is as true of Angels, the foolishness of God is wiser then Angels, and the weakness of God is stronger then Angels. Angels are called Principalities and Powers, but yet it is only because they act in the Power of God, and go forth in his strength; that's the first Answer. The whole nature of Angels is unfaithful and foolish, weighed with God.

In comparatione justitiæ Dei, si nec sancti in cœlis Angeli justi esse dicantur, non mihi videtur importuna sententia, non quia ut hoc essent à justitia lapsi sunt, sed quia facti sunt & Deus non sunt. August. contr. Prisc.

Secondly, I answer, although in the Angels there is no actual unfaithfulness or folly, yet there is possible folly and unfaithfulness in Angels; and this potentiality is the thing here meant or aimed at. The Holy Angels that now stand are wise and faithful altogether, yet considered in themselves (not as confirmed by Christ) they may fall; their condition is altered, but their constitution is the same. It is otherwise with man, (which makes a wide difference between Angels and men.) Man not only hath a potentiality to be foolish and unfaithful, but man is actually foolish and unfaithful; yea man in himself is nothing else but a bundle of folly and unfaithfulness. Whereas Angels in themselves, or considered in their natural constitution, have no folly actually in them at all. The nature of man is nothing but sin, and Angels have no sin at all in their nature; they only have a potentiality, a possibility in their nature to sin. So then we must understand this charge of folly with two cautions concerning Angels. First, There was not any folly concreated with them, their nature is purely pure. Secondly, They have not contracted any folly into their nature. The folly of the good Angels is but like the folly of man in the state of innocency, when he had only a power to sin: which possibility of Angels to sin is by the mediation of Christ (wherein these Angels have a share, though not to redeem or raise them from their Fall (as man) yet to confirm and keep them from falling) I say, by the mediation of Christ that possibility is removed. Christ hath changed their possiblity to sin, into an impossibility of sinning. This is a glorious priviledge indeed, and that which all the Saints shall have in glory. Redemption hath not only bettered the condition of man, but the condition of Angels. Now they all excel in strength, doing the Commandments of God, and hearkning to the voice of his word for ever, Psalm 103.20.

Cuicunq; creaturæ hoc convenit, ut peccare non possit, hoc habet ex dono gratiæ, non ex conditione naturæ. Aqui. p.1.quæst.63. art.1.

We may hence learn, First, What the sin of Angels was.

God charged his Angels with folly; The possible sin, which God saw and still sees in the nature of Angels, was the actual sin of Angels. Pride and self confidence were the sins of Angels, and these are the most proper sins of Angels; Angels cannot fall into every sin. The Schoolman questions, Whether the first sin of Angels was pride? He argues and concludes, that howsoever in regard of guilt, the Devils, or fallen Angels, have all sins upon them, because they tempt man to every sin, (For he that tempts another to a sin which himself commits not, or is incapable to commit, is as guilty as if he had committed it,) yet in regard of the act it self, evil Angels can only commit those sins which are sutable to a spiritual nature.

Aquin. par. 1. q.93. art. 2.

Now a spiritual nature is not affected with those sins which belong to a corporal or sensitive nature: Devils are not adulterers, they are not drunkards; theirs are spiritual sins, and their chief spiritual sin was pride: Their first sin consisted in not submitting themselves to that condition wherein God placed them, and whereunto they were appointed. All agree it was pride, though there be different opinions about what this pride shewed it self; whether in affecting a higher degree then God created them in, refusing the work and office God set them about, (which some conceive, was the ministration to, or the guardianship of man, which trust they deserted or scorned) or whether it were in affecting a further condition upon their own strength, not looking to the strength and grace of God; whatsoever the particular was, the general is plain, They abode not in the truth, they kept not their station: Pride and ambition swel'd them, till they brake and fell.

Secondly, Observe, Angels (as creatures) are mutable creatures.

Though they are the best of creatures, yet they are changeable creatures; though they are the most perfect creatures, yet there is somewhat in them of imperfection. Look upon Angels in their creation, they were created blessed; Blessed (as the Schools determine) with a natural blessedness, not with a supernatural, which consists in the vision of God; for, if they had been created in a supernatural blessedness, then they had never fallen; they were created only in a natural blessedness, and from that they might fall, and did. Now, indeed, the good Angels have obtained by Christ a supernatural blessedness, from which they cannot fall; and so by grace are become immutable, which by creation they were not. Though Christ be not a Redeemer (as was toucht before) yet he is a confirmer, a supporter of the holy Angels. In reference whereunto, Christ is called the Head of all things (Ephes. 1.22.) And of him the whole family in Heaven and in earth is named, Ephes. 3.15. And by him (Col. 1.20.) God hath reconciled all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in Heaven. Some understand that place in the Colossians of men only, because of the word reconciling; yet we may well take in Angels also, because that place takes in all things, both in Heaven and earth. And howsoever Angels needed not such a reconciliation as supposes a breach of peace, or a falling out before: Yet they needed such a reconciliation as consists in the continuance and strengthning of that peace which was before.

Angeli fuerunt à Deo creati beati, beatitudine naturali, non autem beatitudine supernaturali, quæ in visione divinæ essentiæ consistit. Aquin. par. 1. q.62. art 1.

Further, We learn by way of Corollary, from the former point,

That, there is no stability in any estate out of Christ.

The Angels themselves could not be trusted out of Christ; folly is in them not considered in Christ, how much more in man? When Adam fell, if God should have repair'd him again, and set him up (in statu quo) in the same condition wherein he was, yea, in a better (if a better could be had) without a Mediator; and so have tried his obedience once more; or should every particular man have stood for himself, and not one for all; certainly, as we fell at first in a lump all together, so we should have all fallen single (as it were) by retail, one after another: There is no assurance in any estate on this side Christ: Nor man, nor Angel can hold out without a Surety: Christ is called the Surety of the Covenant, Heb. 7.22. because he undertakes for us that we shall do our parts, that we shall be faithful and believing, that we shall be holy and humble, that we shall do what God expects from those whom free grace shall save. Christ undertakes for all the grace, and holiness, and faithfulness, which is required in believers; He gives no command but what himself helps us to fulfil, nor calls he for any duty but what himself works in us, and for us.

Fourthly Observe, That, God sees imperfection in creatures, whose natures are most perfect.

Man looking upon the Angelical nature, or upon mans nature in innocency, could see no fault or folly in either; but God saw both possibly faulty, though not actually faulty. And, as it is with the nature of men and Angels, so with their works: when we can see nothing amiss in a work, God can: As the Apostle acknowledges (1 Cor. 4.4.) I know nothing by my self: I profess, when I look into the course of my ministery (for he speaks to that particular) when I look how I have discharged my Apostleship, my conscience bears me witness, I know of no unfaithfulness or neglect, but yet, though I know nothing by my self, I am not hereby justified, but he that judgeth me is the Lord: as if he should say, when God comes to look over my work, he may find faults, many faults in it; there is no standing for creatures before God in any creature-purity: Angelical perfection is imperfect in his sight. Angels have not the least spot or tincture of sin in their nature, ye the nature of Angels is potentially sinful. The best creature (in regard of pure naturals) may be wrought to evil, only God cannot. And the reason is, because every one may err, who hath not the rule of righteousness within him: and therefore it is impossible God should err, because his own will is the rule of his own actions: He is every way a law unto himself. The Apostle speaking of the Gentiles (Rom. 2.14.) saith, These having not the Law, are a law to themselves. Not, that their nature is a law,

(which

(which is the tranſcendent priviledge of God) but that they have the law of Nature, or the law printed in their nature, though not publiſhed to their ear; They have the Law written in their hearts: but the heart of God is his Law, both written and unwritten. Creatures how perfect ſoever in their nature, have the will of God for their rule and law: which though it be within them, yet it is not Them, and ſo they may act beſide it. The hand of the Artificer often fails in cutting or faſhioning the work he is about, becauſe his hand is not the rule by which he works: his hand works by a rule or line, his hand is not that rule or line: Therefore he ſometimes ſtrikes right, and ſometimes he ſtrikes wrong; but if the hand of a man were the rule by which he works, then it were impoſſible that ever he ſhould work amiſs. Thus it is with God, the very will of God which acts, is the rule by which he acts, hence it is impoſſible for God to fail; Angels and men act by a rule preſcribed, their will is one thing, and the rule is another; the power by which they work is one thing, and the direction by which they work is another; and therefore (to ſhut up this point) the moſt perfect creature may poſſibly ſwerve and err in acting; Only he cannot err in any thing he doth, whoſe will is the perfect rule of all he doth.

Solum illum actū à rectitudine declinare non contingit, cujus regula eſt ipſa virtus agentis. Aquin. par. 1. q. 63. art. 1.

Fifthly, Foraſmuch as God beholding Angels, ſees folly in them; Learn,

That, God hath no need of any creature, no not of Angels.

The Reaſon is clearly this, becauſe Angels themſelves in themſelves are unfaithful, Angels themſelves in themſelves are fooliſh, therefore what need hath God of ſuch as theſe? As King Achiſh ſaid (1 Sam. 21. 15.) when David changed his behaviour before him, (ſtudiouſly acting the fool and madman) ſcrabling on the doors of the gate, and letting his ſpittle fall down upon his beard: What, ſaith Achiſh unto his ſervants, Have I need of mad-men, that you have brought this fellow to play the mad-man in my preſence? So God may ſay when he looks upon the beſt of creatures, Angels or men, have I any need of mad-men, any need of fools or of their folly? Foraſmuch then as there is nothing in any creature, barely as a creature, but what may be reduced to folly and unfaithfulneſs, and would certainly end there, therefore God hath no need at all of any creature. Men will ſay, we need not the help of diſloyal or untruſty men, we need not the help of fools to counſel us, or of unfaithful ones to act for us.

Beſides, Creatures are no help to God: For the truth is, God and the creature are no more then God alone; I ſay, God and the utmoſt perfection of all creatures put together are no more then God alone: The Reaſon of it is, becauſe, if there be any perfection in creatures, it is but what God himſelf hath put into them. What a man gives to another is no addition to himſelf; much leſs is that which God gives man or Angel, any addition to God. God is infinite, and no addition can be made to infinite: When the creature doth moſt for us, the creature (of it ſelf) doth nothing for us, God doth all in all and by all. The creature doth you no more good at one time then at another; all the good that is done at any time, God doth it: So then, every way God hath no need of creatures. And it is our comfort, I am ſure it ought to be, that he hath not. He ſaith to wiſe men, I have no need of your counſels; to rich men, I have no need of your purſes; and to great men, I have no need of your power; he ſees all is vanity.

Laſtly, If God truſt not Angels, let not us truſt in man; if he charges his Angels with folly, let not us adore the wiſdom of man. This diſcovery of imperfection in Angels ſhould lay all creatures low before us, and take us off from confidence or boaſting in any arm of fleſh. To this ſence Eliphaz proſecutes the Argument in the following words to the end of the Chapter. If Angels, the chiefeſt and choiceſt of creatures, be thus weak, what then is man, who dwels in a houſe of clay, whoſe foundation is in the duſt, and who is cruſhed before the moth?

VERS. 19, 20, 21.

How much leſs on them that dwell in houſes of clay, whoſe foundation is in the duſt, which are cruſhed before the moth?

They are deſtroyed from morning to evening, they periſh for ever without any regarding it.

Doth not their excellency, which is in them, go away? they dye, even without wiſdom.

THeſe three verſes contain a deſcription of man in oppoſition to the Angels. The form of the Argument was given before to this effect; That if Angels, thoſe excellent creatures, cannot ſtand before God, or be juſtified in his ſight; then much leſs man, a weak creature; Man who dwels in a houſe of clay, and whoſe foundation is in the duſt.

Two things this Context holds forth to us, concerning the weakneſs of man, in oppoſition to Angels.

Firſt, It ſhews that man is a material ſubſtance, ſo are not Angels, Angels are ſpirits, ſpiritual ſubſtances.

Secondly, It ſhews that man is a mortal ſubſtance, ſo are not Angels, ſpirits dye not.

That man is a material ſubſtance, is proved in the beginning of the 19. verſe, from thoſe words, He dwels in a houſe of clay, whoſe foundation is in the duſt.

That man is a mortal ſubſtance, is implied in the former; That which is made of clay and duſt muſt needs be brittle ware. But beſide that his mortality is implied in thoſe words, it is proved expreſly, and in terms, in the words following to the end of the Chapter. And this mortality of man is ſet forth by divers adjuncts or circumſtances.

Firſt, By a ſimilitude, ſhadowing the quickneſs or the ſuddenneſs of mans death, They are cruſhed before the moth.

Secondly, By the ſhortneſs of life; They are deſtroyed from morning to evening.

Thirdly, By the everlaſting power which death hath upon us (reſpecting this world;) They periſh for ever.

Fourthly, By the common and general inſenſibleneſs and inconſideration of this frail life, of this long-laſting death; Man (ſaith he) is deſtroyed from morning to evening, he dyeth quickly, periſheth for ever; he lies, as long as the world laſts, in his grave: yet ſuch is the ſtupidity of man that none regardeth all this, he dyes without any regarding.

Fifthly, And leaſt any ſhould ſay, ſurely, man is not ſuch a pitiful creature, as this ſad deſcription repreſents him; man was the moſt excellent part of the inferiour Creation; God planted many noble endowments upon man: and is there no more to be ſaid of him but this? He is cruſh'd like a moth, and dyes, no man regarding? That objection is taken away in the laſt verſe; as if the Holy Ghoſt had ſaid, I grant that man, beſides duſt and clay (which are his materials) hath many heavenly, yea divine endowments, he hath the impreſſions of Gods Image in reaſon and underſtanding ſtamped upon him; but, though he be thus qualified, yet all his excellency (all which may be accounted the choiceſt and the beſt in him) will not keep him ſweet, or protect him from death and rottenneſs: Doth not (ſaith he) their excellency which is in them go away? As if he had ſaid, If you alledge, that man is more then duſt and clay, then weakneſs and corruption; 'tis granted: But what then? Doth not their excellency that is in them go away? Doth it not vaniſh, and where is it? and where is he? All natural perfections (whatſoever man hath under the notion of a reaſonable creature) be they never ſo high and raiſed, quickly paſs, wither and decay: They have no abiding excellency in them, Doth not their excellency that is in them go away? They have wiſdom, but they dye without wiſdom, even as bruit beaſts; either their wiſdom decayes while they live, or it is not able to keep them alive: wiſdom, parts and learning ſtand them in no ſtead to prevent death. Now if their excellency go away, they muſt go too; if wiſdom cannot keep them alive, dye they muſt; as we ſhall ſee further in opening the ſeveral parts, having thus given the ſence in general.

Theſe things conſidered, we may ſee the ſtrength of the Argument in Verſe 19. How much leſs on them who dwell in houſes of clay, &c. As if he ſhould ſay, Foraſmuch as Angels cannot ſtand in competition with God, or approve themſelves in his ſight, certainly much leſs can man, how great thoughts ſoever he hath of himſelf; much leſs can man be juſtified in his ſight, who comes ſo many degrees short of Angelical perfections; for his soul which is within him, though it be a noble and a spiritual substance, and that wherein he is most like to Angels, yet this soul of his sojourns, dwells and acts in a body composed of corruptible clay, and hath no better a foundation (in a natural capacity, then the very dust: And so subject is this man to mortality, thus composed of dust and clay, as, what through the inward distempers of his body, what through outward accidents and casualties, he is as transitory, and as subject to death, as the meanest worm, as the poorest creature in the world; he is crushed before the moth.

How much less on them that dwell in houses of clay?

Particula אפס pro quo est simpliciter אלא hoc loco ut transeat, de- signat, &c. vel quanto minus vel quanto magis. Drus.

The Hebrew bears a double rendring; either, how much less (as we) or, how much more: If it be rendred how much less; then it refers to the first clause of the former verse; thus, if he puts no trust in his Angels, then much less doth he put trust in men, who dwell in houses of clay. If it be rendred, how much more, then it refers to the latter clause of that verse; thus, If he charged his Angels with folly, then how much more may he charge them with folly who dwell in houses of clay? Which words are a description of man, either in his civil condition, or in his natural constitution. Some take these words in the very letter, the house, for that which we ordinarily call a house, the house wherein man ordinarily inhabits; as if Eliphaz had thus said, Angels dwell in heaven, they have everlasting mansions; but man dwells in a house of clay: the best and goodliest houses are but clay and dust, a little refined and sublimated by art or nature; brick and stone, all these materials are but dirt concocted by the heat of fire and Sun: So that, if the allusion were to the very houses in which mankind dwells, in opposition to the habitation of Angels, these set them far inferiour to, and below the Angels. As these take it for the house wherein man lives, so some understand it, of the house where man lies, being dead, namely, the Grave. The Chaldee is expres, paraphrasing thus, How much more the wicked, who dwell in a Sepulcher of clay? That the grave is called a house, the Prophet helps us, Isa. 14. 18, 19. All the Kings of the Nations, even all of them, lie in glory, every one in his own house, that is, in the grave, as the next words prove; But thou art cast out of thy grave, &c. But I rather take it (as was before intimated) to be an expression of mans natural constitution; He dwells in a house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust: And so the Apostle is expres (2 Cor. 5. 1.) If our earthly house of this Tabernacle were dissolved; the earthly house is the body; and (2 Cor. 4. 7.) the body is called an earthen vessel, we have this treasure (namely the precious promises and truths of God in the dispensation of the Gospel) in earthen vessels. We, dying men, preach eternal life; we have death in our faces, while the word of life is in our mouths. The word here used, signifies clay, either wrought or unwrought, either natural slimie dirt, or dirt made up for use by art: So, Gen. 11. 3. When they attempted the building of that Tower, it is said, they had slime for morter; it is the word of the Text, which is used for both slime and morter; they had slime (which is natural) for morter, that is (by art & industry) they made morter of slime: The body of man is a house of clay, but not of rude natural clay; the power, and (if I may so speak) the art of God hath wrought it beyond it self, and refined it for this goodly building, the body of man.

חמר Turbidus, lutulentus, mixtus, ut cum aquæ turbantur, & in eis lutum ita commiscitur, ut confundantur & in unum misceantur, ut in cementum digerantur.

The body of man is called a house, or a building, in two respects. First, Because of the comely fabrick; it is set up by line or by rule; there is admirable architecture, admirable skill in building and raising up the body of man, story after story, room after room, and contrivance after contrivance, in all so compact and set together, that the most curious piles in the world are but rude heaps compared to it; so then in respect of the frame and structure, it is fitly called a house.

Hoc corpus lutum domus animæ dicitur, quia anima humana quantum ad aliquid est in corpore, sicut homo in domo, vel sicut nauta in navi, in quantum scilicet est motor corporis; anima autem non unitur corpori accidentaliter sed forma iter, ut forma materiæ, dicitur enim materia fundamentum formæ, eo quod est prima pars in generatione, sicut fundamentum in constitutione domus. Aquin.

Secondly, The frame of the body is called a house, in respect of the soul; the soul dwells in or inhabits the body, as the whole man inhabits or dwells in a house; the soul guides and orders the body, as the inhabitant orders the affairs of the house; or, as the Mariner and Pilot steer and direct the motions of the Ship: Not that the soul is in the body accidently (we must not strain the similitude so far) as a man is in a house, or a Mariner is in the Ship: there is a formal union between the body and the soul; only the soul is said to dwell in the body, and the body or the matter is after called a foundation, because there is the beginning. Man was begun at his body, as the house is at the foundation. First, God formed man (that is, the body) out of the dust of the earth, and then he breathed into him the breath of life, and man became a living soul.

corpus humanum lutũ dicitur, quod ex terra & aqua gravioribus elementis abundantius constat. Aq.

Thus the body is a house, and it is a house of clay, or a house of earth, so called, chiefly in two respects.

First, Because of the matter of it; it is made of earth. Though all Elements (as Naturalists teach) meet in mixt bodies, yet earth is predominant in gross or heavy bodies.

Secondly, Because of the continuance of it, or the means by which it is supported; for as it was at the first framed out of the earth, so it is still supported and maintained by earth; earthly creatures, meat and drink, with such like accommodations, continue and repair this house from day to day, until at last, it be laid down in the dust, and return to earth again. So then, it is called an earthly house, not only from the matter of which it is made, but also from the means by which it is kept in repair, earth and earthy all.

Whose foundation is in the dust.

These words aggravate the weakness of mans condition. Suppose man were formed out the dust, and were but clay, yet, had he a strong foundation, that would support and strengthen him. The strength of a building is in the foundation, and that building whose walls are but weak, may stand long, being firmly founded. The Church of Christ is weak of it self; but because the Church hath such a mighty foundation, Christ the Rock, a living and unmoveable Rock: (that confession of Peter, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God, is the Churches foundation-rock) therefore the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. But when the building is weak, and the foundation weak too, in how tottering a condition is such a building? Mans foundation is but sand or dust; and the word signifies flying, light, unstable, moveable dust, such as lies on the surface of the earth, and is plaid about with every puff of wind, though some (I confess) take the word not strictly, for this flying dust, but for slimie dust, or dust moistened, which is slime. This was the matter out of which God created man (Gen. 2. 7.) dust out of the earth, or out of the dust of the earth. That dust which can hardly be collected or kept together, to make a subsistence, that is laid together as the foundation of man; His foundation is in the dust.

עפר Pulvis propriè rarior & tenuior, qualis in superficie terræ. Merc. in Gen. Significat non simpliciter pulverem, sed pulverem cœnosum & limosum. Fag. in Gen. 2. 7. Pulvis levissimus, ex quo nihil firmum aut diuturnum compingi potest.

Hence we may observe first, what the pedigree and original of man is; what treasure soever he carries about him, yet he is an earthen vessel; or as the Apostle speaks of the first man, 1 Cor. 15. 47. He is of the earth earthy. Earth is the original of man, and man himself is no better, earthy; yea the earth is called his earth; as if he had propriety in nothing but earth, Psal. 146. 4. speaking of the greatest Princes, Trust ye not in Princes, nor in the Son of man, his breath goeth forth, and he returneth to his earth. Our bodies can challenge no alliance with, or propriety in any thing but earth; it is our earth. The Wise man (Eccles. 12. 7. calls the body only an Allie to the dust, or a-kin to dust, but plain dust; Then (speaking of Death) shall the dust return to the earth as it was; it came from the earth, and in death it returns to the same point from whence it set out.

A second thing we may take notice of from mans Original, which exceedingly advances the infinite wisdom, and the almighty power of God;

That, Dust and Earth are the matter out of which we are formed.

But doth the countenance of man represent dust and earth? Could any one say, who had nothing to judge by, but the eye, that man was made of such mean materials? what characters of Beauty and Majesty sit in his visage? how unlike is he to his own parent the Earth? Man hath received from God, not only an excellent fabrick or composure ſure of body; but if you conſider it, the very matter of which the body is compoſed, is far more excellent then earth or duſt. Take a piece of earth, or a handful of duſt, and compare them with the fleſh of man, that fleſh is earth indeed, but that fleſh is far better then meer earth. This ſhews the power of the Creator, infinitely exceeding the power of a creature. A Goldſmith can make you a goodly Jewel, but then you muſt give him Gold and precious Stones, of which to make it; he can put the matter into a better form, but he cannot make the matter better. The Engraver can make a curious Statue, exactly limb'd and proportion'd to the life, out of a rough piece, but the matter muſt be the ſame you put into his hands; if you give him Marble, it will be a Marble Statue; but he cannot mend the matter. Mans work often exceeds his matter, but mans work cannot make the matter exceed it ſelf. Now God took up a rude lump of earth, or ſubtil duſt, and he did not only put that into an excellent form, but he mended the matter alſo. Man is earth, but he is earth ſublimated and refined: Not only doth the form exceed the matter, but the matter formed exceeds the matter unformed.

Materiam ſuperabat opus.

Thirdly, As this lifts up the wiſdom and power of God, ſo it ſhould humble and lay man low.

Eliphaz improves this principle as an argument to take down the ſpirit of Job from his ſuppoſed heights and ſelf-conceits. Surely thou art great in thy own thoughts, when thou preſumeſt to enter a conteſt with God: but, look to thy Original; ſuch towring, lofty, and aſcending thoughts would quickly be abated, if thou wouldſt remember that thou art but a clod of earth, a little refined clay, moving ſlime, enlivened duſt, breathing aſhes; did we ſpiritually look upon the matter of our bodies, it would take down the ſwelling of our ſpirits; when our ſpirits are like Jordan, in the time of harveſt, overflowing all the banks of humility and moderation, this thought ſpiritualized, will bring us into our chanels again, and recall us to our own bounds and banks. Some Naturaliſts obſerve of the Bees, that when they are up and angry, do but throw a little duſt upon them, they are quiet, and hive again. Certainly, when our imaginations are buzzing and humming in the air, when they are flying and mounting up to heaven, not in holy aſpirings to God (which we ever ought) but in bold aſpirings againſt God, which we ſhould never dare, in ſuch a diſtemper of our ſpirits, if we could but caſt this duſt upon them, it would quiet and bring them in again.

Hath not man cauſe to lie as low in his thoughts, as that from whence he was extracted? ſhould not he be humbled to the duſt, who is the duſt? Eſpecially this earth ſhould be abaſed in all addreſſes to heaven, in all our approaches unto God; as Abraham, Gen. 18. 27. I have taken upon me to ſpeak unto the Lord, who am but duſt and aſhes. We ſhould never be ſo low in our own thoughts, as when we make uſe of our higheſt priviledges. And the nearer we are admitted to come to heaven, the more ſhould we (for the magnifying of free Grace, which makes this admiſſion) remember that we are but earth.

Fourthly, If the Body be but clay, and hath but a foundation of duſt; then,

Do not beſtow too much care and coſt upon your clay, upon your duſt.

How many are there who beſtow much pains to trim up a vile body, and neglect a precious ſoul? Moſt uſually they who beſtow moſt pains upon this mortal houſe of clay, beſtow leaſt about that immortal inhabitant. In an over-cared-for body, there ever dwells a neglected ſoul. You ſhall have a body cleanly waſhed, and a ſoul all filth; a body neatly cloathed and dreſt, with a ſoul all naked and unready; a body fed, and a ſoul ſtarved; a body full of the creature, and a ſoul empty of Chriſt; theſe are poor ſouls indeed. That complaint of the Moraliſt againſt Heathens, may be renewed againſt ſome Chriſtians; they are buſied moſt between the Comb and the Glaſs, and troubled more at a diſorder in their hair, then at a diſorder in the Commonwealth, (he ſaid, I ſay) then at a diſorder in the Church, or in their own hearts. It is a ſad thing that any who bear the name of a Chriſtian, ſhould ſpend much time between the Comb and the Glaſs, and but little between Ordinance and Ordinance, between the Bible and the Pulpit, between reading and hearing, between both, and holy meditation; the body is but a houſe of clay, it is but duſt, therefore be not ſo induſtrious for it. We uſually laugh at children, when they are making houſes of clay, and Pies of dirt. They whoſe care is thus over-active for the body, are but children of a greater ſtature, and ſhew, they have ſo much more folly in their hearts, then they, by how much they have more years over their heads; and are fooliſh about more ſerious matters then they. There is no Child to the old Child.

Fifthly, Seeing this houſe of clay is founded alſo in the duſt, obſerve,

That, Man is a very frail, an unſteady, and an unſtable creature; every puff muſt needs ſubject him to ruine.

Look upon his foundation, it is nothing but duſt. When Chriſt (Mat. 7. ult.) had finiſhed his Sermon upon the Mount, he compares his hearers to ſuch as build either upon the Rock, or upon the Sand; They that hear and do not, are like a houſe built upon the ſand: and what becomes of that houſe? when the rain deſcended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, that houſe fell, and the fall thereof was great. A foundation of duſt or ſand cannot ſtand out one ſtorm. The houſe of a mans body is walled and rooſed with clay, and bottomed upon no better then duſt; the ſtrength of the Church (as was touch'd before) is deſcribed by the matter of its foundation, a Rock, Mat. 19. And the new Jeruſalem (which, as it is conceived, to be the moſt pure ſtate of the Church here on earth, ſo it muſt be the ſtrongeſt) is ſet forth having twelve fonndations, and they all of ſtone, and all thoſe ſtones moſt precious, and therefore moſt durable, Rev. 21. 19. The ſtrength and ſtability of that eſtate which the Saints ſhall inherit, when theſe houſes of earth are by death levelled to the earth (the ſtability (I ſay) of that eſtate) is deſcribed under the notion of a City which hath foundations (Heb. 11. 10.) He, namely, Abraham) looked for a City which hath foundations, whoſe builder and maker is God. When the holy Ghoſt ſaith foundations, who can tell how many they may be? we can eaſily tell the feweſt they can be; two is the loweſt number; ſo that at leaſt this City hath a foundation upon a foundation. The foundation of Chriſts perfect righteouſneſs is laid upon the foundation of Gods eternal free love; here is foundation upon foundation. The City above hath theſe foundations, and therefore we receive a City that cannot be ſhaken. I note theſe things, to ſhew by conſent of Scripture, that the ſtability of any condition, in alluſion to a building, is expreſt by the ſtrength of its foundation. Now all our outward glory and excellency, our life, and all the pomp of it, hath ſcarce ſo much as deſerves to be called a foundation: a foundation of duſt hath only the name of a foundation. That Image in Daniel, which typed out all the deſcents of worldly greatneſs, had a head of Gold, the breaſt and arms of Silver, the thighs of Braſs, and the legs of Iron, but the feet were part of Iron and part of Clay. The feet are the foundation, and the feet of this Image ſpeak thus much to all the world, that all worldly pomp and greatneſs, all worldly power and Majeſty muſt fall; for the Image ſtands upon clay; and though it have a mixture of iron in the feet, which is ſtrong, yet it ſhall not ſtand by the iron which is ſtrong, but fall and be broken by the clay, which is weak. As it was in thoſe great Monarchies, into which the outward power of Nations and Kingdoms was contracted; ſo if you look upon any particular man, though you may conceive him to have a head of gold, arms and breaſt of ſilver, thighs of braſs, and legs of iron, yet when you come to the feet, the foundation of the whole body, it is but duſt, which a ſmall ſtorm will diſſipate and blow away. The body of man hath ſo weak a foundation, that it is ſome time compared to that which hath no foundation, a Tabernacle (1 Cor. 5.) If the earthly houſe of this Tabernacle were diſſolved, ſaith the Apoſtle) Now a Tabernacle hath a roof or a covering, but no foundation: The Tabernacle of the body hath a covering, but hardly any foundation, only a foundation in the duſt.

Teſtum habet, fundamentum non habet.

Laſtly, Conſider the form of ſpeaking in this Scripture; How much leſs on them that dwell in houſes of clay? He ſpeaks of the whole man, as dwelling in a houſe of clay: Now we know that a body cannot properly be ſaid to dwell in a body, the houſe doth not dwell in a houſe; yet he ſpeaks, speaks, as of a compleat person dwelling in a house of clay, which yet is to be understood of one part of the person, The soul; that dwels in a house of clay, that is, it acts and officiates in a body composed of clay. Hence observe, seeing the whole man cometh under the notion of the soul,

That, the soul of man is the man.

Non quod anima sit homo, ut quidam posuerunt, dicentes hominem nihil aliud esse quam animam inditam corpori; sed quia anima est principalior pars hominis, unumquodq; autē consuevit appellari id quod est in eo principalius. Aquin. in loc.

The soul goes away with the name of the whole person: The soul is not the man in a natural consideration, (as some have Philosophiz'd, asserting that man is nothing but a soul cloathed with a body) for, man is man by the union of soul and body; and the perfection of man as man, consists in that union; but the soul is the man in a moral consideration, because it is the more noble and excellent part of man: and it is usual to denominate the whole from that part which is more excellent. The body is but as the Cabinet, the soul is the Jewel; the body is but as the sheath or the scabbard, the soul is as the knife or the sword: You know when a man buyeth a sword, he buyeth a scabbard too; or when he buyeth a knife, he buyeth the sheath too; yet he saith, this knife cost me so much, or I gave so much for this sword; he makes no mention of the scabbard or of the sheath: now the body is the sheath or scabbard of the soul, (Dan. 7. 15.) you have it expresst so, I was grieved (saith the Prophet) in my spirit in the midst of my body, so we translate it, but the Chaldee is (and so we have in some Margents) in the midst of my sheath; The soul is the blade, a blade of admirable metal and temper; the body how beautiful soever by nature, or gay by art, is but a velvet, or an embossed sheath and scabbard: Therefore at first, when God formed man out of the dust of the earth, and had breathed into him the breath of life, the result of all is, and man became a living soul; it is not said man became a living body, though life was breathed into the body, and the body stood up and lived; yet the best part is named for all, the dust and the clay are (as it were) quite forgotten in the story, man became a living soul. And that may be a reason, why the fear of God and keeping his Commandments (Eccles. 12. ult.) is called all man, because the things chiefly concern that part of man, which (upon the matter) is all man. The fear of God and keeping his Commandments, are soul work, and tend to the eternal welfare of the soul; and though the body shares in all the blessings, and assists in most labours of the soul; yet the soul labours most for, and is the chiefest seat of blessedness. How strangely have some departed from this point of truth, which the Scripture every where writes as with a Sun-beam? who instead of making the soul to be the chief part of man, deny that man hath any such part. And whereas some (toucht at before) err'd on the right hand, saying that man was nothing but a soul; these go astray more, and more dangerously on the left hand, saying, that man hath no soul at all: An opinion, howsoever lately drest in some fineness of wit and subtilties of Philosophy; yet in it self, so gross, so dishonourable to man, so contrary to this Text and the whole tenor of the word of God, that I hope it is very mortal, and will shortly find a grave in every heart, but theirs, who have more reason to wish it, then to maintain it. I intend no dispute about it, beyond the Argument before me; which if it be not demonstrative (as many others from Scripture are) yet it carries (at least) a fair probability aud an ingenuous ground: For how can man be said to dwell in a house of clay, if he himself be nothing else but a house of clay? or how can the inhabitant and the house be in all, but one, and the same?

But I shall dwell too long upon these houses of clay, in which man cannot dwell long, for it follows;

Which are crushed before the moth.

What strength is there in houses which are crushed before the moth? or as others read it, which shall be consumed after the manner of a moth? Mr. Broughton thus, Beaten to powder as a moth be they; that is, they are crushed as soon, or as speedily as a moth. Another, They are consumed as it were with a moth. A fifth translates differently from all these, which are crushed and consumed before Arcturus. Arcturus is a constellation in Heaven about the North Pole; we read in the 9. Chapter of Job, ver. 9. Which makes Arcturus, Orion and the Pleiades, &c. The same word here, signifies a moth, and sometimes a constellation, a knot or company of Stars: The sence of this reading is made out thus; they are crushed before the face of Arcturus, that is, they are crushed as long, or whilest Arcturus doth continue; in plain English, as long as there is a Star in Heaven, man will be a mortal man; or man will never change this condition of mortality, while the world stands. We may thus expound it, by that (Psal. 72. 17.) where the Prophet describing the Kingdom of Christ in the extent both of place and time, saith, His name shall be continued as long as the Sun; the Hebrew is His name shall continue before the face of the Sun; to continue before the face of the Sun, is to run in a line of equal continuance with the Sun; so here, they are crushed before the face of those Stars, that is, they shall be in such a crushing, perishing condition, as long as those Stars continue, which is, as long as the course of this world continues. Our own translation, which comes clear to the letter of the Original, is further to be looked into. They are crushed before the moth. It may have a three-fold interpretation. First, Before the moth, that is, before in time, or sooner then the moth. How quickly is a moth crushed? man may be crushed before it, sooner then it is crusht. Secondly, Before the moth, may be as much as, in presence of the moth; as if he should say, man thinks he is able to stand it out against a potent Adversary, yea, against God himself; but, alas poor creature, he is not able to stand before a moth, or contend with a fly, if God arm any of them against him. Thirdly, They are crushed before the moth, that is, man is crusht and torn, vext and worn out by a thousand miseries and troubles which attend his life, before ever the moth hath to do with him, before ever he lyes down in the bed of death, before the moth, that is, for the moth to fret on, or as a companion for the worms.

All these rendrings, though they differ in words, come near and meet in the same general sence, namely, An illustration of mans frailty. Take them first by way of similitude, Man is crushed, as it were, with a moth; it notes thus much to us, That death consumes us without noise, secretly and silently: To do a thing as a moth, is to do it silently and without noise, Hosea 5. 12. God himself saith, That he will be as a moth unto Ephraim, and as a Lion, vers. 14. When he saith, he will be as a Lion, it implieth open judgments, which come violently and visibly, which come in like thunder, roaring as a Lion upon them: But when he saith, I will be as a moth to Ephraim, the meaning is, I will send silent and secret judgments upon you, which shall eat out your strength, corrode your power, and blemish the beauty of your garments, and you shall not perceive it: Ye shall be undone, consumed, and (as we speak Proverbially) ye shall never know who hurt you. The open enemies of the Church are threatned with secret judgments, under this notion of a moth, Isa. 50. 9. Lo they shall wax old as doth a garment, the moth shall consume them. Again, Chap. 51. 6, 7. Fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their reviling. For the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool: that is, whereas your enemies have made a great noise and clamour with their revilings against you; I will come against them without noise, they shall perish with as little clamour as a garment doth, that is eaten with moths. And thus the life of man is ordinarily consumed (as it were) by a moth; sicknesses and diseases enter secretly, into his house of clay, they lye in the frame, and between the rafters of this house, sucking up the spirits, and wasting the strength, spending the heat, and drinking up the natural moisture of the body; we know not how we consume, but we consume; we know not how we decline, but we decline; we dye, we know not how, but we dye: Is it not then as with a moth, creeping upon us, yea, feeding upon us without noise?

Again, Take it by way of similitude, not as before, actively, or instrumentally, they are crushed as by a moth, or as a moth crushes; but passively or subjectively, They are crushed as a moth, that is, they are crushed as a moth is crushed, alluding to the easiness of crushing a moth: A moth is dust as soon as you crush it, the least touch kills it: Man in his house of clay is so weak, that if God do but touch him, he dies and falls to dust; the Lord needs not bring his great Artillery,

Artillery, and make batteries against the body of man; the body of man is no such strong Fort or Bulwark to stand out a long siege, or endure much assaulting and opposition; he is crushed as a moth between your fingers: Hence David most humbly deprecates the stroak of God, which he saw coming, or felt as come, because he was not able to bear it, Psal. 39. 10. Remove thy stroak away from me, I am consumed by the blow of thine hand, (Lord if thou strike me thus, I shall quickly consume.) And lest you should think that Davids flesh (he being a King) was tender and delicate, and so less able to bear any hardship, therefore in the following words, he puts the case in general concerning man or man-kind. Take the man whose strength is as the strength of stones, and his flesh as brass; yet this man breaks and vanishes under the hand of God, so he affirms, ver. 11. under this passive consideration of a Moth, When thou with rebuke doth correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a Moth; (And then closes with that common axiome of mans mortality) surely every man is vanity, Selah.

Further, Man may well be said to be crushed, or dye even as a moth, for as the garment breeds the moth, and then the moth eats the garment; so (besides that power of God, or the out-ward stroak of his hand, of which David spake) mans own distempered body breeds ill humours, they diseases, and these breed death: As it was with Jonas gourd, so it is with us, we give life and suck to a worm in our own roots, which sucks out our life, causing our leaves to fall, and our goodly branches suddenly to wither.

Thirdly, From that sence, he is crushed before Arcturus, or as long as the Stars continue, Observe;

That, as mans state is frail and weak, so it will be, the for ever of this world.

Do not look that ever there shall rise up a generation of men, that shall have better houses then houses of clay, or houses stronger built then our present buildings. As we are risen up in our fathers stead, a generation of sinful men; so we are risen up in our fathers stead, a generation of weak mortal men: and our children will arise in the stead of us their fathers, a generation of men, as mortal as we their fathers. Till the whole compages and course of nature be changed, man shall not exchange the infirmity of his nature, He shall never be without crushing sicknesses, till he is above them.

The said story of man holds on still, and grows yet more sad; before it was crushing, now it is destroying.

Verse 20. They are destroyed from morning to evening' they perish for ever without any regarding it.

We may understand the former verse of natural death, and this of casual and violent death. Destruction and perishing, import violence; though I conceive natural death be here also intended. They are destroyed from morning to evening, they perish for ever without any regarding it; or as Mr. Broughton reads it, between a morning and evening, they are wasted without any regarding, or without any thinking upon it.

A mane ad vesperam, i. e. per totum diem, quippe mane & vespera sunt partes diei. Drus.

They are destroyed.] That is, they are subject or liable to destruction: That phrase from morning to evening, notes the whole day: it is as much as to say, they are destroyed continually, or all the day long, as the Apostle speaks out of the Psalm, Rom. 8. 36. For thy sake are we killed all the day long: the morning and the evening are the parts of a natural day, Gen. 1. 5. or the two terms of a civil day, and these include and take in the full compass of the day.

This sence teacheth us, That, man is destroyable every moment.

He wastes in one sence, while he grows; and dyes, from the morning of his birth, and coming into the world, to the evening of his return, and going out of the world: And not only so, but he is obnoxious to the violent assaults of death every day, and all hours of every day: From the morning when he rises, to the evening when he goes to bed, he walks among armies of dangers, and within the Gun-shot of destruction. The Apostles Catalogue of perils is true to this day, 2 Cor. 11. 26. In perils of Waters, in perils of Robbers, in perils of mine own Country-men, in perils by the Heathen, in perils in the City, in perils in the Wilderness, in perils in the Sea, in perils among false Brethren: Every place is a peril, and every person a peril. Where can we go, with whom can we meet, and not go among or meet with perils? And do not all these perils speak destruction from morning to evening? Pauls experiences, both in regard of a natural, but especially of violent death, brought forth these conclusions, which come full up to the point, I dye dayly, (1 Cor. 15. 31.) in deaths often (2 Cor. 11. 23.) we are killed all the day long (Rom. 8. 36.)

Secondly, Take the words as a proverbial speech, by which the shortest time is signified. As (Isa. 38. 12.) Hezekiah complaining, sets forth his mortal sickness, threatning present death and cutting off, thus, Mine age is departed and removed from me as a shepherds Tent; I have cut off like a Weaver my life, he will cut me off with pining sickness, from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me; that is, either continually or suddenly: from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me, I am wasting perpetually: or before night, within the compass of this day thou wilt destroy and make an end of me: these were the thoughts of my heart, when I was in the hands of that acute dispatching disease. The Psalmist (Psal. 90. 5, 6.) describes man as grass, In the morning it flourisheth and groweth up, in the evening it is cut down and withereth; that is, man continueth but a very short time: His life is but a span long, or but as a day long. Jonahs Gourd came up in a night, and perished in a night; and man cometh up in the morning, and perisheth in the evening. The Naturalists speak of a Fly, they call Ephemeron, a creature of one day, which comes forth in the morning, is very active about noon, but when the Sun declineth, it declines too, and sets with the setting of the Sun. Man is an Ephemeron, a creature of one day; for howsoever his life consisteth of many days, and is often lengthened out to many years; yet between morning and evening, or from morning to evening, he is destroyed. The first step he sets upon the stage of the world, is a going out of the world; his ascending to the height of his natural perfection, hath in it a descent. One part of his life compared with another, is an increase; but the whole, in reference to his end, is a decrease: his life is but a breathing death, life shortning as fast as it lengthens; his life is death hastning upon him continually. A hand breadth is quickly measured; Behold (saith David, Psal. 39. 5.) thou hast made my dayes a hand breadth; nothing needs no time to pass it in: mans age, in it self, is but little, and comparatively it is nothing; it falls under no calculation before the face of Eternity. Mine age is nothing before thee.

But though the life of man be thus short, and himself be destroyed between a morning and an evening; yet death lasts long, they perish for ever without any regarding.

They perish for ever.] Death it seems is everlasting. They perish; the word is often used in this book for the dissolution of soul and body, not for the annihilation of either, as perishing properly imports: to perish, is here but to dye, for thus even the righteous perish, and no man lays it to heart, Isa. 57. 1.

But doth man perish thus, dyes he for ever? Shall there not be a return, a resurrection, shall not soul and body be re-united? How is it said then, they perish or dye for ever? εἰς χρόνον αἰώνιον.

For ever,] is sometime put for an infinite time, and sometime for an indefinite time, 1 Chron. 23. 25. The Lord God of Israel hath given rest unto his people, that they may dwell in Jerusalem for ever. And yet the Jews are now so far from dwelling in Jerusalem, that they have scarce rest or dwelling among any people. The like sence of for ever, read 1 Kings 2. 33. Psal. 132. 12, 14. Yet further, for ever is put for the finite time of one mans life, 1 Sam. 27. 12. He shall be my servant for ever, that is, as long as he lives; Psal. 23. 6. I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever; that is, as long as I live. In the Text before us, for ever, is as long as this world lasts; it notes the utmost term of time, not (which is without term) eternity. They perish for ever, that is, they shall not live in this world any more; as (Job 14. 14.) If a man dye, shall he live again? As if he had said, man can dye but once; he cannot live again, that is, in this world; shall he any more re-return to his house, to his wife and children, to his riches or honours, and shall he here again enjoy such an estate as he had before? That (Psal. 103. 16.) explains it so, As for man, his days are as grass, as a flower of the field so he flourisheth; for the wind passeth over it, and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more; that is, he shall never return to that local place, or civil place in which he lived; he shall not return to that place of Magistracy or Ministry, to that place of merchandizing or trading, of husbandry or handicraft, where he convers'd before. Thus his place will know him no more. Man dyes but once, and therefore when he dyes, he is said to dye for ever. There is a second death, but it is only a second condition of life. Some shall so live for ever, that they shall be dying for ever. The misery of all men here, is, that they are dying while they live; the misery of the damned hereafter, will be, that they are living while they dye. We see then, that as life is a continual going out of the world; so from death there is no returning to the world, they perish for ever; when once you dye, you are dead for good and all (as we say;) there's an end, in respect of any work proper to this world, whether Natural, Civil, or Spiritual. A dying man perishes for ever from eating and drinking, from any outward content or pleasure. When Barzillai was (as it were but) upon the borders of death, and confines of the grave, (2 Sam. 19. 25.) he be speaks David thus, who had invited him to Court, Can I taste what I eat and drink? (and it follows) Can I any more hear the voice of Singing-men and Singing-women? Can I any more? As if he had said, I am now nigh unto death, these delights are gone, they are perished for ever, I can hardly taste any thing I eat or drink; the pleasant Voice or musical Instrument, can I any more hear? Much more then in death it self are all these outward comforts perished, and will perish for ever.

Again, In respect of civil works, he that dyes perisheth for ever; no more buying, or selling, or trading, or dealing, all these things are past, and past for ever. Yea, death puts an end to all spiritual works, such as were the Saints exercise and duty upon the earth; at the grave, there's an end of them also; a dying man perishes for ever, in respect of repenting or believing, in respect of praying or hearing the word. These are heavenly works, but the time for these is, while you are upon the earth, none of these labours are in Heaven or Hell, no, nor in the grave whither thou goest, as the Preacher concludes (Eccles. 9. 10.) Therefore (Isa. 38. 18.) Hezekiah in his sickness, makes it one part of his suit to God, that he might be spared, For (saith he) the grave cannot praise thee, they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth; the living, the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day. To praise God shall be the work of Saints for ever; and yet the Saints dying are truly said to perish for ever, from praising God. All that praise shall cease in death, which belongs to the ways of grace; and then such praise begins as suits with glory, which is our end. That Hezekiah means it of such praise, and not of all praise, is clear from his own words, Verse 20. We will sing my songs to the stringed Instruments, all the days of our life, in the house of the Lord; that is, in the ordinances of thy publick worship. They that are in the house of the grave, cannot praise the Lord in his house. And though the praises of the Lord in Heaven are transcendent, and more perfect then those in his house on Earth; yet it is a higher act of grace to desire to live to praise God, then to be willing to dye that we may praise him, because in this we deny our selves most: Praising God on earth is a work as well as a reward; but praising God in Heaven is a reward rather then a work. And we put forth the most spiritual acts of grace, when we cheerfully go on with a work which we know stands between us and the best part of our reward. But I return to the Text.

They perish for ever without any regarding,] or without any laying it to heart. The word heart is not in the mouth, but it is in the heart of this Scripture. For the sence is parallel with that, Isa. 57. The righteous perish, and no man lays it to heart. The Chaldee gives a strange gloss, They perish or dye because no man giveth them medicine; as if he had said, there is no Physitian can give an Antidote against death, or by any medicines prolong mans life. It is a truth, that the decayes and ruines of Nature, will at last exceed the repairs of Art: but this gloss hath little regard to the Text, which we translate well, They perish without any regarding it, that is, none or very few regarding it. The negative is not absolutely universal, excluding all, as if there were none in the world who take notice of the shortness and frailty of mans life, or of his for ever perishing condition. So in that place of Isaiah, The righteous perish, and no man layes it to heart; that is, there are very few, scarce any to be found who lay to heart (in comparison of the number which neglect) the death of righteous men.

Observe hence, Few of the living regard how suddenly others do, or themselves may dye.

Till we see a friend gasping and dying, till we see him bedewed with cold sweats, and rackt with Convulsions, till our eye thus affects our hearts, our hearts are seldom affected with the sense of our mortality. It is one Reason why Solomon advises to go to the house of mourning, Eccles. 7. It is better to go to the house of mourning, then to the house of mirth; for (saith he) that is the way of all men (all must dye) and the living will lay it to heart, or the living will regard it. As if he had said, the living seldom lay death to heart, till they come to the house of death: he seems to promise for the living, that then they will: yet his undertaking is not so strict, as if every man that goes to the house of mourning, did certainly lay it to heart: but he speaks probably, that if living man will at any time lay death to heart, then surely he will when he goes to the house of mourning. When will a man think of death, if not when he sees death? And looks into that dark chamber of the grave? There are many who lay it to heart only then: for a fit at a Funeral, they have a passion of the heart about mortality. And very many have gone so often to the house of mourning, that they are grown familiar with Death, and the frequency of those meetings take off all impressions of mortality from their hearts. As we say of those Birds that build and roost in steeples, being used to the continual ringing of the bells, the sound disquiets them not: or as those that dwell near the fall of the River Nylus, the noise of the water deafens them so, that they mind it not. Many have been so often at the grave, that now the grave is worn out of their hearts; they look upon it as a matter of custom and formality, for men to dye and be buried; and when the solemnity of death is over, the thoughts of death are over: as soon as the grave is out of their sight, preparations for the grave are out of mind. It is storied, (2 Sam. 20. 12.) that when Amasa was slain by Joab, and lay wallowing in his blood, in the midst of the high way, every one that came by him stood still; but anon Amasa is removed out of the high way into the field, and a cloth cast upon him, and then (the Text saith) all the people went on after Joab. It is so still, we make a stop at one that lies gasping and groaning, at one that lies bleeding and dying; but let a cloth be thrown over him, and he drawn aside, put into the grave, and covered with earth; then we go to our business, to trading and dealing, yea to coveting and sinning, as if the last man (that ever should be) were buried. Thus men perish for ever, without any regarding. If this kind of perishing were more regarded, or regarded by more, fewer would perish. Thoughts of death spiritualiz'd have life in them: thoughts of death laid to the heart, are a good medicine for an evil heart. It follows, Verse 21. Doth not their excellency which is in them go away? They dye, even without wisdom.

This Verse (as I noted in the beginning) prevents an objection which might be made, as if man had wrong done him: and that it were too great a diminution to his honour, whom God made the chief creature in the inferior world, and but little inferior to Angels themselves, that he should be looked upon only as a heap of dust, or a lump of clay, as a mortal momentany perishing creature, therefore he grants that man hath an excellency; but all the excellency that he hath, whether natural or artificial, bred in him, or acquired by him, as a man, when he goes, goes too; Doth not their excellency which is in them go away? Or journieth not their excellency with them? As Mr. Broughton translates, alluding to our passing out of the world, as in a journey; when a man dyes he takes a journey out of the world.

world, he goes out for ever; and (saith he) doth not his excellency journey along with him? Yes, the question affirms it; when man goes, his excellency goes too. The word (jether) which we translate excellency, signifies primarily, a residue, or a remain, and that two wayes. First, a residue of persons, Judges 7. 6. But all the rest of the people bowed down on their knees to drink water. So the Vulgar understands it here. They who are left after them, shall be taken away from them; namely, their heirs or posterity.

Secondly, It signifies a residue of things, Psal. 17. 14. Where describing worldly men, who have their portion in this life, he saith, Their bellies are filled with hid treasure, they are also full of children, and leave the rest of their substance to their babes. Thus others take it here, Doth not the wealth and riches which men leave when they die, die also, and go away? as their persons are mortal, so are their estates; there is a Moth will eat them both. And as the word signifies a quantitative remainder, or overplus, both of persons and things; so also a qualitative excess or remainder, or that which exceeds in quality; any excess in the goodness of a quality, is called excellency. Thus Jacob calls Reuben, in regard of his primogeniture, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power; yet blots him in the next verse, because of his sin; thou shalt not excel, Gen. 49. 3, 4. This sense of the word suits well with the scope of the Text in hand. His excellency, that is, whatsoever doth excel, or is best in him. But what is that? Some by his Excellency understand the Soul; as if he had said, that best part of man, the Soul, which may be opposed to clay and dust before spoken of, that noble guest, that royal inhabitant of this house of clay, goeth out when Death enters. Death dissolves the union between soul and body.

Jather, quod est superesse, non solum excessum quantitatis significat, sed etiã qualitatis dignitatis, sicut verbum Latinum supero, non solum superesse, sed etiã vincere, & excellere. Pined. חבם בם

Or rather, we may take excellency for any special endowment; first of the body, as beauty or strength. Secondly, of the mind, as wit and knowledge, learning or skill. Thirdly, We may take it for those worldly excellencies of riches, honour or authority; when a man goeth out, all these excellencies which are in him, or which are about him, go out too. This excellency is the same which is called the goodliness of man, by the Prophet (Isa. 40. 6.) The voyce said cry; what shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field; not only is the flesh, but the goodliness thereof fading also. So here, not only the house of clay, and the foundation of dust, but the excellency of it, all the adorning and polishing, the guilding and painting, the rich hanging and precious furniture of this house go away.

Taking excellency here for the soul, then we see wherein our excellency consists.

As man was the principal part of the Creation, so the Soul is the principal part of man.

The constitution of the Soul is mans natural excellency, and the conversion of the Soul is mans spiritual excellency.

Secondly, Observe, Death is the going away, or the departure of the soul from the body.

Death is called sometime a departure of body and soul out of the world. Now letteſt thou thy servant depart in peace (saith old Simeon, Luke 2.) Man goes to his long home, Eccles. 12. 5. I go the way of all flesh, saith Moses; and, I go away, saith our Lord Christ of his death. Death is also called a departure of the soul from the body. The death of Rachel is thus described, Gen. 35. 18. And it came to pass, that as her soul was in departing (for she died.

From the other interpretation, which I rather insist upon; observe,

That, In death all a mans natural and outward excellency whatsoever, leaves him, and departs from him.

Psal. 49. 16. Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house increases; why, For when he dieth, he shall carry nothing away with him; his glory shall not descend after him. Though a man have an excellent outside, a great stock of riches, beauty and honour, though he hath excellent linings of wisdom and knowledge, yet all ends, as to him, when he ends; and therefore David concludes (Psal. 39.) Man at his best state, or, in his best estate, is altogether vanity. The excellencies that are in him go away, in that day all his thoughts perish; his counsels and his projects perish with him. One of the Ancients standing by Cæsar's Tomb (who was one of the most accomplish'd men in the world, for natural, civil and moral excellencies, learned, valiant, noble, rich and powerful) he (I say) standing by Cæsar's Tomb, wept, and cried out, Where is now the flourishing beauty of Cæsar? what is become of his magnificence? where are the Armies now? where the honour of Cæsar? where are now the victories, the Triumphs and Trophies of Cæsar? All's gone, all's departed, the goodliness of them is as the flower of the field; his excellency which was in him, is gone away. And thus it will be said of all those, (who without grace) are most excellent in any thing below. Though your clay be curiously wrought, and stampt with such beauty, as renders you almost Angelical to the eye of others; though your bodies are strongly joynted, and blessed with such health as renders your lives most active and comfortable to your selves; though your minds are stored with variety of learning, and you know as much as is knowable in the whole circle of nature, or of times; yet when Death comes, all these excellencies go away. Nothing will stay by us then, and go (not from us, but) with us, but the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord, for whom (Paul did, and) we ought to suffer the loss of all things, and count them but dung, that we may win Christ (Phil. 3. 8.) For notwithstanding all other knowledge and wisdom, we shall die, and conclude (as this Chapter concludes of man) without wisdom. They die even without wisdom, or word for word They die not, and in wisdom. We may understand it two wayes. First, (as if he had said) though men are excellent in wisdom, yet they die, their wisdom is to them in death, as if they had no wisdom; they have no more priviledge or defence against the stroke of death, by all their wisdom, learning and knowledg, then fools or brute beasts, who have no wisdom, no knowledge at all. They die even without wisdom, or, even as if they had no wisdom. Died Abner as a fool dieth? said mourning David, 2 Sam. 3. 33. yea, Abner died as a fool dieth. And so, in one sence, do the wisest of men. He was the wisest of all the children of men, and he spake it by the wisdom of God, who asking this question, How dieth the wise man? answers, as the fool, Eccles. 2. 16. Let not any man pride himself in the excellency of his wisdom; for that he dwells in a house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust: his frailty is not curable by his excellency, nor his mortality conquerable by his wisdom; he shall die as if he had no wisdom. And some who have most worldly wisdom, die with least; yea, they die with the greatest folly. Not in wisdom, may be an extenuation, or a more gentle, easie expression, for, in abundance of folly. I remember, it is observed concerning Paracelsus (a great Physitian, a man exceedingly vers'd in Chymical experiments) that he bragg'd and boasted, he had attained to such wisdom, in discerning the constitutions of men, and studying remedies, that whosoever did follow his rules, and keep to his directions, should never die by any disease; casually he might, and of age he must; but he would undertake to secure his health against diseases? a bold undertaking! But he who by his art promised to protect others to extream old age, from the arrest of death, could not, by all his art or power, make himself a protection in the prime of his youth, but died even as one without wisdom, before, or when he had seen but thirty. Secondly, They die without wisdom, that is, they cannot carry their wisdom away with them; as not their worldly riches and pomp, so nor their worldly wisdom and knowledge, chap. 36. 12.

Thirdly, They die even without wisdom, that is, they prepare not wisely for death. This is the condition of most men, their excellency goes away with them, and they die without wisdom; they have had wisdom, but they die as if they had none, that is, they apply not their wisdom while they live, to fit themselves for death; they die before they understand what it is to live, or why they live. This wisdom is wanting in most men; and of all such the Psalmist concludes to this sence of the place, Man being in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish, Psal. 49. 20. That is, he perishes foolishly, and without wisdom, like a beast, though in his life a man of honour and excellency. He that dies unpreparedly, dies foolishly. It is the wisdom of man to live in the world, in the medi-meditation of, and preparation for his departure out of this world. And it is such a wisdom as is above man; therefore David prayes, Psal. 39. 4. Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my dayes, what it is; that I may know how frail I am: As if he had said, Lord, I have been considering this and that thing (haply David's thoughts were in the dust, and he had been handling the clay out of which he was made) yet saith he, by all those considerations of my natural constitution, I cannot bring my heart to be so sensible of my frailty, as I ought to be; therefore he turns himself to God, Lord make me to know this thing. Here is our wisdom, when we seek to God to spiritualize natural considerations, and make them effectual for the attaining of this wisdom, the knowing of our end, and the measure of our dayes.

But is it not some ignorance of our duty to petition for the knowledge of our end? May we desire to know what God hath no where promised to reveal? To petition for the literal knowledg of our end, that is, what year or day our lives shall end, is a sinful curiosity, and a presumptuous intrusion into the secret will of God: but to petition for a spiritual knowledge of our end, that is, how we may end well any day of the year, or any hour of the day, in an holy duty, and an humble submission of our selves to the revealed will of God; thus to know our end, how soon ceasing (as one translates) short-liv'd and brittle ware we be; thus to know, how defective we are (as the Greek renders it) or what we lack, namely, to the end of our dayes, is above the instruction of any creature. We may preach, and you hear of death, as long as you and we live, and yet not know the frailty of our lives, till God makes us know it; therefore (saith he) Lord, make me to know how frail I am; none could teach him this Lesson, but God himself. The same holy desires are breathed out, Psal. 90. 12. So teach us to number our dayes, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom; as if Moses had said, Lord, I have been numbring my dayes my self, and telling over my life; I can tell no further then three or four score, and yet, though I can tell no further, I cannot apply my heart unto wisdom; we need but little Arithmetick to number our dayes, but we need a great deal of Grace to number them. And a child may be wise enough to number the dayes of an old man; and yet that old man a child, in numbring his own dayes, that is, not able to number his own dayes so, as to apply his heart to wisdom. To number them so, is a very special point of wisdom; the true Christian Philosophy; perfectly to meditate on death, is the perfection of life. And it is therefore our wisdom to die well, because we can die but once: A man had need do to that wisely, which he can do no more. An error in death, is like an errour in war, you cannot commit it twice. We have most reason to look to it, not to err at all, where it is not possible to err again. Actually to err twice, is more sinful; but not to have a possibility of erring twice, is most dangerous. We transgress the Laws of living, over and over a thousand thousand times; but as for the Laws of dying, no man ever transgressed them a second time. That we so often transgress the law of living, is an aggravation of sin upon all men. And that we can transgress the law of dying but once, is the seal of misery upon most men. Let us then cry unto God, to be taught this great wisdom, how to die, and not without wisdom.

CHAP. V. Vers. 1, 2.

Call now, if there be any that will answer thee; and to which of the Saints wilt thou turn? For wrath killeth the foolish, and envy slayeth the silly one.

The five first verses of this Chapter, contain the fourth Argument, by which Eliphaz goes on to convince Job of sinful hypocrisie. And the conviction is made two wayes, from a twofold comparison. First, He compares Job to the Saints, and finds him unlike to them. Secondly, He compares Job to the wicked, and finds him like to them; if so, then Job must needs be a hypocrite, who had carried it fair all the while in the world, for a great Professor, and yet, when he comes to the trial, was unlike all the Saints, and most like the wicked of the world. The first Argument may be thus framed;

He is not a just or a holy man, who in his affliction is altogether unlike holy and just men.

But Job, thou in thy affliction, art altogether unlike holy and just men:

Therefore thou art not a holy or a just man.

The Proposition is implied: the Minor or the Assumption is in the first verse; Call now, if there be any that will answer thee; and to which of the Saints wilt thou turn? As if he should say, Enquire as much as thou wilt, thou shalt find none among the Saints like thy self; they who have been somewhat like thee (of whom thou shalt find but few) in the troubles which thou hast born, even those thou wilt find altogether unlike thee, in bearing those troubles. Scarce any of the godly ever suffered such things as thou hast done, but none of the godly ever did such things in their sufferings.

As he argues him, in the first verse, of hypocrisie, by his unlikeness to the Saints; so in the next words, he argues him of hypocrisie, by his likeness to the wicked: His first Argument for this, lies in the second verse; and in the three following verses, there lies a second Argument to confirm the same point: He attempts to prove Job like a fool or a wicked man, two wayes.

First, In his manner of suffering.

Secondly, In the matter of his sufferings.

First, (saith he) Thou art like a fool, or like a foolish man, like the worst of men, in the manner of thy carriage under sufferings: The Argument may be framed thus;

He that behaveth himself like a fool, or like a wicked man while he is in trouble, is a man either openly wicked, or grosly hypocritical.

But Job, thou behavest thy self like a foolish or wicked man in thy troubles:

Therefore thou art wicked, &c.

The Assumption or Minor Proposition is in the second verse; Wrath killeth the foolish, and envy slayeth the silly one. As if he should say, Thou pinest, ragest, and vexest thy self under thy sufferings, after the rate of foolish and silly ones, that is, sinful and wicked ones.

Secondly, He would prove Job to be a hypocrite, because his sufferings, for the matter of them, were like the judgments which God uses to pour forth upon wicked and ungodly men; and that Argument may be thus framed:

Wicked men flourish a while, and then sudden destruction cometh upon them; they and their children, and their whole estates are swallowed up in a moment.

But Job, thou having flourished a little while, wast suddenly surprized and swallowed up by judgments; thou, thy estate, thy children, all devoured and consumed:

Therefore thou art a wicked man, a very hypocrite; God hath dealt with thee as he uses to deal with his enemies, and therefore thou art not his friend.

This is the Logick of the Context, or the Reasons couched in them, whereby Eliphaz would convince Job of sin: By this a general light is let into the whole Context.

Now we will consider the words, and open their sence distinctly.

Call

Call now, if there be any that will answer thee; and to which of the Saints wilt thou turn?

Interpreters varie much about the meaning of these words.

First, Some of the Jewish Writers look upon these words as proceeding from height and pride of spirit in Eliphaz; as if he disdained to talk with Job any longer about the business; as if he looked upon Job as no match for him, in point of argument; bids him look out an Angel or a Saint to grapple with him in these disputes, and see if he could find any one of those, who would undertake for him as an Advocate, or be his Second, forasmuch as himself was so unable to defend his cause, or justifie what he had done; Call now, if there be any that will answer thee, that is, answer for thee; or, to which of the Saints wilt thou turn for help, to patronize or plead thy cause? but I shall pass that.

Nemo tibi prave corruptéque de his rebus judicanti patronus aderet? nemo qui tibi respondeat, tibi accinat, tuam sententiam tueatur.

Secondly, Others of the Jewish Writers make the sence out thus, as if Eliphaz had said with Paul, in the point of the Lords Supper (1 Cor. 11. 24.) That which I have delivered unto you, I have received of the Lord; so, that which I have delivered unto thee, in my former argument, I received from the Lord in a vision; it was revealed unto me from heaven: Now, do thou try whether thou canst learn any thing from heaven, or from the Saints upon the earth, (who are instructed to and for the Kingdom of heaven) which may answer my arguments, or confute the reasons which I have brought against thee. I had a vision from heaven, now call thou to heaven, and see if thou canst have any answer from thence; turn also to the Saints, to any Saint upon the earth, and see what they will answer thee; I believe thou wilt not find one amongst them all, differing in judgment from me, or from that Oracle with which I have now acquainted thee. They will all agree with me in these great Principles, about the providence, power and justice of God, about the sufferings, sinfulness and weakness of man. That's a second sence.

Thirdly, Others take the words as an Ironie, as a derision or scorn put upon Job by Eliphaz; as if Eliphaz had mocked him thus; Thou hast handled the matter well, thou hast carried thy self so, in the dayes of thy peace and prosperity, that now, when thou art in trouble, thou maist call long enough, and cry till thy throat akes, and thy spirits be spent, and yet have none to answer thee, none to speak a word to thee, or to do thee any good; though thou cry to all the Saints, and send to all thy friends round about thee, yet in this day, none will hear or regard thee: Thou wilt find thy self forsaken of all, no man will give thee any assistance, or take any care of thy condition. Just as Elijah brake forth in holy scorn against the Prophets of Baal (1 Kin. 18. 27.) when they were crying out to their Idol for help, and a sign by fire; Cry aloud (saith he) cry aloud; he bad them cry aloud, yet he knew the Idol was deaf and dumb, and could neither hear their cry, nor give them Answer: So Eliphaz seems to speak to Job; Cry aloud now, to this, to that Saint, with whom thou art acquainted here on earth, or cry to Heaven, cry to God himself; call this way, call that, if any will answer thee, either God above, or Saint below; thou shalt not find here or there any to assist, any to relieve thee. And so he seems to allude to that just retaliation of God, who usually turns his ear from their cry in a day of trouble, who have turned their ears from his counsels, in the dayes of comfort; as (Prov. 1.) Wisdom threatens, They shall call, but I will not answer; they shall cry, but I will not hear. Why? Because they have refused instruction, and have not chosen the fear of the Lord.

Vox in tribulatione cum non invenit quem mens in tranquillitate contempsit. Gre. in loc.

In the fourth place, Most of the Popish Writers busie themselves much, to ground invocation of Saints, and the intercession of Saints for us, upon this Text: As if Eliphaz had directed Job to cry to the Saints departed; Call now, if there be any that will answer? and to which of the Saints wilt thou turn? What Saint wilt thou chuse for thy Patron or helper in this sad condition? So they teach and practise, having appointed a particular Saint in the Kalendar of the year, to the help of every particular affliction in their lives, and to these they turn themselves in every distress: They have a Saint for the Sea, and a Saint for the Land, a Saint for the fire, and a Saint for the water, a Saint for each disease of the body, and for each disaster in the family: To some of these they suppose Job was advised to have recourse for succour and comfort in his troubles. And yet they are divided in opinion, and give a double sence about it, First, As if Eliphaz had thus bespoken him; If thou dost not give credit unto me, nor believe what I have spoken, was revealed from God, then call thou thy self upon God, and try whether he will not give thee some answer, and resolve thy doubt. Or if by reason of thine own unworthiness, thou canst not obtain an immediate answer at the hand of God, then turn thee to some of the Saints, that by their mediation thou maist receive light from God, to assure thee about my vision, whether it were sent from heaven or no. Secondly, Others interpret it more largely, as if Eliphaz perceiving Job to be brought to some sight and acknowledgment of his sins, and now to thirst after the pardon of them; he, in these words, exhorts him to call upon, and cry unto God for pardon, if perhaps he himself would vouchsafe to answer; but in case shame did so cover his face, and guilt so stop his mouth, that he could not speak unto God immediately, then he adviseth him to pray in aid from some of the Saints departed, who might manage this suit, and intercede for him at the throne of Grace. The grosness of this interpretation, is such, as carries a self-reputation with it, and therefore I shall not need to stay long about the refuting of it. Neither will I stay to argue against that groundless, useless doctrine in general, The invocation of Saints departed; which finds no letter of command or direction, no letter of promise or acceptation, no letter of example or practice for our imitation, in the whole Book of God: but it is a reproach to the Saints, and a dishonour to God, whose Name and incommunicable Title is, The God hearing prayers, and therefore to him shall the desires of all flesh come; and if all to him, then who to Saints or Angels? Only He can be the object of our prayer, who is the object of our faith, Rom. 10. How shall they call on him on whom they have not believed? To whom we pray, upon him we must believe. Saints departed are not to be believed upon, how then shall they be called on?

Aqu. in

But to leave the question, I shall only touch two things, to shew how wide they are in this exposition.

First, The confessed Doctrine of Popery tells us, that before Christs coming in the flesh, & his resurrection from the grave, all the Saints departed were in Limbus, a place, which they have framed and built up in their own fancies, as the common receptacle of all those who died in the Faith of Christ, before Christ died; therefore they tell us (to eek out the story) that as Christ went down into Hell, the place of the damned, to strike terror into the Devils, so he went into this Limbus, thence to deliver the Fathers from that prison, and carry them up, with himself into glory. Now this being their Tenet, how senceless is it for them to ground their opinion of invocation of Saints, upon any Scripture of the Old Testament? And therefore it is so, to ground it upon this.

Secondly, If we consider these words, we may as well seek for fire in the bottom of the Sea, as for the invocation of Saints in this Text, for here is no such thing spoken of; and if any thing sounds that way, it is rather to condemn praying to Saints, then any confirmation of it; for call now, if there be any that will answer thee; carries this sence rather; call now, for there is none to answer thee, and to which of the Saints wilt thou turn? that is, none among all the Saints (if thou turnest to them) can give thee any help: As Mercer, a moderate Papist, gives the meaning of this Scripture, against the current of their interpreters.

Vóca si quis est qui tibi respondeat, q. d. nemo tibi respondebit. Merc. Quod qui- dam nostrorum hunc locum ad sanctorum mortuorum invocationem, quam veteres ne agnoverunt quidem, referunt, merum delirium est, Idem paulo p. st. Nihil hic de sanctorum mortuorum invocatione. Tho. Aquin. & Lyranus eò quidem referunt, sed aquè ineptè, ne dicam impiè. Idem in loc.

And this will appear more fully in opening the Grammatical sence of a word or two, which also will give the clear meaning of the whole passage. Eliphaz (as was hinted in drawing out his Arguments) calls upon Job to call to remembrance former times, to search the records of Antiquity, and see whether he could find an example of any one among all the Saints, who either had such troubles as his, or in his troubles spake and behaved himself as he had done; he bids him name one, if he could.

Call now.] or, Call I pray thee. What we translate, now, now, is sometime a particle of insulting, but most usually of perswading or intreating. We render it as an Adverb of time, but it rather imports a request. So, Gen. 12. 13. Abraham intreats Sarah, Say I pray thee, thou art my Sister.

The word (Kara) which we translate call, signifies first to cry aloud by way of preaching or proclamation, Isa. 58. 1, Cry aloud, lift up thy voyce like a Trumpet: Secondly, By way of prayer or invocation, as, Psal. 50. 15. Call upon me in the day of trouble; but it rather signifies, and that more properly, to call by appellation, or by way of nomination, as, Ruth 1. 20. Call me not Naomi, but call me Marah. So here, Call now, that is, look over the names, or call over the names of all the Saints, as we use to say, when many should meet together, and we would know whether they are all met; or as Stewards, when they pay many hired servants their wages, take the Bill, and call over their names, and so pay them one by one, Mat. 20. 8. In the evening, the Lord of the Vineyard saith unto his Steward, Call the Labourers, that is, call them by their several names, and give them their hire. Thus we may understand the phrase in this place, read the Catalogue of the Saints; call every one by his name, and put the question to them, ask them whether ever they had such afflictions as thou hast? or ask them whether they behaved themselves under their afflictions as thou hast done? I believe thou wilt find none to answer thee. To this sence Mr. Broughton translates, Call now if there be any that will defend thee, that is, be thy Patron or Advocate, in word, or in example of their lives.

Na, licet insultantis aliquando sit, ut plurimũ tamen suadentis & exhortantis est, ut sodes amabo Latinis.

If there be any that will answer thee.] For, the word which we render answer, signifies not only, answering unto a question, but an answering to a condition, or a correspondency in practice. There is an answering by likeness of works, as well as by fitness of words. A real answer, and a verbal answer. Take it so, and then, Call now to the Saints, call them all by their names, intends only thus much, see if there be any that are like thee, or suite either thy spirit or thy condition, if there be any to whom thou mayest parallel thy self, either in the matter or manner of thy sufferings. Thou art more like a Heathen, who knows not God, then any of the Saints, in these complainings. And seeing, out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaks, these words speak thy heart abounding in sin, but empty of grace. Face answers face in the water; but neither thy face nor heart, will answer either heart or face of any of the Saints, in these waters of affliction. We find this word signifying similitude or comparison, or the equivalence of one thing to another, in that instance, Eccles. 10. 19. Money answers all things; the meaning of it is, that money in a proportion or value, suits, parallels and fits all things: There is nothing in the world, but you may suit it with a proportion of money, money will answer it; money answers, or is like all things, by an equivalency, though not in the formality.

Verbum respondere, in hoc loco significat potius similitudinem vel comparationem quam responsionem. Bold.

And to which of the Saints wilt thou turn?

εἴ τινα ἀγγέλων ἁγίων ὄψῃ.

The Septuagint read it, To which of the Angels wilt thou look? And the learned Mercer adheres to that translation, as thinking, that by Saints, are meant Angels; though he be so far from laying any bottom in the words for the Popish opinion of the mediation of Angels, that he expresly condemns it: but he gives the sence thus, as if Eliphaz had reproved Job of pride, for contesting with God, whenas, if he did turn himself to Angels, he should find himself far below, and much over-matcht by them: What! Thou dust and ashes, more righteous and just then God? Though he charged his Angels with folly, yet, even they are too wise and holy for thee to deal with. If thou wert put into the ballance with Angels, how light wouldst thou be? then, how much lighter then vanity art thou, being weighed with God? But the Hebrew is better translated, Saints. The word signifies a thing or person, separated and set apart from common, and dedicated to a special, especially, a holy use. Holiness (in the general nature of it) is nothing else but a separation from common, and dedication to a divine service, such are the Saints, persons separated from the world, and set apart unto God: The Church in general (which is a company of Saints) is taken out of, and severed from the world: The Church is a fountain sealed, and a garden inclosed; so also, every particular Saint is a person severed and enclosed from the common throng and multitude of the world: Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord; and touch no unclean thing, and I will receive you, 2 Cor. 6. 17.

Turn thee.] It is both a witty and judicious conceit that Eliphaz, in these words, alludes to Painters and Picture-drawers, who when they are drawing the picture of a man, or of any other thing, frequently turn their eyes upon the Proto-type, upon that which they are to draw by. When a man sits (as they speak) to have his picture taken, the Artist turns his eye often upon him; so here, to which of the Saints wilt thou turn thee to see thy picture, or to see any one like thee? where wilt thou look now, and by looking, observe a Saint of thy complexion, a holy man like thy self? If the Pictures of all the Saints were lost, none of them could be found in, or copied out from thee. The word which we translate turn, doth not signifie simply to look about or turn the eye, but to turn the eye about with much intention, or curiosity of observation, to make a discovery, and find out somewhat. Sometime it signifies to look in compassion, Psal. 25. 16. Turn thee unto me (saith David) and have mercy upon me, for I am very low. To look in compassion, notes a strictness of observation, to find out what charity or mercy should supply: such a look or view of his estate, David desired, that God would turn his eye upon him; to what end? that he might consider and find out all his necessities, and in mercy succour him.

Alludere videtur ad pictores, qui frequenter ad prototypum & exemplar, quod imitari conantur, oculos dirigunt & ad illud convertuntur.

Verbum פָּנָה non simpliciter respicere significat, aut aliquid intutri, sed cum quadam animi intẽtione & ad aliquem finem.

So then, To which of the Saints wilt thou turn? sounds thus much; upon what Saint wilt thou fix thine eye, to find thine own likeness, a representation of the sufferings thou beareſt, or of thy bearing these sufferings? Take the sum and sense of the whole verse thus, Call over the Roll or Catalogue of all the Saints, which either ever were, or at this day are upon the face of the earth. See if there be any whose condition or actions will answer in proportion unto thine; turn thine eye upon all the holy ones, see if thou canst observe any like thy self, in the matter or manner of thy afflictions, in the dealings of God with thee, or in thy complainings against God. Job, thou standest alone for all the Saints; go to the fools of the earth, and to the prophaner Infidels; among them thou maist haply meet thy pattern, and among their records read the story of thine own impatience and miscarriage: For (as it follows) wrath killeth the foolish, and envy slayeth the silly one. How like a fool and silly one art thou, who hast thus almost vext thy self to death at thy own troubles, and pinest with envy at the prosperity of others? Such seems to be the connexion and dependence of the second verse, with, and upon the first, which I shall presently descend to open, when I have added an Observation or two from the former already opened.

It was good advice which Eliphaz gave Job in that condition, namely, to take view of the Saints, and to compare himself with them. Thence observe,

> It is profitable for us to look to the example of the Saints, either those departed, or those alive, and by them to examine, both what we do, and how we suffer.

God hath given us, not only his Word for a rule, but he hath given us examples as a rule, to walk by. He hath given us his own example, that we, looking unto him, should be holy, as he is holy, in all manner of conversation; Be ye holy as I am holy: God, who is the holy one, is the highest pattern of holiness. And he hath given us his Son, who is the expres image of his person, and the brightness of his glory, to be our example. The life of Christ is a fair copy indeed, a copy without any blot, or uneven letter in it: for he also is the holy one. Christ is not only the Principle of holiness, but also the Pattern of holiness to his people; they that say they abide in him, must walk even as he walked. His works (excepting those that were miraculous, and works of mediation between God and us) are our rule, as well as his word, Heb. 12. 2. Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him, &c. words of near importance with those in the Text, To which of the Saints wilt thou turn thee? Look to Jesus; when you are in sufferings, and have a race of patience to run, let your eye alwayes be upon Christ, and draw the lines of your carriage, both in your spirits and outward actions, according to what you see in him. Look to him: And, ver. 3. Consider him that endured such contradiction diction of sinners. Which the Apostle Peter (1 *Pet.*2.21.) give us in plain termes, For even hereunto were ye called, because Christ also suffered for us, leaving an example that we should follow his steps. We must follow his steps both in the matter and in the manner of our sufferings: Therefore Christ saith, Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, Matth. 11.29. Christ calls it his yoke (it is a yoke of affliction, as well as a yoke of instruction.) And he calls it his yoke, not only because, he, as a Lord layes it upon the necks of others, but because, he, as a servant bore that yoke himself; therefore he saith, Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; that is, not only take my yoke upon you for the matter, but learn of me for the manner, how to bear that yoke. Besides these grand leading, unerring examples of God and Christ, the examples of the Saints are also commended to our imitation, both in doing and in suffering. Whatsoever things were written (and examples were written) aforetime, were written for our instruction. Why hath the Holy Ghost set so many pens a work, to write the lives of the Saints? Why hath he kept a record of them in his own book, but for direction to his people in after-times? The Lord hath not registred any one act of the Saints, but is useful for us. The acts of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Samuel, David, are full of practical Divinity. The sufferings and troubles of these, and many others, are full (if I may so speak) of pathetical Divinity. As the Apostle James his counsel doth more then intimate (James 5.10.) Take, my brethren, the Prophets, who have spoken in the Name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction and of patience: Hence those ancient Saints and believers (Heb. 12.1.) are called a cloud of witnesses; A cloud, because there is a directive or a leading vertue in them. As there was a cloud that went before the children of Israel in the day to lead them, so this cloud of witnesses, leads us up and down the wilderness of our sorrows, and in the dark night of our sufferings. Turn you to the Saints, to that cloud of witnesses, eye them, and see what becomes you in sad times. They have suffered joyfully the spoiling of their goods; suffer you likewise, if you come into the hands of spoilers. They lived by faith in the midst of a thousand deaths; live you likewise by faith in death, when ever you come into the hand of that King of terrors. And when at any time your own hearts, or the wayes of others are out of course, check and chide them for and from those disorders, by sending them to the practise of the Saints. Look to the Saints: from which of the Saints have you learned to be proud and high minded? From which of the Saints have you learned to be earthly and covetous? From which of the Saints have you learned to seek and set up your selves, or to be impatient under the hand of God? That man hath reason to suspect he hath done ill, who doth that, which a good man never did, or ever repented the doing of it.

Observe further, When God forsakes a man, all the Saints on earth forsake him too.

Eliphaz looks upon Job, as a man forsaken of God, and then he bids him get help, if he could, among the Saints. He that opposes God, shall be opposed by all who are God's. There is the same mind in the servants of Christ, which is in Christ their Master. They love where and whom he loves, they hate whom he hates, they are ashamed of those of whom Christ is ashamed; If God reject a man, the Saints will not undertake or answer for him. So much of the first Argument, ranking Job with the wicked, because (as Eliphaz thought) he could not find any in the rank of Saints like himself.

The second Argument rises to a like conviction, because (in the same mans opinion) he might easily see himself so like the wicked.

For wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one.

Here are two sinful passions, wrath and envy; and here are two sorts of sinful persons, The foolish man, and The silly one, producing two sad effects, (which yet in effect are but one) the one kills, and the other slayes, both are deadly and destructive; Wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one. There are several sins and lusts which accompany, as the several ages and degrees, so the several tempers of men. Rashness and intemperance hurry and inflame young men, ambition blows up riper years, and covetousness often tyrannizeth over old age: Wrath takes hold of fools, and envy seizeth the silly one. These worms strike the root of such men, and make them wither. As there is a special worm killing special trees, and consuming their fruits; so there are special lusts, which like worms, eat out, and destroy the life of man; wrath killeth the foolish man.

Omne pomū omne grani omne frumē tum, omne ligñ habe vermē suū & alius vermis mali, alius pyri, alius Tritici. August.

The foolish man. He is A fool, who hath not wisdom to direct himself; but The fool, is he, who will not follow the counsel and direction of the wise. The word signifies, not so much a fool, who hath no knowledge; as a fool, who makes no use of the knowledge which he hath: such a one is a foolish man indeed. Or it notes a man hasty, bold, inconsiderate, rushing on, hand over head, without fear or wit: A man, who either is master but of little knowledge, or that which he hath (be it little or much) masters him. It agrees fully in sence, and is the same to a letter in sound, with our English word Evil; Such the Prophet (Zech. 11.15.) describes: Take (saith he) the instruments of a foolish shepherd, he doth not mean, the instruments of a rude and merely ignorant shepherd, a man that hath no knowledge or learning; but of a rash and imprudent shepherd, or of a lazy and idle shepherd, who, though he hath knowledge, yet knows not how (or hath no heart) to improve his knowledge for the good of his flock. The Prophet Ezekiel gives us the character of such, Chap. 34. 4. The diseased have ye not strengthened, nor have ye healed that which was sick, nor bound up that which was broken, &c. But (will ye know what work they made?) with fury and with cruelty have ye ruled them: ye have been moved with fury, not with pitty, and acted by passion, not by reason, much less by grace: So in this place, the foolish man, whom envy slayes, is not a mere ignorant, one that hath no brains, but one hare-brain'd and uncompos'd. Eliphaz hints at Job secretly in this word, whom he knew reported for a man of great knowledge and learning, according to the learning of those times, yet he numbers him with fools; because he conceived him wrathful, rash, intemperate, not having any true government of himself. Anger resteth in the bosom of fools, Eccles. 7.9. A fool is not able to judge of the nature of things, or times, or occasions, and therefore he is angry with every thing that hits not his nature or his humour. He will be angry with the Sun, if it shine hotter then he would have it; and with the winds, if they blow harder then he would have them; and with the clouds, if they rain longer then serves his turn. They that are emptiest of understanding, are fullest of will, and usually so full of will, that we call them wil-ful. Hence, unless every thing be ready to serve their wills, they are ready to dye by the hand or judgment of their passions.

Wrath kills the foolish man. Wrath may be taken here two wayes, either for the wrath of God, or for the wrath of man. In the former sence, the meaning is, That the wrath of God kills foolish men; which is an undoubted truth: but I rather adhere to the latter, which gives the meaning thus, That the wrath of a foolish man, kills himself; his own wrath is as a knife at his throat, and as a sword in his own bowels. The word which we translate wrath, signifies indignation, anger, teastiness, or touchiness: Properly wrath is anger inveterate; anger is a short fury, and wrath is a long anger; when man is set upon it, when his spirit is steeped and soaked in anger, then it is wrath. Esau raked up the burning coals of his anger in the ashes, till his Fathers Funeral; The time of mourning for my Father will shortly come, then will I slay my brother. But our word rather notes, a fervent heat and distemper of spirit presently breaking forth, or an extream vexation fretting and disquieting us within: As Psal. 112.10. The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; (that is, he shall have secret indignation in himself to see matters go so.) He shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away. Gnashing of the teeth is caused by vexing of the heart: and therefore it follows, he melts away; which notes (melting is from heat) an extream heat within. This sence is very futable to this of Eliphaz, wrath slayeth the foolish, or wrath makes him melt away; it melts his grease with chafing, as we say of a man furiously vext: Hence that deplorable condition of the damned, who are cast out of the presence of God for ever, is described by weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth; which imports not only pain, but extream vexing at, or in themselves. Those fools shall be slain for ever with their own wrath, as well as with the wrath of God.

Wrath killeth, &c.] But how doth wrath kill a foolish man? His wrath sometimes draws his sword and kills others: but is his wrath as a sword to kill himself? Many like Simeon and Levi, in their anger have slain a man; but that the anger of a man should slay himself, may seem strange. The passion of wrath is such an engine, as recoyles upon him that uses or discharges it. As the desire of the sloathful killeth him, Prov. 21. 25. So, the wrath of a foolish man kills him: that place enlightens this; how comes desire to slay the slothful? Thus; A man slothful in action is full of desires, and quick in his affections after many good things; he would fain have them, he longs for them: but the man is so extream lazy, that he will not stir hand or foot to get the things which he desires; and so he pines away with wishing and woulding, and dies with grief, because desire is not satisfied. So, in like manner, wrath is said to slay a man; first, because it thrusts him head-long upon such things as are his death; he runs wilfully upon his own death, sometimes by the dangerousness of the action, whence casual sudden death surprises him; sometime by the unlawfulness of the action, which brings him to a legal or judiciary death. Secondly, his wrath is said to kill him, because his wrath is so vexatious to him, that it makes his life a continual death to him, and at last so wearieth him out and wastes his spirits, that he dyes for very grief: and so at once commits a threefold murder; First, He murders him, intentionally, against whom he is wroth: Secondly, He, really, murders his own body: And thirdly, He, meritoriously, murders his soul for ever, except the Lord be more merciful then he hath been wrathful, and the death of Christ heal those wounds, by which he would have procured the death of others, and hath (as much as in him lies) procured his own.

And envy slayeth the silly one.] These two expressions meet near upon a fence. Envy is the trouble which a man conceives in himself, at the good which another receives. This disease gets in at the eyes and ears, or is occasioned by seeing or hearing of our neighbours blessings. In the 1 John 2. All the lusts in the world are reduced to three heads, The lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life; Envy is the chiefest lust of the eyes, and it is properly called the lust of the eye; because a man seldom envieth another, untill he sees some good he hath above himself. This passion is a murderer also, it begins at the eyes, but it roots down into the bones.

Envy slayeth the silly one.] There is not much difference between the nature of these two, the foolish man, and the silly one; But the Original words by which they are expressed, are very different. The root signifies to perswade, to intice or allure: And it is taken sometime in a good sence (as in Gen. 9. 27.) where the Holy Ghost speaks with admirable elegancy, God will perswade the perswasible, we translate it, God will perswade Japhet. Japhet had his name from being perswaded or perswadable; God shall intice or perswade Japhet: which was a prophesie of the calling of the Gentiles, who are descendants from Japhet, as the Jews are from Shem. So, that word is applied to Gods drawing, or alluring men by the sweet promises and winning enticements of the Gospel. God doth (let it be taken in holy reverence) tole men on by promises, and deceive them graciously into the Gospel (Hosea 2.14.) I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness. And because by perswasions men are often deceived and seduced to evil, therefore the word signifies also to deceive and beguile, as well as to perswade; and in the passive, to be beguiled and deceived; Hence the word in the Text is derived, which we translate a simple one, or a man that will easily be perswaded and led by another, a sequacious or easie man, whom you may carry with a mouth full of good words, and fair promises, whither you will. Yet, we find this word (Psal. 116. 6.) used in a good sence, for a man without sinful guile and craft, a simple, honest, plain-hearted man, The Lord preserveth the simple. But here, and often else-where, it is taken in an ill sence, for a man without sence and reason, without heart and spirit; a man that cannot in any competency judge of things, or make out his way, but is merely led, and lives upon the opinion and judgment of another: To such wisdom cryeth without, and uttereth her voice in the streets; how long ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? Prov. 1. 20, 22. This silly one envy slayeth, He is out of his wits already, and a little matter will put him out of his life: Envy slayeth him, that is a simple man looking upon the prosperity and blessing of God upon his neighbour, will needs afflict himself: he looks upon himself, as having lost all, if that man gain: he falls, if his brother stands; and can with more ease die miserably, then see another live happily. In this sence it is, That envy kills the silly one.

Exiguo animo & abjecto spiritu.

Now the reason why Eliphaz speaks of these two, the foolish and the simple one, and characters them, as dying by the hand of these two lusts, Wrath and Envy; is because he conceived all Jobs troubled and (as he thought) muddy complaints in the third Chapter, arose from these two impure and filthy springs, Wrath and Envy; from proud Wrath, and impotent Envy: he looked upon him, as angry and displeased, yea, as enraged, because God had dealt so ill with him; and he supposed he saw him pale and wan, eaten up and pined with envy, because others were so well, because his friends enjoyed health, and lived in prosperity round about him. As if he had said, Thou art wroth at thy own poverty, sickness and sores; and thou art envious at our plenty, health and ease. And may not folly and simplicity, challenge that man for Theirs, whose spirit thus resents, either his own evils, or his neighbours good?

> Observe hence, First, Every wicked man is a foolish, a silly man. Sin is pure folly.

In the Proverbs all along, wickedness is the Interpretation of foolishness. It is folly to take brass Counters for gold, and to be pleased with Bugles more then with Diamonds. When an heir is impleaded for an Ideot, the Judge commands an apple, or a counter, with a piece of gold, to be set before him, to try which he will take; if he takes the apple or the counter, and leaves the gold, he is then cast for a fool, and unable to mannage his estate, for he knows not the value of things, or how to make a true election. Wicked men are thus foolish, and more, for when Bugles and Diamonds, Counters and Gold are before them, they leave the Diamonds and the Gold, and please themselves with those toyes and bables; when (which is infinitely more sottish) Heaven and Hell, life and death are set before them, they chuse Hell rather then Heaven, and death rather then life; they take the mean, transitory, trifling things of the world, before the favour of God, the pardon of sin, a part in Jesus Christ, and an inheritance among the Saints in light. All the wisdom of wicked men, is wisdom in their own conceits. And Solomon assures us, that there is more hope of a fool then of such; that is, of those who are sensible of their own failings, and are willing (as the Apostle directs) to become fools that they may be wise, 1 Cor. 3. 18. Opinion in it self is weak, but self-opinion is very strong; even the strongest of those strong-holds, and the highest of those high Towers, which the spiritual war, by those weapons which are mighty through God, is to oppose and cast down: which, till they are cast down, these fools are impregnable, and will not be led captive unto Christ.

יפת ליפתי Japheth le Japheth.

> Secondly, Observe, That, to vex and to be angry at the troubles that fall upon us, or at the hand which sends them, is a high point of folly and of ignorance.

Wrath and discontent slay the foolish; such are at once twice slain, slain with the wrath of God, and with their own.

To die thus, is to die like a fool indeed. For first, this wrath of man springs from his ignorance of God: Man would not be angry at what the Lord doth, if he knew he were the Lord, and may do what himself pleases, The ground of anger is a supposition of wrong.

Secondly, This wrath of man springs from ignorance of himself. He cannot be angry with any cross, who rightly knows himself.

First, to be a creature.

This

This notion of our selves teacheth us that lesson of humility, to be subject to the will of our Creator. The law of our creation calls us to all passive obedience, as well as unto active, as much and as quietly to suffer, as to do the will of God; but especially, if a man did fully know himself to be a sinful creature, he would not be angry; yea, he would lay a charge upon his mouth, not to utter a word, and a charge upon his heart, not to utter a thought against what the Lord doth with him. I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him, saith the Church, Micah 7. 9. As if she had said, the remembrance of my sin takes away all pleading, much more all quarrelling, in how angry a posture soever the Lord sets himself to afflict me: And therefore my spirit is resolved, that because my flesh hath sinned, my flesh shall bear the indignation of the Lord. He that knows what it is to sin, knows that all sufferings less then hell, are less then sin. If a man were convinced of this, that, what he bears is less then his sin deserves, he would bear it, with thanks, not with complaints. Yea he would say, that, as he hath deserved all these and more then all these strokes, so he hath need of them. The bundle of folly in his heart, calls for a bundle of rods upon his back, and he sees want of correction might have been his undoing. Therefore to be angry with affliction, argues a man ignorant of himself as a creature, much more as a sinful creature. Once more, the foolishness of such wrath appears to the eye of nature and common reason, because this wrath brings no ease or remedy at all to those wounds, but rather makes them more painful, if not remediless. It is an argument of folly to do a thing, whereby we cannot help our selves; but it is folly and madness to do that which hurts, which makes our wound fester and our disease grow desperate. Did any man ever ease himself by fretting or raging under the cross? How many have made their cross more heavy upon them, by raging at it? A mans own wrath is heavier to him then his cross. A stone is heavy, and sand weighty, but a fools wrath is heavier then them both, Prov. 27. 3. A fools wrath is very heavy to others, but it is heaviest to himself. The Text is express for it, which may be a third Observation.

Trascitur, quia omnia sibi dēberi putat.

To be angry and discontent at Gods judgments, is more destructive then the judgments themselves.

The wrath and judgments of God afflict only, but your own wrath destroyes; wrath slayes the foolish. Probably God came only to correct you, but wrath kills you. The wrath of man is a passion, but it is very active upon man, and eats up the spirit which nurses and brings it forth: Frowardness and anger are at once our sin and our torment. He that is angry when God strikes, strikes himself, whereas humble submission to the blow turns it into a kiss or an embraces and they that sit down quietly and believingly under any evil, bear it at present with more ease, and in the end, find it in the inventory of their goods. David, It is good for me that I have been afflicted.

Fourthly, Note, That, to envy another mans good or prosperity, is an argument of the worst simplicity.

Envy slayeth the silly one.] Envy is a common theam, I will not stay upon it; but shall only give you two reasons to demonstrate the silly simplicity of an envious person.

First, The good of another is not thy hurt; thou hast not the less, because another hath more. Leah's fruitfulness was no cause of Rachels barrenness. Thy portion is not impaired by thy brothers increase; thou hast thy share, and he hath but his; how silly a thing then is it to envy him that hath much, when as, his having much is not the cause why thou hast little? Again, this troubling thy self that others have more, will not get thee any more; Envy never brought in earnings or increase.

Secondly, A man of wisdom will make all the good of another his good. Take away envy, and that which is mine, is thine; and if I take away envy, that which is thine is mine. To have a heart to bless God for his blessings upon another, is it self a great blessing, and gives thee likewise a part in those blessings. Thus we may enjoy all the joys and comforts, the favours and deliverances, the health and peace, the riches and plenty, the gifts, yea, and the very graces of all those, in whose graces and gifts, plenty and riches, peace and health, &c. we can really and cordially rejoyce. Whereas an envious man ever standeth in his own light, and cannot rejoyce in his own mercies, for grieving at his Brothers.

Tolle invidiā, & quod meū est, tuū est; & si ego tollam invidiam, quod tuū est meū est.

So far of the second part of the argument, whereby Eliphaz would convince Job of wickedness, his likeness to the wicked in bearing of, or rather fretting against his troubles.

VERS. 3, 4, 5.

I have seen the foolish taking root, but suddenly I cursed his habitation.
His children are far from safety, and they are crushed in the gate, neither is there any to deliver them.
Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thornes, and the robber swalloweth up their substance.

TWO parts of the fourth argument were cleared in the two former Verses. In these three Eliphaz argues further, to the same effect. His argument is grounded upon his own experience, which had shewed many examples of foolish men, like Job (as he supposed) both in his rising and in his falling, in his good dayes and in his evil. I have seen the foolish taking root, and suddenly I cursed his habitation, &c. The Argument may be thus framed, Foolish men flourish a while, and then come to certain and sudden destruction; they, and their children, and their estates, are all crushed and swallowed up.

But thou didst flourish a while, and grow up like some goodly tree, yet sudden destruction came upon thy children and upon thy estate, the robbers have consumed and swallowed all up.

Therefore thou also art foolish, &c. I have seen the foolish taking root, but suddenly I cursed his habitation: I have seen thee taking root, and I observe thy habitation cursed; Thy outward condition is so parallel with theirs, that I know not how to distinguish thee, from them, in thy inward and spiritual condition.

I have seen the foolish taking root.

Eliphaz urgeth experience. He urged experience in Chap. 4. vers. 8. Even as I have seen, they that plough iniquity and sow wickedness, reap the same, &c. He urgeth experience here again, and this superadded experience seems to answer an objection which might be made against that former experience: For some might say, many wicked men plow iniquity enough, and sow wickedness abundantly, yet they reap comforts and the contentments of this world; they have what their hearts desire, a full harvest of riches, pleasures and honours.

It is true (saith Eliphaz) I grant it, I have observed the like also, I have seen the foolish taking root; yea, but I can answer quickly and remove this objection: it doth not at all weaken my former assertion, grounded upon that experience; for as I have seen him take root, so, suddenly I cursed his habitation, his children are far from safety, &c. He flourisheth, but he withers quickly; he takes root, but he is soon pull'd up by the roots.

I have seen.] Experience is the mistress of truth. Truth is called the daughter of time, because experience bringeth forth many truths; and the word of God is made visible in the works of God. I have seen, (saith he) This truth hath run into my eye. In experiences the promises of God stand forth, and in experiences the threatnings of God stand forth, and shew themselves: all the experiences that we have in the world, are only so many exemplifications of the truths contained in the promises or threatnings of the word.

The foolish.] I shall not stay to open that term; for we met with it in the former verse, wrath slayeth the foolish one. Only in a word, this foolish man is one, who acts without counsel, and whose will is too hard for his understanding. He hath no reason for what he doth, but because he hath a mind to do it. A foolish man is a wicked man; and here the foolish man is a wicked man at ease, a wicked man in his fulness and abundance of outward comforts: A fool is ever worst, when he is at ease. And as he more abounds in comforts, so, he abounds more in sin. All mercies are to him but fuel to his folly, and meat and drink for his madness. That rich man who pleased himself so in his worldly successes is call'd a fool, Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be taken from thee, and then whose shall all these things be which thou possessest? (Luke 12. 10.) All wicked men are foolish, and wicked rich men have ever the greatest stock of folly. And they are therefore more foolish then others, because they think themselves wiser then all. If a man can get riches, if his root be well settled in the earth, and his branches spread fairly out, he accounteth himself very wise, and so do many others account him too. A thriving sinner is a foolish and an unprosperous man; but he that plots how to thrive by sin, is the most foolish man in the world, and therefore in all his prosperity most unprosperous. As the foolish take root, so, that by which they take root is oftentimes their folly.

Taking root.] Wicked men under the outward curse are compared to trees not taking root, Isa. 40. 24. He bringeth the Princes to nothing, yea they shall not be planted, yea they shall not be sown, yea their stock shall not take root in the earth. And Psalm 129. 6. Let them be as grass upon the house (having no earth to take root in) which withereth afore it groweth up, whereof the mower filleth not his hand, nor he that bindeth up the sheaves his bosom. Wicked men prospering, are compared to a tree well rooted. I have seen the foolish taking root; that is, confirmed and setled in their outward prosperity. A root is to the tree as a foundation is to the house, the establishment of it; when a tree is well rooted, it takes in the moisture of the earth freely, then the body or trunk grows big, the branches spread forth, the leaves are green, and it abounds with fruit. So that with the well-rooting, we must take in all that concerns the flourishing of a tree. Hence, other Scriptures expresse the men of the world by trees, not only secretly taking root in the earth, but putting themselves forth and appearing in their visible beauty and vertue. (Psal. 37. 35.) David produceth his experience, I have seen the wicked in great power (how? taking root, yea) spreading himself like a green bay-tree. They are described by their boughs, branches and leaves. And in Isa. 2. 11. The day of the Lord shall be upon the Cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up; not only upon the Cedars of Lebanon that are deeply rooted, but upon the Cedars of Lebanon that are high and lifted up, and upon all the Oakes of Basan. In Hosea 14. v. 5. The prosperous estate of the Church (under the dew and influence of heavenly blessings) is held forth to us under the notion of a tree taking root. I will be as the dew to Israel, he shall grow as the Lilly, and cast his roots as Lebanon (that is, as the trees in Lebanon) his branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the Olive-tree, and his smell as Lebanon.

In the fourth of Daniel, the state, glory, and magnificence of the Kingdoms of this world are shadowed by a tree. Nebuchadnezzar in a vision hath a tree presented before him, he knew not what to make of it, and therefore calls for the wise men to expound the vision, which he thus relates, ver. 4. I saw, and behold a tree in the midst of the earth, the heighth thereof was great; and the tree grew, and was strong, and the heigth thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the ends of the earth, and the leaves thereof were fair. When Daniel comes to interpret it, (ver. 22.) he sayes to the King, Thou art this tree, &c. Nebuchadnezzar in all his worldly pomp, is set forth by a goodly tree. In the 53. of Isa. v. 2. Where the birth of Christ is propheſied, it is said, That he shall grow up before him, as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground. As a very flourishing estate, whether in spirituals or temporals, is expresst by a tree planted by the water side; So a mean, low estate, is signified by a tree in a dry ground. Our Lord Jesus, in regard of any outward glory, was like a tree in a dry ground, as the words following expound it, He hath no form nor comelineſs; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. His Kingdom was not like the Kingdom of those great Monarchs, strong, and high, and beautiful with any created lustre.

Hence Observe, First, That wicked men may flourish in great outward prosperity.

I have seen the wicked taking root. The Prophet Jeremiah, in the twelfth of his Propheſie (a Scripture touched before, chap. 4. 7. to this purpose) being somewhat scandalized at the prosperity of treacherous dealers, describes them thus, ver. 2. Thou hast planted them, yea, they have taken root; they grow, yea, they bring forth fruit. Here are four degrees: First, They are planted; there is many a tree planted that takes not root: but (saith he) thou hast planted them, yea, they have taken root. There are some trees, which are both planted and have taken root, yet they do not grow; especially not to any height or greatness: though they live, yet they do not thrive. These are planted, and they take root, and they grow; but there are many trees planted, rooted and growing, which yet are fruitless; these have all, they are planted, they take root, they grow, and they bring forth fruit: And who are these? Surely, the worst of men, as the very next words evidence; God is near in their mouths, but far from their reins. God is near in the mouth of such, that is, they may speak of him sometimes, but he is far from their reins; there is nothing of God in their hearts: and surely, they that have nothing of God in their hearts, have nothing of goodness in their hearts, or in their lives.

This present glory and prosperity of wicked men lifts up the glory of Gods patience. How is the glory of the patience of God exalted, in letting them have ease, who are a burden unto himself? in letting them prosper, who are (as God can be pained) a pain unto himself; in suffering them to flourish, who vex his people? in suffering them to laugh, who make his people mourn?

Further, He gives them leave to take root and flourish, (whom he could blast and root up every moment) that all may see what is in their hearts. If God did not permit them to take root, yea, and sometime to grow up and flourish, we should never see what fruit they would bring forth; we should never see those grapes of gall, those bitter clusters, if these vines of Sodom, and fields of Gomorrah, were not water'd with the dew, and warm'd with the Sun of some outward prosperity.

Lastly, The prosperity of wicked men, is a great trial of good men; The flourishing of the ungodly is as strong an exercise of their Graces, as their own witherings.

Secondly Observe, That, Wicked men may not only flourish and grow, but they may flourish and grow a great while.

I ground it upon this; the Text saith that they take root, I have seen the foolish take root; and the word notes a deep rooting. In the Parable of the Sower (Mat. 13. 21.) it is said, that the seed which fell into stonie ground, withered, because it had no root; noting, that the cause of a sudden decay, or withering in any plant, is the want of rooting; whereas a Tree well rooted, will endure many a blast, and stand out a storm. Some wicked men stand out many storms, like old Oaks, like trees deeply rooted, they stand many a blast, yea, many a blow. Spectators are ready to say, such and such storms will certainly overthrow them, and yet still they stand; but though they stand so long, that all wonder; yet they shall fall, that many may rejoyce, and take up this proverb against them (as of old against the King of Babylon) How hath the oppressor ceased? The Lord hath broken the staff of the wicked, and the scepter of the Rulers: He who smote the people in wrath, with a continued stroke, he that ruled in the Nation with anger, is persecuted, and none hindreth. Therefore many shall break forth into singing, yea, the fir-trees shall rejoyce at him, and the Cedars of Lebanon, saying, since thou art laid down, no feller is come up amongst us, Isa. 14.

Thirdly, Observe, Outward good things are not good in themselves.

The foolish take root. The worst of men may enjoy the best of outward comforts. Outward things are unto us, as we are. If the man be good, then they are good. And though the Preacher tells us, Eccles. 9. That all things come alike unto all, yet all things are not alike unto all. There is a great difference between the flourishing of a wise man, and the flourishing of a fool; all his flourishing and fastning in the earth, is no good to him, because himself is not good. Spiritual good things are so good, that though they find us not good, yet they will make us good; we cannot have them indeed, and be unlike them: But worldly good things find some really good, and make them worse; others who had but a shew of goodness, they are occasions of making stark naught: Rooting in the earth never helpt any to grow heaven-wards. Many deeply rooted in the earth, have grown down, and gone down to the depths of Hell.

not

Fourthly, observe, as a consequence from the former;

That, The enjoyment of outward good things, is no evidence, can be made no argument that a man is good.

I have seen the fooliſh taking root. And yet how many ſtick upon this evidence, bleſſing themſelves, becauſe they are outwardly bleſſed? Yea, though they meet with a diſcovery of their ſins, and ſinful boſomes, in the word, though they find thoſe ſins threatned, yea curſed with a grievous curſe in the word, yet they bleſs themſelves, and ſay, we are rich and flouriſh, we have a good eſtate and credit, we take root and ſtand; but they forget that all this may be the portion of a fool. I have ſeen the fooliſh taking root.

And ſuddenly I curſed his habitation.

ואקוב deducitur vel à נקב vel à קבב ſedit, perfodit, terebravit, & per metaphoram, maledixit, exoratus eſt, eſt metaphora tranſlata ab his qui gladio aut pugione aliquem transverberant, tanquam ſi aliquis Dei aut hominis maledictione trajiceretur, Cartw. in Prov. 11. 26.

The word here uſed, to curſe, ſprings indifferently from two roots, which yet meet, and are one in ſignification; namely, to ſtrike through or pierce, as a man that is ſtruck through with a ſtaff, or ſword, or ſtabb'd with a dagger; thus, Hab. 3. 14. Thou didſt ſtrike through with his ſtaves the head of the villages. And, Iſa. 36. 6. The piercing of a reed into the hand of him that leans upon it, is expreſt by this word. So then it carries a metaphorical alluſion to the effect of a curſe; the curſe of God alwayes, and the curſe of man upon due grounds, is as a ſword or a dagger, piercing a man through and through; through both ſoul and body. I have curſed his habitation, that is, I have ſmitten his habitation quite through with a curſe.

Pium non decent diræ.

I curſed his habitation.] Some read, I abhorred, or I abominated his habitation. I was ſo far from envying this flouriſhing, ſpreading tree, or from being in love with his goodly ſeat and brave habitation, that I loathed, and could not abide it. The cottage of an honeſt man was more delightful to me, then the tents or palaces of wickedneſs.

But the word bears rather to curſe; which is firſt to wiſh evil unto another: And ſecondly, to foretel, to pronounce, or denounce evil againſt another. Often in the Pſalms, David's curſes upon his enemies, are predictions from the ſpirit of God, not maledictions or ill wiſhes from his own ſpirit; good men know not how to wiſh evill; their curſings are propheſies, not prayers; they foretel or foreſee evils, but they deſire them not. I have not deſired the woful day, Lord, thou knoweſt, ſaid that Prophet, who had denounced many woful dayes, Jer. 17. 16.

Id fieri ab aliquo dicitur in Scriptura quod faciendum denunciatur.

In Scripture, many are ſaid to do that which they declare to be, or foretel that it ſhall be; as (to give an inſtance or two) Lev. 13. in the caſe of the Leper, the Text ſaith, that when the Prieſt makes up his judgment concerning the Leper (having found the tokens of Leproſie upon him) he ſhall defile him (v. 3, & 8.) or make him unclean; ſo the Original gives it; which we tranſlate, The Prieſt ſhall pronounce him unclean. In that ſenſe, the Miniſters of the Goſpel (whoſe buſineſs it is to cleanſe) defile many; yea, one way to cleanſe men, is thus to defile, and pronounce them Lepers. So Iſa. 6. 8. The Lord ſends the Prophet againſt the people, and ſaith to him, Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and ſhut their eyes: Now, the Prophet did not act this himſelf, he did not deafen their ears, or blind their eyes; but only fore-told or denounced that this judgment ſhould fall upon them: becauſe they had ſo long ſtopped their ears, at laſt their ears ſhould be ſtopt and made heavy enough: and becauſe they had ſo long winked and ſhut their eyes, at laſt they ſhould be blind, and their eyes ſhut faſt enough: How faſt are thoſe eyes and ears lockt up, which are thus double lockt? Once more, Jer. 1. 10. The Lord gives the Prophet a ſtrange commiſſion, See (ſaith he) I have this day ſet thee over the Nations and over Kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to deſtroy, and to throw down, and to build, and to plant. One would think this commiſſion, more fitting for a Cæſar or an Alexander, for great Commanders attended with numerous Armies, then for an unarmed Prophet; what could he do? could he root out Kingdoms, and deſtroy Nations? Yes, by denouncing the deſtroying judgments, and conſuming wrath of God, due unto them for their rebellions and provocations: Thus a poor weak Prophet can overturn a whole Kingdom, and root up the ſtrongeſt Nations. And the truth is, that, never was any Nation or Kingdom rooted up by the ſword, but it was firſt rooted up by the word; firſt, God hewed them to pieces, and ſlew them by his Prophets, and then let in Armies of cruel enemies to do it.

Prædic excæcandos oculos, & aures aggravandas.

So here in the Text, I have ſeen the fooliſh taking root, but ſuddenly I curſed his habitation; The clear meaning is, I foretold a curſe, I knew what would ſhortly become of his habitation. It was not anger againſt his perſon, or envy at his eſtate, that moved me to curſe him; but it was an eye of faith which ſhewed me him markt with a curſe in the juſt threatnings of God: I ſaw a curſe hanging over his family and dwelling, over his riches and honours: And though he then flouriſhed, that, yet he ſhould quickly wither and be deſtroyed root and branch. The curſe of the Lord is in the houſe of the wicked, Prov. 3. 33. Man doth but ſee it there, the Lord ſent it there.

Non per invidiam & iram dirè imprecaretur, ſed animum præſagiret male ipſi fore. Coc.

The word is conſiderable which we tranſlate Habitation; נוה It ſignifies a quiet, a ſetled, a peaceable, a beautiful habitation: And ſo carries an aggravation of the judgment upon the fooliſh man; his judgment is worſe upon him, becauſe he thought himſelf ſo well, ſo well ſeated, ſo well ſetled, ſo ſecured and accommodated, that he ſhould never be removed: They are moſt troubled with removings, who thought themſelves ſetled; troubles afflict them deepeſt, who ſuppoſed themſelves beyond trouble. When David thought God had made his mountain ſo ſtrong that it could not be moved, how was he troubled, as ſoon as God hid his face? Pſal. 30. 6, 7. And if they are ſo troubled with ſhakings, who look upon their eſtates as ſettled by the favour of God, how will they be troubled to meet with totterings and ſhakings, much more with ruinings and deſtructions, whoſe eſtates at beſt, are bottomed only upon their pollicies, often, upon their ſins?

Obſerve hence, Firſt, the eſtate of ſome wicked men, is out of the prayers of Gods people.

When they go by their dwellings, they cannot ſay, The bleſſing of the Lord be upon you, we bleſs you in the name of the Lord, Pſal. 126. 8. It is a great mercy to ſtand under the influences of prayer, and for a man to have his eſtate, land, dwellings, watered with ſhowers of bleſſings and hearty good wiſhes from the mouthes of Saints. Their bleſſings or their curſings, are next to the bleſſings and curſins of Chriſt, nay, they are his: It is an argument that Chriſt hath bleſſed or curſed a man, when the ſpirits of his people generally are carried to either. It is one of the ſaddeſt preſages in the world, for a man to be caſt out of the prayers of the Saints, or to be caſt by their prayers; that is, when their prayers are againſt him, and he preſented naked to the diſpleaſure of Chriſt: It ſhewes that the ſin of a man is a ſin unto death, when the faithful ceaſe praying for him, 1 Joh. 5. 16. What can it prognoſticate then, but approaching ruine and deſtruction, when they bend the ſtrength of prayer againſt him? There was never any habitation of wickedneſs, ſo firmly founded or ſtrongly fortified, but that Great and Holy Ordinance hath or may ſhake, and batter it to the duſt. The fair Towers and Walls of Babylon, the ſeat and ſtate of Antichriſt, have long been under this curſe: All the Saints, whoſe eyes God hath unſcaled and brought out from Egyptian darkneſs, have ſeen That fooliſh man taking root, and have curſed his habitation.

Obſerve, Secondly, A wicked man in proſperity is under the curſe of God.

He is often under the curſe of man, but ever under the curſe of God. Eſau have I hated (ſaith God, Rom. 9. 13.) yet even at that time the fatneſs of the earth was his dwelling, and of the dew of Heaven from above, Gen. 27. 39. While the meat was in the mouths of the murmuring Iſraelites, the wrath of God was upon them. They did at once eat their luſt and their death, wrath was mingled with their meat; and while he gave them their requeſt, he ſent leanneſs into their ſouls, (Pſalm 106. 15.)

15.) This is the most dreadful curse of all, To have a fat estate, a well fed body, with a lean starven soul.

Thirdly, Observe, A vast difference between godly and wicked men, between the foolish and the wise.

When a godly man withers in his outward estate, and is pluckt up by the roots, yet God loves him; when a godly man is poor, God loves him; when he is sick, God loves him; when he is in prison, God loves him; when he is in disgrace, God loves him; and when the world hates him most, then God usually shews, that he loves him most: The world cannot cast a godly man into any condition, but he meets with the love of God in it: his estate may vary and vary, change and change a thousand times, but the love of God towards him is unchangeable. On the other side, we see in the Text, when a wicked man takes root, and the branches of his outward estate bear fruit abundantly, God curseth him; when he is at ease, God is angry with him. That place is very observable (Zech. 1. 15.) I am very sore displeased with the Heathen, that are at ease; the Heathen were at ease, yet God was extremely displeased with them. When a wicked man is in health, God curseth him; when he is rich, God curseth him; when all men honour, admire and flatter him, God abhorreth, hates and detests him; he can be in no condition, but he is sure to meet with the curse of God. As a foolish man, a wicked man, gives God many things, but he never gives God his love, or his affection: A wicked man may give God prayers, but he doth not give him his love; he may give him praises, but he never gives him any love; he may give God his purse, but he gives not his love or his heart; whether such a fool praiseth God, or prayeth to God, or giveth unto God, he hateth God. So likewise, whatsoever God gives to a wicked man, he hates him; whatsoever he bestows on him, he curseth him: This should awake men rooted in the earth, to consider whether they are under the influences of Gods eternal love, as well as under the influence of temporal blessings. This is the ground of Davids conclusion, Psalm 37. 16. A little that the righteous hath, is better then the riches of many wicked: the reason is this, because many ungodly ones, swimming in a full Sea of riches, have not so much as one drop of the love of God, nor one beam or ray of the light of his countenance shining upon them; but a godly man, if he have but a small estate, he hath much love mixed with it; if he have but a little purse, he hath a large portion of the favour of God in it, and this makes it so out-worth and out-value a wicked mans estate, this puts the price and stamps an excellency upon his little. The love of God doth so far exceed the farness of the earth, in the esteem of Saints, that they in rating their estates, reckon not upon earthly things at all, they see nothing to value themselves by, but their interests in the love of God. As when God gives his people their portion, he looks upon outward things, as mere additionals, or as an overplus given in by way of vantage. All other things shall be added (Matth. 6. 33.) When a man casts in a handful of wheat after the bushel is full, or gives a fingers breadth after the due measure of the cloth; so it is in the case of all temporals bestowed upon the Saints.

Then fourthly Note, Outward good things, are no argument of the favour of God.

As we shewed before, that, they are no evidences of the goodness of a person, so neither are they any evidences of the grace and favour of God unto a person. A man cannot find an evidence of Gods love in his purse, in his land, in his honour, in his credit: Yea, a man may flourish in better things then these I speak of, and yet have no evidences of Gods love to him; a man may flourish in knowledge, be deeply rooted in learning, may have extraordinary branches of parts, and wonderful fruits of gifts; yet notwithstanding all this while, his habitation and his person too under a curse. And therefore, be sure that you look for your evidences of the love of God in the right box, do not look for evidences of the love of God in your chests, or in your purses; but look into your hearts, and see what Christ hath done there; look into your lives, and see what light shines there from the Spirit of Christ: Look whether grace flows from the Spirit of Christ, and is rooted in your spirits. If grace be rooted in thee there, if it spring up and bring forth fruit in thy life, this is an evidence indeed. They that are thus rooted, God never curseth: Grace and holiness were never under any curse.

Observe one thing further, As these words hold forth the judgment or opinion of a godly man, concerning the wicked in prosperity. I have seen the foolish taking root, and presently I cursed his habitation.

A godly man sees the wicked of the world to be miserable in their best and most flourishing condition.

When thousands stand about the great ones of the earth, admiring, applauding, making little gods of them, envying their happiness, and thinking none happy but they, or such as they are; then a godly man pitties them, mourns over them, sees them, and all such as they are, miserable: He looks through all their outward glory and beauty, riches and honours, and sees them curst through all, hated of God through all: He sees nakedness through their cloathing, emptiness and want through all their plenty and abundance: neither is this unhappiness confined to their own persons, but derived to all, to whom they derive life, or stand related. So it follows,

His Children are far from safety, and they are crushed in the gate, neither is there any to deliver them, &c.

These words contain a further effect of this curse. I cursed his habitation? and what then? was it an ineffectual curse? was it but wind and words, returning and doing nothing? or did it spend all its strength upon this foolish man, in his own person? No, His children are far from safety, they are crushed in the gate, &c. One of the Rabbins conceives that these words and the verse following, are the form wherein the curse was pronounced upon the habitation of the foolish man; as if Eliphaz had said, I cursed his habitation, thus, Let his Children be far from safety, and let them be crushed in the gate, neither let there be any to deliver; as for his harvest, let the hungry eat it up, and let the robbers swallow up their substance. And we find such a form, Psa. 109. David pronounces the curse upon those wicked enemies, in language very sutable to this (vers. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.) Set thou a wicked man over him, and let Satan (an adversary) stand at his right hand. When he shall be judged, let him be condemned: and let his prayer become sin. Let his Children be fatherless, and his Wife a widow; let his Children be continually vagabonds and beg, let them seek their bread also out of desolate places, let the extortioner catch all that he hath; and let the stranger spoyle his labour.

Secundum genus calamitatis quod Deus improbis immittit, posteritatis exitium deploratum, & quidem acclamante publico consensu. Rabbi Solomon, formam maledictionis esse vult.

But we may rather take it, as the matter, then as the form of a curse. I cursed his habitation, and the curse brake forth upon his Children, and upon his estate, upon the branches, and the fruit of that goodly tree: much like that in the vision, Dan. 4. 13, 14. I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed, and behold a watcher, and a holy One came down from Heaven. He cried aloud and said thus; Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit, &c. This Allegory may be rendred in the plain words of Eliphaz, I cursed his habitation, his Children are far from safety. The Master of the Family is the tree, his Children are either fruit or branches, his leaves are riches and honour, the beauty and pleasantness of his habitation.

Some things in the letter of the Text are to be opened, but I shall first observe one thing in the general, from the connection of this fourth verse with the third, I suddenly cursed his habitation (verse 3.) Then follows, his children are far from safety.

Observe from it, That, Creatures cannot stand before the curse of God.

How strongly soever they are rooted, the blast of the breath of Gods displeasure, will either blow them down, or wither them standing. The curse comes powerfully, suddenly and secretly, it is often an invisible stroak. When we see neither ax nor spade at the root, nor storm at the top, yet down it comes, or stands without leaf or fruit. When Christ in the Gospel curst the fruitless fig-tree, his Disciples passing by that way, wondred saying, how quickly is this fig-tree withered! it was but onely a word from Christ, Never bear fruit more, and the fig-tree which had no fruit, lost its life. Some are such tall Cedars, such mighty Oaks, that men conclude there is no stirring of them, no Ax can fell them, or blast loosen them; yet a word from the Lord will turn them upside down: or if he do but say to them, never fruit grow upon your actions, or out of your counsels, presently they wither. The curse causeless shall not come; but when there is a cause, and God speaks the word, the curse will come: Neither power nor policies, neither threatnings nor entreaties can hinder or block it up. It is said of the water of jealousie in the book of Numbers, that when the woman drank that water, if there were cause of her husbands suspition, presently her belly swell'd, and her thighs did rot, the effect was inevitable. So, if God bid judgment take hold of a man, family or Nation, it will obey. A word made the world, and a word is able to destroy it. There is no armour of proof against the shot or stroak of a curse.

Suddenly I cursed his habitation, and the next news is, His Children are far from safety. If God speak the word, it is done as soon as spoken; as that mysterious Letter said of the Gunpowder plot, As soon as the paper is burnt, the thing is done. Surely God can cause his judgments to pass upon his implacable enemies, such horrid conspirators against Churches and Common-wealths, truth and peace, with as much speed, as a paper burns; with a blaze and a blast they are consumed. That, in the general from the connexion of these two verses: As soon as he was cursed, his Children and his estate, all that he had went to wrack, and ruine. I shall now open the words distinctly.

His Children are far from safety.] Some read, Were far from safety, (and so the whole passage in the time past) because he speaks of a particular example, which he himself had observed in those dayes, as is clear, v. 2.

Having shewed the curse upon the root, he now shewes the withering of the branches.

Some of the Rabbins understand, by Children, the Followers or Imitators of wicked men, such as assisted them, or such as were like them; these are moral children. But take it rather in the letter, for natural children, such as were born to them, or adopted by them, these come under their Fathers unhappiness: They are far from safety.

The Hebrew word is commonly rendred, salvation. His Children are far from salvation. But then we must understand it for temporal salvation, which our translation expresses clearly by safety. His children are far from safety. It is possible that the children of a wicked man, may be near unto eternal salvation; Though godly Parents have a promise for their seed, yet grace doth not run in a blood, neither is the love of God tied or entail'd upon any lineage of men. Election sometimes crosses the line, and steps into the family of a reprobate Father. Therefore, it is not said, His Children are far from salvation, in a strict, but in a large sence. We find the word salvation, frequently used for safety (2 Kings 13. 17.) when Elisha bad Joash the King of Israel shoot the arrow, he called it the arrow of the Lords Salvation, which we render, the arrow of the Lords deliverance. So Moses bespeaks the trembling Israelites at the Red Sea, Stand still, and behold the salvation of the Lord; that is, behold what safety the Lord will give you from all these dangers, what deliverance from the hand of Pharaoh. The Prophet represents the Jews thus bemoaning their outward judgments; We roar all like Bears, and mourn sore like Doves; we look for judgment, but there is none, for salvation, but it is far off, Isa. 59. 11.

They are far from safety.] To be far from safety, is a phrase importing extream danger; As when a man is said to be far from light, he is in extream darkness; and when a man is said to be far from health, he is in extream sickness; and when a man is said to be far from riches, he is in extream poverty: So here, His Children are far from safety; that is, they are in extream danger and peril, they walk (as it were) in the regions of trouble, in the valley of the shadow of death continually. That phrase is used also, respecting the spiritual estate of unbelievers, They are far off from God, far off from the Covenant, Isa. 57. 19. Ephes. 12. 13. that is, they have no benefit by the covenant, no interest in, no favour at all or mercy from the Lord. To be far off from mercy is to be near wrath, and to be far from safety is to dwell upon the borders of danger.

And they are crushed in the gate.] In Chap. 4. Eliphaz describes man, as crushed before the Moth, to shew how suddenly, how easily man is destroyed. This mans Children are crushed in the gate, as a man would crush a flie or a moth between his fingers.

They are crushed in the gate.] That notes two things.

First, The publickness of their destruction, they shall be destroyed in the sight of all men; for the gate was a publick place (Prov. 31. 31.) Her works praise her in the gates; that is, she is publickly known by her good works. To do a thing in the gate is opposed to the doing of a thing secretly. To suffer in the gate is to suffer publickly.

Secondly, To be crushed in the gate, is to be crushed or cast in judgment; for The gate was the place of old, where justice was administred and judgment given; and for a man to be crushed in the gate, is as much as for a man to be overthrown in his sute, when he hath any controversie or tryal before a Judge, whether for his estate or for his life. So this phrase, They are crushed in the gate, implies that all business shall go against them; if they have any controversie in law, or if they be charged with any crime, they shall certainly be condemned.

In portis judicia exercebantur. Merc.

I need not stay to prove that judgment was given in the gate; only take a few Texts. First, In this book (Chap. 29. 7.) Job describes his own prosperity thus, When I went out to the gate, that is, to sit in judgment; And Chap. 31. v. 21. the word is used in the like sense; So Gen. 23. 17. Chap. 34. 20. Ruth 4. 1. Isa. 29. 11. Those words of the curse, Psalm 109. 7. When he is judged, let him be condemned, are the full Exposition of this, They are crushed in the gate.

And the reason given by one of the Ancients, why justice was usually administred in the gate, is the accommodation and convenience both of strangers and Citizens: For strangers, who lived far off in the Countrey, that they might have justice, before they entred into the City, whose pomp and throngs of people might possibly occasion either some terror or diversion in the minds of poor Countrey men. And then likewise, that the Inhabitants of the City, might not be either charged or tired with long journies into the Countrey; to which we may add, that judgment was therefore administred in the gate, because gates are places through which all pass in and out, and therefore the declaring of judgment there, was the making of it more publick; that all might take notice of what passed, in such and such cases, as the sentence and resolution of the Judges.

Ne agricolæ litis causa veniens, civitatis frequentia & nova terreretur conspectu; nec urbis habitator, longè ab urbe properaret & subvectionē quæreret judicantorum. Jeron. in Amos 5. 9. v. 10.

Neither is there any to deliver them.

This is the third degree of evil falling upon the foolish mans Children. Though a man be brought to and cast in judgment, yet he may have a friend to help and deliver him; but these shall have no help, none to speak a good word for them, none to mediate either for reprieve or pardon. Some give the sence thus, His Children shall neither find a judge to give a favourable sentence, nor an Advocate to plead for them, and make the best of their cause. This also answers another part of another curse, Psal. 109. 12, Let there be none to extend mercy to him, neither let there be any to favour his fatherless Children; None shall be found either able or willing to rescue or pluck them out of the hand of danger.

In summis malis neminem habebūt assertorem. Ut injusti confundebuntur & contundebuntur in judicio publicè coram tribunalibus

Hence Observe, First, That, a wicked man and his Children are often wrapt up in the same destruction.

I cursed his habitation, and his Children are far from safety, they are crushed in the gate. A godly man is a defence for his Children; it is a great blessing to be born of holy parents, and it is a curse to be born of oppressing wicked parents. As the blessing of God descends from the Father, upon the Children; so, the curse of God many times descends from the Father, upon the Children, and they inherit their judgments, as well as their Lands. Though the justice and goodness of God, will make that Proverb cease in all the families of the world for ever, which was once taken up by the Jewes, Ezek. 18. 2. The Fathers have eaten sowre grapes, and the Childrens teeth are set on edge. The Naturalists observe, and experience teacheth, that when a man eats very sowre grapes (and so makes a sowre face) another standing by is affected with a sympathy, and and his teeth are set on edge or pained with the very sight or grating of anothers teeth, though himself taste not the grape. The present Jews thought themselves but bare lookers on upon their Fathers sin, and yet they suffered. But the Lord found the sowre grapes in their mouths also, or them risen up in their Fathers stead, an encrease of sinful men to fill up the fierce wrath of the Lord against them. Now (I say) though the Lord will make that proverb cease, in their sence: For no child is punished merely in contemplation of his Fathers sin. Yet when a son is wicked, the wickedness of a father, whether immediate or further off, may come in remembrance against him, and at once aggravate his sin, and encrease his sorrow.

Secondly, Note, Whom God will destroy, no creature shall be found able to deliver out of his hands.

God can take away the help, and stop up the pitty of all creatures, None shall deliver them. And though themselves should endeavour to escape, they shall not escape, (Amos 9. 1.) They that fly shall not fly away, and they that escape shall not be delivered; that is, by endeavouring to escape, they shall not be delivered, they shall attempt it in vain. If God will not deliver, none can. If a Lot be taken prisoner, He bids Abraham arm and rescue him. If a Paul be in the mouth of a Lion, the Lord will deliver him. It needs not trouble us, who is our enemy, if God will be our deliverer: nor can it avail what friends so ever we have, if God saith, ye shall not be delivered. A wicked man (when the Lord appears against him) either hath none to deliver him, or none shall. Salvation is far from the wicked, for they keep not thy statutes, Psal. 119. 155.

From the Children, judgment proceeds to the estate of this wicked man.

Verse 5. Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and fetcheth it even out of the thornes, and the robber spoileth all his substance.

Whose harvest the hungry eateth up.] By his Harvest, we are to understand not only the return of that which he hath sown, as corn and other fruits of the earth; but all the goods or provisions, which he hath gathered or laid up for his support and accommodation. A mans harvest is the improvement of his whole estate. And this mans harvest is all he hath gotten, by right or wrong; by industry or by injury; by sweat or by deceit; by secret practises or open violences. To eat up a harvest, is as much as to devour a house, with which Christ charges the hungry Scribes and Pharisees (Matth. 23. 14.) who made Beggars as fast as they made prayers; Ye devour widdows houses and under pretence make long prayers.

The greatness of his affliction is set forth by the loss of those things, which cost much pains to get. A harvest is not had with idleness: The earth must be broken, plowed and sowed, before we reap. The Law of Nations (I am sure of this Nation) is very tender in this point, providing, that they who till and sow the Land, shall also enjoy the crop. But this wicked man shall not reap what he sowed: The labour shall be his, and the benefit another mans. The hungry shall come and eat up his harvest.

Whence Observe in general, It is a great evil when we cannot enjoy the thing we labour for.

What greater disappointment to the husband-man, then to deprive him of his harvest? Poets have sung this in mournful verse. And we find this threatned in the law, as the very sting of those evils, which should come upon a disobedient people, Deut. 28. 33. The fruit of thy land and all thy labours, shall a Nation which thou knowest not, eat up: All thy labours, that is, The fruits for which thou hast laboured, shall be eaten up by strangers. And (Levit. 26. 16.) Ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your Enemies shall eat it. The sloathful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting, so we translate, Prov. 12. 26. But it seems not so proper to the sence of this proverb: A sloathful man is not usually a hunter. That sport requires an active spirit. And usually men that are slow at work, are quick at meat, and will not lose their Venison for the roasting. Therefore more properly (I conceive with others) to the original, and fully to the point in hand, it may be translated thus, Deceit or the deceitful man shall not roast his hunting, or that which he hath taken in hunting: That is, he shall not take pleasure in that, which he hath got by extream pains (as all hunters do) or by craft and stealth, as some hunters do. Somewhat comes between his mouth and his morsel, his cup and lip; either he cannot get his meat to the table, or he rises hungry from it. Therefore Solomon puts a great blessing in this, when a man enjoyeth his labour, Eccles. 2. 10. My heart rejoyced in all my labour, and this was my portion of all my labour; namely, the fruit and benefit which God gave me by my labour; I enjoyed it, and this was my portion. Again, (Eccles. 3. 13.) And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour; it is the gift of God: He puts the Emphasis upon this, when a man hath taken pains to lay in provisions for a comfortable subsistence, that then he may sit down quietly and enjoy it, It is the gift of God. Therefore on the other hand, not to eat and drink, and enjoy the good of our labours, but to have all violently snatcht from our mouths, It is the judgment of God. This judgement the Prophet also threatens (Isa. 1. 6.) Your land. strangers shall devour it, in your presence; when you are looking on, strangers shall devour it. Thou preparest a Table before me in the presence of my enemies, said David, Psal. 23. 5. As it is one of the greatest outward mercies, to eat at a Table, prepared in the presence of an enemy; so, it is one of the greatest afflictions, to have an enemy eat up what is prepared for our Table, in our presence, (Mic. 6. 15.) Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; thou shalt tread the Olives, but thou shalt not annoint thee with oyl; and sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine. Observe how he puts in their labour to aggravate their sorrow. If they had not sown, it had not been so troublesom not to reap; if they had not trod the Olives, it had not been so grievous to have had no oyle; but this was their calamity, they sowed, but reaped not; they trod the Olives, but had no oyle to annoint themselves. The misery of that rich man (Luke 12.) is thus described, when he had made larger barns, and got in his harvest; when he had made provision for many years, then the question is, Whose shall all these things be that thou hast provided? The rich man was not unprovided of an answer to the Query long before: Whose shall they be? My own I warrant you: I am not such a fool to take pains for others. Little did he think his grave was a making while he was making his barns: Or, that all his providence and care should redound to strangers. How will it cut the heart to see all those things taken away, in and about which, a man hath laid out his whole strength, and laid up his whole heart? This Job imprecates as the extremity of all outward evils, in case he were an hypocrite, and dealt falsly with God (Chap. 31. 8.) If any blot hath cleaved to my hands; that is, if this blot of insincerity (Job did not think himself to be without all blot of sin, but, if such a blot as I am charged with) cleave to my hands, then let me sow, and let another eat. This judgment which Eliphaz hints at in another person, as already fallen on Job for his hypocrisie; Job, in his own person calls for, if he were an hypocrite. Let me sow, and let another eat, yea let my off-spring be rooted out.

The hungry.] There is some difference in opinion, who are to be understood by the hungry. Some take this hungry one for the Devil; he is a hungry one indeed: but his hunger is not after our riches, but after our souls; 'tis them he goes about like (a hungry) roaring Lion, seeking to devour (2 Pet. 5. 8.). It is a truth also, that Satan goes about as a hungry one, to devour our Estates, so he did Jobs, His harvest that hungry one did eat up; but, it was not because he desired Jobs harvest, but because he gaped for Job himself. He thought if God would but give him leave to rob Job of his riches, Job would quickly let his soul lapse into his hands. A foul is the dainty morsel, which That hungry spirit waits for. The most delicate things in the world are meat too gross for a spirit, though an unclean one.

Others, by the hungry one, understand the Heir of this rich worldling; his heir whom he had kept low, and bare, and short, as long as he lived; now, when he is dead and gone, comes hungry to the estate, and quickly consumes it; he eats it out, drinks it up, and lavisheth it away. It is often seen that the heirs of great, rich men, come very hungry gry to their inheritances, and as quickly swallow them down. They have been kept so short, that like empty and sharp set stomacks they waste all, when they come where they may have their fill. That estate which is got by the oppression, and kept by the base covetousness of parents, is usually spent out in riot and luxury. A hungry heir devours the harvest.

Thirdly; The hungry may be taken for those poor oppressed ones, whose estates those Nimrods of the world had unjustly and cruelly ravisht from them. They, whom wicked men make hungry and lean by their exactions and cruel dealings, come at last (though unbidden and unwelcome guests) to eat the bread from their tables. And these poor hungry ones are conceived by some, to be Wisdoms children, the people of God, whom those wicked fools had stript of their estates, and would have eaten them too like bread, Psal. 14. So the Septuagint renders it; The just or the godly shall eat up or devour the harvest of this rich worldling. Put both these together, and this may be the sence, The hungry eateth up his harvest, that is, the godly poor, whom this man had unjustly oppresst, and even put to starving, God, by his just judgment shall send in, to take free Quarter, to eat their fill of his harvest, and never reckon with their Host. From that sence take this Note.

Δικαιοι ἐσθιουσι. Sep.

That, God doth sometimes give the riches of wicked men to poor godly men whom they have oppresst.

Job himself, chap. 27. v. 16. gives us this truth in expres terms; where speaking of a wicked man, he saith, Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay, he may prepare it (let him prepare it, let him scrape it together as fast as he can) but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver, that is, those just and innocent persons whom he had wronged, shall by a divine retaliation enter upon his estate. The wicked grind the faces of the poors to make themselves bread, but at last the poor shall make bread of their corn and grist.

Fourthly, We may take the hungry yet more largely, for any that are low and poor, whom God stirs up and sends in judgment, as his teeth, to consume and eat up, to devour and destroy the portion of such fat ones. Every spoiler is a hungry one; spoilers devour as if they had never eaten in their lives, they sweep all away: The word which we translate to eat up, signifies the most fierce kind of eating; when a man eats as if he could never have enough. And therefore it is applied to the eating of fire, which we know is the most hungry thing in the world; nothing will satisfie the appetite of that hungry Element; the more it eats, the more hungry and devouring it is. Hence that adjunct of fire (Isa. 29. 6.) A flame of a devouring fire, or, the flame (it is the word of the Text) of an eating fire; a fire whose stomack is able to digest all the material creatures in the world. So (Job 1.) it is said, that the fire of God, or a great fire did eat up the sheep, the fire came hungry and consumed them; such is the force of the word here used: and secondly, it is applied in Scripture, to the eating of the sword; which (alas!) we know is very hungry too, My sword shall devour flesh, Deut. 32. 42. Thirdly, it is applied to savage beasts (Gen. 37. 33.) when Jacob bewaileth the loss of his son Joseph, he saith, an evil beast hath devoured him. Fourthly, The cruelty of persecutors (in whom wild beasts, and sword and fire are all met, if not swallowed up) the cruelty, I say, of persecutors is expressed by this word, They eat up my people like bread, Psal. 14. 4. Wild beasts, and sword, and fire, and above all, the persecuting spirits of men, are the most hungry and speedy devourers, such a devouring shall consume the harvest of those foolish men; the hungry shall eat it up. Hence we may observe,

In communi quicunque raptor & deprædator famelicus appellatur. Pined.

That, They who consume others, shall at last be consumed themselves.

Such as have raised themselves upon the ruines of others, shall raise others by their own ruine: God will send devourers to eat up the estate of those, who have devoured the estates of their brethren; especially, if they have devoured the estates of his own people. The Apostle, Gal. 6. 7. gives this general law, whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; he that sows oppression, or makes his seed-time to be the reaping of his neighbours harvest, may find reapers which he hired not, in his field at harvest. The Prophet Isaiah denounceth a wo against those that joyn house to house by oppression; and what is the wo? their houses shall be made desolate: So, Zeph. 3. 19. I will undo all that afflict thee. And, Jer. 30. 16. They that devour thee, shall be devoured; and they that spoil thee, shall be a spoil; and all that prey upon thee, will I give for a prey: It is just with God (2 Thes. 1. 6.) to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you. The rich man who hoards up that for himself and for his children, which he hath pulled out of the bellies of others, shall have his meat devoured from his table, and pull'd from between his teeth.

The hungry eat up his harvest. But where doth he find it? [He takes it even out of the thorns.]

There is some difficulty in that expression. Mr. Broughton reads it, The hungry shall eat up his harvest which he had gotten thorough the thorns. And others thus; He shall fetch it out from among the arms or weapons. The Hebrew word which we translate Thorns, gives occasion of these various readings, which some derive from Tsinnah, which signifies a Shield, and so by a Trope, it notes any kind of arms or weapons.

ינים Spinæ, a qui dedi cunt à unde scutum, peus.

If we take the word in the first sence, for thorns, a threefold interpretation may be given of this clause.

First, As Mr. Broughton reads it, which he had gotten thorough the thorns. This refers to the manner how a worldling obtains his estate; he hath a great harvest, and how came he by it? he got it through the thorns; that is, he got it through vexing pricking cares: for so (Mat. 13.) in the Parable of the Sower, when Christ expounds the meaning of the thornie ground, he shews, that the thorns are cares, the cares wherewith men are vexed in getting riches, or compassing the things of the world. Hence a man is said to get riches through the thorns, when he gets them through overmuch care and vexation of spirit.

Secondly, As the word signifies thorns; some conceive, that Eliphaz closely describes the persons who should take away his estate, as he did in the former branch; there he said, the hungry eat up his harvest: now he describeth another sort of men, that shall eat it up, namely, men of thorns, or, men coming out of the thorns; this rendring is not easily made out of the Original, though it hath learned abettors, and therefore I am not confident of it; yet it may yield some advantage to our meditation upon the words. The meaning is this; Mean or contemptible men shall take it away: As in our language, when we would express a vulgar person, a man of low birth, we say, he was born under a bush, or under a hedge, that is, he is a man of a low pedigree, none of the Gentry; and so it is, as if he should say, this great, rich, mighty man, who hath so much honour and riches about him, and thinks himself safe, shall see a man coming out of the thorns, some obscure person, and take all that he hath from him. This exposition may yield us a profitable Observation.

Homo ex spinis ex ens, &c. jectus & contempt eum rapi Homo ig bilis qui spinis na tur. Me

That, When God reckons with the greatest of wicked men, he can humble and pull them down by the meanest and poorest of men.

A very shrub, a man that comes out of the thorns, may pull down the tallest Cedar: It encreases affliction, to be overcome by a weak, despised, inconsiderable Enemy. It troubled Abimelech more to be slain by a woman, then to be slain; and therefore (upon the matter) he would have the pain to be twice killed, rather then the disgrace to be kill'd by a woman; for having received his deaths wound by her hand, yet, he calls hastily to the young man his Armour-bearer, and said unto him, draw out thy sword now, and slay me, that men say not of me, a woman slew him, Judg. 9. 54. The Lord threatens it, both as a just retaliation for the sin, and an aggravation of the punishment of his people, I will move them to jealousie with those that are not a people, I will provoke them to anger with a foolish Nation, Deut. 32. 21. The Gentiles (as Paul expounds this place, Rom. 10. 19. & Peter, 1 Per. 2. 10.) whom the Jews slighted as a foolish people, as no people, came in, and eat up the harvest of the Gospel, and were invested with greater priviledges then they. This made the Jews mad with anger, as you may read in that famous record of it, Acts 22. 21, 22. They could not bear it, that, Those men of the thorns, should partake of the fatness of the Olive; as Jotham spake in his Parable (Judges 9. 15.) when the question was, which of the trees should be King,

King, the Olive or the Vine? &c. at last it fell to the Brambles lot, or to the Thorn. That Parable gives some light to this exposition; for those several sorts of trees shadowed out the several sorts of men, and the Bramble shadowed out the meanest sort of men, a man of thorns, or a man coming out of the Thorns. And he adds (which further answers this sence) Let fire come out of the Bramble, and devour the Cedars of Lebanon; which in plain English is, let there come power from a powerless man, who is but as a bryer, or as a thorn, and consume the greatest and the mightiest.

And it may support us (while we see so many great Cedars and strong Oaks, with whom we have to do) that God can send a man out of the thorns to subdue their pride; and can cause a Bramble to consume Cedar, when himself pleaseth. The Prophet Amos puts the question, By whom shall Jacob rise? for he is small; the only answer is, Jacob hath a great God, a God that can do great things. If we should question, By whom shall the wicked fall, for they are very great? I answer, haply, they shall fall by him that is very small. A man out of the bushes, a man of thorns, some poor shrub, armed with the power of God, shall shake and overthrow them in the height of all their wickedness and worldly glory.

Thirdly, Take it according to our reading; He shall fetch it out of the thorns. Which some interpret, to be thorns growing naturally in or among the corn; according to that general curse upon the earth, Gen. 3.18. Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee. But rather (if not alone) these are thorns platted together industriously, and wrought into a hedge, to save corn-fields, or corn-stacks from spoil. So the meaning is, that when the hungry man comes with a commission from God, to eat the harvest of the foolish, he will have his estate, whatever it cost him, or what danger soever he incurs for it. For, as a man is said to fetch a thing out of the fire, or out of the Lions mouth, when he gets it with much peril and hazard; so, what a man gets with much difficulty and labour, he is said to get it out of the thorns: And the reason is this, because men were wont, when they had gathered in their harvest, (take it especially about that, and in proportion about any thing else) they were wont (I say) to secure it with a thorn-hedge, or to lay bushes about their stacks, to keep off cattel or any other annoyances. We read among the Laws given by Moses, somewhat answerable to this practice, Ex. 22.6. If fire break out, and catch in thorns, so that the stacks of corn, or standing corn, or the field be consumed therewith, he that kindled the fire, shall make restitution. This Law intimates it for an ancient custom, to make fences of thorn about corn brought home or stackt up; and that fields while the corn was standing, were hedged about with thorns. To either of which, the allusion may be made by Eliphaz; so that, to fetch his harvest out of the thorns, is to fetch it through the fences made to secure his harvest, to fetch it, though it cost (as we speak proverbially) a scratch'd face, or scratch'd fingers. We say, hunger breaks through stone-walls; certainly then those hungry ones will break through a thorn-hedge.

When the Lord would keep his Church from wandring in sinful paths, he resolves thus, Hos. 2.6. I will hedge up her way with thorns; there are pleasures that she would go fetch; but as men fence their ground and pastures with thorns, so will I do with her; I will hedge up her way with thorns, she shall pay dear, she shall smart for pleasures, ere she come at them. And therefore, as it shews the extream intensiveness and resolvedness of a man to sin, when a man will sin, though God hath hedged up his way with thorns; that is, when a man will break through many dangers, and run hazards to satisfie his lusts; so here in this place, the hungry mans taking it out of the thorns, notes a resolvedness and eagerness of spirit, to have the estate of this rich man, let him secure it by all the power and policies he can.

From this Exposition, we may observe first, the practice of worldly wise men.

When they have gotten riches, they do not leave them loose and open to surprizal, they keep them among the thorns.

They will secure their estates as much as they can. As they get riches with thorns, so they will keep riches with thorns, that is, they will bestow care to keep, as well as to get. A godly man takes great care to get more of Christ, more riches of Grace; he improves all means, and makes this his business night and day; these spiritual cares are his thorns, and when he finds his stock of holy things increasing, his next care is to preserve his stock, to maintain communion with Christ, and to keep up his graces to their height: The care of a godly man, is as much to preserve grace and comforts from the power of that hungry one the Devil, as it was to fetch them in. And Satan is so hungry after our spiritual harvest, that he would fetch it out of the thorns and fences of all our prayers and holy cares, were it not that Christ himself keeps it for us; his care over his peoples spiritual welfare is such a thorn-hedge, as the Devil can never break through: We are kept by the power of God as with a Garrison, 1 Pet. 1.5.

Such also is the wisdom of that generation, about worldly things, they fence in and fortifie their riches, so that if any man will have them, he must have them through the thorns, or come upon the Pikes.

Secondly, Though he lay up his estate within the thorns, yet the hungry man will fetch it out. Hence note,

That, All the care of worldly men, all the thorn-hedges they make about their estates, shall never secure them from spoil and ruine.

The hungry will press and venture through the thorns to take them.

Further, As the word signifies a Buckler (or any kind of arms, whether offensive or defensive) as the text is by some translated, He shall fetch it out of their Arms, or from among their weapons. And then the sence may be thus conceived (which agrees fully with the former Observation.)

Though this wicked man in his high estate, should get many armed men together to defend it, yea, though he should get an Army of men, with sword and buckler, with pike and shot to defend it, yet none of them shall be able. The wrath of God, by the man out of the thorns, the meanest instrument of his wrath, shall break through all. And in allusion to this, the Vulgar (more truly then as a Translation) reads it,

The armed man shall take him away, that is, he shall carr him away prisoner, and spoil him of his harvest: Which, though it doth not comply with the letter of the Original, yet it implies the sence of it; for when armed men come to take any thing away, it intimates, that the thing was, or was supposed to be protected with arms. The Chaldee Paraphrase saith the same; Souldiers with weapons and warlike instruments shall carry them away. This word is in other places rendred an Army, in the Chaldee. So, Josh. 23.15. That which we translate, They shall be thorns in your eyes, the Chaldee glosseth thus; They shall be an army besieging or compassing you round about. And so much for the second Branch of this Verse, He taketh it even out of the thorns.

There is a third branch; And the robber swalloweth up their substance.

It is the same in substance with the former; and we may say here, as Joseph about the dreams of Pharaoh, The dreams are the same, and they are doubled, only to note the certainty of the thing: The matter here is the same, only the words are doubled (as the Holy Ghost often doth) to note the certainty of this thing, that the foolish mans estate shall be consumed.

Yet there is somewhat very considerable in the phrase here used; and therefore I shall open it a little: The robber swalloweth up his substance.

The robber.] Some translate, The thirsty shall drink or swallow up their substance; Mr. Broughton, The thirsty shall swill up their wealth; and it suits fairly with the former words, there, the hungry shall eat up his harvest; and here, the thirsty shall swill up their wealth; so you have both the hungry and the thirsty to make riddance of all; neither his corn, nor his wine, his bread, nor his drink, neither wet, nor dry, shall scape, where both hungry and thirsty come to consume.

We render it, The robber swalloweth up their substance; The reason of this difference is from the original word, which which may have a double derivation; first, from a root, signifying to thirst, or to be thirsty: Secondly, from a root which signifies the hair of the head, or the locks, or extraordinary Ruffian-like long hair and locks. And the reason why we translate Robber, is given from both; from the first, because robbers and spoilers are commonly tosspots and drunkards, men that love their liquor, a thirsty generation in that sence: and they alwayes thirst for a prey, they thirst for the estates or lives of others: From the latter, because robbers, plunderers and spoilers, usually wore very long hair, either to disguise or make themselves the more terrible; so that a robber may be denominated, both from his unnaturally natural thirst after the pot, and from his uncivil civil thirst after a purse, or from his long, shaggie, bushie hair: To this latter sence one of the Rabbins translates, The hairy man, or the man with long hair, shall swallow up their estates. Hence some expres him by a Latine word, which signifies a man all over-grown with hair; this Ruffian or Robber shall swallow up his substance.

Swallow up.] The word notes an utter exhaustion, he shall exhaust his substance: As we say, when a spender or an unthrift is described, he hath exhausted his estate, he hath, as it were, suckt it up, guzl'd or swallow'd it down his throat; the radical word may import, drawing or sucking up with a pipe; properly it signifies to fetch wind, or draw breath; and by a Metaphor, to swallow down, to sup or suck up; as also, with fervency and pleasure to desire; because vehement desires are often expresst by quick breathings; yea, to breath after a thing, is to desire it: or it notes a mind to swallow it up, either from the delight we have in it, or hatred of it. In which latter sence David applies it to his enemies (Psal. 56. 2.) Mine enemies would daily swallow me up. They breath after me to devour me, So then the meaning is, this robber, this hairy spoiler or thirsty one, will be so dry, that he will swallow all up, he will soop and drink up the foolish mans estate to the very bottom; he will draw it down to the very dregs or lees, and not leave a drop behind him.

The robber swalloweth up their substance.] In the first Chapter we read Job described, A man of a very great substance; Job's substance in cattel was thus and thus: Here also it is said, The robber shall swallow up his substance; but the word in the Hebrew, is very different from that in the first Chapter; there the word signifieth properly substance in cattel; but here it signifies substance in any kind of wealth and riches whatsoever: And it notes three things.

First, and most properly, Strength; either strength of body or of mind, namely, valour, activity and courage; also wisdom and industry to get or defend our substance; so Gen. 47. 6. Pharaoh tells Joseph, that if among his brethren, there were any men of activity, he should make them Rulers over his cattel.

Secondly, It notes riches and wealth, or any worldly substance; because much activity, wisdom and strength, is usually employed in obtaining them; or because wisdom and strength are requisite for the keeping and retaining of them (Prov. 11. 16.) Strong men retain riches; as if he should say, though a man have abundance of riches, yet if he have not strength, he shall hardly hold them, they will be wrested out of his hands. Once more, Riches are thus expresst, because men usually account their riches to be their strength; a man naturally puts confidence in his riches, Pro. 13. 15. The rich mans wealth is his strong City: Riches are called strength, from that corrupt opinion which the world hath of them, making them Idols, and trusting to them, as they should unto God alone. Though yet, there is a truth in it, that riches have much strength in them; a rich man, and a powerful man, are mutually put for each other.

Thirdly, The word signifies an Army of men, Psal. 33. 16. There is no King saved by the multitude of an host. We may take it either way; this hungry man, this robber, shall come and swallow up his substance, his riches, his strength; or, he shall come and swallow up his very Army, by which he thought to defend his substance: All shall be lost, neither the estate, nor the means used to protect the estate, shall stand before this hungry, thirsty, hairy robber. In this description of a total desolation brought upon the estate and family of the foolish man, together with the character of the persons, who shall make him desolate, questionless Eliphaz would represent to Job, the desolation brought upon his estate and children, by those troops of hungry, hairy, thirsty robbers, the Caldeans and the Sabeans, who swallowed all his substance at one morsel, soopt up his estate at one draught. Whence observe,

> It is a great point of wisdom, to shew a man his condition in anothers, and to seem only relating the History of our foreign observation, when we mean the person to whom we speak.

What is proposed as seen in others, works the heart to see it self; and doth at once mitigate the sharpness of the reproof, and open the spirit to let it in. As we see in the instance of Nathan's Parable to David, 2 Sam. 12. Eliphaz said only, I have seen the foolish taking root, &c. He doth not lay it boisterously and directly upon Job, I saw thee taking root, &c.

Thus we have opened the context of these five verses, wherein Eliphaz argues Job guilty of wickedness and insincerity, because God had dealt with him as he usually doth with the wicked and insincere, whose habitations are cursed, their children crushed, their substance swallowed up by thirsty, and eaten up by hungry robbers, who take it out from the very thorns of their own cares, in getting, or means in securing what they have gotten.

VERS. 6, 7, 8.

Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground.
Yet man is born unto trouble as the sparks flie upward.
I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause.

THus far Eliphaz had spent his discourse in reproof and conviction; and you have had it out of the fourth Chapter, and the precedent part of this, four heads of reason, or arguments, by which Eliphaz labours to reprove Job for, and convince him of close sin, or of gross hypocrisie. Now Eliphaz turns himself to another stile, and falls to counsel and exhortation, directing and advising Job what becomes him, what he ought to do in his condition. His exhortation consists of two distinct branches.

The former whereof begins at the sixth, and is continued to the seventeenth verse of the Chapter. The sum of this exhortation is, That, forasmuch as he had found him so distempered in his speech and carriage, he now earnestly beseeches and intreats him, that he would seek unto God, beg favour, and believingly commit himself and his cause unto God.

The second branch of exhortation begins at v. 17. and is continued to the end of the Chapter: The scope whereof is, That Job would humbly and patiently submit himself unto, and under the correcting hand of God; quietly waiting the time of his deliverance.

The matter of the former exhortation lies in the words of the eighth verse, I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause.

He strengtheneth his exhortation by two arguments; whereof,

The first is taken from the cause of his afflictions, and that either the efficient, or the meritorious cause of his afflictions; both which we find in the sixth and seventh verses.

The second argument by which he strengtheneth his first exhortation, is continued in the ninth, tenth, eleventh and twelfth verses following; and it is grounded upon the power, wisdom and goodness of God: As if he should say, Who would not seek unto a God who is of infinite power, able to deliver? Who would not seek unto a God, and commit his cause unto him, who is gracious, and pitiful, merciful, and ready to deliver? Who would not seek unto a God, and commit his cause unto him, who is of infinite wisdom to find out wayes and means for the contriving of deliverance, though mans condition (to the eye of sense or humane reason) seem altogether desperate and remediless?

These three verses contain the first exhortation, together with the first Argument: And we may form it thus, both respecting the efficient, and the meritorious cause of his afflictions.

First, Reſpecting the efficient cauſe, the Argument ſeems to lie thus;

He is to be ſought unto in our afflictions, who is the principal efficient cauſe or ſender of our afflictions.
But, God is the principal efficient cauſe and ſender of our afflictions:
Therefore, he is to be ſought unto, and, to him our cauſe is to be committed.

The Major or firſt Propoſition is not expreſly in this text, but it is plainly ſuppoſed, and logically to be underſtood. The Minor, or the Aſſumption lies in the ſixth and ſeventh verſes, where he proves that God is the efficient cauſe or the ſender of afflictions; and his proof is grounded upon a denial, or a removal of all other efficient cauſes. As if he ſhould ſay, there muſt be ſome efficient cauſe of affliction, but no efficient cauſe can be aſſigned or named, except God: therefore God is the efficient cauſe, the ſender and orderer of afflictions. That no other efficient cauſe can be aſſigned, he proveth plainly in the ſixth verſe, thus; Affliction cometh not forth of the duſt, neither doth trouble ſpring out of the ground; yet man is born to trouble, &c. As if he ſhould ſay, our eyes teach us, we ſee plainly man is full of trouble; man is no ſooner born, but he is afflicted; theſe afflictions muſt have ſome efficient cauſe; ſome hand or other doth frame, form and faſhion them, they come not alone; and if they come not alone, then we muſt find out this cauſe either in earth or in heaven: we muſt find it, either in the Creator, or among the creatures; but from the earth or from creatures, they come not: Affliction cometh not forth of the duſt, neither doth trouble ſpring out of the ground, that is, it riſes not by or from the creatures in themſelves, and alone conſidered; and if ſo, it muſt needs come from heaven, from the hand of God, who dwelleth above, and diſpoſeth all things according to the pleaſure of his own will. It is ſuch a kind of ſpeech, as often falls from us, when a thing is loſt; we ſay, ſome body muſt have it; ſure it is not gone into the ground, you or you muſt have it, for there were none elſe in the place. So Eliphaz ſeems here to argue about the afflictions which he ſaw upon Job: here are heavy afflictions upon thee, theſe afflictions muſt come ſome way upon thee; They come not forth of the duſt, neither do they ſpring out of the ground, they come not up alone: Either then they muſt come from God or man; and from man they come not, they ſpring not out of the earth; therefore he leaves it, as a clear inference, that God is the efficient cauſe or ſender of affliction.

Again, if we conſider this Argument, as it ſtrengtheneth the exhortation from the meritorious cauſe of his afflictions; it may be formed thus.

If the ſin of man be from himſelf, and the ſufferings of man be for his ſin, then in his ſufferings for ſin, he ought to ſeek unto God, and commit his cauſe unto him.
But the ſin of man is from himſelf, and the ſufferings of man are for his ſin:
Therefore, he ought in ſuch a condition to ſeek unto God, and commit his cauſe unto him; for remedy is no where elſe to be had.

This ſecond Argument is grounded rather upon the expoſition, then the letter of the text, as ſhall be further cleared in purſuance of the words.

Thus you ſee how the Minor or ſecond Propoſition is confirmed, both, as it reſpects the efficient cauſe, and the meritorious cauſe of mans affliction. The Concluſion lies in the eighth verſe, which Eliphaz pronounces in his own perſon; I would ſeek unto God: therefore ſeek thou unto God: he ſpeaks in his own perſon, thereby more freely to inſinuate his counſel, and make way for his exhortation. As if he had ſaid, Were I in thy caſe, I would do ſo; therefore do thou ſo likewiſe; Seek unto God, and commit thy cauſe unto him.

So much of this context in the Logick of it, as it contains an exhortation, with an argument to ſtrengthen and back that exhortation. Now for the clearing of the words.

Although afflictions come not forth of the duſt.

The Hebrew particle, which we tranſlate Although, may be taken three wayes, and ſo I find it rendred upon this place.

First, (which is its moſt proper ſence) it is taken cauſally, and then the text is read, For, affliction cometh not forth of the duſt. So Mr. Broughton, for ſorrow iſſueth not from the duſt.

Secondly, It may be taken adverſatively, as we read it, Although affliction or ſorrow comes not forth of the duſt.

Thirdly, It may be taken affirmatively; according to which acception, the text is thus carried, Certainly, affliction cometh not out of the duſt, or, Surely, affliction cometh not out of the duſt.

Either of theſe wayes the ſence is good; yet to me our tranſlation by the Adverſative Although, doth a little obſcure the ſence: And to ſay, Surely, or certainly, affliction comes not forth of the duſt, ſeems to carry it more clearly.

Surely affliction cometh not out of the duſt.] It is conſiderable, that the word by which affliction is here expreſt, bears a double ſignification in Scripture, and I conceive it may alſo in this text; properly it ſignifies, ſin, iniquity, iniquity of all ſorts, but eſpecially, That ſin of Idolatry; as (Hoſ. 4. 14.) when the houſe of God (Bethel) was polluted with Idolatry, the name is changed, and it is called Bethaven, the houſe of an Idol, or, the houſe of iniquity; or of that ſpecial iniquity, namely, of Idolatry; Sin alters the nature of man; no marvel then, if it alter the names of things, Hoſ. 10. 15. and often in the old Teſtament we find this word added, to ſet out the worſt of men, the workers of iniquity, Pſal. 5. 5, &c. Iniquity comes not out of the duſt: the ſoil where it grows, or the ſhop where it is wrought and formed, is mans heart; Eliphaz would carry us to the well-head, our ſinful natures, or our birth-ſin.

Secondly, The word ſignifies affliction or ſorrow, calamity or miſery, becauſe ſin is the cauſe of affliction, the mother of ſorrow: and therefore by a Metonymie of the effect for the cauſe (which is frequent in Scripture) the ſame word notes both ſin and ſorrow; the mother and the daughter are called by the ſame name. We tranſlate by the effect, Surely, affliction cometh not out of the duſt; many by the cauſe, Surely, iniquity cometh not out of the duſt. And for the full underſtanding of the Text, we muſt take in both; where the effect only is mentioned, the cauſe is ſuppoſed, Affliction ſprings not out of the duſt, becauſe ſin ſprings not out of the duſt.

Now this form of ſpeaking (Iniquity or affliction ſprings or cometh not forth of the duſt) is proverbial; and no doubt was well known, and often uſed in thoſe times. When they would remove chance or fortune (as we ſay) or deny any event to be without a certain directive power, they ſpake in this language, This came not from the ground; thereupon the Vulgar tranſlates it ſo in terms, (a) There is nothing in the world without cauſe, alluding (it is probable) to the Proverb. Hence, a man obſcurely born, whoſe Parents and Original are unknown, is called (b) A Son of the earth: Which imports, that no man can tell whence he is, or how deſcended. They whoſe original cannot be aſſigned, are uſually aſſigned to the common Original, or (c) parent of us all, the earth. And as in regard of perſons, ſo of things, when no man can tell how or which way they come, they are ſaid to come out of the ground. We ſpeak alſo (in the other extream) affirmatively, Such a thing comes out of the clouds, that is (we know not, but) God knows how it comes. So then, here is a denial of chance or fortune; as if Eliphaz ſhould ſay, reaſon may be found and aſſigned for theſe things, they come not out of the duſt.

Further, For the clearing of this, The duſt and the ground ſtand in a twofold oppoſition. Firſt, Unto God; and ſecondly, unto our ſelves. Firſt, In oppoſition to God, thus, Affliction ſpringeth not from the ground, that is, it comes from the wiſdom, power, and diſpoſition of God, as the efficient cauſe. Secondly, In oppoſition to our ſelves, and then the ſence may be thus conceived, that, the material and meritorious cauſe of our affliction, is not without us, it is not in the ground, or in other creatures, but in our ſelves: Every man in himſelf hath the ground which bears, the ſource, or fountain, which bubbles out his ſorrows and his ſufferings. Man hath no reaſon to accuſe or charge heaven or earth, as the Authors of his ſorrow, he carries the reaſon about with him, The ſinfulneſs or ſink of his own polluted nature. And therefore (to allude to that of the Apoſtle in the point of Juſtification, Rom. 10. 6, 7. Say not in thy heart, who ſhall aſcend into heaven? that is, to bring thy troubles עסל Terrâ nata dicuntur illa, quibus nulla ab agricolis impensa est opera, ut sunt herbæ quas ultro terra fundit in pratis & locis incultis. Sanct.

The latter branch of this verse, Neither doth trouble spring out of the ground, is of the very same importance with the former, therefore I shall not need to stay upon it. The word which we translate Trouble signifies properly, toylsom labour, or any laborious toyl accidental to man in this life, as a fruit of sin. This doth not spring out of the ground. It is an allusion to plants or herbs, which grow in the open field, without the work or care of man, and so are opposed to plants or herbs in a garden: As if he should say, thy troubles are not like those herbs, that grow wild, in the fields, without the labour and pains, the care or art of man. There is some hand or other, that both plants and waters them.

We may ground some observations as the Text is read, Iniquity comes not forth of the dust. And then as it is read, Affliction comes not forth of the dust. And it is necessary to give it this latitude; the word equally bearing both sences. As it is read, Iniquity comes not, &c.

We learn, First, The material cause of sin is in our selves.

We bring forth the fruit at our tongues or fingers ends, and the root is in our hearts. Our sins spring not out of the dust, but out of the dirt and filth of our own corruptions, Gen. 6. 5. Every thought of the imagination of mans heart it is evil, and only evil, and that continually; the Hebrew is every figment or every creature in the heart of man, whatsoever a man moulds and fashions within himself, naturally, is evil, and nothing but evil, and it is alwayes so. The natural births of mans heart have all one common face and feature; they are all of one common constitution, Evil all.

Secondly, We may Observe, That, the meritorious cause of mans suffering is from his sin.

Iniquity springeth not from the ground, neither doth trouble come out of the dust. As iniquity springs from our selves, so we may resolve it, that misery springs from our sin. It is a truth (as hath been touched upon the second Chapter) that, God, in many afflictions laid upon his dear children and servants, respects not their sin, as the cause procuring and drawing on these afflictions. And very many are afflicted by the world, not for sins sake, but for righteousnes sake. As Christ, so some Christians may say in their sphear, We have done many good works, for which of them do you stone me. Yet this is as clear a truth, that the sin of any man is in it self a sufficient meritorious cause of any, yea, of all afflictions. A creature cannot bear a greater punishment, then the least of his sins deserves. Man weaves a spiders web of sin out of his own bowels, and then he is intangled in the same web; the troubles which insnare, and wrap about him, are twisted with his own fingers.

Thirdly Observe, Naturally every man seeks the reason of his sorrows and afflictions out of himself.

When man is afflicted, he is not willing to own himself, as the cause of his afflictions, or acknowledge that they spring from his sin; and, that may be the reason, why Eliphaz speaks thus to Job, as if he had said, thy thoughts are wandring abroad, thou little thinkst that thy afflictions were bred in thy own bosom: Thou art fastning the cause of them upon this, and t'other thing; thou art complaining of the day wherein thou wast born; but thou shouldest rather complain of the sin, wherein thou wast born; Thy birth-day hath not hurt thee, but thy birth-sin. Thy birth-sin hath given conception, to all the sorrows of thy life.

The Jews in the Prophet Isaiah's time were in great distress, and could get no deliverance: The ports and passages of mercy were all obstructed. Now, whither went their thoughts? And what did they look upon, as the reason of those abiding lingring evils? we may read their thoughts in the refutation of them; we may see what the disease of their hearts was, by the medicine which the Prophet applies unto them: he labours to purge them from that conceit, as if either want of power, or want of love in the Lord, were the stop of their deliverance. The Lords hand is not shortned that he cannot save, neither his ear heavy, that he cannot hear, Isa. 59. 1, 2. As if he had said, I know what your apprehensions are in these afflictions, you think the reason is in God, that either he cannot, or he will not save you: You think the hand of Gods power is shrunk up, or the ear of his mercy shut up; but, you reflect not upon your selves, nor consider, that Your iniquities have separated between you and your God: Your sin does hurt you, and you touch not that with a little finger, but lay the weight of your charge upon God himself. So (Hos. 13. 9.) Thy destruction is from thy self, in me is thy help; God is forced to tell them so, that their destruction was from themselves, they would not believe it: they supposed it was from the cruelty or malice of the creature, from the wrath and rage of enemies, from some oversight or neglect of their friends; therefore the Lord speaks out, in expres terms, Thy destruction is from thy self. It springs not forth of the dust, neither is thy destruction from me; In me is thy help: in both the heart of man fails equally: we are ready to say, that the good we have comes from our selves, that our help and comforts are from our own power and wisdom, and so offer sacrifice to our own nets, as if by them our portion were fat: but for evil and destruction we assign it wholly over, sometime to men, and so are angry; sometime to God, and so blaspheme. We naturally decline what reflects shame upon our selves, or speaks us guilty.

From our translation, Although affliction, &c.

Observe, First, Every affliction hath a cause.

The Proverb carries that sence, in every common understanding. Our afflictions have a cause, a certain cause, they come not by hap hazzard, or by accident. Many things are casual, but nothing is without a cause. Many things are not fore-seen by man, but all things are fore-ordained by God. The Prophet Amos (Chap. 3. 6.) sets forth this by an elegant similitude, Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is for him? As if he should say, is a bird taken in a snare by chance, where none have prepared, set, or industriously laid a snare or gin to take him? The bird saw not the snare, but the snare was set for the bird. Snares fall not on the ground at adventure, they grow not out of the earth of themselves: but the Fowler, by his art and industry, invents and frames them on purpose to catch the bird: Thus the calamity and troubles in which men are caught and lime-twig'd, insnared, and shackled in the world, come not out of the ground; They are not acts of chance, but of providence: The wise and holy God sets such snares, to take and hold foolish, unruly men, like silly birds, gaping after the baits of worldly pleasures. Which meaning is clear from the scope and tendency of the whole Chapter; but the next question resolves it in the letter, Is there any evil in a City, and the Lord hath not done it? Those words are both the conclusion and explication of the former similitude.

Secondly Observe, Affliction is not from the power of any creature.

As it comes not by chance or without a cause, so not by the power of creatures, they are not the cause; dust and the ground, are opposed to Heaven or to a divine power: Creatures in this sence, can neither do good, nor do evil. The world would be as full of trouble, as it is of sin, if sinful men could make trouble: It is not in the compass of a creature, no not of all the creatures in Heaven or earth, to form or to make out one affliction, without the concurrence and allowance of God himself. Men alone, can neither make staves of comfort, nor rods of affliction.

Whence thirdly, A consectary from both may be, That,

Afflictions are from the Lord as from the efficient cause, the directer and orderer of them.

These evils are from a creating, not from a created strength. I (saith the Lord) form the light, and create darkness, Isa. 45. 7. Natural darkness hath only a deficient cause, but pœnal darkness hath an efficient cause. Darkness is created. As in the first creation God said, let there be light, so in providence (which is a continued creation) he saith, let there be darkness. If afflictions come not forth of the earth, then they come from Heaven. That wicked King preacht very good doctrine, when he said of an extreame devouring famine, This evil is from the Lord; though he failed utterly in the use or application, while he murmured out, Why should we wait on the Lord any longer, 2 Kings 6. 33. For the reason holds strong to the contrary, This evil is from the Lord, we will wait upon the Lord for ever.

Verse 7. Yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward.

Yet man, or but man is born to trouble.] Some read, Man is born to sin, that is, he is born with a nature ready and prone to sin, because he is born in sin, Psal. 51. 5. And so by consequent he is born to trouble, which is caused by, and is the fruit of sin. These two, sin and trouble, are so near in blood and kindred, that still one word includes them both; the former word which signifies sin properly, is translated affliction; and this word which signifies affliction properly, may be translated sin. When it is said, That Man is born to trouble or sin; it notes two things.

First, A right to them, a right to sin, and a right to sorrow. That which a man is born to, is duly his, it is his inheritance, or his birth-right; that is the common understanding of the phrase: As some men are born to a great estate, to lands and honours, &c. so all men are born to trouble and sin; they are ours by a lineal right, derived from our next, yea first parents, so they descend to us as land descends.

Secondly, It implies a readiness, or a fitness to commit sin, or to fall into trouble: When a man is said to be born to a thing, it notes him exceeding apt and forward to take it: He needs little teaching and instructing, little cultivating or manuring. As when a man makes verses readily, we say he was born to Poetry; or when a man gets wealth easily, we say, he was born to be rich. So in the present case; a mans understanding, will, and affections, need no manuring or dressing to bring forth sin, or the fruit of it, sorrow. He is born to sin.

The latter clause of the verse clears the sence fully, Man is born unto trouble, or unto sin, as the sparks fly upward; the meaning is, as the sparks have a principle in themselves, by which they ascend, they need no directing; when a spark comes out from the fire, no man bids it fly upward, or shews it the way, it will fly upward alone, it knows no other way, but upward; so, it is a natural course for man, as soon as he is born, to sin and work his own sorrow. This he can do, the first thing he doth, and before he can do any thing, well, he can do this, but, too well; He needs no Tutor for these, sinning and sorrowing, are not his art but his nature: Though he should have neither rule nor example in the world, he would find out the mysteries of iniquity, and do enough quickly to make himself miserable.

The particle, As, is a copulative in the hebrew: So divers render it in this Text, Man is born unto trouble, And the sparks fly upward; that is, mans trouble and sparks flying upward, are alike natural. We, as in divers other places, translate it by way of similitude; Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward: So Job 34. 3. The ear tryeth words, and the mouth tasteth meat; we translate the copulative by a comparative; The ear tryeth words, as the mouth tasteth meat. Again, Mark 9. 49. Every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt: The sence lies in the similitude, Every one shall be salted with fire, as every sacrifice is salted with salt; It is an allusion to the old sacrifices, wherein salt was continually used. So here, Man is born unto trouble, and the sparks, that is, as the sparks fly upward.

As the sparks.] The Hebrew is, The sons of the coal; the sons or children of the coal, are sparks; blow a coal, and presently a spark is begotten and born; therefore the Hebrew elegancy calls sparkes, The sons of the children of the coal. And it is observable, that by a metaphor this word signifies in the Hebrew, the Head of an arrow heated with motion, as also, a bird flying in the air; and the reason is, because birds fly up in the air, they ascend naturally, they fly about and flutter, like sparkes of fire in the air. Hence the vulgar and some others translate the words, Man is born unto trouble, as the birds fly upward; The Septuagint, as the young Vultures fly upward; others, as the young ones of the Eagle fly upwards: Aben Ezra a learned Rabbin, makes use of that sence also, and gives the gloss thus, As it is natural and innate for birds to fly, so it is natural for man to suffer trouble.

Hence Observe, First, Sorrow and sin are the portion and all the portion that man hath by nature.

He is born to these.

They who are ascended to the greatest heigths, and have got the greatest stock, either of spiritual or outward comforts, were born to nothing, but a cup of sorrow, to the bread of affliction, and to the waters of adversity: And these we are instated in, yea possessed of, as soon as we are born; we need not wait the death of our parents for this inheritance, they divide it all to every child, and yet keep it all to themselves: All our real comforts are from our second birth, and have their pedigree from the blessing and love of God. Therefore the Apostle puts that general question, What hast thou, that thou hast not received? that is, what good hast thou? Thou hast all thy evil from thy self, but whatsoever good thou hast, was received from above; all our good is founded in free Grace.

Secondly Observe, That, All sins and sorrows are contained virtually in the nature of man.

Though a man doth not formally commit or bring forth every sin, though a man doth not formally bear evey affliction, or taste every cup of sorrow; yet virtually and radically a man hath every sin in him, or it is possible for any sin to be formed and shaped out of the nature of man: Radically also every man hath every affliction, all sorrows in him; and the justice of God, may form the most dreadfully shap'd afflictions out of his sins: And as the sparks lie closely in the fire, or in the flint, till you smite or blow them up; so sin lies secretly in our hearts, till some temptation or occasion smites and brings it out.

Again we may Observe, That, Man can sin without a teacher.

You need not instruct him, or teach him to do evil; he doth that by a natural instinct, since his nature was corrupted. He sins as the sparks fly upwards, or as a bird flyes in the air, whom no man directs how to use her wings, Nature is her rule. There needs much teaching against sin, and it is the business of all the Ordinances, to bridle us from acting our corruptions: But man walks in the wayes of wickedness, without guide or precept.

It was the ancient error of the Pelagians, that the sin of man came onely by imitation: they denied that man had a stock of corruption in his nature, or that his nature was corrupted; but, seeing others sin, he sinned; an opinion which carries its condemnation in its own face, as well as in our hearts. And though similitudes are no proofs, yet, the reason of a similitude is: mans sinning is therefore compared to a sparks flying, to shew how naturally he sins. A spark flies upward without any to lead it the way; and a bird would fly, though she should never see another bird fly: And if a man could live so, as never to see any one example of sin all his dayes; yet that man, out of his own heart, might bring forth every sin, every day. Example quickens and encourages the principles of sin within us, but we can sin without any extrinsick motion or provocation, without pattern or president from without.

Lastly Observe, To sin, is no burden, or labour, to a natural man; For it is his nature.

It is no pains to the spark, to fly upwards: what we do naturally, we do easily. Holy duties are no burdens to a godly man, because, through grace, he doth them naturally; he hath an inward principle, which dictates the law of holiness to him, though he should want outward teaching: He hath an unction from the Holy Ghost, and knoweth all things, 1 Joh. 2. 20. Not that a godly man becomes like God, Omniscient, or knowing all, for at most we know, here, but in part: but he knows all things necessary, and so far as necessary, his new birth teacheth him: He lives not meerly upon the outward teaching, he hath both light and liberty in himself; and so hath a tendency to these things things in his own ſpirit, as there is a tendency in fire to aſcend.

We ſhould wonder and rejoyce, to ſee how grace conquers the courſe of ſinful nature. The new man is born to mercy and holineſs, to grace and glory, as the ſparks fly upward. Hence it is ſaid, He that is born of God cannot commit ſin, for the ſeed of God remaineth in him: As, the ſpark cannot fly downward, becauſe the heat of fire remains in it. The Apoſtle affirms it, of himſelf and his Fellow-labourers in the Goſpel, We can do nothing againſt the truth, but for the truth, 2 Cor. 13. 8. The poſſibilities and impoſſibilities of a regenerate man, are directly oppoſite to thoſe of a natural man: The one cannot ſin, the other cannot but ſin; the one can do nothing againſt the truth, the other can do nothing for the truth: gracious acts become as natural, as ſinful, when nature is changed from ſin to grace. What a bleſſed change is this, that man ſhould do good as readily, as once he did evil; that, he who was born free to iniquity, ſhould be re-born free to righteouſneſs, as the ſparks fly upward. A godly man is an heavenly ſpark: He hath a fire in his nature, which carries him upward for ever.

Thus having opened theſe two verſes, being the grounds of the following exhortation; let us now examine the matter of the exhortation it ſelf, contained in the eighth Verſe.

Verſe 8. I would ſeek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cauſe.

אולם Our Tranſlation omits one word in the beginning of this ſentence, which though it may be underſtood in our reading, yet the expreſſion of it betters the ſence. Surely, or truly I would ſeek, &c.

There are two opinions about the meaning of theſe words; ſome conceive, that Eliphaz ſpeaks in high contempt of Job: and I may give you their ſence, by that proud Schooling, which the Phariſee gave the poor Publican, Luke 18. As that Phariſee inſulted over the Publican, thus, I thank God, I am not ſuch a one as thou art, &c. but I faſt, and I pray, &c. So, they repreſent Eliphaz here inſulting over Job, I thank God, I am not ſuch an impatient perſon as thou art, no ſuch rude curſer of my day, or complainer of my trouble; I am not (I thank God) ſo diſtracted, and ſo diſtempered as thou art; and if I had been in thy caſe, I ſhould have ſhewed more wit, and grace too, then, to do, as thou haſt done; I ſhould never have been ſo vain and fooliſh, ſo forgetful of my own duty, or the Lords Soveraignty, as, to cry out againſt and accuſe his providence and dealings with me, to lay about me like a mad man, as thou haſt done; no, I would have ſought unto God, and committed my cauſe unto him, this ſhould have been my courſe, ſuch and ſuch the frame and temper of my ſpirit.

But I rather take theſe words in a good ſence, implying much ſweetneſs and meekneſs of ſpirit in Eliphaz. And ſo this verſe is as an application of the Doctrine, contained in the former two: As if Eliphaz had ſaid, Seeing matters ſtand thus in themſelves, and theſe are undoubted truths, that afflictions come from our ſelves, and that our ſins are our own: and ſeeing thy caſe ſtands thus, that now thou art under great afflictions and troubles; I do aſſure thee my loving friend Job, were I in thy condition (I will give thee faithful counſel, and tell thee my heart, what I would do) I would no longer ſtay complaining againſt my day, curſing creatures, diſtempering my head, and diſquieting my heart with theſe paſſions; but, I would even go and addreſs my ſelf unto God, I would apply my ſelf to Heaven, I would ſeek for remedy there, earth affords it not. I have ever found this the way to eaſe my heart, when burdened; to aſſwage my ſorrows, when encreaſed; to compoſe my ſpirit, when diſtracted; to ſtrengthen my reſolutions, when unſetled: I can give thee this rule with (a probatum eſt) an aſſurance from mine own experience, in the uſe of it, and with clearneſs of conſcience, that it is my purpoſe in ſuch caſes to uſe it ever.

I would ſeek unto God.] The word ſignifies a very diligent ſearch; I would ſeek exactly and enquire laboriouſly unto God. It ſignifies to ſeek by asking queſtions or by interrogating: And it imports ſeeking with much wiſdom and skill; a curious or a critical enquiry; So Eccleſ. 1. 13. I gave my heart (ſaith Solomon) to ſeek and ſearch out by wiſdom. And this ſeeking implies four things.

First, A ſuppoſition and a ſenſe of our wants; no man ſeeks that which he hath already, or, but thinks he hath it. He that is full loaths a hony comb.

Secondly, A ſtrong deſire to find that which we want; it notes not a bare deſire only, or woulding, but a kind of unquietneſs or reſtleſneſs, till we find: ſuch a deſire took hold of David, Pſal. 132. 4. I will not give reſt to mine eyes, nor ſlumber to mine eye lids, untill I find out a place for the Lord, or, untill I find the Lord.

Thirdly, A care to be directed about the means which may facilitate the finding or recovery of what we want, and thus earneſtly deſire. A ſeeking ſpirit, is a careful ſpirit, after light and counſel.

Fourthly, A diligent and faithful endeavour, in or about the uſe of thoſe means, to which counſel directs us. Through deſire a man having ſeparated himſelf, ſeeketh and intermedleth with all wiſdom, Prov. 18. 1. That is, he is very induſtrious in purſuing thoſe advices, which wiſdom ſhews him, or, which are ſhewed him, as the wayes of wiſdom. A lazy ſpirit is unfit to ſeek.

I would ſeek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cauſe.] In the former clauſe, the word for God, is El, and in the latter, Elohim; both names note the power of God. El, notes power or ſtrength to act and execute; Elohim, power or authority to judge and determine. I would ſeek unto El, The ſtrong God: I would commit my cauſe to Elohim, the mighty God: As if he had ſaid, Thou art in a weak and low condition, now therefore ſeek unto God, the ſtrong God, the mighty God, who is able to deliver thee: Thou wanteſt the help of ſuch a friend as he.

The Hebrew, word for word, is thus rendred, Unto God would I put my words, or turn my ſpeech; We reach the meaning fully, rendring, Unto God I would commit my cauſe, or put my caſe.

The term which we tranſlate, cauſe, ſignifies any buſineſs or cauſe, but moſt properly a word; Explicite prayer in the turning of our thoughts into words, or the putting of our caſe to God. It is a ſpeaking to, or a pleading with the Lord. The Septuagint is clear in this ſence, I would deprecate the Lord, I would call upon the Lord, the governour of all things.

Both theſe ſignifications of the word, are profitable for us, and congruous with the ſcope of the Text, I would turn my ſpeech and prayer, or I would commit my cauſe unto God.

The committing of our cauſe to God, notes a reſignation of our ſelves, and of our condition into the hands of God: It is as much as to ſay, Let God do what he will, or determine what he pleaſeth concerning me, I will not ſtrive or contend about, queſtion or diſpute his deciſion or judgment of my cauſe: I will lay my ſelf down at his feet, and tell him how the caſe ſtands with me; then, let him do with me, what ſeems good in his eyes: This is the committing of our cauſe and condition unto God. And the Original word here uſed for God, doth very well ſuit and correſpond with this ſence; I will commit my cauſe unto God, unto Elohim, the great and impartial Judge of Heaven and Earth; the God who loves Judgment, and the habitation of whoſe Throne is righteouſneſs: The God who knows how to diſcern exactly between cauſe and cauſe, perſon and perſon, and will undoubtedly give a righteous ſentence concerning every cauſe and perſon, that comes before him. Unto this Elohim would I commit my cauſe, and refer my ſelf to his arbitration.

Obſerve, firſt, in the general; Eliphaz having reproved Job, turns himſelf to counſel and exhortation: From which we may learn,

That, As it is our duty to reprove a fault in our brother, ſo it is our duty to adviſe and counſel him how to amend, or come out of that fault, for which we reprove him.

It is not enough to eſpy an error, but we muſt labour to rectifie it; or, to tell another that he is out of the way, but we muſt endeavour to reduce him. Many can eſpy faults and failings in others, who either know not how, or care not to reform and help them out.

Secondly Obſerve, That, It is a duty to exhort and excite our brethren to thoſe duties wherein we find them ſlack or negligent.

Eliphaz conceived, that Job was much behind in the duty of prayer and self-resignation unto God, and therefore he quickens him up to it. The Apostle calls us to this Christian inspection (Heb. 3. 13.) Exhort one another daily, lest any of you be hardned through the deceitfulness of sin; sin growing and getting strength, hardens the heart; it is best to oppose it betimes, and therefore he bids them do it at all times, Exhort one another daily. Though the Apostle Peter (2 Pet. 1. 12.) was perswaded of the Saints establishment in the present truth, yet (saith he) I will not cease to put you alwayes in remembrance of these things. It is a dangerous error (which some hold) that the Saints in this life may out-grow counsel and exhortation; as if there were no need to bid a godly man pray, and seek unto God; no need to bid a godly man to repent, or humble himself, or believe: he cannot but do these things (say they) these are connatural to him: they are indeed to the new man, within him: but let them withal remember, that the neglect of all these duties, is as connatural to the old man, within him. While there are two men within us, we had need every man to look, not only to one, but to one another. It may go ill with the better part, the new man, if while he hath an enemy within to oppose him, he hath not a friend without to help him. On this ground (besides the command of Christ) the holiest man on earth, may be exhorted to look to his holiness: none are in more danger then they, who think they are past danger. And, as it is a certain argument, that a man was never good, if he desires not to be better; so, it is a great argument, that a man was never good, who fears not that he may be worse. They who are truly assured they cannot fall from grace, are assured also that they may fall in grace, and fall into sin: The foundation of God stands sure, but the footing of man doth not; and therefore, Let him that stands, take heed lest he fall: And let them who see their brethren heedlesly falling, lend them the right hand of exhortation to raise them up again: and when they are careless of, or wandring from the Lord, lead them by the hand of counsel, into wayes where he may be found. I would seek unto God.

Observe in the third place, That, We ought to manage our exhortations with meekness and tenderness.

This of Eliphaz is a mild and tender expression; and to make it more easie, he puts the exhortation (as was noted before) in the first, not in the second person; he doth not say, seeing afflictions come not from the ground, and that man is born unto trouble, therefore do thou seek unto God, and do thou commit thy cause unto God; but seeing thy case is thus, truly brother, I advise thee as I would advise mine own soul, Seek unto God. It moves strongly and gains upon the affection of another, to tell him, we would do the thing our selves which we desire he should, and we wish him as we do our own souls.

Fourthly Observe, That, It is both our wisdom and our duty in all our afflictions to seek unto God.

I would (saith Eliphaz) if I were in thy case, seek unto God. Unto whom should we go, but unto God? He is our best friend, when it is best with us; and he is our only friend, when it is ill with us: all other friends will be Physitians of no value, as Job himself found them, therefore seek unto God. As the Disciples said unto Christ, when Christ asked them, Will ye also go away? Whither shall we go (say they) for thou hast the words of eternal life? So saith the soul in afflictions, To whom shall I go? Unto this creature or that creature, unto this friend or that friend? No, I will seek unto God, That is the wisest and shortest course: all other courses are about, if not in vain. Other wayes may be used as helps, but this must; pitch mainly upon God.

When we are directed to seek unto God in afflictions, it speaks four things.

First, To seek unto God about the cause of our afflictions: desire that God would inform us, what his mind is in sending such an affliction, or what it is he aims at, in sending it. Afflictions are the Lords messengers, and we should never be quiet, till we know their errand. This is it which Job complained of in Chap. 3. That his way was hid, which was expounded, that he knew not the cause of his afflictions, the cause was hidden; and so was the issue, he could neither tell how he came in, nor how he should come out; If our way in afflictions be hid, we must seek unto God for the opening of it.

Secondly, To seek unto God for strength and patience, to bear the affliction. As the affliction comes from God, so doth the strength by which we stand under it, or, get victory over it.

Thirdly, To seek unto God for the sanctifying of affliction to our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness. Afflictions are the good creatures of God, and they (as all other creatures) are sanctified to us, by the word and prayer. We have as much reason to seek unto God for a blessing upon our daily Rod, as upon our daily Bread.

Fourthly, Seek unto God for cure and ease, for the removing or mitigating of them. In their affliction they will seek me early, saith the Lord, Hos. 5. 15. But, for what will they seek? even, for medicine and healing. Come and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up, Hos. 6. 1.

Observe from the other branch, And unto God would I commit my cause,

That, It is a very great ease unto the soul in affliction, to commit our cause unto God, and to put our affairs into his hand.

Man is not able to stand alone, under the weight of his afflictions. Both sin and sorrow are burdens too heavy for us to bear: if you would have ease, lay both upon Christ; it is no unbecoming boldness to do so, for, he calls us to it, and bids us do it; Psal. 55. 22. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee. Christ is willing to bear a part; and put his shoulder under these burdens; yea, it is his strength that bears the whole. The committing of our cause to God, is at once our duty, our safety, and our ease. Thus David did, Psal. 142. 2. I powred my complaint before him, I shewed before him my trouble. David brought out his evils, and set them (as it were) one by one, in the sight of God, and told him, thus it is with me. We may see David acting this rule, to the life, when Absalom had fomented a most unnatural rebellion against Him: He hastens out of Jerusalem, All the Country wept with a loud voice, and the Priests with the Ark of the Covenant of God came with him also. In what posture was Davids spirit, in the midst of these commotions? His words to Zadok shew (no doubt) the true picture of it. And the King said to Zadok, carry back the Ark of God into the City; if I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and shew me both it and his habitation: but if he say thus, I have no delight in thee, behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him (2 Sam. 15. 25, 26.) As if he had said, I am uncertain what God will do with me: but I am resolved to let the Lord do with me what he will, I am willing to be what God will have me; I lay my cause and leave my busines at his foot-stool, if he will have me dethron'd and unking'd, I am content my honour should lie in the dust. If he say, I shall never come again to Jerusalem, or see the Ark of his strength and presence, I am content for ever to be banisht Jerusalem, never to see the Ark (which to me is the most beautiful and desirable sight in the world) any more. Here was self-resignation, and cause-committing to the height. And when David had brought his heart to this, his heart was unburden'd, he (doubtless) found the weight and stress of the whole business lying upon God himself. His cause was with God, and his cares were with God; and therefore, though his throne shak'd, yet his heart was fixed. Nor do I find, that ever his heart was more fixed, then in this stress, while his Throne and Crown were tottering. Hezekiah did the like with like success. In the day of that great and publick calamity, he went and spread the letter of Rabshaketh before God; he, as it were, desired God to read it, to observe the blasphemous contents, and see in what condition he was. He that commits his cause to God, breaths a composed spirit, when the greatest storms and distractions are upon his body or estate, upon Church or State.

Only take this caution, be sure the cause you commit to God, be a good cause. The committing of a sinful cause to God, is a dishonour to, and a high strain of presumption against God. We may commit a doubtful cause to God,

God, desiring, that he would try, and examine, whether it be good or bad. But we must not commit a doubtful cause to God, desiring him to protect it, or us in it, whether it be good or bad. And if (in this sense) we may not commit a doubtful cause to God; what shall we think of those, who shall dare to commit an openly unjust and wicked cause to God? A wicked mans prayer is alwayes sinful; but, how abominable is it, when he prayes to be prospered or directed in acting his sin, or to be strengthned in suffering (impenitently) for his sin? There is no gracious act, but a wicked man, at one time or other, will imitate it. He will pray, and repent, and forgive, and commit his cause to God; and when he dyes, commit his soul to God. There is no trusting to a mouth full of good words, while the heart will not empty it self of wickedness. It is good alwayes to commit our cause and our souls to God: but a cause or a soul are not therefore good, because committed unto God. The language of Israel is often spoken by the men of Ashdod; and many who never had the least part of holiness in them, can yet set themselves (when there is no remedy) to act a part in it. The Apostle Peter gives us this rule, (1 Epist. 4. 19.) Let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him, in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator. Except we suffer according to the will (or from the hand) of God, and, also, do well in our sufferings, Christ will not admit this Feoffment; though we commit our selves to him, he will not accept the trust. But he that suffers according to (or by) the will of God, and doth well in suffering; that is, hath a good cause, and a good conscience: He (I say) may commit all to God, and (in the mercy of the most High) he shall not miscarry.

Lastly, Whereas Eliphaz saith, I would seek unto God, were I in thy case, Observe, That, It is a wise course in advising others, to shew our selves ready to follow the same advise.

It wins exceedingly upon others, to take our counsel, when it appears we are ready to follow the same counsel our selves. We ought to do nothing unto others, but what we would have done unto our selves; and we should advise nothing to others, but what we our selves would do: It puts strength into a rule, when he that gives it, is ready to enliven it by his own practice. As a Physitian, for the encouragement of his Patient to take a nauseous medicine, will say to him, Sir, you seem unwilling to drink it, but if I were sick and distempered, as you are, I would drink it readily; and that you may see there is no hurt in it, I will taste a little my self; his tasting sweetens it, and the Patient likes it well. Thus when either Minister or private friend offers advise or counsel, and shall say, thus I would do, this I would follow; this takes upon the heart: whereas it disparages prayer or any duty, to say to another, Seek unto God, put your case unto him, fast and pray, when he that gives the counsel neglects all these duties, and is careless of communion with God.

Christ saith of the Pharisees, that they bound heavy burthens upon the shoulders of others. These burdens were counsels and directions, rules, and canons; they would have men do thus and thus, in the manner of Gods worship, or daily converse with men. But, They themselves would not touch them with one of their fingers; (Matth. 23. 4.) That is, they would not practise them in the least degree. As to do evil with both hands, (Mic. 7. 3.) notes the highest degree both of desire and endeavour, in doing evil: So not to touch that which is good with a finger, notes a total neglect of doing good. A finger is the least member, and a Touch is the least act; then these Pharisees not touching with a finger, imports they did not act at all. It is good to act a rule privately by way of experiment, before we put it upon others: but it is most necessary to act it by way of example, when we have published it to, and prest it upon others. It was a speech of one of the Ancients, I never taught my people any thing, but what I had first practised and experimented my self. Doctrine is sooner followed by the eye, then by the ear; he that (like the Scribes and Pharisees Matth. 23. 3. saith and doth not, shall find but few to do what he saith. No man ought to teach any thing which he is not willing (as he is call'd) to do and observe himself. It is very sinful to give counsel, which we will not take. Our works ought to be the practise of our words, and as practicable as our words. Wo unto those of whom it may be said, as Christ of the Pharisees, Matth. 23. 3. Whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do, but do not ye after their works.

VERS. 9.

10 Which doth great things and unsearchable; marvellous things without number.

THis context unto verse 17. contains the second Argument, by which Eliphaz strengthneth his former exhortation, To seek unto God, and to commit his cause unto him. The Argument may be thus formed.

He is to be sought unto, both in duty, and in wisdom; and unto him our cause is to be committed, who is of absolute, 20 infinite power, wisdom and goodness.
But God is of absolute, infinite power, wisdom and goodness.
Therefore it is our duty and our wisdom to seek unto God, and unto God to commit our cause.

That, God is infinite in power, wisdom and goodness, Eliphaz proves by an enumeration or induction of divers effects and works, which call for infinite power, wisdom and goodness to produce and actuate them.

These effects are laid down, first in general, verse 9. Who 30 doth great things and unsearchable; marvellous things without number.

Then, these works or effects are given in particulars; and the first particular instance of Gods mighty power, is in natural things, or his preservation of the world, at verse 10. Who giveth rain upon the earth, and sendeth waters upon the fields.

The second instance is given in civil things, or his administrations in the world, at vers. 12, 13, 14. And that we may consider two wayes.

40 First, In destroying the counsels and plots of the wicked, in vers. 12, 13, and 14. He that disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise, &c.

Secondly, In delivering those who are in trouble, vers. 15. He saveth the poor from the Sword, &c. These are works of Power.

Further the goodness of God shines forth in two things:

First, By the present intendment, or end aimed at, in these mighty works, vers. 11. To set up on high those that be 50 low, that those which mourn may be exalted to safety.

Secondly, By the future benefit of these works, and that in two respects, vers. 16.

First, The raising up of their spirits who are oppressed, So the poor hath hope.

Secondly, The confounding and shaming of their oppressors, expresst in their silence, at the latter end of vers. 16. And iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

Thus you have a brief account of the several points contained in this argument, and the disposition of the whole 60 context. For the better understanding thereof, we will first consider what might be the aim or scope of Eliphaz, in making so accurate and large a description of God, in his great and marvellous works, and then survay these works in order as they are digested.

To the former, we may take notice of a four-fold aim, which Eliphaz might have in describing these works of God.

First, Plainly to assert the providence of God, in ordering or disposing all actions and events here below: and so 70 it is in prosecution of what he had said in vers. 6. Affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground.

Or secondly, His intent might be, to humble Job, to bridle and take down his spirit, which he conceived overbold with, and too much heightned towards the Almighty; a discovery whereof himself made in his extravagant speeches before noted, in Chap. 3. The remembrance of God in his greatness, is one of the readiest means to humble man: And God himself took this way to humble Job, in the latter end of this book, even, by a large discourse of his own power, exemplified in many great acts and pieces of the creation.

Or thirdly, The intent of Eliphaz might be, to ſupport and comfort Job in his afflictions, by ſhewing him a God that had done ſuch wonders, and therefore able to work another wonder in delivering and raiſing him up again: A God, who could provide medicines for all his diſeaſes, heal all his breaches, repair all his loſſes, ſupply all his wants, and reſolve all his doubts. To conſider God in himſelf, and in his works, who he is, and what he doth, is a mighty encouragement to ſeek unto God in our greateſt extremities, in the ſaddeſt and cloudieſt day of our afflictions. Neither can we do any thing more prevalent, for the ſupport and relief of our own ſpirits, in a time when we are loweſt, then to ſpread before the eye of our own thoughts, the power, greatneſs and goodneſs of the high God, in his works and wonders.

A fourth intent in probability was to ſtop Jobs curioſity, in enquiring ſo much into the reaſon of Gods dealing with him; which Eliphaz it ſeems obſerved in the complaints of Chap. 3. where Job expoſtulates, Why is light given to a man whoſe way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? Job was troubled, becauſe he could not ſee the bottom of Gods dealings with him; he could not ſee through them, either what the cauſe was, why he came into thoſe troubles, or by what iſſues and out-lets, he ſhould eſcape thoſe troubles. Now, to ſtop Jobs curioſity in prying too far, or too boldly, into the ſecret workings of God; Eliphaz tells him, That God doth great things, and unſearchable: no marvel therefore, if his wayes were hid; That he doth marvellous things without number, no marvail then, if he could not meaſure his dealings, by the line of humane underſtanding, or ſum up their account by the beſt of his Arithmetick.

This in general, for the common tendency of his diſcourſe, about thoſe noble acts of divine Providence in earthly things. I come now to open the words in particular.

Which doth great things and unſearchable, marvellous things without number.

Which doth.] He ſpeaks in the preſent tenſe, he ſayes not, which hath done great things, or, which will do great things; but which doth great things. And that notes not only a preſent act, but a continued act, or an everlaſting act; or, as if the workings of God were but an act, paſt, and to come, all included in the preſent, He doth. As in his Nature and Eſſence, though God was from all eternity, and ſhall be unto all eternity, yet his Name is, I am. So in his works, though he hath done great things, and ſhall no great things for ever, yet all are comprehended in this, I do, or He doth great things. Chriſt (John 5.17.) ſpeaks this language, My Father worketh hitherto: worketh; All that which God had done, and all that he ſhould do, is to be looked upon as his preſent act, My Father worketh hitherto.

Again, there is ſomewhat to be conſidered in the natural emphaſis of the word it ſelf, as well as in that circumſtantial of the time. The word which we tranſlate, Doth, ſignifies more then an ordinary Doing; which doth great things. The Criticks obſerve, that in ſtrictneſs and propriety of the Hebrew, it ſignifies to do a thing compleatly, perfectly and exactly, or (as we ſay) the ſetting of our laſt hand to a work. Hence Eſau (Gen. 25.25.) had his name. When Jacob and Eſau were born, Eſau came forth firſt, and the Text ſaith, they called his name Eſau; and why? becauſe he was born, made up, in greater perfection, then an ordinary child. Eſau ſignifies, adorned and perfected, becauſe he came into the world hairy, or with hair upon him, which is both a natural ornament, and an argument of natural ſtrength, activity and heat of ſpirit, &c. Hence they call'd him, Eſau: So then, the word [doth] imports doing, not by way of eſſay or inchoation, but doing compleatly, or to carry a thing on, or up to an extraordinary degree of perfection. I ſhall give one Scripture to illuſtrate that ſignificancy of the word, *Iſa.*43.7. where the Lord by the Prophet, ſhewing the abundant increaſe of the Church, ſpeaks thus, Bring my ſons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; even every one that is called by my name, for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him, yea I have made him. Obſerve, here is a plain gradation in thoſe three words, Created, formed, made; I have created, ſignifies the bringing of a thing from a not-being, to a being. But, ſaith God, I have not only given him a being, but, I have formed him; which notes the limming, proportioning and poliſhing a thing: And not only have I done ſo; but, in the third place, (which is the word of the Text) I have made him. There is more in this word, then in the former two, and therefore we tranſlate it with an emphaſis; yea, I have made him; that is, I have not only given him a being and a ſhape, but I have put upon him all the perfections of nature; yea, and the perfections of grace, the impreſſions of my ſpecial love and favour; I have lifted him up to the top of all, and ſo ſome render the word, I have magnified or made him great; I have exalted and ſet him upon the higheſt pinnacles of perfections, and mountains of holineſs.

יצר Conſtituit rem in forma ſua.
עשה Perficit, diſpoſuit.

Hence Obſerve, When God begins a work, he compleats it and carries it thorough.

He doth not only Create, and give a being; Form, and give proportion: but He doth, or He makes, giving beauty and exactneſs to his works. Whether we conſider the works of God as Natural, Civil, or Spiritual; in this ſence God doth them, Deut. 32. 4. Moſes ſpeaks in generall concerning all the works of God; He is a Rock, and his work is perfect: The works of Creation are admirable to the eye; the works of providence, how often do they fill the heart with admiration! That which he ſpake to Samuel concerning the houſe of Ely, is appliable both to his works of Mercy and of Judgment; When I begin, I will alſo make an end, 1 Sam. 3. 12. that is, I will do it fully, there is nothing ſhall take me off, or ſtay me in the mid way; I will not work to halves, I will alſo make an end. And ſo it is in ſpirituals, when once God hath begun, he carries on his work of grace; when once he hath laid the foundation ſtone of mercy, he never leaves, until he hath ſet up the top ſtone, the higheſt ſtone of Glory. Hence the Apoſtle (Heb. 12.) entitles Chriſt, The author and finiſher of our Faith; that is, the beginner and ender, Alpha and Omega, firſt and laſt about our faith. It ſhall never be ſaid of any work of God (as Luke 14.) That he began to build, but could not finiſh it.

And as he finiſhes, ſo he beautifies: all his works are full of order and comelineſs: He doth his work exquiſitely (or as we ſay) artificially; yea, thoſe works that we look upon as full of confuſion, are full of order; and thoſe works in which we ſee no form, or nothing but deformity, even theſe will one day appear (now they are) admirable in beauty and comelineſs. That which the Apoſtle ſpeaks in his exhortation to Timothy, 2 Tim. 2. 15. bidding him do the work of an Evangeliſt, bidding him ſhew himſelf a Workman that needeth not to be aſhamed; is moſt true concerning the great God of Heaven and Earth: He ſhews himſelf a workman, or a worker that needeth not to be aſhamed: When he works, he doth the work of a God; He works like himſelf: Man cannot ſo much as be ſuſpected to have done ſuch things: The Name, that is, the wiſdom, power and goodneſs of God, is written upon them in ſo fair and clear a letter, that it muſt be ſaid, by way of aſſertion, This hath God wrought: And by way of admiration, what hath God wrought! Numb. 22. 23. A man (ſc. a meer natural man beholding theſe things) ſhall ſay, verily he is a God that judgeth the earth, Pſal. 58.11. Man cannot judge, or do like this. The Lord needs not engrave or ſubſcribe his Name to his works; His works, like ſo many Capital letters, ſpell, and like ſo many Heraulds, proclaim his Name.

Which doth great things.] To paſs from the act or manner of doing, we will conſider the object; He doth great things. Some men with a great deal of pains do nothing; and others with a great deal of Art do a thing of nothing, a trifle, a toy, a meer fancy; at moſt, ſome mean or inferior work takes up their time, skill and ſtudy: But when God goes to work, we may expect a noble work, He doth great things. The works of God, anſwer the ſtile or Attributes of God. He is a great God, and His are great works. The works of God ſpeak a God. And here are four things ſpoken in this one verſe, of the works of God, which ſpeak aloud, This is the finger of God. I will firſt bundle bundle them together, and then, both take and weigh them asunder.

He doth { First, Great things. Secondly, Unsearchable. Thirdly, Wonderful. Fourthly, Innumerable; or, without number.

No works of man or Angel, are capable of such a four-fold stamp as this; no, nor any one work of all the creatures put together, could ever be stamped with any one of these characters, in any comparison, with the works of God. Some, in a sence, have done great things, but none have done things unsearchable: Man may fathome the works of man, his closest wayes are not past finding out. As there was never any thing made so strongly by the strength of man, but there was some other strength in man, that could match, yea overthrow it; so there was never any thing so wisely, so artificially or mysteriously contrived, by the skill, knowledge and deepest understanding of a man; but that the skill, knowledge and understanding of another man, hath, or might have ridled and searcht it out. The works of most men are wrought above ground, and their intentions flote and swim upon the face of their actions: And although some, as the Prophet speaks (*Isa.*29.) work deep to hide their counsels (as they hope, not only from men but) from God; yet God gives other men a light, to discover the very lowest Hell of those counsels; even all the depths of Satan, The Master-Engineer of those mines and subterranean contrivances. Further, Though some men do that, which makes other men (especially fools, or men weak in knowledge) wonder, yet no (Thaumaturgus, or) wonder-worker ever did that, which makes all men wonder. Or, if it should be granted, that any have done things great, unsearchable, wonderful, yet I am sure, none have done these things without number; one great, unsearchable, wonderful work, is task enough for one mans life: And a little skill in numbers will serve the turn, to cast up, and give us the total sum and number, of all the works of all men, which deservedly bear (as mans may) the title and superscription of great, unsearchable, wonderful.

More directly. First, He doth great things. There is a greatness upon every thing God doth: The great God leaves (as it were) the print of his own greatness, even upon those things which we account little; little works of Nature, have a greatness in them, considered as done by God; and little works of Providence, have a greatness in them, considered as done by God: If the thing which God doth, be not great in it self, yet it is great, because he doth it. As there is no sin of man little in it self (though comparatively it be) because committed against a great God: So there is no work of God little (though comparatively it be) because acted by the great God. Further, if God doth a thing, which in it self considered, or considered according to the line and rule of the creature, is unjust; yet because God doth it, or commands it to be done, his very doing or commanding stamps justice upon it; as is clear in the case of Abrahams call to sacrifice his son, and the Israelites carrying away the jewels of the Egyptians. If then the Act of God (whose will is the supreme law) makes that lawful, which according to the common rule, is unlawful; how much more doth the act of God make that great, which in ordinary proportion is accounted small.

Again, When it is said, God doth great things, we must not understand it, as if God dealt not about little things, or as if he let the small matters of the world pass, and did not meddle with them: Great in this place, is not exclusive of Little, for, he doth not only great, but small, even the smallest things. The Heathens said, their Jupiter had no leisure to be present at the doing of small things, or it did not become him to attend them. God attendeth the doing of small things, and it is his honour to do so: the falling of a Sparrow to the ground, is one of the smallest things that is, yet that is not without the providence of God; the hairs of our head are small things, yet as not too many, so not too small for the great God to take notice of; Christ assures us this, The very hairs of your head are all numbred, Matth. 10. 29, 30. We ought highly to adore and reverence the power and inspection of God about the lowest, the meanest things and actions. Is it not with the great God, as with great men, or, as it was with that great man Moses, who had such a burthen of business in the government of that people upon his shoulders, that he could not bear it; therefore his father in law adviseth him, to call in the aid of others, and divide the work: But how? The great matters, the weighty and knotty controversies must be brought to Moses; but the petty differences and lesser causes, are transmitted and handed over to inferior judges; And it shall be, that every great matter, they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge; Exod. 18. 22. But God, the great Judge of Heaven and Earth, hath not only the great and weighty, but small matters brought unto him; the least motions of the creature, are heard and resolved, disposed and guided by his wisdom and power.

Non vacat exiguis rebus adesse Jovi.

You will say, What is this greatness, and what are these great things? I shall hint an answer to both, for the clearing of the words.

There is a two-fold greatness upon the works of God. There is (so we may distinguish) First, the greatness of quantity. Secondly, the greatness of quality or vertue. That work of God which is greatest in the bulk or quantity of it, is the work of Creation: How spacious, huge and mighty a fabrick is Heaven and Earth, with all things compacted and comprehended in their circumference! And in this work, so vast for quantity, what admirable qualities are every where intermixt! Matter and form, power and order, quantity and quality, are so equally ballanced, that no eye can discern, or judgment of man determin, which weighs most in this mighty work.

Yet among these works of God, some are called Great, in regard of quality, rather then quantity. As it is said (*Gen.*1.16.) That God made two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser to rule the night. (Sun and Moon) these are great lights, not that there are no lights great but these, or that both these are greater then all other heavenly lights; for many Stars are greater then the Moon, as the doctrine and observation of Astronomers assures us; but the lesser of these is great, in regard of light and influence, excellency and usefulness to the world.

And as these works of creation, so the works of providence are great works: When God destroyes great enemies, the greatness of his work is proclaimed. When great Babilon, or Babylon the great, shall be destroyed, the Saints song of triumph shall be, great and marvailous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true are thy wayes, thou King of Saints, (Rev. 15. 3.) Great and marvellous works, why? Because thou hast destroyed great Babylon, and hast executed great judgment, and powred out great wrath. So, great works of mercy and deliverance to his people, are cried up with admiration, And hath given us such a deliverance as this, saith Ezra, Chap. 9. 13. When the Jews returned from their captivity out of Babylon; that mercy was a kind of miracle, that deliverance a wonder, and therefore he mentions it in terms of admiration, Such deliverance as this! How great? So great, that he had neither words to express, nor example to parallel it; but lets it stand nakedly by it self, in its native glory: Such deliverance as this.

The spiritual works of God, are yet far greater; the work of redemption, is called a great Salvation; the conversion and justification of a sinner, the pardon of our sins, and the purifying of our nature, are works as high above creation and providence, as the Heavens are in comparison of the earth. Take two or three Corolaries or Deductions from hence;

As first, It is the property of God to do great things: And because it is his property, he can as easily do great things as small things.

Among men, Great spirits count nothing great: A great spirit swallows and overcomes all difficulties: Much more is it so with the great God, who is a Spirit, all Spirit, and the Father of spirits; To the great God there is nothing great: He can as easily do the greatest as the least: 1 Sam. 14. 6. 2 Chron. 14. There is no restraint to the Lord, to save with few or by many; or, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power: It is not ſo much, as the duſt of the ballance with God, to turn the ſcale of victory in battel, whether there be more or leſs: Seeing all Nations before him, are but as the duſt of the ballance, as nothing, yea leſs then nothing. So that whether you put him upon any great work or ſmall work, you put the Lord to no more ſtreſs, to no more pains in the one, then in the other, for he doth great things; and to do them, is his property, not his ſtudy; his nature, not his labour. He needs not make proviſions or preparations, for what he would have done; the ſame act by which he wills the doing of a thing, doth it, if he wills. What great things hath the Lord done in our dayes? We may ſay as the Virgin (Luke 1.49.) He that is Mighty, hath done to us great things, and Holy is his Name; and as they, Act. 2. 11. We have both heard and ſeen the great things of God done amongſt us; and I believe greater things are yet to be done. It was a great work at the beginning of time, to make Heaven and Earth: and will it not be a great work, to ſhake Heaven and Earth? That God hath ſaid, he will do, before the end of time. Yet once it is a little while, and I will ſhake the Heavens and the Earth, and the Sea, and the dry Land, Hag. 2.6. The words following, ſeem to interpret this Earth-quake, and Heaven-quake; I will ſhake all Nations. Again, It was a great work to make the old Heaven and Earth: and will it not be a great work to make a new Heaven and a new Earth? That is the buſineſs which God is about in theſe latter dayes, as he promiſed, Iſa. 65.17. Behold I create a new Heaven and a new Earth; what is that? Jeruſalem a praiſe, and her people a joy. When God reformeth the face of his Church, and ſettles the affairs of Kingdoms and Common-wealths, he makes new Heavens and a new Earth.

Τὰ μεγαλεῖα τοῦ Θεοῦ. Magnalia Dei.

And if it be the property of God to do great things, then it is a duty in us, to expect great things. We ought to look for ſuch things, as come up to, and anſwer the power and greatneſs of God; we diſhonour, and as it were, humble God, when we look only for low and mean things; Great expectations from God, honour the greatneſs of God. As the Lord expects to receive the greateſt ſervices from us, becauſe he is a great King, Mal. 1.14. So we ought to expect, that we ſhall receive the greateſt mercies from the Lord, becauſe he is a great King; It diſhonours God as much and more, when we believe little, as when we do little. A great King thinks himſelf diſhonoured, if you ask him a petty ſuit; he looks more what becomes him to give, or do in bounty, then the petitioner to ask in neceſſity. The Great Alexander could tell his ſuiter (whom he had more aſtoniſh'd then reliev'd with his favour) that though the thing might be too great for him to receive, yet it was not too great for Alexander to give. If duſt and aſhes can ſpeak and think at this rate; O how large is the heart of God! Then, it is not only our priviledge, but our duty to ask and believe great things; we ought to have a great faith, becauſe God doth great things; Is it not unbecoming to have a great God, and a little Faith? to have a God that doth great things, and we to be a people (his people) that cannot believe great things? nay, to have a God who can eaſily do great things, and we a people, that can hardly believe ſmall things? How unbecoming! If ſome ſmall thing be to be done, then uſually faith is upon the wing; but if it be a great thing, then faith is clogg'd, her wings are clipt, and we at a ſtand; why ſhould it be ſaid unto us, as, Chriſt ſaid unto his Diſciples. O ye of little faith? It may be as dangerous to us, if not as ſinful, not to believe the day of great things, as to deſpiſe the day of ſmall things. Why ſhould not our faith in a holy ſcorn, baffle the greateſt difficulties, in that language of the Prophet (Zech. 4.7.) Who art thou O great Mountain? before Zerubbabel thou ſhalt become a plain.

There is another uſeful conſequence from this truth.

He that doth great works, ought to have great praiſes.

As we ought to have great faith, that he will do great things; ſo he ought to have great acknowledgments, when he hath done great things. Shall God do great things for us, and ſhall we give him ſome poor, lean, ſtarven ſacrifices of praiſe? It is very obſervable, that, as ſoon as the Prophet had deſcribed the Lord in his greatneſs (Iſa. 40. 15.) he adds in the very next verſe, And Lebanon is not ſufficient to burn, nor the beaſts thereof ſufficient for a burnt Offering. That is, no ſervices are great enough, for this great God. Lebanon abounded in ſpices for Incenſe and perfume; it abounded with cattel for Sacrifice and Burnt-offerings; to ſay that Lebanon had not ſpice enough to burn for Incenſe, nor beaſts enough to burn for Sacrifice, ſhews the Lord far exalted in greatneſs, above all the praiſes and holy ſervices of his people.

Laſtly, Seeing God doth great works for us, let us ſhew great zeal for, great love unto the Lord.

We ſhould aim at the doing of great things for God, ſeeing God indeed doth great things for us. So much of the firſt Attribute of the works of God. Who doth great things,

And unſearchable.] The Hebrew is, and no ſearch. The word imports the ſearch of thoſe things which are moſt abſtruſe and ſecret. As the heart, which the Lord only can ſearch, Jer. 17.15. The heart lies too low, not only for the eye, but for the underſtanding of man. Hence it is uſed, Pſal. 95.4. to note the Foundations, or deep places of the earth, becauſe they cannot be known, but by deep ſearchings, or rather, becauſe they are beyond the deepeſt ſearch of man. And the ſame phraſe we find, Pſal. 145.3. Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praiſed, and his greatneſs is unſearchable; or according to the letter, of his greatneſs no ſearch. As when the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks of the greatneſs of God, in his nature and eſſence, preſently he adds, and of his greatneſs there is no ſearch; ſo here, when Eliphaz ſpeaks of the greatneſs of God, in his works, the next word is, they are unſearchable. As God in himſelf is great, and of his greatneſs there is no ſearch; ſo many of the works of God are ſo great, that of their greatneſs there is no ſearch; that is, you cannot find out their greatneſs by any ſearch. God is in working (and ſo are men, the hand cannot act beyond the head) as he is in underſtanding. There is no ſearching of his underſtanding. (Iſa. 40. 28.) Therefore there is none of his working.

ואינרקר

Penetralia terræ, ut Aben Ezra explicat, quæ ſcire nequeunt, niſi exquiſita perſcrutatione, vel potius quòd homini minimè ſunt perſcrutabilia, Deo antè in propatulo. Buxtorf.

This unſearchableneſs of the works of God, may be conſidered two wayes.

Firſt, As that, which cannot be found by enquiry.

Secondly, As that, which ought not to be found or enquired.

There are ſome works of God, which are not to be ſearched into; they are to be adored by believing, not to be pryed into by ſearching; and in that ſence they are called unſearchable (Rom. 11.33.) O the depth of the riches, both of the wiſdom and knowledge of God! How unſearchable are his judgments! Many of his judgments, that is, his works of judgment, are ſo unſearchable, that it is not induſtry or duty, but preſumption, to ſearch into them. As thoſe unſpeakable words, which Paul heard in the third heavens, were ſuch as (2 Cor. 12.4.) it is not lawful for man to utter; ſo unſearchable judgements may be interpreted ſuch, as it is not lawful for a man to ſearch. Great Princes will not have all their actions ſcann'd, at leaſt, not by all, They keep ſtate in their works. If all a mans actions be level to the loweſt, his perſon will be ſo too. The reaſon why the works of Antichriſt were to be ſo myſterious and miraculous, is, becauſe he was to be adored and Godded, to be exalted above all (in man) that is called God, or that is worſhipped, 2 Theſ. 2.4. They who aſpire to divine honour, have, or at leaſt pretend to have many ſecrets. Becauſe ſecret things belong unto God, things revealed unto man, (Deut. 29. 29.) And as the Angel at once anſwers and reproves Manoah (Judges 13. 18.) Why askeſt thou after my name, ſeeing it is ſecret, or, wonderful? As if he had ſaid, thou muſt not enquire after my name, for it is a ſecret. Such prying into the works of God, is as dangerous, as prying into the Ark of God (1 Sam. 6. 19.) It were more profitable for us, and more honourable to God, if we did ſearch our own ſecret wayes more, and Gods leſs.

Arcana imperii.

There are other works of God, which cannot be ſearched, yet we may and ought to ſearch them; it is our duty to ſtudy them, though we cannot find them. We may ſearch and find many of the works of God, with our ſenſes; there are others which we cannot find, though we ſearch for them, with our reaſon and underſtanding. As ſome parts of the word of God (2 Pet. 3. 16.) So ſome parts of his works are ſo hard to be underſtood, that unſtable men wreſt them to their own deſtruction. The mind of God is very very legible in many of his works, and we may read them without a Comment or Interpreter. Other of his works are mysterious and enigmatical, very riddles, in so much, that if an ordinary man looking on them, should be questioned, Understandest thou what thou seest? he must answer, as the Eunuch did Philip, How can I, except some man teach me? And these works are unsearchable, two wayes.

First, In regard of the manner of doing: we cannot find out the wayes and contrivances of Gods work. His wayes are in the deep, and his footsteps are not known, saith the Psalmist; that is, the wayes which God goes to the accomplishing of his ends, are oftentimes like steps upon the water, which leave no impression or track behind him.

Secondly, His works are unsearchable in their causes or ends; what it is which God aims at or intends, what moves or provokes him to such a course, is usually a secret. He doth such things as no man can give an account of, or render a reason why. Peter knew not how to construe or expound that work of Christ, John 13. when he took a towel with a bason of water, to wash his feet: therefore Christ tells him, What I do thou knowest not (that is, thou knowest not what moves me to do this; for his eye taught him what Christ did) but thou shalt know hereafter. In due time this shall be interpreted to thee, and thou shalt know the reason why I did this.

But it is said (and that may be an objection against both Text and Exposition) Psal. 111. 2. The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all those that have pleasure therein. To seek out, notes a full discovery. And in Psal. 106. 7. Failing in this, is charged upon the Fathers, and confessed by the Children, as a fault; Our Fathers understood not thy wonders, that is, the great things which God did for them in Egypt. How then is it said here, The works of the Lord are great and unsearchable?

To clear this, First, I say there are some great works of God, which are easie and plain; and it is our duty to be acquainted with, and learned in these works of God, as well as in the word of God.

Secondly, Those works whose Text is hard, we must search and labour to expound them, so, as to further duty, but not to feed our curiosity; we may search them with submission to the mind of God, not for satisfaction only to our own minds. We may search with desire to honour God, but not to humour our selves. We may search them to make us more holy, though not barely to make us more knowing. Take two Corollaries from this.

First, If the works of God are unsearchable, then how unsearchable are the counsels of God, the deep and secret counsels of God? The works of God are the counsels of God made visible. Every work of God is the bringing of some counsel of God to light. Now if we are not able to find out his counsels, when they are made visible in his works; how shall we find out his counsels, when they lie hidden in his breast?

Secondly, If the works of God are unsearchable, then, we are to submit unto the dispensations of God, whatsoever they are; though we are not able, according to reason, to give an account of them; though we cannot search out either the manner how, or the cause for which they were done, yet we must reverence them: and what we cannot believe by knowing, we must know by believing. It is our duty, not only to wink and believe, shut our eyes and believe, or believe when we cannot see; but we must often believe where knowledge is shut out, believe when we cannot understand. Abraham by faith followed the call of God, not knowing whither he went, Heb. 11. 8. It is dangerous to follow men blindfold (how seeing soever those men are) but it is safe, and our duty to follow God blindfold, how seeing soever we think our selves to be. We must not be displeased (as Joseph was at Jacob his father, Gen. 48. 17.) when we see God laying his right hand upon Ephraim, and his left upon Manasses, doing things cross to our thoughts; much less may we take upon us to direct the hand of God, as Joseph would Jacob's, where we please. The Lord knows (as Jacob answered Joseph) what he doth, and it becomes us to acquiesce in what he doth, though we know it not. Some Romish Parasites have said of the Pope, That if he should carry thousands to hell along with him, there is no man must say to him, Sir, why do you so? They adore him so in the unsearchableness of his wayes and doings, that it is enough for them, if he doth them.

This abominable flattery of that Man of sin, is a sober truth concerning the holy God; Though God cast thousands of souls into hell, no man may say to him, what dost thou? And though God turn Kingdoms upside down, though he send great afflictions upon his own people, and make them a reproach unto the heathen, though he give them up unto the power of the adversary, and make all their enemies to rejoyce, yet no man may say unto God, why do you thus? His works are unsearchable. It is beyond the line of a creature, to put any question, a why, or a wherefore, about the work of the Creator. Shall the thing formed say to him that forms it, why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the Potter power over his clay?

Some think they could do things better then God hath done, or at least, that God might have done better; if they had the power in their hands, things should not go thus and thus: What an insufferable indignity is this to the wisdom and power of God, that He, whose works are unsearchable, should be made accountable for his works? That of Augustine, when he was in a deep meditation about the Nature of God, may well be applied to the works of God, who walking by the sea-side in deep thoughts of God, either heard this voyce, or was filled with this thought, That he might as soon empty the Sea with, or comprehend the Ocean in one of those little Cockle-shells which lay on the shore, as with the narrow vessel of his Spirit, comprehend the infinite greatness of the God of Spirits.

Marvellous things. Unsearchable things and marvellous, differ thus: Those things are unsearchable, which lie hid, and cannot be found: that is a marvel, whose cause cannot be found, though it self be not hid. This is the third adjunct or attribute of the works of God. The word is derived from a root, which signifies, separated, disjoyned or divided. And marvellous things are expresst by that word, because marvels or wonders are separated or removed from us three degrees at least.

Inscrutabil & mirabil differunt; Inscrutabil est quod la tet & perquiri non potest: Mirabile est, quod ipsum quidem ap-paret, sed causa ejus perquiri non potest. Aquin. in loc. נִפְלָאוֹת from פָּלָא Separatus, disjunctus. Hinc significat mirabilia, quia talia sunt à nobis separata, & captum superant, ita ut ratione quis assequi, aut re præstare nequeat.

They are separated,

First, From our knowledge or reason.

Secondly, From our sense; not that marvels are invisible, marvels and miracles are wrought to be seen, and the use of them lies in this, from the sense to confirm faith, or to convince of unbelief. Which (by the way) quite overthrows the Popish refuge of a miracle, in their supposed transubstantiation of Bread at the Eucharist, who tell us of a miracle, but can shew us none. But though in all miracles and marvels the thing wrought is plain to the senses, yet both the power and manner of doing it, are removed from the senses: The marvel wrought is seen, but the working of the marvel is not seen.

Thirdly, Marvels are separated or removed from our imitation; we cannot do such things. The Lord stands alone working wonders. They are a separated part and portion for God himself. The Egyptian Sorcerers seemed to do by their deviliish enchantments, what Moses did by the command and power of God; but at the best, they did but seem to do like Moses, and presently they could not so much as seem, Exod. 8. 18. And the Magicians did so: (that is, they attempted to do so) but they could not. They that work by the Devils art or power, cannot work long, they will quickly be at A could not. Both their Religions and their miraculous works are at best but in appearance; at last they will not so much as appear. In these three respects Marvels are rightly called, separate.

Further, The word also signifies sometimes, a hard or a difficult thing; because those things that are very difficult, have somewhat of wonder in them, and cause us to wonder at them, Deut. 17. 8. If a matter come which is too hard, the word is, which is too marvellous and wonderful for thee, &c. And, Gen. 18. 14. Is any thing too hard for me? (saith God) the word is, Is any thing wonderful to me? Nothing is wonderful to us, but that which is too hard for us. There is nothing wonderful to God, who doth all wonders, and is himself all Wonder. It hath been said concerning those lovers of, and searchers after secret wisdom, called Philosophers, that it doth not become a Philosopher to wonder; for admiration admiration is uſually the Daughter of Ignorance: We marvel at moſt things, becauſe we know the cauſes of few things. It was therefore a ſhame for a Philoſopher to wonder, becauſe it betrayed his ignorance, who would be thought ſtudied in, yea, a maſter of all cauſes; and able to give a reaſon of all things in Nature. But it is moſt certain, the great God never marvelleth at any thing; For, is any thing too hard for me? ſaith the Lord. Wonders are things too hard for us, and the ſame word ſignifies a Wonder, and a thing too hard.

אות מופת נפלא

There are three words of near alliance in the Hebrew, Signs, Miracles, and Marvels: And they may be diſtinguiſh'd thus; a Sign is the repreſentation of a thing preſent, or before us: A Miracle or Portentum (as contra-diſtinct from the former) ſhews forth ſomewhat future, or, that is to come. A Marvel, as differing from both, is any act of providence, ſecret or ſeparate from us, in the manner of doing or producing it; a thing to us unſearchable: ſo (Exod. 33. 16.) Wherein ſhall it be known, that I and thy people have found grace in thy ſight (ſaith Moſes) Is it not in that thou goeſt with us? So ſhall we be ſeparated, I and thy people; ſo we tranſlate it, or made wonderful; that is, if thou goeſt along with us, thou wilt do ſuch marvels for us, a will make a difference between us and all the people in the world; we ſhall be a people marvell'd at all the world over, or, a ſpectacle to the world, Angels and Men. The preſence of God with a people, is their difference, or will make them differ from all people with whom God is not (under the Notion of Favour and Protection) preſent.

Again, Marvels are taken ſometimes for Miracles, which are meerly and purely ſupernatural. For in ordinary acceptation of the word, a Marvel is only the heightning and ſublimating of Nature, or acting in the higheſt ſphear of Nature; but a Miracle is a croſſing or a contradicting of Nature; a work altogether above, yea, againſt Nature. Now we are not to take marvels here in that ſtrict ſence for miracles; for the great works of God are called marvels or wonders, which yet are but either the ordinary conſtitutions of Nature, or the extraordinary motions of Nature; as, Pſal. 136. 4. O give thanks to the Lord, to him, who alone doth great wonders: What are theſe? In verſ. 5, 6, 7. inſtances are given in natural things, as making the heavens, and ſtretching out the earth above the waters; the making of thoſe great Lights, the Sun and Moon (a). One of the Ancients diſcourſing upon that Miracle in the Goſpel, The multiplying the Loaves, obſerveth, that in natural things, there are very great wonders, though we lightly paſs them by; they were aſtoniſhed to ſee the loaves multiplied while they were eating: To ſee bread grow upon the Table, or between their teeth, made all wonder: but there is as great a miracle wrought every year, and no man takes notice of it; that is, when Corn caſt into the ground, multiplies thirty, ſixty, a hundred fold; It is (ſaith he) a greater miracle for corn to multiply in the earth, then for loaves to multiply on the table. And he makes a like concluſion in his Book of the City of God, Whatſoever is wonderful in the world, is not ſo great a wonder as the world; yet men rarely wonder at the making of the world, the Earth, the Heavens, the Sea, the Air, every creature in them, exceed in wonders, the things we wonder at. Ordinary works of Nature are marvellous; Firſt, Becauſe they proceed from a divine power. Secondly, Becauſe man is poſed to give a reaſon of moſt of them; Canſt thou tell how the bones grow in her that is with child? ſaith the Preacher. The bringing of an Infant alive from the womb, is a wonder, as well as the raiſing of a man from the dead: and the budding of a Tree, as well as the budding of Aaron's Rod (b). The uſualneſs of the one, and the rareneſs of the other, is, though not the only, yet the greateſt difference. And as the ordinary works of Creation, in making, ſo of Providence, in governing the world, are full of wonders, though they paſs unobſerved. Such Eliphaz takes notice of in the words following; The diſappointing of crafty oppreſſors, and the deliverance of the poor. When God ſhall deſtroy Babylon, the Song prepared is, Great and wonderful are thy works: And (Exod. 15. 11.) from whence that is taken, Who is like unto thee, O God! who is like unto thee, glorious in holineſs, fearful in praiſes, doing wonders! The wonder was, a deliverance, the wonderful deliverance of his people from Egypt, and through the Red Sea. Works of judgment are often called works of wonder (Deut. 28. 59.) I will make thy plagues wonderful; and, Iſa. 28. 21. The Lord ſhall riſe up as in Mount Perazim, he ſhall be wroth as in the valley of Gibeon; that he may do his work, his ſtrange work, and bring to paſs his act, his ſtrange act: What act was this? an act of judgment upon his, and his peoples enemies; as is clear, 2 Sam. 5. 20. & Joſh. 10. 12. Where we may read, what God did in Mount Perazim, and in the Valley of Gibeon; ſtrange works indeed! And theſe works of God are called marvellous, not only, when God is in them alone, and acts without the intervention of the creature, but when he acts with the creature, above the ſtrength of a creature, ſo that little of the creature appears in the act, this alſo is a marvel. What God doth more by a man, then man can do, whether in ſtrength or wiſdom, ordinarily aſſiſted, ſo much of a wonder ſhews it ſelf, in what man doth. And therefore no man is ordinarily to attempt any thing beyond his ſtrength, for that is to tempt God, and to call him to work a miracle, at leaſt a wonder for us. Lord (ſaith David, Pſal. 131. 1.) mine heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; neither do I exerciſe my ſelf in great matters, or in things too high for me: The word is, in things too wonderful for me, that is, I do not ordinarily put my ſelf upon things which are extraordinary, or beyond my ſtrength and parts. I meaſure my undertakings, and my abilities together, and would keep them even. I do not put God upon doing wonders every day; therefore I ſet my ſelf to thoſe things which are according to the line of man. If God call us to it, we may expect a miracle, but we muſt not call God to work miracles for us, or with us. I do not exerciſe my ſelf in matters too high for me. Miracles or marvels are not every dayes exerciſe. We ought rather to be above our work, or any of our deſignes, then below them; but we muſt be ſure they are not above us. It is the ſafeſt and the holieſt way for man, in all his actions, to be upon a level. We cannot but diſpleaſe God, and hurt our ſelves, by clambering. It is but ſometimes, that the Lord will work wonders to relieve our neceſſities, and help our faith; but he will never (unleſs in wrath) work wonders, to pleaſe our humors, or comply with our ambition. Hence obſerve, Non me extuli ad ea quæ meas vires aut ingenium ſuperarent. Eliganter Theodoretus, Meipſum metiabar, & quæ me excedũt, non aggreſſus ſum.

First, When we ſee marvels done, we muſt acknowledge the hand of God.

Marvels are proper unto God, Pſal. 75. 1. In that thy Name is near, thy wondrous works declare. Wondrous works are an Argument that God is near. When wonders are among us, we may know God is among us. We may well apply that of the Pſalmiſt, to our ſelves, Marvellous things hath the Lord done in our ſight, Pſal. 78. 12.

Secondly, If God work marvels, and we believe him not, hath he not reaſon to marvel at our unbelief? Chriſt having wrought miracles to gain the belief of his Countrey-men, marvelled at their unbelief, Mark 6. 2, 6.

Unbelief is a great ſin at all times, but in a time when marvels are wrought for the cure and healing of it, unbelief is a marvellous ſin.

Will not Chriſt, think you, marvel at our unbelief, if we believe not after all theſe marvels? Ye will not believe, (ſaith Chriſt, and he rebukes the Jews for it, John 4.) except you ſee ſigns and wonders: Surely, if they were ſo charged, becauſe they would not believe, except they ſaw ſignes and wonders, how ſhall they be charged, who will not believe, when they ſee ſignes and wonders? eſpecially when God ſeems to work a wonder on purpoſe, that they might believe? God loves and prizes the faith of man ſo highly, that ſometimes he bids a miracle for it, rather then go without it. And ſurely now, as God hath done marvels, to abate the marvellous pride of the Adverſary, ſo, to overcome the marvellous unbelief of his own people: As hath been obſerved concerning the Lords ſwearing, As I live, I deſire not the death of a ſinner, &c: O happy man, for whoſe ſake the Lord ſwears! but O moſt unhappy, who doth not believe the Lord, when he ſwears! So we may ſay of the Lords wonder-workings; O happy people, for whom the Lord works wonders! but O moſt unhappy people, who believe not the Lord, when he works wonders!

(a) Mirabilior eſt grani in terra multiplicatio, quã illa quinque panum. Aug. tract. 24. in Johan. *Quicquid mirabile fit in mundo, profectò minus eſt quam totus hic mundus. (b) Permulta ſunt quæ admirari non ſolemus, propterea quod vulgò quotidièque fiunt. Re nova & inſolita commovetur animus.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, When God works extraordinary things for us, let not us stay in ordinary duties.

Let our works have somewhat of a marvel in them too; let our repentance, and the change of our lives be marvellous; let our zeal and courage for Christ be marvellous; like that of the Apostles, who carried themselves with such heroical magnanimity, in the work of the Gospel, that when the High-Priest and Council (who had convented and threatned them) saw their boldness, they marvelled, saith the Text, Acts 4. 13. Let our love and thankfulness be marvellous, let us pray marvellously, and believe marvellously; Marvels done by God, should ever work faith in man; and faith in man, doth sometime work marvelling in God. Christ speaks with a kind of admiration to the woman of Canaan, O woman, great is thy faith, Mat. 15. 28. O that his people in this Nation, would set Him thus a wondring once more! O England, great is thy faith in me! O England, great is thy love to me! O England, great is thy zeal for me! O England, great is thy repentance, exceeding glorious thy Reformation!

I will close this Point with this one word. God hath begun to do so many marvels amongst us, that I verily believe, the work he is about, will end in a marvel too; and we in the close, shall be made either a wonder of mercy, or a wonder of judgment to all the Nations round about.

The fourth Attribute of the works of God, raises the glory of them all. They are innumerable.

He doth marvellous things without number.] The Hebrew, word for word, is, Until there be no number: Without number, may be taken three wayes.

First, Strictly and absolutely, for that which is without number; and thus there is no number innumerable. Things absolutely without number, would be infinite; but there cannot be two infinites: As God is so one, and without number, that he is infinite; so, whatsoever could be so many, that it were without number, would be infinite too.

Secondly, Without number, is that which man cannot reckon or cast up the sum of it (Rev. 7. 9.) John speaks of a great multitude which no man could number; as a small number is said to be such as a Child may write, Isa. 10. 19. So such a multitude as a man cannot write, notes the greatest number. And, Heb. 12. 22. There is mention made of an innumerable company of Angels. So God calleth Abraham out, and saith, Look now towards heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them, Gen. 12. The Stars are innumerable, that is, beyond mans Arithmetick.

Thirdly, Things are said to be without number, or innumerable (in a more common sence) when they are a very great number; and so we find it frequent in Scripture; as that which is very high, is said to be as high as heaven: Thus the discouraging Spies describe the Cities of the Canaanites, to be Cities walled up to heaven, Deut. 1. 28. And when Seamen or Mariners are tossed upon the waves and billows of the Sea, they are said, to mount up to the heaven, and go down again to the depths, Psal. 107. 26. So here, a very great number is said to be innumerable or without number: In this third, and in that second sence, the great works of God are innumerable: God hath done so many marvellous things, as are impossible for man to reckon. His mighty works are not only beyond the writing of a child, but of the wisest men: The man who numbers most dayes, cannot number the wonders of God.

I shall note but one or two Instructions from this, That the works of God are innumerable.

First then, What God hath done, he can do it again a second time, yea, a third, a fourth time, ten times, yea, ten thousand times over, if our necessity and his good pleasure meet together; for his works are innumerable.

Eliphaz speaks not only of what God had done, but of what he can do; yea of what he is doing; he doth innumerable marvels. Some men can do great things, many have done great things, but they cannot do them without number; even a child may write all that any man can do, and at most, it needs but a man to reckon all the great things which all men have done. The hand of God shortens not in an eternity; but the hand of man shortens every day, sometimes in a day; and therefore he cannot do things innumerable: Man cannot do that to day which he could yesterday, whether we respect his civil abilities, or his natural. As old Barzillai said unto David, 2 Sam. 19. When the King invited him home with him, and offered him all the pleasures of the Court, Can I any more hear the voyce of singing-men and singing-women? or can I any more taste what I eat and what I drink? As if he should say, It is true, Sir, I have known the time when I could have made use of this Royal Favour, and have taken in the pleasures of your Court; I once delighted in Musick, and my ear could taste a sweet voice; I once delighted in rich fare, and my palat could taste meat and drink; but can I any more do thus? My natural strength is gone, my senses cannot renew innumerable acts of pleasure: If Grace doth not wean us from the abuse, yet Nature will tire in the use of worldly comforts. But the civil abilities of man wither sooner then his natural; you may see a man that hath done great things in a State or Commonwealth, come to him a while after, and he may say, Can I any more do those things? I am not what I was, my power is gone: But come to God, after he hath done this or that, and a thousand great things, he will not say, Can I help you any more? can I deliver you any more? can I destroy your enemies, can I discover their plots and counsels any more? Yes Lord, as thy works are unsearchable, so they are innumerable, and thou canst do them for evermore. The Lord saith sometime to a people, as he did to Israel (Judg. 10. 13.) in anger, I will deliver you no more; but he never saith to any of people out of weakness, I can deliver you no more, Psal. 78. The people provoked God, by making a question of this (ver. 20.) Behold (say they) he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed (we acknowledge that God hath done a marvel) but can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people? surely, he cannot do this marvel also: what saith the Text? The Lord heard this, and was wroth, so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel: What do you think, that I can do but one great thing? that I have but one blessing, but one deliverance, but one wonder? Know, that I who smote the rock, can provide you flesh; I, who gave you water, can give you bread; I, who have discovered one wicked plot of the enemy, can discover all; I, who have given you one victory, can give you a thousand; I, who have given you one deliverance, can give you innumerable deliverances; therefore take heed of setting bounds to God, of limiting the Holy one of Israel: Men love not to be limited, but God ought not. We at once provoke and dishonour the Lord, by thinking, that our wants can renew faster then his supplies; or that our innumerable evils shall not find innumerable good things to balance, or remove them, from the hand of God. We weary men, when we come often to them, to do great things for us; yea, to come often for small matters, will weary men: But we never weary the Lord by coming often; we weary God only, when we will not come often. How doth the Prophet, not only complain, but expostulate, because that unbelieving King wearied God (take it with reverence) by not setting him awork, and that about the hardest and most knotty piece of work that can be, the working of a miracle, and that, as hard a one as himself would ask, either in the depth beneath, or in the height above. Is it a small thing with you to weary men, but will you weary my God also? Isa. 7. 13. It is no weariness to God to do innumerable miracles for us; but he is weary when we will not believe he can do them. To be distrusted the doing of one, is more laborious to God, then to do a million of miracles.

To conclude this, take heed above all, that you limit not God in works of spiritual mercy; as, to fear to ask pardon of sin, because ye have asked it often. His great works of forgiveness are as much without number, as any of his works. He multiplies to pardon, saith the Prophet, Isa. 55. 7. And when the people of Israel had committed a new sin, it is admirable to read, by what argument Moses moves the Lord for pardon: It is not this (as usually with men) Lord, this is the first fault, Lord, thou hast not been often troubled to sign their pardon: But, pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people, as thou hast forgiven this people from Egypt until now, Numb. 14. 19. As if he had said, Lord, because thou hast pardoned them so often, therefore I beseech thee pardon them now. It is a most wicked argument to move our hearts to ſin, becauſe God will pardon often; but when we have ſinned, it is a holy argument to move God to pardon again, becauſe he hath pardoned often before; for he pardons without number.

Secondly, Seeing God doth innumerable great things for us, let us not be ſatisfied in doing a few things at the command, and for the glory of God; let us continue in acts of holineſs, charity, humility, zeal and thankfulneſs, without number; let us never ſtand reckoning our duties, when we hear the mercies of God are beyond reckoning. It is a noble rule in our friendſhip with men, That Curteſies muſt not be counted: I am ſure it is a holy rule in our obedience to God, That duties muſt not be counted: God hath no need of any one of our good works; but he will not bear it, if we think we have done enow, or can do too many. Let our hearts be like the heart of God, as he doth great things for us, let us do (in what we are able) great things for God, and good things for one another, without number.

So much in general of the proof of Gods power, by the Greatneſs, &c. of his works.

VERS. 10, 11, 12.

Who giveth rain upon the earth, and ſendeth waters upon the fields.

To ſet up on high thoſe that be low, that thoſe which mourn, may be exalted to ſafety.

He diſappointeth the devices of the crafty, ſo that their hands cannot perform their enterprize.

THis Context, from v. 9. to v. 17. contains the ſecond Argument, by which Eliphaz ſtrengthens his exhortation upon Job to ſeek unto God. The Argument ſpeaks to this effect; He is to be ſought; and unto him our cauſe is to be committed, who is of abſolute power, infinite in wiſdom and goodneſs; But ſuch is God: Therefore ſeek to him, and commit thy cauſe unto him. That God is of infinite power, wiſdom, &c. was proved in general at v. 9. by thoſe four adjuncts of his works, great, unſearchable, marvellous, and without number. And now, at v. 10. he begins his proof, by an enumeration of the particular effects of Gods power, wiſdom and goodneſs. The firſt inſtance is in natural things; God doth great things and unſearchable, marvellous things without number. And would you know what thoſe things are? You need not go far to enquire; there are things very near unto us, and very common among us, which yet, if they be well looked unto, will advance the power, wiſdom and goodneſs of God; every ſhower of rain drops down this truth, that God doth great things; He giveth rain upon the earth, and ſendeth waters upon the fields.

There is not any difficulty about the meaning of theſe words, which calls for ſtay in opening of them. Therefore in brief; The Hebrew word for Rain, in our Letters (Matar) is ſo near in ſound to our Engliſh, Water, that ſome think it a derivative from it.

By the Rain, we are to underſtand, not the ſhowers only which fall from heaven, but all thoſe bleſſings and benefits for the ſupport of our natural life, which are the fruits of rain: He ſendeth rain (as it were) on his errand, to bring or carry the bleſſings of plenty, and to drop fatneſs on the earth. He giveth rain to the earth, and then the earth giveth her encreaſe. The Rabbins have a ſaying, that Rain is the Husband of the Earth, becauſe thoſe ſhowers fœcundate the Earth, and make that great Mother of plenty, fruitful, in bringing forth all things uſeful and comfortable for the life of man.

He giveth Rain upon the face of the Earth (ſo the Letter of the Original) that is, upon the Earth; as the face of Heaven, and the face of the Sea, ſo the face of the Earth, is an Hebraiſm, for the Earth it ſelf.

It is ſaid in the latter clauſe of the verſe, that he ſendeth waters upon the fields: we muſt diſtinguiſh theſe waters from the rain, taking them for rivers and ſtreams of water, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks, He cauſeth the Rivers to run among the hills; and the Prophet Habakkuk, Thou cleaveſt the earth with the Rivers.

The word is of the Dual Number in the Hebrew, and therefore by ſome applied to thoſe two ſorts of waters; or to the waters above, and to the waters that are beneath; ſo the waters are diſtinguiſh, Pſal. 104. 3. We read of the upper waters; Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters, who maketh the clouds his chariot; and of the inferior or lower waters, Gen. 1. 9. The Lord ſaith, let the waters under the earth be gathered into one place: and both are put together, v. 7. God made the firmament, and divided the waters that were under the firmament, from the waters that were above the firmament. So that the waters above, and the waters below, may both be here underſtood.

tur aquæ duplices, ſuperiores in cœlo, ut nubes, & inferiores in terra, ut mare, fontes & flumina.

It is added further, He ſendeth waters upon the fields. The word we tranſlate [fields] ſignifies any place without doors, as ſtreets and high-wayes; and becauſe fields are are without (ſub dio) covered only with the Canopie of the heavens, therefore we tranſlate, He ſendeth waters upon the fields. And it taketh in all ſorts of fields, whether till'd or untill'd; though ſome conceive, that here Eliphaz means, thoſe fields eſpecially which are untill'd, unſown, or unmanur'd; fields where men come not; namely, deſarts and wilderneſſes; as if he ſhould ſay, there is no place but God ſends waters to it: Hence the Vulgar read, in ſtead of fields, all places: He moiſtens all places with waters.

Nomen propriè eſt, ſed ſumitur ſæpe adverbialiter, pro foris & in univerſum pro loco exteriori. Merc. Deſerta, horrida loca & mortalibus inacceſſa. Irrigat aquis univerſa. Vulg.

Here firſt, Foraſmuch as an inſtance of Gods greatneſs, power and unſearchable wiſdom is given in the rain, a natural thing we may note,

That, The common bleſſings of God are not diſpenſed without a ſpecial providence: Nature works not without the God of nature.

He doth great things: And what? He ſendeth rain. The whole courſe of Nature moves, as it is turned by the hand of God, and directed by his counſel. It is not in the frame of Nature, as in many artificial frames, which being once ſet up, will ſtand, or go alone. When the Artificer hath made a Clock, and put it in frame, and hung on the weights, let him go whither he will, the Clock will go, and if there were room for the weights to deſcend, the Clock (continuing in frame) would go perpetually, though no hand helped or toucht it: But it is not ſo, in the frame and workings of natural things; God hath ſet all creatures in a frame, and curiouſly ordered them one within another, but there is no motion of the leaſt wheel, much leſs of the whole fabrick, without the ſpecial hand of God: When Rain comes, God ſaith, go; Rain is his gift, not the Clouds; the Cloud receives a Commiſſion from God to diſtill and diſſolve upon man: The moſt full, ſpongie Clouds diſtill no more then the Rock did in the wilderneſs, till the Lord ſpeaks to them. As, When he uttereth his voyce, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens, and he cauſeth the vapors to aſcend from the ends of the earth, Jer. 10. 13. So, till he uttereth his voyce, not one ſingle drop of all that multitude of waters, falls from heaven, nor will thoſe vapours deſcend and return again to the earth, except he bid them.

Cum plenæ ſunt nubes, effundunt pluviam, non tamen abſque Dei juſſu. Druſ.

He giveth rain upon the earth.

Rain is the ſpecial gift of God. Special, not in that ſence as Grace is a ſpecial gift; for rain is a common gift; but ſpecial, becauſe it is that, of which, and about which, God takes ſpecial notice; as we read, Amos 4. 8. I cauſed it to rain (ſaith God) upon one place, or upon one City, and not upon another. There is a ſpecial diſcriminating work about the rain; it rains by appointment, not accident, upon one place, rather then another. And, Iſa. 5. 6. When God expreſſes diſpleaſure againſt his Vineyard (he ſaith) I will command the Clouds, that they ſhall not rain upon it: The Clouds are as vaſt Bottles full of rain, but they cannot unſtop themſelves, or let out one drop, until God himſelf commands them: He melteth the clouds (as it is ſaid in Job) and then the rain falleth down. Thou, O God, didſt ſend a plentiful rain, whereby thou didſt confirm thine inheritance when it was weary, Pſal. 68. 9. How weary or dry ſoever the Earth is, unleſs God by a word broach thoſe veſſels of rain, the very inheritance of God cannot have a draught, no, nor a drop, to quench its thirſt.

Therefore though rain be a common bleſſing in reſpect of all places and perſons; yet we ought to acknowledge a ſpecial hand in giving it. And this checks that natural Atheiſm, which reigns in their hearts, who think that they are beholding only to the motions of the winds, or change of the Moon for rain: And hence in times of drought, they look most when the wind will turn, or when the Moon will change. To confute this, the Prophet tells us by way of question, That as Idols cannot, so neither can the Heavens give rain, Jer. 14.22. Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain? Or can the Heathens give showers? They cannot. Indeed the holy Prophet Elias speaks such language, as if he had carried the keyes of the Clouds at his girdle, or had been master of the rain, 1 *King.*17. 1. As the Lord liveth, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word. But the Apostle James shews us what word this was, namely a word of prayer, not of command, Chap. 5. 17. Elias prayed, and it rained not; again he prayed, and it rained. All the power of man cannot prevail with the Heavens to rain, but the prayer of faith can prevail with the God of Heaven. To send rain was the work of God, though it were at the word of a man. They, who deny God in one work, will quickly deny him in another. And if we deny him in lesser, yea, the least of his works, in a drop of rain, we are in danger to deny him in the greater. And they who deny God in his working, have but an easie step to the denyal of his being.

This should teach us to walk in dependance upon God for all natural comforts, He giveth rain. All creatures drink from Heaven, that they may have their eyes and their hearts in Heaven. And if we must walk in dependance upon God for natural comforts, how much more for spiritual; if for the rain of the Clouds, how much more for the dews of his Spirit, and the rain of grace upon our hearts?

Further Observe, It is a great, wonderful, and unsearchable work of God to send rain.

For we must put the stamp of those four characters upon all these works; and so the rain is a great, a wonderful, and an unsearchable work of God: so great and wonderful, that (as hath been proved) no creature can communicate with God, or share in the honour of this work. The Rabbins have a saying, that upon every (apex or) Tittle of the Law there hangs a mountain of sence and holy Doctrine. We may say, that in in every drop of rain there is an ocean of wisdom, of power, of goodness, and of bonnty. If we study the ordinary works of God, we shall learn somewhat extraordinary in them; common things are full of wonder: And among all common things, none fuller of wonders than the rain: To illustrate this a little, in some particular considerations.

In ea mira Dei in suas creaturas spectatur benignitas, clementia simul & potentia, undè passim Prophetæ, et præsertim in hoc libro, quàdo focii Job, aut Job ipse, admiranda Dei opera proponunt, pluviam inter ea primo loco ponunt. Merc.

First, There is marvellous power seen, in causing and giving rain. Is it not marvellous power, which raises the vapours and holds (as we may so speak) a Sea of water above the earth? That such mighty Seas and floods of water hang in the Air, and thence are distill'd and sprinkled down (as Job speaks) in small drops, are acts and arguments of the wonderful power of God.

Secondly, Behold in the rain the wonderful goodness of God: who by this means cools and refreshes, nourishes, and suckles all earthly living creatures. When the ground is chapt and gapes, as it were with open mouth, the Lord opens these bottels, and gives it drink. And a miracle of goodness is seen in this, forasmuch as when his very enemies hunger, he thus feeds them; when they are naked he thus cloaths them; when they thirst, he thus gives them drink: *Matth.*5.45. He sendeth rain upon the just, and upon the unjust: They are maintained in life by the goodness of God, whose lives maintain a continual war against his Justice.

And as there is a wonder of goodness in giving rain for the use of evil men: So there is a wonder of bounty in sending rain upon those places, which are not of use to any man; He sendeth waters upon the fields, that is, all over the world. Hence when Elihu would set forth he marvellous power and bounty of God, he exemplifies it in this (Job 38.25.) Who hath divided a water-course for the overflowing of waters, to cause it to rain on the earth where no man is, and on the wilderness, where there is no man? Such an open and bountiful house doth the Lord of Heaven and Earth keep, that rather then any shall want, he will (in a sence) let the water run waste. God will not have so much as an herb or a plant to want: though there be no man to come there, yet the grass and shrubs shall have drink, and taste of his bounty.

And so legible is that goodness of God, which is written with drops of rain, so wonderful his power and bounty in giving rain, that the Prophet wonders at the stupidity of those men, who are not convinced of, and taught obedience by it. They have not said, let us fear the Lord that giveth the first and the latter rain in his season (Jer. 5.24.) As if he should say, what a strange thing is it that sweet showers of rain have not softened the hearts of men, into the fear of God, and made them blossom with, and bring forth abundantly the fruits of holiness? Hereupon it is very remarkable, how Moses makes this a motive to perswade the children of Israel to obedience in Canaan; because that Country stood in much need of rain, which Egypt, from whence they came, did not, Deut. 11. Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments, which I command you this day, vers. 8. For the land whither thou goest in to possess it, is not like the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, like a garden of herbs. That is, Egypt being a flat plain Country all upon a level, when the land wanted moisture, thou didst not stay for, or depend upon the rain, to moisten it; but with thy foot, thou diggedst drains and madest sluces or water-courses, from the River side (meaning Nilus that famous River, which ran quite through Egypt) and that refreshed thy lands, and made them fruitful. But (Canaan is another kind of Country, vers. 11. 12.) the Land whither thou goest in to possess it, is a Land of hills and valleyes, and drinketh water of the rain of Heaven. A Land which the Lord thy God careth for, his eyes are upon it, &c. As if he had said, Canaan is not a Country capable of being watered by the foot, it is so mountainous and uneven. All the labour of hand or foot, cannot bring the streams upwards, to give thy thirsty land drink; it must drink from Heaven, or be burnt up and parcht with thirst: and if so, then, that must be the Lords care, his eye must observe, when thou wantest rain, his hand must make water-courses in the Heavens, and open the sluces and cataracts of the clouds for thee. And wilt thou not serve this God in duty, who in bounty thus serveth thee, and gives thee such a sensible evidence of his care over thee? The Apostle Paul preaches thus to the Gentiles, as Natural Theology, to leave them inexcusable, Though he suffered all Nations to walk in their own wayes (in that he gave them not either the light or restraint of grace, yet he did give them light and restraint too in nature) nevertheless he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from Heaven. As if he had said, though ye have not had the rain of the word, yet the rain of the cloud, is such a Preacher of Gods power and goodness, as will leave you for ever without excuse. The Lord himself seems to glory in this, as one of the chiefest of his works: (Job 38.37.) Who can number the clouds in wisdom? Or who can stay the bottles of Heaven? I challenge all creatures to a competition with me in this. And again in his book (Chap. 36. 26.) Elihu lifts up the greatness of God in this act of his providence, Behold God is great, and we know him not; (wherein doth he instance his greatness?) it follows, vers. 27. For he maketh small the drops of water, they pour down rain according to the vapour thereof. Read parallel Texts, Jer. 10. 13. Psal. 65. 10, 11. Psal. 147. 8. So much of this first work of God, the rain; and of his power, wisdom, goodness, bounty, visible and apparent in it. Act. 14.

The second instance of Gods power and wisdom, &c. is in civil things, both in setting up and pulling down: First, in raising and setting up.

Vers. 11. To set up on high those that be low, that those which mourn, may be exalted to safety.

As if he should say, will you see another way, wherein God shews himself in his power, wisdom and goodness? It is in looking thorough the world, for such as are low, that he may lift them up: in espying out mourners and weeping eyes, that he may wipe them; and more, exalt them to safety.

Some of the Jewish Writers connect this verse with the former; making this as an effect of Gods bounty and wonderful work in sending rain. He sendeth rain and showers upon the earth with such plenty of blessings; that by this means, many who were poor, low, mean and sad-hearted, may be set in high estate, and exalted unto safety. And there is a truth in it, Gods blessing upon the earth hath exalted many, that were low, to an high estate, to riches and prosperity.

But rather, we shall take it in a more general sence: And so Eliphaz in these words seems to comfort Job by giving him a hint, that though his estate was now very low, yet if he would apply himself unto God, as he had advised, vers. 8. By seeking unto and committing his cause to him, as low as he was, he might be set high again; and though he was now a mourner, sitting in dust and ashes, He might be exalted to joy and safety; for in this the power, wisdom and goodness of God are usually put forth and exalted.

The words carry an allusion to that custom of Princes and Magistrates, who sit in high places, upon erected thrones. As (1 King. 16. 19.) it is said of Solomon, that he built a magnificent Throne, or chair of State, which had an ascent of six steps to it, he sate on high. And the Prophet Isaiah (Chap. 6. vers. 1.) described the Lord in the same manner, sitting in state; I saw the Lord (saith he) sitting upon a Throne, high and lifted up. The pride and arrogancy of the Assyrian is thus expresst (Isa. 14. 13.) He hath said in his heart, I will exalt my Throne above the Stars, I will sit also upon the Mount of the Congregation. So that to sit on high, is as much as to be preferred or advanced, whether we respect honour or riches, dignity or authority.

To set on high those that be low. The word may note either those that are low in their own eyes, or those that are made low by others, active or passive lowness. Grace in our own hearts, causes the former lowness; and sinful oppression from the hand of others, causes the latter. The former are humble, the latter are humbled; the Lord sets both these on high. And,

Those which mourn. The Hebrew word signifies to be black, dark or obscured. And the reason why that word is borrowed to note mourning or sorrow, is, because sorrow causeth blackness, or darkness of habit and countenance; mourning and blackness usually go together (Jer. 4. 28.) For this cause shall the earth mourn, and the heavens above shall be black. And usually Mourners go in black, it is the die and dress of Mourners; as white is the colour of joy. Let thy garments be alwayes white, saith the Preacher to him, that is to eat his bread with joy, Eccles. 8. 8. Yea the very beauty of the face is obscured, the light of the countenance shadowed or clouded with tears and sorrow. Hence the Seventy render it, They whose faces are sad or sowre. It is the word used, Matth. 6. 16. When ye fast, be not as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance; It implies an affected, studied sadness, severity, austerity, grimness, gastliness, unpleasantness of countenance, proceeding from art, rather then from nature, much less from grace, as the words following imply: for they disfigure, vitiate or discolour their faces; corrupt or abolish their native complexion, so as it appears not what it is, that they may appear what they are not. Hypocrisie can paint the face with black, as well or rather worse then pride with red and white; and so doth real sorrow sometimes, whether for sin or outward affliction. True passion in the heart, will dim the brightness and stain the beauty of the face.

These Mourners shall be exalted to safety. The word which we translate Exalted, signifies to set in a high place, and in a place so high, that a man so placed, is beyond the reach of danger or the power of an adversary; it is to be set upon a place impregnable: Hence the word is used for a Fort, Tower, or Castle, because Forts and Towers, being places of defence, were for the most part built upon some high place, upon some rock or precipice (Prov. 18. 10.) The name of the Lord is a strong Tower; That is, we are as safe under his protection, as in a strong Tower founded on the steepest rock. And the Prophet describing the safety of him who walks uprightly, gives it in this word; His place of defence shall be the munition of Rocks, Isa. 33. 16. So Jer. 48. 1. Misgab is confounded and dismayed; that is, the high place or Castle of defence is dismaied: That word which is common to all places of safety, being supposed by our translators, as the proper name of some one place of more eminent safety.

Further, although this word (Exalted) implies safety, yet in the Original, we have two words, They are exalted to safety. He that is exalted (according to the sence of that word) is safe: But to shew the compleatness of their safety, safety or salvation is expressed: He is exalted to safety with salvation, or he is safely exalted in safety. It is a full and a perfect safety, to which God exalts his mourners and oppressed servants: They are as safe as salvation it self can make them. That's the force of the Hebraism. Εν δὲ Σω. ὁιν. Ενδυαδὶ.

From the former clause of the verse, we may Observe,

First, That, advancement is the gift of God.

He setteth on high those that are low, Psalm 75. 6, 7. Promotion cometh neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South (neither this way nor that way, nor any way of man) but God putteth down one, and setteth up another. When a man is advanced by the favour of a Prince, it is God that setteth him up. If a man be advanced by the vote of the people, yet it is God that setteth him up. Though a man be advanced by that, which may seem to have most contingency in it, by a lot, yet it is God that setteth him up, Prov. 16. 33. The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord. The Lord gives special direction to mans peradventure, and certainly determines, what we call contingent.

Secondly Observe, They that are low and mourning, are nearest to exaltation and safety.

To be very low, it is to be (as it were) in a due posture and readiness to be exalted very high; He setteth the low on high (Luke 1. 51.) he hath put down the mighty from their seat, and hath exalted the humble and meek; or, hath exalted the lowly and the meek. We are not to understand it only of those, who are low, that is, lowly in mind (that frame of heart which is wrought above in the highest Heavens (is in this sence) lowest upon the earth) but we may understand it likewise of those, who are low in their estates; (many that are low in mind, may be high in place; a man may have abundance of humility in the height of outward eminency) therefore (I say) we must take in both; Before honour goes humility, as a high mind before a fall, Prov. 15. 33. And (Psal. 113. 6, 7.) he raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghil, that he may set him with Princes, &c.

And as it is in reference to particular persons, so to the Church and people of God in general; when they are low, then look for their raising up. The Scripture is frequent in this, Deut. 32. 36. Psal. 126. Psal. 102. 13. And in that notable place, Isa. 33. 9, 10. The Ambassadors of peace weep bitterly, the earth mourneth, and Lebanon languisheth, and Carmel shakes off her fruit, &c. All places, every creature is brought in, mourning with that mourning people. When it was thus with them, Now will I arise, (saith the Lord) now will I be exalted, now will I lift up my self. There are three Nows for it, to note That the special Now of their exaltation. But the Text saith, God would then be exalted. Was he brought low? God is alwayes alike exalted in himself, but he is not alwayes alike exalted in his people; therefore when he saith, Now will I be exalted; the meaning is, I will exalt this people who are low, that my name may be exalted and lifted up in the sight of all people.

Therefore our low estate should be so far from sinking, that it should lift up our faith in believing deliverance and exaltation. A low estate, is a great advantage for faith; faith hath surest-footing when we lie prostrate upon the ground: There faith stands firmest, because there faith meets with most promises: Promises are the foundation of faith. The people of God have never so much of the word about them, as when they have least of the world about them. The covenant sits closest to us, when we are divested of the creature. When the river is at the lowest ebb, we are sure the tide is coming in: the night is darkest a little before day breaks: when the dayes are shortest, and the winter sharpest, then the spring of mercy is at hand. As the highest flourish of ungodly ones, is the immediate forerunner of their downfal (Psal. 92. 7.) When the wicked spring as the grass, what then? would you know the meaning of it? The next words are a comment upon the former: It is, that they shall be destroyed for ever: So, the lowest downfal of the godly, is usually the immediate forerunner of their advancement. When the godly wither as the grass, the interpretation of it is, That they shall flourish for ever.

Observe in the third place, from that word, exalted to safety.

That, God can set his people on high, beyond the reach of all their Enemies.

Beyond the reach of their heads or counsels, and beyond the reach of their hands and swords; Isa. 33.16. The munition of rocks shall be their place of defence: He setteth them so high, that no ladders can be found long enough to scale these rocks, nor any Artillery or engine strong enough to batter them down; and least any should say, but we will hold the siege, till we starve them out; it follows in the Text, Bread shall be given him, his waters shall be sure. I remember a story in Alexanders wars, that when he came to besiege the Sogdians, a people who dwelt upon a rock, or had the literal munition of rocks for their defence, they jeered him, and asked him whether his Souldiers had wings or no? Unless your Souldiers can fly in the Air, we fear you not. It is a most certain truth, when God exalts a people, he can set them upon a rock, so high, that unless their adversaries have wings, and those more then Eagles wings, to soar higher then God himself, they are beyond annoyance. He carries his own upon Eagles wings; what wings then must they have, who get above his people?

There are these two things, about which the thoughts of men are most conversant: The one is, to be set on high; the other is, to be set in safety. They both meet in the mercy here promised: He setteth on high those that are low, that's their honour: He exalts them to safety, that's their comfort. The first thoughts of men are spent to get a great estate, but their next thoughts are to keep and protect it. Experience hath often shewed us the men of the world, rolling riches and Titles together into a mountain; but it hath been a mountain of snow, one hot day hath melted all down. The mountain of outward blessings, upon which God raiseth his people, shall be, if he pleaseth, like a mountain of Adamant, which cannot be melted, or like mount Sion, which cannot be removed. A high place is seldom a safe place: All high things are tottering, and the more high, the more tottering. Then how unsearchable is the wisdom, how great the power of God, who can set his people very high, and yet very safe? who can make a man stand as firm and steady upon the highest pinacle of honour, as upon a level ground, or in a valley of the lowest estate and condition. He exalts to safety.

Nutare solent excelsa omnia.

And hence we may draw down a difference between Gods exaltation of his own people, and the exaltation of his enemies and wicked ones. Wicked men are oft-times exalted, and God exalts them, though they know it not: but how? He exalts them to a high place, but doth he exalt them to a safe place? No, the Psalmist, after a long temptation, concludes, Thou hast set them in slippery places, thou castest them down into destruction; how are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! Psal. 73. 18, 19. Haman was exalted high, but not in safety: Many are exalted, as Jezabel exalted Naboth, high among the people; but it was to stone him rather then to honour him. It is said of Pharaoh, he lifted up the head of his chief Baker, he lifted up his head, out of prison indeed, but he lifted up his head to the gallows also; he lifted him out of prison, but it was unto his death. Such is the lifting up of wicked men, they may be set on high, but they are never set in safety. How many have we seen suddenly advanced, and as suddenly depress'd? We are never safe, but where God sets us, or while God holds us in his hand.

Fourthly Observe, It is a wonder, a wonderful work of God, to exalt those that are low, and set mourners in safety.

The 107 Psalm, is a Psalm recounting the wonderful works of God; O that men would praise the Lord for his wonderful works! is the burthen of that holy song. And all those wonders conclude in this, vers. 39, 40. Again, they are minished and brought low, through oppression, affliction and sorrow: what then? He powreth contempt upon Princes, &c. yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction, and maketh him families like a flock. How wonderful is this, that the Lord will give Kings for the ransom of his people, and to raise his poor, will pour contempt upon Princes? the highest must down, rather then his low ones shall not be set on high. There are four things which encrease this wonder, and make it exceeding wonderful. First, These poor have no strength (Deut. 32. 36.) He sees that their strength is gone. Secondly, Many times they have no hope, no faith; When the Son of man comes, shall he find (among low ones) faith (this faith to be exalted) upon the earth? Luke 18.8. Thirdly, They have many enemies, subtil enemies, powerful enemies, confident enemies, enemies (above hope) arrived at assurance, that they shall keep poor ones at an under for ever. Lord (saith David) how many are they that trouble me? So many they were, that he could not tell how many. Fourthly, They are supposed to have no friends, none to appear for them. Let us persecute and take him (say they) for there is none to deliver him. Psal. 7. Not a man, no nor God, as they conclude; They say of my soul, there is no help for him in his God. I need not say, it is a wonder to exalt a people, upon all these disadvantages; the fact speaks: should you see a man trod upon the ground, and many there holding him down, one by the arm, another by the leg, a third laying a great weight upon his breast; were it not a wonder to see this man to rise up, and rescue himself from them all? Thus it is with the Church and servants of God, when they are low, all the world is upon their backs; the world of wicked ones hang about them, one with his power, another with his policy, all with their utmost endeavours to hold them down; yet the Lord sets them on high, who were thus low, and exalts them to safety, who were thus in danger. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and declare his wonderful works to the children of men.

And this is further cleared in the twelfth verse.

He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hand cannot perform their enterprise.

As if Eliphaz should say, Would you know, how God exalteth his people, and setteth them in safety? 'Tis true, they have many enemies, many that plot and devise evil against them, but the Lord breaks their plots, he out-plots them; He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, &c. And as this is a proof of the former, so it is a further instance of Gods wonderful works. The first was in natural things, sending rain; the second and third were in civil things; first, exalting his own people; and secondly, in defeating the policies and power of their adversaries: so then, this twelfth verse, may be taken either as it hath reference to the former, or as a further instance of Gods wisdom and power.

He disappointeth the devices of the crafty.] Or, he defeateth the purposes of the subtil (so Mr. Broughton readeth it) that their hands can bring nothing soundly to pass. The Apostle in 1 Cor. 3. 19. sets the holy stamp of divine authority upon this whole book, by quoting this or the next verse, as a proof of his doctrine: For it is written (saith he) He takes the crafty in their own counsel; He disappoints the devices of the crafty, (saith Eliphaz) and, He takes the wise in their own craftiness.

He disappointeth.] The word signifies to break, to break a thing to pieces: and by a metaphor, to disappoint or to defeat; because if an engine or instrument, with which a man intends to work, be broken, he is disappointed of his purpose, and cannot go on with his work: So here, He breaks the devices of the crafty; the crafty frame very curious engines and instruments, they lay fine plots and projects; but the Lord breaks them, and then they are defeated or disappointed. The word is often used for breaking or making void the law, as Psalm 119. 126. Ezra 9. 13. because wicked men, as much as in them lies, would defeat and disappoint the holy purpose and design of God, in giving those laws. They would repeal and abrogate the laws of God, that they might enact their own lusts. They would do that by the will of God, which the Lord doth with their wills, Null and disappoint it.

The devices.] The word which we translate, devices, signifies, not barely cogitation, or thinking, but excogitation, or, studied thinking; not only a natural thought, but an artificial thought, or thoughts made up and formed after long debate of a business in our own breasts: This is properly expresst by devising. Those Pools of water in Cant. 7. 4. are called from this word, The pools in Heshbon. Some take Heshbon for a City (Numb. 21. 26.) and so it notes the place where those pools were. Others translate it thus *, Pools artificially made: And we may observe much skill and curiosity used in making pools and water-works. So (Exod. 28. 8.) the holy Girdle which was made for the High-Priest, is called a curious girdle; it is from the same Root; because that girdle was made of cunning work, and exquisite embroideries. So that this word notes, the very spirits and quintessence of sinful wit, drawn out for the devising of evil. In Psal. 119. 59. David useth this word, to shew the accurateness and holy curiosity which he used, in surveying his own life, I thought on my wayes, that is, I studied my self and my works with greatest exactness, to find out every error or failing, or to frame my wayes to a hairs breadth (if it were possible) according to rule; which answers the Apostles phrase, Eph. 5. of walking circumspectly or exactly. Grace will vie it with sinful craft, for exactness; that will make as curious works or devices in holiness, as the other can in wickedness.

Of the crafty.] Here the workmen are described as well as their work; their works are devices, and the workmen are crafty. As the man is, so is his employment; we are in working as we are in being; Devices are the proper trade of crafty ones. The Original word sometimes imports holy wisdom, and sometimes corrupt and sinful wisdom. We read it in a good sence (Prov. 1. 4.) & (Prov. 22. 3.) The prudent man (a man that hath holy craft and skill in him) foresees the plague, and hideth himself. Again, Prov. 8. 12. I Wisdom dwell with Prudence, and find out knowledge of witty inventions. But usually the word is taken in an ill sence, for subtil and sinful craft, for craftiness and subtilty to do mischief; therefore the Vulgar translates it, He disappointeth the devices of the Malignants; noting, that it is not any honest craft, but a malignant craft, by which the counsels and devices of these men are contrived or acted (Psal. 83. 3.) that word is used, They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones: And, Gen. 3. 1. Now the Serpent was more subtil then any beast of the field; The word properly signifies to be naked; and by a Metaphor, to be subtil, crafty, nimble; because men, who (as tumblers, racers, rope-dancers) are to do a thing nimbly and speedily, subtilly and slily, often strip themselves of all, but will never cumber themselves with many cloaths. We know that craft always puts a cloak or veil upon actions, and walks in a disguise; yet because the crafty man is so nimble to turn and wind, and varie himself a thousand wayes, both for the plotting and acting of his designes, therefore he is elegantly named from nakedness. Hence also in the Greek Language, the word which signifies any nimble acting or exercising the mind or body, as also places and Schools where those exercises were performed and taught, is derived from nakedness, or being naked. And it is observable, that our first parents Adam and Eve, before they sinned, are called (Gen. 2. 25.) naked. And the Serpent in the very next verse (being the first of the third Chapter) is called subtil, by one and the same word. Our first Parents were naked outwardly (Innocency needed none, and Glory shall need no cloathing) they were also (in opposition to evil) naked inwardly; they were simple, plain-hearted, without any cloak of malice or wickedness. But the serpents nakedness, notes only a fitness, slyness, readiness or activeness to do evil; for he was double-cloath'd with craft, cloak'd and hooded with subtilties, to act mischiefs unseen. The naked crafty ones of the Text, are the seed of the Serpent, his children, and therefore they bear their Fathers name. The Chaldee Paraphrast tells us, that the crafty ones here meant by Eliphaz, were especially the Egyptians, who when they would oppress the people of God, said, Come on, let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply, Exod. 1. 10. A crafty man is one, who hath not alwayes more understanding then his neighbour, but ever less conscience: Yea, how great soever his wit is, his conscience is so little, that it never stands in his light, whatsoever he is doing. He takes measure of his actions, not by what he ought to do, but by what he would have done; and yet he can seldom do what he would, for the Lord disappoints the devices of the crafty so, that as it follows in the Text,

Their hands cannot perform their enterprize.

To every business, two things are required, Invention and Action; or, the electing of means, and the pursuing of the end: The former is Head-work, and the latter is Hand-work. The hands are the instruments of action, as the head is the instrument of invention and consultation. These crafty heads were at work before, now their hands go to it; What they devise craftily, they would act industriously; but they cannot, Their hands cannot perform their enterprize.

The word which we translate Enterprize, signifies Being, as also reason, wisdom and virtue; because wisdom, virtue, and reason, are, as it were, the being, stability and permanency of things; and therefore, as in the Hebrew, this word signifying wisdom and virtue, is derived from a root which notes Being. So the word signifying wickedness and folly, is derived from a root (as some Criticks observe) which notes only a negative, or a not being of any thing; because wickedness is nothing, or it is good for nothing: Those things which want wisdom and reason, are as if they were not, and shortly will not be at all. Hence some render the words thus, Their hands cannot perform their wisdom, that is, they cannot bring to pass that enterprize, which they had determined and laid (as themselves conceived) with so much wisdom and strength of reason. Mr. Broughton to the same sense; Their hands bring nothing soundly to pass. And the Chaldee exemplifies it in the Egyptians before-mentioned, who as the holy story informs us, could not effect that which they had consulted with those depths of policy, and principles of sinful wisdom, the destruction of the children of Israel. Here then we may observe, תושיה a radice אש ut אין ab און denotat essentiam, rationem, sapientiam, virtutem semper permanentem aliis rebus in mundo transeuntibus. Hinc significat, omne quod cum intellectu & ratione fit; & hic specialiter pro eo, quod quis sibi statuit ut faciat quo finem optatum assequatur, etiam in malum. Mer.

First, That, The wisdom of natural men is nothing but craft or wit to do wickedly.

The Prophet Jeremy gives us this character of them, They are wise to do evil (Jer. 4. 22.) And to be wise to do evil, is very ill wisdom, the worst wisdom, indeed meer folly; better to be a fool, then to be but so wise: And these have it from their father, it dwells and is derived in their blood, They are the seed of the serpent (as was toucht before) and his subtilty was made the instrument of the greatest evil, the tainting of that first created innocency, and the overthrow of man. Now, they are called the serpents seed, because they are like the Serpent; the Serpent was the subtilest of all the beasts of the field, and these (as Christ speaks of the men of the world) are wiser in their generation then the children of light; yet it is but in their generation, and their wisdom lasteth but for their generation, if it last so long: Elymas (Acts 13. 10.) being charged to be full of all subtilty and mischief, is called at the next word, child of the Devil. Subtil to do mischief, is the Genius or disposition of the Devils children; and they shall have the Serpents, the Devils portion: For as the Serpent, who was once the subtilest of all the beasts of the field (applying his subtilty to mischief) became the most cursed of all the beasts of the field; so they, who are thus the subtilest among the children of men, shall be the most cursed of all the children of men, Jer. 18. 18. We find crafty men in consultation, and under a curse; Come (say they) let us devise a device against Jeremiah, and let us smite him with the tongue. Let us devise devices; it is the same word in the text, but doubled for greater emphasis: These were their crafts-masters. To devise devices, notes more then ordinary skill in that black art; as to work a work (John 6. 28.) notes great industry and intention of the mind in working. Some play their works rather then work their works: I must work the works of him that sent me, saith our Lord Christ, John 9. 4. None ever laboured as Christ laboured, therefore his was working a work. As (I say) to work a work, notes great industry in working; so to devise a device, implies much cunning and skill laid out in devising. Now as these men would be witty above others, in devising evil, so they are cursed above others in bearing evil. The Prophet gives them their load, v. 21, 22. Therefore deliver up their children to the famine, and and pour out their blood by the force of the sword, and let their wives be bereaved, &c. And it is most just, that they should be deepest in the curse, who are deepest in such craft: for the truth is, that, Every sinful act, the more skill there is in it, the more sin there is in it, it is best to be a dull-head, a very bungler in doing mischief: Wit commends and sets off other things, but it makes sin the more sinful and deformed.

Secondly Observe, That, Satan makes use of subtle, crafty men, and abuseth their parts for his own purposes.

He disappointeth the devices of the crafty. God never disappointeth those whom he sets a work: If God disappoint the devices of men, these devices were not of God: Satan sets those a work, whose work God spoils. The Lord loves to break Satans engines, tools and instruments. Christ came to destroy the works of the Devil, both his works within us, and his works against us. All Satans works and workmen shall rue it, when Christ pleases. And here we see whom Satan sets a work, even men of the finest wits, of the most reaching brains, of the deepest judgments and richest endowments; these he draweth into his pay, and makes serviceable for his ends; that's Satans design; such as are amongst men, as the Serpent amongst the beasts, the most subtil of all, these Satan makes use of: The deep policy of an Achitophel, the Great Oracle of his times for counsel, he desires to improve against a David; the high parts and learning of a Julian, he desires to improve and boyle up against the Christians; such a one will not only Fire and sword, but set hard to jear and wit them out of the profession of the Gospel.

Philosophi hæreticorũ Patriarchæ. Tert.

And it is observable, that the seeds of the greatest heresies and errors, that ever poyson'd the spirit of man, or vext the Church of God, have been sown in that rank soyl, the wits of Philosophers. Which gave Tertullian occasion to call Philosophers, The Patriarks of Heretics, or The Patrons of Heresies: They were men of high conceits and apprehensions; and in those fertile and rich grounds, Satan with great success cast the tares of error. When Christ came into the world, he had most opposition among the crafty Scribes and Pharisees; and Herod the Fox (as Christ himself calls him for his subtilty) was a notorious instrument of Satan, to hinder the receiving of Christ. Our Lord Christ sometimes chooseth the simplest, the meanest, the plainest men, fisher-men, to do his work. But Satan chooseth the subtilest he can find in learned throngs, to send of his errand. The reason of this difference between Christs choice and Satans, is, Satan cannot make a Mercury out of every block; he is not able to give a man understanding, wisdom or abilities for his work: neither can he increase or improve any mans parts and gifts; he must have instruments ready to his hand, he can but put them forward and tempt them on. He will give such as are strong and crafty, many motives to serve him, but he cannot furnish them with strength or craft to serve him. But Christ can give gifts to men, which they have not, and raise the parts which they have. He can make himself a Mercury, a messenger out of any block. Christ can send a fool of his errand, and cause him to do it wisely; he can cause the stammering tongue to speak plain, and the plainest man to speak the highest Rhetorick. When a Moses complains of a slow tongue, he can say, I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt say, Exod. 4. 12. If he finds us not fit to do his business, he can make us fit. If Christ please, he can make a man Master of his trade, before, or as soon as ever he is a servant to it. Thus, without the wisdom of the world, Christ overcomes the wisdom of the world: And by the foolishness of preaching (as men count foolishness) saveth those that believe (1 Cor. 1. 21.) The foolishness of God is wiser then man; that is, those instruments which Christ imployes, how foolish soever men account them, shall foil all the wisdom of man.

Therefore let no man boast of his natural parts, unless they be spiritualiz'd, and resign'd up (for such Christ commonly uses, though he can make use of others) to the service of Christ. Consider to whom you are instrumental, with your parts and knowledge. All wit out of Christs work, degenerates into craft, and wisdom into wickedness. It is Satans work to solicite the learning of men (even as an Adulterer sollicites the beauty of women) that he may commit folly with it, and beget some monstrous birth of mischief and villany.

For, when such appear on Satans side, they are a great credit to his cause, and by the reputation of their learning and parts draw others to it. Do ye not see (will he suggest to inferior ones) such and such wise, learned men, go this way; such learned Divines, such learned Lawyers, such deep Politicians, and do you scruple? and how many have been caught in this snare, and led aside by the noise of their abilities, whom Satan abuseth to his own side? what, such wise men, such learned men, think thus, and do you simple ones stand off? Hath he not reason then to say of wise men, (as it was once said of one) Seeing ye are such, I wish you would come over to me: and to brag of them, as much as ever that Persian Monarch did of Themistocles, whose revolting to him from the Græcians, transported him so, that he broke suddenly out of his sleep with these words, I have Themistocles the Athenian. I remember what Augustine observes (it is a very remarkable passage) in an Epistle to a young Noble man of great learning, who it seems had been sometime his Schollar. Augustine having received from him a Poem or copy of accurate verses (but perceiving that he abused his wit to wantonness or useless curiosity) returns him answer to this effect, I have read this Poem, and I know not with what verses, or with what lamentation to mourn over it; because I see an excellent wit sparkling in every line, but such an one, as I cannot dedicate unto God. A little after he thus exhorts him, Give thy self unto my Lord, who hath given thee this excellent wit: if thou hadst found a golden Cup, what wouldst thou have done with it? Wouldst thou not have given it to some good publick use? God hath given thee a golden wit, thy understanding is a golden Cup, and wilt thou let thy lusts drink out of it, or wilt thou drink thy self to the Devil in it? I tell thee thus much, the Devil would fain make thy wit his ornament, and thy parts, the credit of his Court and Cause. Satan serves himself of the best wits, and his is the worst service of wit: Such shall be paid at last with crying, We fools. Of all fools, the knowing wise fools will be in the saddest condition.

Observe Thirdly, The crafty are full of hopes, that their devises will succeed; and full of trouble, because they succeed not.

Otherwise it could not be said, that God disappointeth the devises of the crafty; Disappointment implies expectation: And it is no affliction affliction to miss of that which we never looked for. These thought all sure. These doubted not to over-wit and over-power all, at last. This brought them somewhat beyond hope, even to the borders of assurance; at least it so endeared them to their hopes, that they would rather hazzard their souls, then lose their plots; they were burthened to be delivered. Having conceived mischief, they were in travel with iniquity, Psal. 7. 14. As the Lord suffers his own people to fear much, that when deliverance comes, their joy may be full: so, he suffers wicked men to hope much, that their sorrows may be full, when they cannot be delivered. A woman forgets the pains of her travel, for joy that a man child is born into the world; and these men shall remember the pains of their travel, for sorrow that a monster (such are their designs) is not born into the world: That their mischief comes not (in their sense) to light, leaves them in desperate darkness.

Fourthly Observe, What such plot and devise, they labour to act and effect.

Their hands cannot perform their enterprise; which intimates, that they put their hands to the work, as well as their heads; as soon as they have laid their plot, they fall to acting. We should in this imitate our enemies, not to stand devising and consulting, this is a good way, and t'others a good way, and then do neither, or then sit still and moulder away in expectation; love to, and zeal for Christ, and his truth, should render us as full of action, as of invention; of execution, as of design.

Fifthly, Though they did attempt it with their hands, yet they could not effect it with their hands, their hands did not perform their enterprise.

Hence

Hence note, That, Crafty men may deviſe ſtrongly, but they have not ſtrength ſufficient to accompliſh their devices.

The Phariſees after all their confederacies againſt Chriſt were forc't (without any rack, but that of their own conſciences) to make this confeſſion, Joh. 12. 19. Perceive ye how we prevail nothing. At this day they have many fine devices and Idæas ready framed in their heads, but the hand ſhakes, They cannot perform their enterpriſe. They want not counſel, nor craft, nor skill, nor will, nor deſires, nor endeavours, only they want God with them. Hence it is, that though they gather very proper materials, and lay very ſtrong foundations, yet they cannot rear up their building. And in the iſſuei (Luke 14. 29.) All that behold it ſhall mock, ſaying, Theſe men began to build, and were not able to finiſh; it is the main work of God to ſtop evil men in their works: what they would do, he ſaith they ſhall not; and what they would not do, he ſaith they ſhall: Pharaoh deviſed a deviſe againſt the children of Iſrael, but his hands could not perform his enterpriſe. Haman deviſed a deviſe againſt the Jews, but his hands could not perform his enterpriſe. Achitophel gave crafty counſel againſt David, but his hands could not perform his enterpriſe. Herod the Fox plotted againſt Chriſt, to hinder the courſe of his Miniſtery and Mediatorſhip, but he could not perform his enterpriſe: Tis ſo all along, therefore (Pſal. 2. 1.) it is ſaid, Why do the Heathen imagine a vain thing; a vain thing, becauſe a thing ſucceſleſs, their hands could not perform it; it was vain, not only becauſe there was no true ground of reaſon, why they ſhould imagine or do ſuch a thing; but vain alſo, becauſe they laboured in vain, they could not do it. And therefore it follows, verſ. 4. He that ſitteth in the heavens ſhall laugh, the Lord hath them in deriſion. The Lord ſees what fools they are, and men (yea themſelves) ſhall ſee it. The Prophet gives us an elegant deſcription to this purpoſe (Iſa. 59. 6.) They weave the ſpiders web, but their webs ſhall not become garments, neither ſhall they cover themſelves with their works. As if he had ſaid, they have been deviſing and ſetting things in a goodly frame to catch flies; they have been ſpinning a fine thread, out of their brains, as the Spider doth out of her bowels, ſuch is their web: but when they have this web, they cannot cut it out, or make it up into a garment. They ſhall go naked and cold, notwithſtanding all their ſpinning and weaving, all their plotting and deviſing. The next broom that comes will ſweep away all their webs, and the Spiders too, except they creep apace. God loves and delights to croſs worldly proverbs, and worldly craft.

How many viſible demonſtrations hath there been of this in all ages! How many cunning, but ruining devices have been unacted! They went thorough the Head-work, but they could not get through their Hand-work. We may ſay, as in the Pſalm (76. 5.) None of the men of might have found their hands: The men of craft found their heads, but the men of might (bleſſed be God) have not yet found their hands, to execute up to the height of the deviſers, either, wit or malice.

In this we ſee the glorious prerogative of God. How many thouſand, thouſand, thouſand thoughts do men looſe! The thoughts of many years are loſt in a moment: God never loſt, nor never ſhall looſe one thought. And therefore David put theſe two together in a breath. Having ſaid (Pſalm 33. 10.) The Lord bringeth the counſel of the Heathen to nought, he maketh the devices of the people of none effect: In the next verſe, he ſubjoyns, The counſel of the Lord ſtandeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations. And as the counſel of the Lord ſtands, ſo he cauſeth the counſel of thoſe to ſtand, who conſult for him: He confirmeth the word of his Servants, and performeth the counſel of his Meſſengers, Iſa. 44. 26. So that their hands ſhall perform their enterpriſe, as the Lord encouraged his ancient people; (Zach. 4. 9.) The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this houſe, his hands ſhall alſo finiſh it: And again, Chap. 8. 13. Fear not, let your hands be ſtrong. As if he had ſaid, Fear not, go on with your work; for your hands ſhall perform their enterpriſe; you ſhall not be beaten from your work, neither ſhall ye work in vain. The Lord himſelf hath no barren counſels, and he makes all the counſels which are for him, bring forth in their due time, deſired fruit, the longed for and beloved iſſue.

Laſtly, Obſerve, That, It is a great and wonderful work of God, to diſappoint the devices, and ſtop the enterpriſes of crafty men.

Eliphaz put this among the wonders of God. This is reported in a way of admiration concerning God (Iſa. 44. 25.) He fruſtrates the tokens of the lyers, and maketh diviners mad; he turneth wiſe men backwards, and maketh their knowledge fooliſh. The wiſdom of God is moſt ſeen, in defeating the wiſe; as the power of God is moſt ſeen, in overthrowing the ſtrong. While we conſider that Theirs, are ſecret devices, and that they are ſubtil devices; that they have many devices, and that they have many wayes to bring theſe devices to paſs; it cannot fall below a wonder in our thoughts, that their thoughts, or devices are not accompliſhed. Therefore the Pſalmiſt concludes (Pſalm 124.) Unleſs it had been the Lord, who was on our ſide, &c. we had been ſwallowed up quick, and taken in their ſnare. As if he had ſaid, if we ſhould have had any leſs then God, to help us, we had been gone; all the world could not ſave us. To paſs through a place full of gins, and ſnares, and pits, ſet and made on purpoſe to take a man, and that man not taken, is marvelous in our eyes. Thus it is with the people of God, they walk among ſnares and traps; The trade of moſt wicked men, is to be Trap-makers, Snare-makers, if not Sword-makers againſt the Saints of the moſt High. They meet with devices upon devices, and plots upon plots; now that God ſhould diſappoint all theſe, and exalt his people to ſafety, in the very face of death and dangers, how admirable!

But ſome may object, Yet we ſee that, at leaſt ſome of theſe plots are not diſappointed, at leaſt ſome of theſe devices take, and we have ſeen bloody hands performing their enterpriſe.

I anſwer, in a word, Firſt, this Text and the obſervation bottom'd upon it, are to be underſtood of what is often done, not ſtrictly of what is alwayes done. The Lord very frequently diſappoints the devices of the crafty.

But ſecondly, Their very ſucceſs is a diſappointment, and their proſperity is their curſe. For their cauſe is under a curſe, and ſo are their perſons, when both ſeem moſt ſucceſsful. If outward judgments ſlay not wicked men, Their proſperity ſhall, Prov. 1. 32.

Thirdly, All the ſucceſs, which the devices of wicked crafty ones have, tends to the fulfilling of Gods counſels, more then their own: So that, though it be to the eye, or in the letter, ſucceſs to them; yet in truth, and upon the matter, it is ſucceſs to the cauſe of God: Craft prevails no further, and no longer on earth, then ſerves to accompliſh the counſels of Heaven, and fulfil what infinite wiſdom hath deviſed. Therefore when you ſee any devices of the crafty thrive, know, that God is ſerving himſelf upon them, and that they are but acting, What his hand and counſel hath determined before to be done, Act. 4. 28. As Chriſt himſelf overcame by dying, ſo do they who are Chriſts, they have ſucceſs in all their diſappointments; and theſe are diſappointed in all their ſucceſſes, and die while they overcome. No ſinful deviſe of man ever did, or ever ſhall prevail, beyond a contribution to the juſt and holy purpoſe of God. All their prevailings are diſappointments, who intentionally oppoſe, though they really accompliſh the good pleaſure and purpoſe of God.

VERS. 13, 14, 15, 16.

He taketh the wiſe in their own craftineſs; and the counſel of the froward is carried headlong.
They meet with darkneſs in the day time; and grope in the noon-day as in the night.
But he ſaveth the poor from the Sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty.
So the poor hath hope; and iniquity ſtoppeth her mouth.

IN theſe four verſes Eliphaz proceeds in, and finiſhes the former Argument, by a further and fuller clearing of the power and wiſdom of God, in catching and over-matching crafty ones, in their wayes and counſels. Having ſhewed before (in verſ. 12.) that their devices are diſappointed; he ſheweth now, that they are intangled in their devices. There, we ſaw they could not perform their enterpriſes, priſes, and here we ſhall ſee them ruined in their enterpriſes. It is a ſore trouble to ungodly men, when they cannot do the miſchief, which they intend to others; but it is a far ſorer trouble, when their counſels recoyle, and when their own projects promote their own ruin: when their own actions effect that, which they had rather die, then ſee done; when that miſchief falleth upon their own heads, which they intended others: That's their calamity in this Text.

He taketh the wiſe in their own craftineſs.

These wiſe men, are no better then the crafty, before mentioned, for we ſee their wiſdom is but craftineſs. We had the Crafty in the former verſe; and here we have their craft or craftineſs. The Apoſtle in 1 Cor. 3. 19. quotes this Text of Eliphaz; The Wiſdom of the world is fooliſhneſs with God; for it is written, He taketh the wiſe in their own craftineſs. The Greek word there uſed hath ſomewhat more in it, then the Hebrew word, opened at verſe 12. For it notes a fitneſs for all purpoſes, a dexterity to ſerve any turn, be it never ſo ſiniſter or evil. Such a man can be on any ſide, and is for any purpoſe, you will turn him to. A godly man hath but one work, and he can do but one work, that is, one work in kind; every work he doth (as a godly man) hath a ſtamp of goodneſs, or godlineſs, of holineſs, or juſtice upon it. But theſe crafty ones are for any work; for various works, you may turn them looſe to any ſervice; they are ready to do good for a need, to ſerve their own ends, and they will not ſtick at any evil, for their own ends; their bias is not within them, but upon them, and they can clap it to which ſide they pleaſe, or may be moſt pleaſing to, or taking with others; yet this Turn-coat Craftineſs ſhall not ſerve their turn; for ſaith the Text, He taketh the wiſe in their own craftineſs.

παγουργία ἀπὸ παγοῦργος, quaſi dicas, ad quodlibet opus promptus, qui dexteritate ingenii valet ad quodlibet agendū.

The word which we tranſlate [He taketh] is very ſignificant. It imports a taking by force or ſtrength, and it imports a taking by ſkill or ſtratagem. God will have them both wayes: If theſe cunning men work by their wits, He can take them: The Lord hath more ſtratagems to take them, then they have had to take others: Or if they work by power and by plain ſtrength, he can take them. The Lord hath more ſtrength to take them, then they have had to take others.

לכד cepit, apprehendit de loco aut urbe, expugnavit inopinata & violenta expugnatione.

The word is applied to the taking in of Cities or Forts, places ſtrengthned both by Art and Nature, and to the taking of them (which includes both ſences) either by ſiege or ſudden ſurpriſal. Read Numb. 21. 32. Joſh. 6. 2. Deut. 2. 34. And ſo the ſence may be, that, although theſe men think, they have ſo intrenched and fortified themſelves by their wits, policies and counſels (as it were in a ſtrong City or Caſtle) that they ſeem impregnable, and laugh at all oppoſite power: Yet, then God beſieges, batters and takes them preſently; he takes in, and ſlights their works with eaſe; he levels to the ground their great thoughts, even the high Tower of their imaginations: That may be the force of the word [He taketh them.] For as every natural man labours to ſecure himſelf and his luſts, againſt the power of the word of God, by carnal reaſonings and pleadings for them: All which the Apoſtle calls ſtrong holds (2 Cor. 10. 4, 5.) The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but they are mighty through God to the caſting down of ſtrong holds. Now (I ſay) as natural men ſecure themſelves (as it were in ſtrong-holds) by their carnal reaſonings; ſo wicked Politicians think to ſecure themſelves, and fortifie their deſigns by plots and platforms of crafty counſel. But as God in the miniſtry of his word, caſteth down all the arguments, which a man frames in his heart, to protect his luſts: ſo the Lord in the adminiſtration of his providence, throws down all the fortifications, which crafty men frame in their hearts, to protect their lawleſs practiſes, and takes them in.

Secondly, The word may imply the taking and binding of a man in bonds or in fetters. He takes the wiſe in their own craftineſs, that is, he takes and binds them as with a chain, or he fetters them in their own craftineſs. So the word is uſed (Prov. 5. 22.) His own iniquities ſhall take the wicked himſelf, and he ſhall be holden with the cords of his ſins.

Thirdly, The metaphor may be carried in alluſion to Hunters of wild beaſts, or to bird-takers; who ſet nets and gins, traps or toyls to take them: Theſe wiſe, crafty men, are cunning hunters; their trade and buſineſs is, to ſet nets to catch, and toyls to intangle; they dig pits, and lay ſnares, for others to fall into: So the Prophet deſcribes them (Jer. 5. 26.) They lay wait as he that ſetteth ſnares, they ſet a trap, they catch men: But at laſt, God takes the wiſe in their own craftineſs; that is, the pits they have digged, and the ſnares they have laid, and the nets they have ſet, ſhall catch themſelves.

Fourthly, The word is applied in Scripture, to a taking or a diſcovery by lot: So (Joſh. 7. 15.) the rule was thus given, He that ſhall be taken with the accurſed thing, ſhall be burnt; and verſ. 18. Achan was taken, that is, taken by a lot, the lot diſcovered and catcht him. Achan had hid the Babyloniſh garment, and the wedge of gold ſafe enough, as he thought: and one would have thought, that in ſuch a multitude, in ſuch an huge hoſt and throng of people, he might have been hidden too; but God ſends a lot, and takes out Achan from the midſt of all the multitude; he calls him out by name, this is the man. There may be a like meaning and uſe of the word in this place, He taketh the wiſe in their own craftineſs; that is, men who think to ſhelter themſelves amongſt the multitude, or to walk in the clouds of craft: men who hide and ſhadow themſelves from the eye of the world, as if none ſhould ſee who they are, or what they do, even theſe God will take; he will direct a divine lot, one time or other, to apprehend and lay hold on them; he will diſcover Achans, the troublers of his Iſrael, in their wicked counſels; and bring to light their ſtoln wedges of Gold, and their Babyloniſh garments.

There is one thing further conſiderable, from the ſence of that Greek word, which the Apoſtle uſes (1 Cor. 3. 19.) He taketh the wiſe, &c. The Apoſtles word ſignifies properly to take, or a taking with the hand, a laying hold upon one that is flying: as in a battel, when the enemy flies and runs, the purſuer takes hold of him, and will not let him eſcape. And ſo the ſence is, that though theſe crafty ones think to make an eſcape, when they have done miſchief, to out-run the juſtice of men, yea, to get out of the reach of God; yet he taketh them, as flying enemies or malefactors, that would make an eſcape; he catcheth them by the back, takes them by the ſhoulder, layes faſt hold on them, ſo that they ſhall not be able to get away. He takes the wiſe in their own craftineſs.

δεσμεύω ἀπὸ δεσμοῦ, Manu capio & firmiter teneo; fugientē in cursu deprehendere manuq; injecta capere ita tenere quicquam nō elabatur unde δεσμὸς manipulus pugillus. Eraſ.

Laſtly, It is obſervable, that the Propoſition [in] he takes them [in] their craftineſs, may be underſtood inſtrumentally: and ſo it is as much as the Propoſition [by:] He takes them in, that is, he takes them by their devices; that Prepoſition is often put inſtrumentally (Gen. 32. 10.) Jacob ſaith, In my ſtaff I paſſed over this Jordan; we tranſlate, with my ſtaff, or, by my ſtaff I paſſed over this Jordan. And ſo Heb. 1. 1. God who at ſundry times, ſpake in time paſt to the Fathers [in] the Prophets, ſo the Greek; we tranſlate, by the Prophets, becauſe they were the means or the inſtruments, which God employed to ſpeak by. Thus here, He takes the wicked [in] their craftineſs; or [by] their craftineſs; their craftineſs is the very means and inſtrument by which God apprehends and takes them. So much for the opening of this firſt clauſe.

Pleroſq; aſtus illorū facit Deū inſtrumentū ad arcendū ab iis quæ cogitans. Rab. Lev.

We may Note hence, Firſt, That, No wiſdom or craftineſs of man, can ſtand before the wiſdom and power of God.

He not only takes them in their fooliſhneſs, but in their craftineſs; he ſtayes not till they begin to dote and do weakly, before he takes them; but when they are in their height of wit, and in the depths of worldly wiſdom and policy; when they put forth the quinteſſence of craft, and give counſel like the Oracle of God (2 Sam. 16. 23.) then God takes them; He takes them in their craftineſs. (Prov. 21. 30.) There is no wiſdom, nor underſtanding, nor counſel againſt the Lord. No counſel againſt the Lord. How is it then ſaid in Pſalm 2. The Kings of the Earth ſet themſelves, and the rulers take counſel together, againſt the Lord, and againſt his anointed? There are many counſels oppoſed againſt the Lord, but there are none prevailing againſt the Lord. The meaning of that holy Proverb, is, That no wiſdom, not the moſt ſublime and refined wiſdom; no counſel, not the moſt Machivilian or Achitophelian counſel can prevail againſt the Lord. Men, uſually catch others, when they are at a fault, or take them upon ſome ad-advantage and error in their counsels. Most successes of men, are made out of the slips and defects of their adversaries: They take, upon mistakes, either in advising or acting; but after the most deliberate and grave debates, the choicest and best grounded resolves, the Lord takes them. For (1 Cor. 1.25.) The foolishness of God is wiser then man: And if the wisdom of man cannot match the foolishness of God, how shall it contend with the wisdom of God? as the Prophet Jeremiah speaks in another case, If I have run with footmen, and they have wearied me, how can I contend with horses? So, if these men are not able to deal with the foolishness of God, how shall they deal with his wisdom? Not, that there is any, the least imaginable foolishness in God; for as God is light, and in him there is no darkness at all; so God is wisdom, and in him there is no foolishness at all: but the Holy Ghost speaks thus, to put God as low as the foolishest thoughts of man can put him, which is to think there is foolishness in God; yet in that, or then, he is wiser then they.

Secondly Observe, That, God turneth the counsels of wicked men against themselves.

He taketh the wise, not only in, but by their craftiness; He beats their own weapons against their heads; He wrests their weapons out of their hands, and with them wounds their hearts. Those counsels and contrivements, by which they thought to secure themselves, are their destruction. He destroyes them in their counsels, and by their counsels.

Qui scripserunt de arte militari, dicunt summũ genus dimicandi, quoties calcato umbone adversarii, se in hostilem clypeũ erigit miles & ita contrastantis vulnerat terga. Serv. in Virg. Æn. 11. * Rem meditandã summè. Jun. in loc.

This wonderfully magnifies and commends the wisdom of God: He doth not trouble himself to devise some new way or stratagem to take these men, but he makes use only of that which they have devised. It is the noblest way of conquering, to conquer our enemy with his own weapons; such was that victory of David over Goliah; and that was a type of Christs victory over the Devil and all spiritual wickednesses. And such will his victory be over all the wickednesses of this world. The Lord is (and shall ever be) known by the judgments which he executeth; the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands, Higgaion Selah *. Mark and meditate, Psal. 9. 16.

It was the plot of Satan, to tempt man, who was made in the image of God (for the doing of good and a voiding evil) to desire to be as God, knowing good and evil; he tempts man to affect a Deity, or a Godship; and this plot was, to ruine man below the beasts, by aspiring to an equality with God; or to make man less then he was made, by seeking to be as much as his maker. Now the Lord takes (as it were) this weapon out of Satans hands, and destroyes him by it. Satan would have man aspire to be a God, that he might be ruined; and God becomes man, to ruine Satan: This was the greatest counterplot that ever was. God took the Devil in, and by his own craftiness. As if God had said, Satan, Thou shalt see what a fine device thou hast devised, I will meet thee in thy own way, and turn it upon thee. Thou wouldst have man become God, so to ruine him; now God shall become man, and by that I will at once ruine thy counsels, and repair the broken condition of man.

Joseph's brethren, had a device to hinder his Prophecies, and make his dreams but phancies; Joseph dreamed that his brethren should worship him; they sell him for a captive into Egypt: what more opposite to honour among his brethren, then captivity among strangers? yet this device effected what they opposed; Joseph was exalted in Egypt, and his brethren press'd with want, worshipt or bowed unto him for bread.

The Jews took counsel to kill Christ, and what was the motive? A wise man among them suggests this fear; If we let him thus alone, the Romans will come and take away both our place and Nation (Joh. 11.48.) But the Lord took the wise in this craftiness; for that cruel act in killing Christ, brought the Romans upon them: The time cometh (saith Christ, he foresaw what would come) that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side; and they shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another, because thou knowest not the time of thy visitation, Luke 19.43,44. And thus as the Psalmist (Psalm 64. 8.) prophesied of his enemies; They made their own tongues to fall upon themselves. A strange thing, that the fall of a mans tongue should oppress his body, and whole estate; yet so it is, the weight of a mans tongue falling upon him, crushes him to powder. The seventh Psalm is the paraphrase of this point (vers. 14.) He travelleth with mischief, and hath brought forth a lie; (that answers vers. 12. He disappointeth the devices of the crafty:) He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made; his mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealings shall come down upon his own pate: Here is vers. 13. made good, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness.

How doth this aggravate the sorrows of crafty men? It is sad enough with the crafty, when they are taken by the craftiness of other men; That any man out-wits them, is enough to put them out of their wits: How then will they live, being taken and ensnared by their own wit; when they see themselves accessary to their own undoing; when they see they have pull'd down their estates with their own hands, and have put fire to their own houses? As it greatens the sin, so it greatens the punishment, when a man falls by his own hand; self-murder is the most sinful and most bloody murder. Neither is their sin or punishment less, who die by the craftiness of their own heads, then theirs, who die by the violence of their own hands.

This is a visible truth among us, and he that runs, may read it in the book of Gods latter providences: I believe our age will be able to make as fair a record of this point for posterity, as any that hath passed, if not as all that have passed for many generations. He takes the wise in their own craftiness: And, as it follows in the Text.

The counsel of the froward is carried headlong.

The counsel.] There is somewhat further in that: not only are their devices disappointed, but their counsels; Counsels are the results of serious and sad debates: Craft is of one, counsel of many heads laid together. Counsel is the extract of reason, both about what we are to do, or leave undone: These counsels God carries head-long: there is nothing more opposite to counsel then precipitation. Long deliberation should go before determination, but their counsels shall be carried head-long: They shall either be overhasty in counsel, or their counsels being solemnly enough setled, shall be over-hastily acted: Rash, headlong execution may be as dangerous as rash, headlong resolutions. But whose are these counsels? The same mens still, though under another notion. The counsel of the froward. Before we had, the devices of the crafty; and again, the craftiness of the wise; now here, the counsel of the froward. The Spirit of God varies words, but the men are the same. There is scarce variety enough of words in all languages, to express the variety of wickednesses, which one heart speaks. The Hebrew word in the root, signifieth to wrest or to writhe a thing, or to wrest and turn a thing as wrastlers their bodies. Hence by a Trope, it is translated often to wrastle; because a cunning man in wrastling, turneth and windeth his body, and works himself in and out every way, to get an advantage of his adversary any way; therefore your cunning-headed men, your crafty men, are fitly presented under this word; they are like wrastlers, who turn and wind themselves in and out, and lie for all advantages; or, as we speak, they lie at catch. A man knows not where to have them, or what they mean, when they speak plainest, or swear solemnest: when we think we see their faces, we see but their vizards; all their promises and performances too, are under a disguise. Such cunning gamesters or wrestlers are here intended. One of the Patriarchs had this name (Gen. 30. 8.) Naphtali, and the reason is there given, for (saith his mother) with great wrastlings have I wrastled with my sister, and I have prevailed; and she called his name Naphthali: The Hebrew is, with wrastlings of God, that is, divine and vehement wrastlings; as if she had said, I have used great and earnest endeavours, both with God in prayer, and all other means, as a wrastler, by might and slight, to obtain these blessing (given before to my sister) and now I have prevailed. And it is observable, that the Hebrews call an extraordinary cunning wrastler, Pethalthol, which is this word doubled in the latter syllable; because he is a man of double or extraordinary skill in wrestling, the word is doubled; and so it expresses one that is double witted, or that hath craft enough for two or three, though not honesty enough for one. And this word is applied to the Lord himself (Psal. 18. 26.) With the froward thou wilt shew thy self froward; that is, if men will be winding and turning, and thinking to catch others, or over-reach the Lord himself, with tricks and turnings of wit, the Lord will meet and answer them in their own kind, he can turn as fast as they, he can put himself into such intricate Labyrinths of infinite wisdom and sacred craft, as shall entangle and ensnare the most cunning wrestler or tumbler of them all. Some of the Greeks interpret this elegantly by a word in that Language, noting a thing that hath many knots, folds or twists, wreaths or plaits in it, as plaited hair, or a folded garment, thereby shadowing out men like a Serpent, of knotted, twisted, enfolded spirits, men who wreath and plait their actions so closely and artificially, that few can understand or tell what to make of them, or where to find them: The counsels of these cunning, intricate, froward men,

Are carried headlong.] It is very observable (Isa. 44. 25.) how the Prophet threatneth, that the counsels of the wise shall be turned backward; and here, their counsels shall be carried headlong, that is, forward. God hath wayes of all sorts to cross ungodly policies; he turns them sometimes backward, and sometimes forward; by both, or either they are disappointed: Counsels are turned backward, when the event is quite cross to the design; or the motion of things, to the resolutions of the mind: As if a man purposing to go Eastward, should be turned about (he knows not how) with his face into the West: Counsels are carried headlong, when they go too fast forward, and make so much haste on in their way, that they tire and are out of breath, or stumble, and break themselves, before they can attain their journeyes end.

Omne consilium captum in festinatione est stultitia. Rab. Sol.

נמהרה à radice מהר accelerare, festinare, atque inde præcipitem esse, imprudentem, stultum; nam prudentia tranquilitate & deliberatione gaudet. Bruta impetu ruunt in suam pestem. Coc.

The Original word signifies to hasten, and thence to be precipitate, rash or foolish in counsel; Prudence uses to go softly, wisdom keeps a kind of state in her pace, and loves to go step by step, not headlong. A prudent man sets his head before his feet; his head goes before his feet in consultation, but he loves to go upon his feet, not upon his head, in action. It is the curse of the froward, their counsels are carried headlong; when they should go steadily upon their feet, they run upon their heads, or run their heads against the next wall. The meaning (in a word) is, They shall make more haste then good speed; or, they shall go so fast to their ends, that their end shall be their undoing. As the Lord (in mercy) makes the rash understand, so (in judgment) he makes the understanding rash. As this is here threatned, so the former is graciously promised (Isa. 32. 4.) The heart of the rash shall understand knowledge, and the tongue of the stammerer shall speak plainly. When the Prophet would shew, how great a blessing God poures out upon his people by Christ, he thus expresses it; Christ, who is the wisdom of the Father, causeth the heart of the rash to understand knowledge; it is the word of the Text, the heart of those who naturally run headlong upon businesses, who have no steadiness nor stableness in their understandings, shall be stayed and balanced with wisdom and gravity from above. Christ will take them off their hurrying pace, and teach them to go and do, to advise and act with sobriety and deliberation. The latter clause of the promise joints fitly with this; And the tongue of the stammerer shall speak plainly; such as stammering is to speech, the same is rashness to counsel: A man that stammers, huddles his words; he that hath an impediment in speech, speaks fastest; and and because he cannot speak one word well, he speaks many words at once. This haste is his hinderance; in making so much haste to speak, he cannot speak at all; therefore we usually advise stammerers, to take heed of speaking hastily, that they may speak plainly. The Prophet joines these sweetly, to note the compleat abilities of a Christian, The rash shall understand, and the stammerer shall speak plainly; that is, he shall advise judiciously, and speak elegantly; depth of wisdom, and sweetness of elocution shall meet in him, though before, rude and rustick. But the counsels of the froward, though men of great parts, and filed speech, shall be carried headlong. Hence observe,

Ut blæsitudo linguæ accelerationem habet cum hæsitatia, ut nihil expeditè pronunciare possit, & quo magis properat eo minus profecit, citata illa lingua volubilitate. Ita qui intelligentia festinus est, nullum profert utile & integrum consilium, sed manca omnia & inutilia. Bold

Hasty counsels are successeless counsels.

Haste in counselling, alwayes makes waste; and so doth hastiness in acting. Haste in either, may hurt, as much as sloth; though usually we may divide the miscarriages that are in the world, between hastiness in counsel, and slowness in action. I know not which is the greater prejudice to any honest design, to be quick in concluding, or to be dull in executing. They who will not take time to consult about what they do, may have time enough to repent of what they have done. And they who will not take the time for doing what they consult, lose all the time they took for consultation.

Secondly note, That, God disappoints evil counsels, as by stopping them, so by putting them forward.

The Princes of Zoan are become fools (saith the Prophet) Why? The Lord hath mingled a perverse Spirit (or a headlong, vertiginous spirit) in the midst thereof, and they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof, as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit, Isa. 19. 13, 14.

Verse 14. They meet with darkness in the day-time, and grope at noon-day, as in the night.

Here is a further aggravation of the misery upon crafty froward Counsellors, They meet with darkness in the day-time. Some understand this for the darkness of trouble, falling upon these men suddenly in the day of their prosperity; as if the Holy Ghost had said, In the day-time of their greatest glory, when they think their Sun at the height, then they are clouded and overcast, they meet with the darkness of sorrow, and are benighted in a moment, Amos 8. 9. I will cause the Sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day; (it is meant of great afflictions, as the next words interpret) And I will turn your feasts into mourning.

Diurnæ tenebræ ignorationem denotant rerum clarissimarum.

But rather by darkness in the day-time, we are to understand the ignorance of those things which are very plain and clear. They meet with darkness in the day-time, that is, they are puzled to find out and discover those things which are as clear as the light. God often sends such a spirit of giddiness and blindness upon the counsels of his enemies, that easie things are hard, plain things, obscure; and common questions, very riddles to them.

They meet with darkness in the light.

There is a double light necessary to the seeing or discovery of a thing. First, An external light. And secondly, An internal light. External light is of the Medium or place in which we see; the air must be enlightned: Internal light is of the Organ or instrument by which we see; the eye must be enlightned. Though there be much light in the air, a blind eye sees nothing. So the meaning of these words may be explained [They meet with darkness in the day-time] though these men have outward light, though the business they are about, be plain, a clear case (as we speak) yet they are so darkned in their understandings, that they cannot apprehend or make it out. The Idol-Shepherd is threatned with this wo, Zech. 11. 17. The sword shall be upon his arm (his power shall be broken) and upon his right eye (his understanding shall be darkned). The Idol-Shepherd shall be like an Idol, having eyes, but seeing not; he was before a blind Seer, sinfully, and now he shall be a blind Seer judicially. As that wicked Priest, so these wicked Politicians in the Text, shall have a sword upon their right eye, a wound in the best of their understandings, which shall make them also blind Seers, and make the light to be darkness round about them. The latter clause clears it farther.

They grope at noon-day, as in the night.

Palpare in meridie, cæci periphrasis. Cæcus tentat & palpat manibus an tequam pedem figat.

To grope at noon-day.] is the description of a blind man. For what the eye is to a man that sees, the same is the hand to a man that cannot see. A man that sees, looks his way, but a blind man feels it; his hand is instead of an eye, to direct his way. They, as it is said in the Text, grope at noon-day, as in the night. When the Sodomites were smitten with blindneſs, they wearied themſelves to find the door of Lot's houſe, Gen. 19. 11. And when the Philiſtines had put out Samſon's eyes, and he was brought to make them muſick at their Feaſt, he ſaid to the Lad that held him by the hand, Suffer me that I may feel the pillars whereupon the houſe ſtandeth, &c. He could not ſee them, but he could grope ot feel them out. Groping infers either want of light, or want of ſight. Theſe in the Text had light enough, therefore the failing was in their eyes; They grope at noon-day. This fearful judgment the Lord threatens againſt his own people, Deut. 28. 29. Thou ſhalt grope at noon-day, as the blind groperh in darkneſs. And it was brought upon them, as themſelves lamentably complain, Iſa. 59. 10. We grope for the Wall like blind men, and we grope, as if we had no eyes, we ſtumble at noon-day, as in the night.

In that it is here added as a further aggravation of the judgment of God upon theſe, who thought themſelves Eagle-eyed, all eye, and all the world blind, That they ſhall meet with darkneß in the day time; we may obſerve, Firſt, It is a ſore judgment not to ſee when there is light.

It is like ſtarving at a full Table, or periſhing with thirſt, in the midſt of a Fountain. It is a great judgment not to have light to ſee by; but it is a greater judgment not to ſee by the light. It is a great judgment to a people, when they have not the light of the Goſpel; when Chriſt, who is the light, is not ſhiningly preached among them; but if light ſhine, if Chriſt be preached, and a people ſee it not, this is a far greater judgment. The poor Gentiles, before the light of the Goſpel came to them, ſate in darkneſs and in the ſhadow of death; and in that eſtate, they could only (like blind men) grope after God; as the Apoſtle elegantly expreſſes it, Acts 17. 27. He hath made of one blood all Nations of men, &c that they ſhould ſeek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him. The Gentiles were inexcuſable, if they did not find the Lord by feeling after him in the dark: what then are they, who find him not by ſeeing in the light? The Apoſtle ſhews us them as as loſt men, and blinded by Satan, to whom the light of the glorious Goſpel doth not ſhine, when it ſhines (2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.) To grope in Goſpel-light, to be in darkneſs, when truth is at her high-noon, is as the ſhadow of death. It is the worſt of ſins to ſin againſt the light; and it is the worſt of judgments, not to ſee the light, by which we may avoid ſin. The heat of divine wrath breaks out in this, when abuſed light is puniſhed with want of ſight, or when light is ſent, and eyes taken away (Iſa. 6. 9, 10.) When the Prophet brought killing light to the Jews, he ſaith, See ye indeed, but perceive not, that is, becauſe ye have had light, and would not ſee believingly; now ye ſhall have light which ye ſhall not ſee, perceivingly, or diſtinctly; as the man in the Goſpel ſaw, but he did not perceive; when he ſaw men walking as trees, he had not a diſtinguiſhing eye, or a diſcerning ſence, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Heb. 5. 14. But why ſhall they not perceive, when they ſee? The Prophet tells us, becauſe the Lord had ſaid, Shut their eyes, leſt they ſee. The work of a Prophet is to open eyes; but when men wilfully ſhut their eyes, then God ſhuts them judicially, and blinds them with light. The Apoſtle quoting this text, Acts 28. 27. expounds it ſo, Their eyes have they cloſed, leſt they ſhould ſee; for this, God cloſed them, that they could not ſee. Paul was preaching, and he preached Chriſt the true light, the Son of righteouſneſs: Behold the miſery ſpoken of in this Text, They met with darkneſs in the day-time. This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkneſs rather then light. Why love they darkneſs? becauſe they ſee not the light; And becauſe they ſee not the light, therefore they cannot love it. It is impoſſible to ſee the light, the beautiful face of the Truth, as it is revealed in Chriſt, and not to love it. A Heathen ſaid, if virtue (much more if Goſpel-truth) were ſeen, every eye would be taken, and every heart led captive by it. A great part of the world hath not this light to ſee, and the greateſt part of thoſe, who have this light, ſee it not. They muſt needs meet with darkneſs, who are darkneſs, in the day-time; and they muſt grope at noon-day, as in the night, who are in the night. If men hear the Law and the Teſtimony, and neither ſpeak nor do according to that wotd, it is (as the Prophet gives the reaſon) becauſe there is no light in them; or as the Hebrew, No Morning in them, Iſa. 8. 20. Till the day-ſtar ariſes in our hearts, the day before our eyes, is night.

Secondly obſerve, Plain things are often obſcure to the wiſeſt and moſt knowing men.

They grope at noon-day, as in the night.] That which a man may ſee with half an eye (as we ſay) theſe men, who think themſelves all eye, cannot ſee. Men of acute and ſagacious underſtandings, men quick-ſighted like Eagles, prove as dull as Beetles. Owles and Bats ſee in the dark, better then in the light; and (in a ſence) it is true of theſe, they can ſee about the works of darkneſs, but the light of holineſs and juſtice, they cannot ſee. The reaſon is given in that of Chriſt, The light that in them is darkneſs; no wonder then, if the light without them be darkneſs, if the inward light, the light that is in them, be darkneſs, how great is that darkneſs? ſo great, that it quite darkens the outward light. Inward darkneſs is to outward light, as a great outward light is to a ſmall one (in regard of our uſe and benefit) it extinguiſhes and overcomes it. Hence theſe men cannot ſee the plaineſt object in the cleareſt light. Light ſhineth in darkneſs, and the darkneſs comprehendeth it not, John 1. 5.

Chriſt breaketh forth into a vehement gratulation to his Father (Mat. 11. 25. I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, becauſe thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe and prudent, and haſt revealed them unto Babes. The wiſe and prudent could not ſee ſo much as children. They were ſo wiſe in their own conceits, that the could not conceive the things of God. As it is in ſpiritual's, ſo likewiſe, in regard of civil counſels. God hides wiſdom from the wiſe, and underſtanding from the prudent. They ſhall not be able to do or ſee, what a child might have done or ſeen; they ſhall do ſuch things, and ſo abſurdly, that a child would not do them. Myſteries are plain, when the Lord opens, and plaineſt things are myſterious, when he ſhuts the eyes of our underſtanding.

Thus far Eliphaz hath ſet forth the power and juſtice of God againſt ſubtil, crafty counſellors. Now he ſhews the oppoſite effect of his power and goodneſs.

Verſe 15. But he ſaveth the poor from the ſword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty.

But he ſaveth the poor.] It is very obſervable in Scripture, that uſually, if not alwayes, after the mention of judgment and wrath upon the wicked, the mercy, goodneſs and love of God unto his own people, are repreſented; leſt any ſhould think, that judgment is a work wherein God delighteth, he quickly paſſeth from it, and concludes in what he delighteth; Mercy. As he retains not his anger for ever towards his own people, ſo he ſtayes not long upon the deſcription of his anger againſt his enemies, becauſe he delighteth in mercy, Mich. 7. 18. A ſubject of mercy is moſt pleaſant both to the hand and pen of the Lord. He wiſhes rather to write in honey then in gall, and to draw golden lines of love, then bloody lines of wrath. Satan is a Deſtroyer, and he doth nothing but deſtroy and pull down. The Lord deſtroyeth, and he pulleth down; he defeats and diſappointeth, but he hath another work beſides; he ſaves and delivers, he builds up and revives the hopes of his people.

He ſaveth the poor.] Theſe poor are Gods poor. Some may be called the Devils poor, for they have done his work, and he hath given them poverty for their wages. Satan will give all his hirelings full pay, when they die; the wages of ſin is death; while they live, many of them receive only the Earneſt of it, poverty and trouble; all that are poor, and not under the rich influences of this promiſe, He ſaveth the poor. Wicked poor are no more under Gods protection, then wicked oppreſſors or wicked rich men are. This poor man cried, and the Lord heard, Pſal. 34. 6. Not every or any poor man. Some poor men may cry, and the Lord hear them no more then he did the cry of Dives, the rich man in hell, Luke 16. Forget not the Congregation of thy poor, Pſal. 74. 19. Thy poor, by way of diſcrimination; There may be a greater diſtance between poor and poor, then there is between poor and rich. There are many ragged Regiments, Congregations of poor, whom the Lord will forget for ever: But his poor ſhall be ſaved. And theſe poor are of two sorts; either poor in regard of wealth and outward substance, or poor in regard of friends or outward assistance. A rich man, especially a godly rich man, may be in a poor case, destitute and forsaken, wanting patronage and protection; God saveth his poor in both notions, both those that have no friends, and those that have no estates.

אביון à radice אבה quod est desiderare, quasi pauper omnia desideret, cum nihil habeat; inde Æbion hæreticus, quasi mentis & intelligentiæ inops. Schind. Quia omnibus indiget, omnia cupit, & grata habet Rab. Dav.

The Hebrew word for Poor, springs from a root signifying desire; and the reason is, because poor men are commonly rich in desires. They that are full of sensible wants, are full of earnest wishings: They that are emptiest of enjoyments, are fullest of hopes and longings. And the reason why poverty of spirit, in our spiritual estate, is pronounced a blessing, is, because the poor in spirit are full of desires after spiritual riches. They are ever craving and seeking to be filled with that fulness which is in Christ, with grace for grace; they would have the image of every grace in Christ, engraven upon their souls. Or (in a holy covetousness) they would be as rich in grace as Christ is, grace for Grace; as a covetous man would have penny for penny, pound for pound with his richest neighbour; or as an ambitious man would have honour for honour, title for title, with his greatest Neighbour. That Christian who sees his estate lowest, usually sets his desires highest; his affections are ever upon the wing for supplies from Christ. Both the civil poor man, and the spiritual poor soul, would fain be enriched.

He saveth the poor from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty.

Some read this by apposition, he saveth the poor from the sword, their mouth, making the latter to be but an exposition of the former, from the sword their mouth, that is, their mouth is the sword, from which God saveth his poor. So taken, it is a truth; for the mouth is a sharp sword, as killing as any instrument or engine of war. Hence others, who keep this sence, read it thus, He saveth the poor from the sword of their mouth; or, from the killing stroak of their mouth: making the particle Mem, in the Original, to govern the Genitive Case, The Sword of their mouth, or, the Sword coming out of the mouth. There are two Swords of the mouth, two coming out of the mouth, or one double-edged. 1. Slander. 2. False-witness: by which, often the reputation, and sometime the person of a man is murdered.

A gladio oris eorum. Vulg. Ab occisione oris eorum. Chal. Ut Mem indicet Genitivum. מחרב מפ הם Gladius oris est ipse lingua mala i. e. calumnia falsa, qua homo tanquam gladio necatur. Sed melius à gladio qui ex ore ipsorum, i. e. à falsis testimoniis. Dru.

But I conceive that the clearest meaning of the Original (though both are good) is, to read these as distinct evils, from which He saveth the poor; namely, 1. From the sword. And, 2. From their mouth. 3. From the hand of the mighty. That is, From Nimrods, mighty hunters, oppressors of the poor, or from the violent man. I returned (saith the Preacher, Eccles. 4. 1.) and considered all the oppressions that are done under the Sun, and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of the oppressors there was power, but they had no comforter. Oppressors are alwayes cloathed with power, and the oppressed seldom find so much pity from men, as to be their comforters. Therefore for the oppression of the poor, and the cry of the needy, the Lord arises, and he saves his poor.

From the { Slaying Sword. / Slandering Tongue. / Oppressing Hand.

These three wayes, crafty, powerful men seek to destroy the poor. First, By the Sword, to cut off their lives. Secondly, By Slander, to blemish and blot out their good Names. Thirdly, By strong Hand, to captivate their persons, or oppress their estates and liberties. To be saved from all these destructions, is compleat salvation. Let the wicked attempt as many wayes as they will or can, to destroy, the Lord both will and can find out as many wayes to save. The malice of man shall never out-act or overmatch the mercy of God. He saveth the poor from the sword, &c.

I should here more distinctly open these great evils, the Sword, the Mouth, and the hand of the mighty, with the goodness of God in saving his poor from them: But these particulars occur again, v. 20, 21. Where you may find a more distinct explication of them. From these words thus far opened, Observe,

First, To what all the Devices and crafty Counsels of ungodly Politicians tend.

Here we have the issue or English of their counsels, the meaning of their State-mysteries is interpreted, Oppression. Their craft concludes in cruelty, and their witty devices, in drawn Swords, slandering Tongues, or the Hands of violence. We may say of them as Jacob of his Sons Simeon and Levi, Gen. 49. 5, 6. Instruments of cruelty are in their habitations. O my Soul, come not thou in their secret, for in their anger they will slay men, and in their self-will dig down a wall.

Secondly, Observe their method. First, here is the bloody Sword.

They will cut them off, and rid their hands of them, if they can.

They could wish (as that bloody Roman Emperor) that the heads of their supposed enemies (possibly their best friends) were set upon one shoulder, and that they might cut them all off at one blow. But if God save his poor from the mouth of the Sword, then the next weapon is the sword of their mouths; slanders and defamations, lies and false accusations shall reach them, whom Iron and steel, pike and shot cannot. The tongue is a little member, but it is a world of iniquity, and boasteth (often acteth) great things, Jam. 3. 5, 6.

But if God saves his poor from both mouth and sword, so that their enemies cannot prevail at sharps; then they try at blunts, by a heavy hand, to over-load, oppress and keep them down, in their Estates, Liberties and Prividelges.

Thirdly Observe, That, Salvation is of the Lord.

The Faith of David grasped this, as his richest treasure, Psal. 68. 20. He that is our God, he is the God of salvation. The Lord is called the God of salvation, as the God of comfort, both affirmatively and negatively. Salvation is to be had in him, and there is no salvation to be had without him. Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills, and from the multitude of mountains (from Armies, from counsels, from the power and policies of men) in the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel, Jer. 3. 23.

Fourthly, It is observable Against whom these crafty cruel men muster up and levie the united forces of Sword, Tongue and Hand.

They are the poor. He saveth the poor. Why, will not God save the rich? will he not save the mighty, the Princes of the earth? Yes, God will save all that fear him, both high and low, rich and poor. Why then is it said, He saveth the poor? As it were, determining salvation upon them. The reason is, because, as the poor are most easily oppressed, so usually they are most oppressed: Where the hedge is lowest, men go over fastest. And because, for the most part, Gods people are poor, comparatively to others; they are the vallies, the lower part of the Earth, and wickedness is commonly advanced upon the mountains of wealth, honour and greatness; therefore the denomination is taken from them: He saveth the poor: They whom God loves most, the World loves least, they have least of the World. The World gives most to its own; and God hath given his own so much beyond the world, that, the loss of a world is not discerned in their Estate, and worldly gains are not often discernable in their Estates; therefore, though in Christ, they are heirs of all things, and all is theirs, yet their rank and titles are among the poor.

Fifthly observe, they are poor ones; yet what devising and plotting is here against them? Crafty counsels, drawn swords, envenom'd tongues, strong hands lifted up, Against whom are all these? Against the poor. Hence note,

That, Wicked men plot against the people of God, how poor and low soever they be.

As David said unto Saul (1 Sam. 24. 14.) After whom is the King of Israel come out? after a dead dog, after a flea? As if he had said, whom dost thou pursue? thou dost that which is unworthy, and much below so great a King; wilt thou set thy strength against my weakness? Why dost thou arm against him, by whose conquest thou canst get no honour? Alas, I am but a poor man, a mean subject, no match for thee; I wonder you trouble your self so much in following or opposing me: I am (in comparison) but as a dead dog, or as a flea. A dead dog cannot bite; or if I bite, it is but a flea-bite: A dead dog can do no hurt, and a living flea can do but little. The people of God (as such) never have any will to do wrong, and it is seldom that they have any power to do wrong; and yet the world is all up in pursuit against them: What's the reason of it? what's the matter? The truth is, how poor and low soever they are, yet there is an eye of jealousie awake upon them. The world looks upon them as a suspected party: the world hath secret misgivings, that one time or other, they must rise upon their ruines; and therefore they will keep them down (yes, that they will) as long as they can. What a distance was there between Haman and Mordecai? the one sate in the gate, and the other stood at the Kings elbow, and had his ear, yea, and his signet (upon the matter) at his command: yet this Haman must needs oppress Mordecai, because he would not bow: Haman had a jealous eye upon him, he was a suspected person; though he cou'd not reach Haman, yet Haman fear'd he might undermine him.

Again, There is a continual Antipathy between the two seeds; and Antipathy is incurable: To oppose the godly, is not so much the disease, as the nature of wicked men: And we know, Antipathies are against the whole kind; revenge against this, or that Individual, is no ease to it; Antipathy is not spent, but in the consumption of the whole kind. It is not this or that sheep which the Wolf hates, but every sheep, fat or lean, shorn or unshorn, that's all one to the Wolf; he will suck the blood of a sheep that hath not a lock of Wool on his back, as greedily as if that sheep had a Golden Fleece. Let a godly man be poor or rich, low or high, their sword shall be unsheath'd, and their mouth opened against him: the old hatred and quarrel is against all. Haman thought scorn to lay hands on Mordecai alone, wherefore Haman thought to destroy all the Jews, Esth. 3.6. He hated those whom he never saw, those who had never wrong'd him, haply had bowed to him; yet, because Jews, die they must.

Sixthly observe (But he saveth the poor.)

God delights to help the poor: He loves to take part with the best, though the weakest side.

Contrary to the course of most, who when a controversie arises, use to stand in a kind of indifferency or neutrality, till they see which part is strongest, not which is justest. Now if there be any consideration (besides the cause) that draws or engages God; it is the weakness of the side. He joynes with many, because they are weak; not with any, because they are strong; therefore he is called, the helper of the friendless, and with him the fatherless (the Orphans) find mercy: By fatherless, we are not to understand such only whose parents are dead, but any one that is in distress; as Christ promiseth his Disciples, John 14.18. I will not leave you Orphans, that is helpless, and (as we translate) comfortless; though ye are as children without a Father, yet I will be a Father to you. Men are often like those clouds, which dissolve into the Sea, they send presents to the rich, and assist the strong; but God sends his rain upon the dry Land, and lends his strength to those that are weak. This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles. Forget not the Congregation of thy poor for ever. The truth is, he never forgets them: They are graven upon the palms of his hands; such poor are his treasure, his Jewels, as the Signet upon his right hand; therefore alwayes in his eye, yea, alwayes in his heart, though they lie in the dirt, or be trodden under foot, like mire in the streets. The Prophet makes this report to God of himself (Isa. 25.4.) Thou hast been a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy in his distress, a refuge from the storm, &c.

Thus far Eliphaz hath given instance of the great, marvellous and unsearchable works of God, in a double reference: First, to wicked crafty oppressors. Secondly, to poor helpless innocents. He shuts up this Narration with a double effect of these works upon those two sorts of men. First, shewing what effect they produce in the poor; namely, Hope. Secondly, what in the wicked; namely, shame and confusion of face.

Verse 16. So the poor hath hope, and iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

Here is the conclusion or result of all, the Epiphonema or exulting clause, in which Eliphaz perfects the story of those admirable acts of judgment and of mercy; So the poor hath hope.

This original word for [poor] varies from the former, though the persons and their estate be the same: That word noted them full of desire, and this (which is the cause of it) empty of comforts: Properly it signifies one that is exhausted or drawn dry. Poor persons are exhausted persons; exhausted of their strength, exhausted of their estates, exhausted of friends and credit in the world. It is a Metaphor taken from Rivers, Ponds or Pools, that are drawn dry, when we would take the fish, or take away the defence which they give to Forts or Cities, Isa. 19.6. And they shall turn the Rivers far away, and the Brooks of Defence shall be emptied and dried up: Which also enlightens that Text, Isa. 33.21. There the righteous Lord will be unto us a place of broad Rivers. A River which shall not be drawn dry or sluced out (as Euphrates was by Cyrus, when he took Babylon) but shall fill its banks and shores perpetually; that is, the Lord will be there a perpetual defence; a River that shall never be impoverished, but shall keep a full stock and treasure of streams and waters.

Exhaustus, de humore proprie, per metaphoram de viribus corporis & opibus, attenuatus, tenuis fortunæ homo.

Delilah had her name from this root, and it carries an elegant allusion to the qualities of all Delilahs, or insinuating lascivious women; they drain the strength, exhaust the purses, dry up the credit, waste the All of the mightiest Samsons, whose hearts are entangled by their flatteries, or ensnared by their beauties.

The poor have hope.] The word hath been opened at the sixth verse of this Chapter, to note strong and earnest expectation: The poor man observing the wonders which God doth in the world, cannot be out of hope, though he be out of possession; and though his own strength be gone, yet he lives upon the strength of Christ; he hopes strongly (that's the force of the word) when he feels no strength. When I am weak (saith the Apostle Paul, 2 Cor. 12.10.) then am I strong; that is, I am strongest (through hope) in Christ, when I am weakest, through sense, in my self.

More distinctly, this hope may be taken two wayes.

1. For the Object, or thing hoped for.
2. For the Act or Grace of hope.

In the former notion of hope, the sence runs thus; God having taken the wise in their own craftiness, and disappointed the devices of the crafty, having delivered the poor from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty, now the poor hath the thing he looked for, the thing he prayed for, the thing for which he hath been seeking and waiting upon God: So the poor hath hope, that is, he hath the mercy he expected, salvation from the sword, &c. he is made partaker of his hope, by those glorious administrations of the justice and mercy of God. Hence observe,

First, God's poor hope for good in the worst times.

When deliverance comes, these poor have but that which they looked for; they looked for light when they were in the darkest condition. When they were exhausted, they knew God was not exhausted; and when they were drawn dry, they knew the Lord was not; though their treasure was spent, yet they were assured the treasury of Heaven was full: When strength is gone, and Money is gone, and Friends are gone, yet God is not gone; and therefore they know the good may come which they hope for. Turn ye to the strong holds, ye prisoners of hope, saith the Prophet, Zech. 9.12. The people of God (though prisoners) are yet prisoners of hope, that is, they have hope of deliverance and enlargement, in their greatest streights: The power of God is never imprisoned, and while his people can make this out, their spirits are not.

Secondly observe, It is no vain thing to hope in God.

The

The poor hath his hope. The Prophet brings in the Jews thus triumphing in God (Isa. 25. 9.) And it shall be said in that day: What day was that? The former verse points it out, A day wherein death shall be swallowed up in victory, wherein tears shall be wiped away from off all faces, &c. And in that day, the people of God shall thus boast of God, and (as it were shewing him to the World) shall say, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us: This is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoyce in his salvation; vain hopes fill our faces with shame; but hopes fulfilled, fill our hearts with rejoycing. The poor hath his hope; he can shew his hope, 'tis visible: As Hannah, when she came to present her son unto Eli, For this child I prayed, as if she should say, Sir, here is my prayer; you could not hear my prayer, when I was in the Temple, you thought I was drunken; but now you may see my prayer, here it is, for this child I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him, 1 Sam. 1. 27. So the soul saith, In such a time of trouble, Personal or National, I was praying and seeking God, I was believing and hoping; men knew not, understood not the workings of my soul toward Christ, yet now they may see them; here is the thing I prayed for, here is that I hoped for; So (first) the poor hath hope.

Secondly, The poor hath hope, that is, the grace of hope or the gracious actings of hope; and taking it so, the sence rises thus: So (that is) God having done such great things, in disappointing the devices of the crafty, and in saving his poor, by this means, the poor come to have hope; the grace of hope strengthned and confirmed in them.

> Hence Observe, That, the experience we have of Gods power and mercy, in saving us out of former troubles, breeds and nourishes hope, against future times of trouble.

So the poor hath hope. Though the poor man was in a hopeless condition before; yet now seeing the works of God, he hath hope laid up for ever, Psalm 64. 9, 10. All men shall fear and declare the Works of God, for they shall wisely consider of this thing: And what follows? The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, and trust in him; that is, if they have fail'd in their trust heretofore, and not given God honour by confiding in him; yet these wonderful works of God (of which he speaks in that Psalm) work this hope; Rom. 5. 4. Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope. Graces have a generation one from another, though all have but one Generation from Christ at once. We have here the genealogy of hope in three descents. Experience is the next, or immediate parent of hope. So the poor hath hope. Thus it is begotten, 2 Cor. 1. 10. God who hath delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in him we trust, that he will yet deliver us. An Armed daring Goliah, should be looked upon, as vanquisht already, when we can but remember a vanquisht Lion and a Bear.

Again, The poor hath hope: He doth not say, God having thus destroyed the ungodly, and saved his own people from the sword, &c. Now they have liberty, now they have peace, now they have abundance of riches and prosperity; but he makes this the issue, now they have hope.

> Whence Note, That, hope is a greater and better possession unto the people of God here, then all the great and good things which they possess.

Put as much into their hands as you can, there is more then that put in their hearts by hope. The poor hath hope: he looks over all his possessions, and pitcheth upon expectation as his Portion. The estate which a believer hath in the promises, is more then the estate he hath in possession: Riches in the promise, is better then riches in the chest. And so the deliverances and protections which are laid up for the Saints in promises, are more then all the deliverances and protections received and enjoyed: There is no enjoyment but that in Heaven (where we shall enjoy all that ever was promised) so good as hope, for what is promised. Alexander an Heathen, had such a notion about an earthly hope, which had no ground neither, but the great things his own ambition promised him: for when one seeing him give away all his present inheritances, said, What Sir, will you make your self a beggar? No (saith he) I will reserve hope for my self.

And iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

Here is the opposite effect, iniquity; the abstract is put for the concrete, iniquity, for men of iniquity; wicked men, these stop their mouthes. And it is observable, that as before God made them active in their own destruction, so here he makes them active in their own silence; he saith not, God stoppeth their mouthes, but they stop their own mouths; that is, the wicked seeing those wonderful works of God, have not a word to say, nor a counsel to give more against the godly; they are as mute as fishes, as dumb as dogs, they know not how to slander, or of whom to complain, and therefore they suspend, and enjoyn silence upon themselves. As that word of Christ, Friend how camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding garment (Matth. 22. 12.) so these works of Christ shall make his enemies speechless. Iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

Perspectâ hac Dei providentiâ erga pauperes & humiles, maligni & nocendi studiosi retrahent se, neq; inter se apliuineant prava & iniqua adversus pios consilia. Aquin.

This stopping their mouths, is caused two wayes; First, from shame; A man is sometime silent, because he is ashamed to speak; disappointments (especially such as theirs before noted) produce shame naturally, and shame makes silent. A man that blushes much, speaks little; and he that dares not lift up his head, will not be forward to lift up his voice, Mich. 7. 16. I will shew marvellous things (saith the Lord, and what then?) The Nations shall see and be confounded; they shall lay their hand upon their mouth, their ears shall be deaf: They shall see it, and be confounded, that is, they shall be greatly ashamed; confusion of face is but shame heightned, and the Holy Ghost puts shame and confusion of face together in divers places. Now this great shame layes their hands upon their mouths, and puts their fingers in their ears; they are resolvedly both dumb and deaf, at the sight of those marvellous things.

Secondly, Admiration and amaizment silence them: The works of God being marvellous, they shall stand admiring and wondring at them, till they cannot speak. Read the like, Isa. 52. 15. & Psal. 107. 42. where, when the Prophet had reckoned up many wonderful works of God, he concludes as in the Text, vers. 42. He setteth the poor on high, &c. the righteous shall see it and rejoyce, and all iniquity shall stop her mouth; while the Lord seems to do nothing, or to do but little, iniquity will do nothing, but talk, or it talks very much, it is very talkative; but if once God begin working, iniquity has done speaking, you shall hear no more of them, till the next success on their side.

> Then Observe, First, Wicked men will never cease slandering and censuring, bragging and boasting, till some eminent judgment stops their mouths.

So iniquity stoppeth her mouth, they will never stop their mouths before: Isa. 26. 11. Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see; but they shall see and be ashamed for their envy at thy people: I will make the judgment bigger and and greater; write my wrath in fairer, or rather bloodier Characters, that they may see them: As small judgments will not open the eyes of wicked men, so small judgments will not stop their mouthes; but when God begins to work wonders, they are dumb, they have done.

> Secondly Observe, That, God will do such things for his people, as shall put the crafty to silence.

The Saints ought to live so holily, That by well doing they may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. 2. 15. The Lord will do so justly and gloriously, as shall put to silence the malice of the wisest men: These two, the holiness of the Saints, and the Justice of God, are stopples in the mouths, or the stop-mouths of ungodly men. As they by unrighteous acts have stopped other mens mouths, and silenced them, so God by terrible things in righteousness, will stop their mouths, and silence them for ever: They shall have nothing to say at last, either against the justice of God, or against the innocency of his People; against both these their mouths chiefly open. They impute and fasten unrighteousness on God: you talk of God, and boast of his promises; where is he? where are they? The Prophet brings them in, belching out such blasphemies (Isa. 5. 19.) They say, let him make speed and hasten his work, that we may see it; and let the counsel of the holy One of Israel, draw nigh and come that we may know it. Words filled with as high a ſence of ſpiritual wickedneſs, as wit and malice can infuſe. They jeer the patience of God as ſlackneſs, and as if Juſtice it ſelf were tired, or too ſlow-pac'd, they ſpur it on, to ruine themſelves. You have often told us of the Holy One of Iſrael, and what he would do, but threatned men live long we ſee. You are nimbler of your tongues, then your Holy One of Iſrael is of his hands. Therefore let him make ſpeed (if he can) and haſten his work, that we may ſee it.

Will not the jealouſie of the Lord awake, at the noiſe of this helliſh blaſphemy? will he not ſtop the mouth of this iniquity? ſurely he will: And the Prophet aſſures us he will at verſ. 24. Therefore as the fire devoureth the ſtubble, and as the flame conſumeth the chaff; ſo their Root ſhall be rottenneſs, and their bloſſoms ſhall go up as duſt. But how doth the fire devour the ſtubble? how doth the flame conſume the chaff? even in a moment; fire needs no blowing, to make it take hold of dry ſtubble: Stubble is at once flame and aſhes. So ſpeedy ſhall the conſumption of theſe men be, who called the Lord to make ſpeed; then (I believe (they'l no more bid him make haſte. The mouth of this iniquity will be ſtopt for ever. Our God ſhall come, and ſhall not keep ſilence. A fire ſhall devour before him, Pſalm 50. 3. And then the wicked ſhall be ſilent in darkneſs, 1 Sam. 2. 9. The fire of wrath is all heat, no light.

Laſtly, All the ſlanders againſt the innocency of the Saints ſhall be ſo confuted, that the adverſary ſhall have nothing to ſay againſt them. Their innocency ſhall be made as clear as the light, and their juſtice as the noon-day: Yea God will ſo order it, that theſe crafty oppreſſors ſhall carry a juſtification of God, and of his people in their own hearts. Their conviction ſhall be ſo ſtrong, and their light ſo clear, that iniquity it ſelf ſhall not be able to gain-ſay, but muſt ſtop it's mouth for ever.

VERS. 17, 18.

Behold happy is the man, whom God correcteth; therefore deſpiſe not thou the chaſtening of the Almighty.
For he maketh ſore, and bindeth up: he woundeth, and his hands make whole.

WE have finiſhed the firſt branch of Exhortation, begun verſ. 8. wherein Eliphaz moves Job, to ſeek to God, and unto God to commit his cauſe; with the ſeveral arguments and reaſons, ſtrengthning that Exhortation. At this verſ. 17. Eliphaz begins a ſecond branch of Exhortation, and it is continued to the end of the Chapter. We have the Exhortation (or Dehortation rather, for it is expreſt in the negative) in the latter clauſe of verſ. 17. Deſpiſe not thou the chaſtening of the Almighty.

The firſt Argument by which he quickens Job to receive this counſel, lies in the former part of the ſame verſe; Behold happy is the man, whom God correcteth: The Argument may be framed thus, That condition is not to be deſpiſed, wherein a man is truly happy; But under the correcting hand of God a man is truly happy: Therefore that condition is not to be deſpiſed. Behold (ſaith he) happy is the man, whom God correcteth; therefore deſpiſe not thou the chaſtning of the Almighty.

Behold, happy is the man.

To behold, calls here both for attention and admiration: For here is a ſtrange ſight, An afflicted man, a bleſſed man. Natural ſence and reaſon cannot agree about this conjunction. They know not how happineſs and correction ſhould meet, and kiſs the ſame perſon: Therefore raiſe up thy attention (ſaith Eliphaz) to conſider this wonder. When the Angel of the Lord appeared unto Moſes in a flame of fire out of the midſt of a buſh; he looked and behold the buſh burned with fire, and the buſh was not conſumed. And Moſes ſaid, I will now turn aſide, and ſee this great ſight, why the buſh is not burnt, Exod. 3. 2, 3. Such a great ſight, this Text ſhews us: A buſh burning, and not conſuming; yea a buſh burning, and yet flouriſhing; a buſh on fire, and yet a fruit-bearing buſh; a buſh blooming and bloſſoming with the pleaſanteſt and ſweeteſt fruit on Earth, or rather with the fruit of Heaven; fruit upoh which we ſhall feed for ever in Heaven; fruit, the taſte of which, makes a Heaven here on Earth, Happineſs. Well then, is this ſtrange ſight preſented to us, with A Behold.

Happy is the man whom God correcteth.

Happineſs is the enjoyment of good commenſurate to all our deſires. That's perfect happineſs. Happineſs is the ſum of all our deſires, and the aim of all our endeavours: and when we have attained perfect happineſs, we ſhall be at a full point, both of our deſire and endeavours.

But though all men have happineſs in their Eye (to be happy is their end, and this happineſs is but one.) Yet the wayes, which men have chalked out, as leading to happineſs, have been, not only various, but almoſt infinite. Some of the learned have reckoned up two or three Centuries, or hundreds of opinions, concerning this one point. And it is well obſerved, that men varied thus in opinion about happineſs, becauſe they thought the enjoyment of that, wherein any of them was defective, would make them happy. He that was poor, ſaid, I ſhould be happy, if I had riches, and thence grew his opinion, that happineſs conſiſted in riches: The ſick man ſaid, I ſhould be happy, if I had my health, and thence grew his opinion, that hapineſs conſiſted in health: Another was obſcure, mean and low, O (ſaid he) how happy were I, if I were honourable; and thence grew a third opinion, that happineſs conſiſted in honour: Thus they varied according to their particular neceſſities and intereſts. But amongſt all thoſe Opinioniſts, we meet not with any one, who pitcht upon this in the Text. This is a Paradox to them all; a natural man cannot place happineſs in correction: No Philoſopher or pure Moraliſt ever ſaid, Happy is the man, that is ſore; happy is the man, that is ſick; happy is the man, that is diſgraced; or happy is the man, that is in priſon: Theſe are riddles, ſuch as nature is not able to expound or make out; the Philoſopher would as ſoon place light in darkneſs, the Sun in a cloud, heat in coldneſs, the Element of fire in the water, as bleſſedneſs in ſufferings. Therefore no marvel if Eliphaz uſher it in, with a Behold; Behold happy is the man, whom God correcteth.

The word, Happy, is of the Plural number, or rather of the Dual in the Hebrew. Some tranſlate it in the Abſtract, Behold the bleſſedneſs of that man, whom God corrects: But it is fully rendred by the Adjective, as we; Behold happy is the man, &c.

אשרי Beatitudines, conſtat indeclinabile eſſe, & formam habere non tã pluralis quã dualis.

There is much contention amongſt the Grammarians about the word, whether it be abſtract or concrete; a Noun, or an Adverb: But I will not ſtay on thoſe, only conſider a little what accounts is given, why the word is uſed plurally or dually.

First, It is to increaſe the ſignification, and heighten the ſence; as noting the confluence of many good things in happineſs. Happineſs is not a ſingle good; happineſs conſiſts in the concurrence or meeting together of many good things: God, who is infinitely happy, infinitely bleſſed in himſelf, and an infinite bleſſing, all bleſſing to his people, is not a ſingle good, or a particular good, but he is all good, both to himſelf, and to his people. A godly man is happy in the largeſt ſence, in all ſences; becauſe his, is not this or that particular good, but all good. And he is not happy only at this or that particular time, but at all times. He is as happy, when he is ſuffering under the hand of God, as when he is ſerving God; as happy in his paſſive, as in his active obedience. And therefore the ſame word expreſſes his condition, both in the one, and in the other.

Beati beatitudo in multis bonitatibus conſiſtit. Rab. D.

Secondly, Becauſe there is a two-fold happineſs: Firſt, the happineſs of this life: And ſecondly, the happineſs of the next; Temporal happineſs, and Eternal happineſs; Corporal hpapineſs, and Spiritual happineſs, To note a complication of all theſe, the word may be given in the Dual or Plural number; he that is thus corrected, loſes not temporal happineſs, but he gains in ſpiritual, and toward eternal happineſs. The preſent and future happineſs of the Saints, the happineſs of grace and of glory, differ but in degrees: It is the ſame ſtate in a higher ſtature: The ſame book in a more correct edition and fairer letter. Theſe differ as a child from a man, or as the morning light from the light at high-noon; ſo then, this word includes all kinds and degrees of happineſs: yet, here it is properly to be underſtood of the happineſs of this life, which only is conſiſtent with correction: There are no rods in Heaven, and we shall be past children, before we come thither.

Simplex & genuina responsio est, quod nomen ipsum quo Hebræi beatitudinem notant, est plurale tantũ, ut Latinis opes, Divitiæ. Ames in Psal. 1.

Thirdly, We may answer plainly, that the word in the Hebrew is only Plural or Dual, being never read in the singular number: As in the Latine we have many the like words.

It is further observable concerning this word, that it is alwayes applied unto man, whereas the word (Barac) blessed, is applied both to God and man. This happiness is a special and peculiar happiness of man: The Lord being infinitely above, both obeying and suffering.

Happy is the Man.] Enosh, the Hebrew word for Man (of whom happiness under correction is predicated) is very sutable to this business of correction. Enoch signifies a sickly, weak, miserable man: We might render the full sence of the word thus, Happy is that miserable man, whom God corrects. That is, look upon a man according to the ordinary account of the World, and calculation of reason, he is a miserable man, a weak, sickly man; yet happy is this weak, sickly, miserable man in the account of God, and by the calculation of faith. Grace makes that good sence, which is a contradiction, both in nature and in reason: A miserable man, and a happy man, one and the same.

In Psalm 1. the word Ish is used, Blessed is the man, that is, Blessed is that excellent man, that holy man, that strong man, walking and delighting in the law of the Lord. Yea blessed with the same blessedness is that miserable man (smarting under the rod of the Lord) whom God correcteth.

And yet Blessedness is joyned with all the words, by which man is expressed. It is joyned with Adam, Psalm 32. 1. Blessed is the man whose iniquity is forgiven. Adam is the general word for Man, and is therefore most fitly joyned with Blessedness in pardon of sin, because all men are sinners, and no man can be blessed, except he be pardoned. Blessedness is joyned also with Geber, a strong, powerful and mighty man, Psal. 94. 12. Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O Lord, and teachest him out of thy Law; Blessed is (Geber) the great man, the honourable man, the highest by birth or place, whom thou chastenest.

Beatus Abrahã vir pius quem corripuit Deus. Chal. Parap.

The Chaldee Paraphrase restrains the word [Man] to an individual, to Abraham, as if Eliphaz had put the instance in Abraham, and said, Behold, happy was that holy man Abraham whom God corrected; therefore despise not thou the chastning of the Almighty: I can give thee a famous example of a godly man corrected; Abraham (thy Ancestor) met with afflictions, as well as thou, and yet he was a most happy man: therefore despise not thou the chastning of the Lord. But the word is general, and so we are to understand it; though this be a truth, in any or every instance among the servants of God.

I must yet put in a caution for the right understanding of this proposition, Blessed is the man, whom God corrects. The meaning is not, as if happiness were the portion of every miserable man, or of every man that is afflicted; do not think so; many are at once, corrected and cursed, troubled and miserable in trouble. To many, their present sorrows, are but the fore-tasts of eternal sorrows. As Christ spake in a common case, These things are but the beginning of sorrows: So we may say to the particular cases of many groaning under sickness, poverty, disgrace, &c. Alas, poor souls, ye are so far from being happy in these, that these are but the beginnings of your unhappiness; God doth but begin to call for some arrears, due to his justice, which ye must be a paying and satisfying to all eternity.

There is no happiness in affliction naturally considered; it is accidental to afflictions, that happiness is associated with them. Affliction in it self is grievous, and it would be only so to us, did not the over-ruling, admirable dispensations of God, temper, order, dispose, and work it to an end above its own nature; it is the art and wisdom of the Physitian, which corrects poysonous simples and ingredients, so, as to make them medicinable. And did not the wisdom and goodness of God, correct our corrections, they would not be medicine to us, but poyson; it is not correction, but the hand of God with it, and in it, which makes us happy.

Happy is the man, whom God correcteth.

יכח Argut, redarguit, corripuit,

The word, which we translate correct, signifies to reprove or to convince, by arguments or dispute; to argue a man down from his error, by the strength and clearness of reason or divine authority. So Levit. 19. 19. Thou shalt not suffer sin upon thy brother, thou shalt surely rebuke him. Thou shalt rebuke him, it is the word here used, that is, thou shalt bring such arguments, as may convince him of his sin, and lay his wickedness open before him. This word is applied to corrections and afflictions in Scripture, because with convictions, we feel corrections frequently joyned; the Lord argues the matter, and (as it were) disputes with some very long, who yet will not let in divine truth, nor be perswaded, though they are perswaded; What doth he then? Then he sends correction with his redargution, he cloaths his words with blows, disputes with a rod in his hand, and brings an argument from feeling, when reasoning prevails not. In this book of Job, Elihu shews it, Chap. 33. 16, 19. Then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction: he is chastened also with pain upon his bed.

Verba contra aliquẽ, disputando & ostendendo jus. Quod etsi verbis plerũq; fiat, pertinet tamen ea vox ad severiorẽ disciplinam & verbera, quæ cujuspiã peccati reprehensionem comitari solent. Pined.

Hence Observe, First, That, afflictions to the children of God at forest, are but corrections.

Blessed (or happy) is the man whom God corrects. You will say, but what is a correction? And how (in a strict sence) differenced from judgments and punishments, and wherein do they agree?

They agree, first, in the efficient cause. God layes his hand on man in both.

Secondly, They agree in the matter; the same evil, the same trouble to one man is a correction, to another a judgment.

Thirdly, They may agree also in the degree; a trouble or an affliction may fall and lie as heavy, and be as painful to sense upon a child of God, as upon the vilest wretch in the world; he may be as poor, as friendless, as sick, as sorrowful in his outward man, as any wicked man; he may lie in the same dungeon, and be bound with the same chain, he may be slain with the same sword, burnt at the same stake, eaten up with the same famine. So that both in the materiality, and likewise in the graduality of it, it may be the same on both, yet, upon one it is a correction, upon the other a judgment.

What then is this correction? And where will the correction and the judgment part?

I conceive, that the infirmities of the Saints, and the sins of the wicked differ, as judgments and corrections differ. Now look upon those sins, which we call the infirmities of the Saints; they may be the same in the matter, the same in kind, yea (possibly) the same in the degree (I mean respecting the outward rule given by God, and the outward act committed by man) with the sins of those who know not God, or who, in sinning, go against their knowledge.

Then, where do they part?

Surely, where corrections and judgments part: And where is that? Especially in two things.

1. In the manner how; 2. In the end why, they are inflicted.

First, The Lord never corrects his children with such a heart, as he carries in laying trouble upon the loyns of wicked men. The heart of God is turned toward his children, when he corrects them; but his heart is turned from a wicked man, when he punishes him. The Lord is even pained (that I may speak as the Scripture often doth in this point, after the manner of men) I say the Lord expresses himself as pained, as grieved, as if every stroak went to his own heart, when he strikes his children. When he is about to strike, he is (as it were) unresolved whether he shall strike or no; and as soon as he hath stricken, he (as it were) repents that he did strike them. All which motions of his heart the Lord shews us in the highest strains of passionate Rhetorick, Hos. 11. 8, 9. But when he takes the wicked in hand to punish them, we read of no passion ascribed to him, but these, delight or joy, and the effect of them, laughter: hatred or indignation, and the effect of these, mocking at them, Prov. 1. 26. I will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh. And when he resolves upon the destruction of his enemies, he speaks, as if then he had unburden'd himself, and his heart were lighter then before, Isa. 1. 24. Ah I will ease me of my adversaries, and avenge me of my enemies.

Secondly, The difference is as broad about the end. When God layes the rod of correction upon his child, he aimes at the purging out of his ſin, at the preventing of his ſin, at the revealing of a fatherly diſpleaſure againſt him for his ſin: The Lord would only have him take notice, that he doth not approve of him in ſuch courſes. When theſe ends are propoſed, every affliction is a correction. But the afflictions of the ungodly are ſent for other ends. Firſt, To take vengeance on them. Secondly, to ſatisfie offended juſtice; juſtice cries aloud againſt them, and they have nothing to interpoſe, but their bare backs or naked ſouls. The Lord comes as a ſevere Creditor, and bids them pay that which they owe, or ſuffer, and to priſon, becauſe they cannot pay.

Secondly obſerve, A Child of God is in a happy condition under all corrections.

As man (in a natural or civil capacity) at his beſt eſtate, is altogether vanity, Pſal. 39. 5. So, in a ſpiritual capacity, he is altogether happineſs, in his worſt outward eſtate: Happy is the man whom God corrects; he is a gainer by correction: If he loſeth any thing, it is but the droſs of his corruptions; By this therefore ſhall the iniquity of Jacob be purged, and this is all the fruit, to take away his ſin. Iſa. 27. 9. Corrections are not ſent to take away his comforts, but to take away his corruptions. That fire which God kindles upon his children, ſhall burn only (as it did the material bonds of the three Children in Daniel) the ſpiritual bonds of their iniquity that they may be more free to righteouſneſs. Again, Corrections are not manifeſtations of wrath, but an evidence of his love, and of their Son-ſhip. Whom I love, I chaſtize, Rev. 3. 21. And if ye endure chaſtening, God dealeth with you as with ſons, Heb. 12. 7. The love of God is better then life; and to be a ſon of God, is the higheſt priviledge of his love. Where ſhall we be happy, if not in that which aſſures us of ſuch love, and of love in ſuch a relation? Hence the Apoſtle concludes (2 Cor. 4. 12.) So then, death worketh in us; death, that is, our daily ſufferings and endurings. He ſpeaks (indeed) eſpecially of ſufferings for the truth, from the cruel hand of man; but it is true likewiſe of all ſufferings under the correcting hand of God: Thoſe ſtroaks which are deadly to our bodies, may yet work for us. And what work they? The ſeventeenth verſe anſwers the queſtion; Our light afflictions which are but for a moment, work for us a far more exceeding & eternal weight of glory. The ſufferings of the Saints are active, and their paſſions operative; But how do they work? Not by way of merit or earning (Our blood cannot oblige God) but by way of preparation. The Lord ſends afflictions, to faſhion and cleanſe our hearts, as fit veſſels to hold an exceeding weight of glory: our bearing the heavieſt afflictions, doth not weigh ſo much as the leaſt grain of glory, yet they fit our hearts for an exceedingly excellent weight of glory. We cannot ſay properly, that they work any glory; but by an Hyperbole in ſpeech, we ſay, they work towards an Hyperbole in glory.
